THAT Arabia, after the introduction of chriſtianity, was famous for hereſies, has been already obſerved. The Hamyarites were infected with the Arian hereſy in the reign of the emperor Conſtantius, as we learn from Theophilus Indus in Philoſtorgius. Some chriſtians of this nation believed, that the ſoul died with the body, and was to be raiſed again with it at the laſt day. Theſe Origen is ſaid to have convinced. The hereſies of Ebion, Beryllus, the Nazaræans, and Collyridians, were alſo broached, or at leaſt propagated, among the Arabs. The Collyridians were ſo denominated from a ſort of twiſted cake called collyris, which they offered to the virgin Mary, whom they worſhipped as GOD. Other ſects likewiſe there were within the borders of Arabia, who took refuge there from the proſcriptions of the imperial edicts; ſeveral of whoſe notions Mohammed incorporated with his religion, as will hereafter be ſhewn [1].

Arabia famous for hereſies, after the introduction of chriſtianity.

THE Jews, though an inconſiderable and deſpiſed people in other parts of the world, were very powerful in Arabia, whither they fled from the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, as well as the great havock made amongſt them by the emperor Hadrian, and brought over ſeveral tribes to their religion. The Jews of Hamyar, we are told, not far from the time of Dhu Nowâs above-mentioned, challenged ſome neighbouring chriſtians to a public diſputation, which was held ſub dio three days, before the king, and his nobility, and all the people. The diſputants were Gregentius, biſhop of Tephra or Dhafâr for the chriſtians, and Herbanus for the Jews. On the third day Herbanus, to end the diſpute, demanded, that Jeſus of Nazareth, if he were really living, and in heaven, and could hear the prayers of his worſhippers, ſhould appear from heaven in their ſight, and they would then believe on him; the Jews crying out with one voice, Shew us your Chriſt, alas, and we will become chriſtians. Whereupon, after a terrible ſtorm of thunder and lightning, Jeſus Chriſt appeared in the air, ſurrounded with rays of glory, walking on a purple cloud, having a ſword in his hand, and an ineſtimable diadem on his head; and ſpake theſe words over the heads of the aſſembly: Behold, I appear to you in your ſight, I, who was crucified by your fathers. After which the cloud received him from their ſight. The chriſtians hereupon cried out, Lord, have mercy upon us; but the Jews were ſtricken blind, and recovered not, till they were all baptized [m].

Concluſion of the hiſtory of the antient Arabs.

Dhu Nowâs, as has been obſerved, was a Jew, and perſecuted all, the chriſtians particularly, who were not of his religion. He burnt three hundred and forty chriſtians in the city of Najrân only. Not content with this, he ſent an embaſſy to Al Mondar, king of Hira, offering him large ſums of money, if he would perſecute the chriſtians throughout his dominions. The patriarch of Alexandria preſſing Eleſbaas (E) the Najaſhi, or king of Ethiopia, to revenge ſuch inhuman cruelty, that prince croſſed the ſtraights of Bab-al-Mandab with a fleet of four hundred and twenty-three ſail, and an army of an hundred and twenty thouſand men, with which he made a deſcent in Yaman. With theſe forces he overthrew Dhu Nowâs, ſeized upon his kingdom, and made St. Aretas's ſon governor of Najrân. The Abaſſines kept poſſeſſion of this kingdom, till they were driven out by Seif the ſon of Dhu Yazan of the tribe of Hamyar, who was, however, himſelf ſlain by ſome of them that had been left behind. (E) According to ſome of the Syriac writers, Eleſbaas or Eleſbaan, whom they call Aidog, king of Ethiopia, undertook an expedition againſt one Dimion, king of the Hamyarites, for maſſacring ſome chriſtian merchants, that were Romans, in their paſſage thro' Yaman into Ethiopia; which he did, to revenge the cruelties exerciſed on the Jews, of whoſe communion, it ſeems, he was a member, in the dominions of the Roman emperor. They add, that Eleſbaas did not undertake this expedition out of a religious motive, but to revenge the injury his ſubjects might ſuſtain in point of trade on this occaſion. Before the Arab and Ethiopian armies engaged, Eleſbaas, according to the ſame authors, vowed ſolemnly to embrace the Chriſtian religion, in caſe he was victorious. The armies then joining battle, Dimion was vanquiſhed and ſlain, and Eleſbaas or Aidog profeſſed himſelf a chriſtian, and placed a chriſtian prince upon the throne of Hamyar. Upon the death of this king, the Jews, who were ſtill very numerous there, found means to fix Dhu Nowâs upon that throne, who, at their inſtigation, proved a bitter enemy to the chriſtians. The particulars of his cruel behaviour towards them are ſet forth at large by Metaphraſtes, Simeon Beth-Arſamenſis, and other authors of good repute already mentioned (5).

D.* 578, commenced the æra of the elephant, from which the Arabs computed their time for twenty years; and that another, called the æra of the unjuſt war (F), ſucceeded this, which continued to the Hejra[n] (G).

Theſe ſacred months were Mobarram, Rajeb, Dulkaada, and Dulhaga. In them all acts of hoſtility amongſt the jarring tribes, how violent ſoever their reſentment might be, intirely ceaſed. CHAP. [X].

The history of the empires of Nice and Trapezond, from their foundation, the former by Theodore Lascaris, and the latter by the Comneni, to their final abolition, the one by Michael Paleologus, the other by Mohammed the Great.

THESE are the two last empires we have left to mention on the other side of the Mediterranean, and before we repass into Europe. We have given them the last place, and have joined them in the same chapter, as they were of the modernest date, smallest extent, and shortest duration, of any of those we have had occasion to
A C. speak of, either in Asia or Africa, that are now extinct; and 1204. as they were both dismembered from the Greek empire about the same time, that is, soon after the taking of its great metropolis by the Latins, mentioned in a former volume [a]. That of Nice was founded by Theodore Lascaris, and that of Trapezond by David and Alexius Comnenus, whilst Baldwin reigned at Constantinople.

The empire and emperors of Nice.

1. THEODORUS Lascaris, son-in-law to the tyrant Alexius Angelus, having happily escaped out of Constantinople and fled into Bithynia, was there received with such demonstrations of joy by the inhabitants, that he soon made himself master of Phrygia, Mysia, Lydia, and Ionia, from the Meander to the Black or Euxine Sea. These he erected into an empire, and fixed his imperial residence in the famous city of Nice, from which this new empire took its name [b]. It was not long, however, before he saw himself invaded by two powerful enemies, his father-in-law and Jubatius sultan of Iconium, his old friend and ally, whom he called to his assistance against the new emperor. They marched accordingly againſt him with an army of twenty thouſand men, and laid ſiege to the city of Antioch, on the Meander, the then boundary of this new empire on that ſide. Laſcaris, though he could then muſter but two thouſand men, was yet forced to march to the relief of that place, leſt its falling into their hands ſhould open them a way to the heart of his dominions. They were ſurpriſed to find him come ſo ſuddenly, and with ſuch a handful of men, againſt them; but ſuch was his valour and that of his troops, eſpecially of eight hundred of his Italians, that he gave the enemy a ſignal overthrow. But his Greeks being ſomewhat intimidated at the ſight of the ſuperior enemy, the ſultan, thinking that a proper time to renew the onſet, fell ſuddenly upon them, and, having ſingled Laſcaris out, threw him off his horſe at the firſt blow. Laſcaris ſoon recovered himſelf, unhorſed his competitor, ſtruck off his head, and, fixing it on the point of a lance, threw the enemy into ſuch a panic, that they betook themſelves to flight. Alexius, the author of this war, was taken priſoner, and carried in triumph to Nice, where he ended his days in a monaſtrey, where Laſcaris had confined him. The Turks were ſoon after glad to accept of ſuch a peace as he was pleaſed to grant to them; and another being concluded between him and Henry the brother and ſucceſſor of Baldwin, he was then at full leiſure to ſecure his new-founded empire to himſelf and ſucceſſors, which he did with vaſt ſucceſs and bravery, both againſt the Turks and Latins, during the ſpace of eighteen years [c].

Defeats Angelus and the Turks.

AT his death he left only a ſon, then an infant, and three daughters, the eldeſt of whom, named Irene, he had married to the brave John Ducas, ſurnamed Vatazes, to whom he bequeathed his new monarchy; tho' he had two brothers, viz. Alexius and Angelus, whom it might be expected he would have entruſted with the care of his ſon and empire: but he ſeems to have been more intent in ſtrengthening and inlarging the latter, than to ſecure it to his neareſt kindred; and accordingly named his ſon in-law his ſucceſſor, as the moſt capable of anſwering his deſign; and ſuch he really proved.

His death and ſucceſſor.

2. John Ducas was accordingly crowned at Nice by Manuel the great patriarch, and proved no leſs brave and ſucceſsful than his predeceſſor. We have formerly had occaſion to mention his great ſucceſs againſt the Turks, and eſpecially the Latins, whom he defeated in ſeveral battles, and from whom he took a conſiderable number of places, which we ſhall forbear repeating here [d]. He died after a glorious reign of thirty-three years, in the ſixty-ſecond of his age, after having extended his conqueſts, not only in Aſia, but in Europe, and even almoſt to the gates of Conſtantinople; and was ſucceeded by his ſon,

3. Theodore Laſcaris; who, during his ſhort reign, was likewiſe very ſucceſsful againſt the Bulgarians and the deſpot of Epirus, as we have formerly ſeen[*]. One great overſight this prince was guilty of was the recalling of the traitor Michael Paleologus, who was gone from him over to the Turks, and reſtoring him to his former dignity; for that gave him an opportunity of depriving his ſon of the empire, as we ſhall ſoon ſee. Theodore died in the third year of his reign, and was ſucceeded by his ſon,

John Laſcaris crowned A. C. 1258.

4. John Laſcaris, then about nine years of age; for which reaſon his father committed him and the care of the empire to Arſenius, the then patriarch of Nice, and to the famed Muzalo, a perſon indeed of mean extract, but of great merit and fidelity, and deſervedly raiſed to the higheſt poſts in the empire. For this, Muzalo incurred the envy of the nobles, who, notwithſtanding the ſolemn oath which he had obliged them to take to the young prince, ruſhed with their ſwords drawn upon that brave miniſter, on the very day and place where the funeral obſequies of the deceaſed monarch were performed; and, in the midſt of the divine ſervice, diſpatched him at the foot of the altar, to which he had fled for ſanctuary. It is not improbable, that the treacherous Paleologus had the greateſt hand in the contriving and conducting of this aſſaſſination, as it was the moſt likely means to open him the way to the ſeizing on the imperial dignity, which he never muſt have ſo much as aimed at, whilſt the young prince was under the care of ſo brave and worthy a guardian. However that be, Muzalo was no ſooner diſpatched out of his way, but the traitor cauſed himſelf to be choſen to ſucceed him in the guardianſhip of the young emperor, and to be declared protector of the empire, without the leaſt notice or regard to the patriarch, who, tho' no conſummate ſtateſman, was yet a perſon of ſingular learning and merit.

His new dignity was ſoon after ſignalized with a complete overthrow, which his brother John gave to the deſpot of Epirus, who had then invaded the provinces of Thrace and Macedon. The news of this action no ſooner reached Magneſia, the place where the new protector then reſided, but he was saluted emperor by a number of his creatures, both of the nobility and populace. For this the worthy patriarch threatened to excommunicate him and all his adherents; and Paleologus found no better expedient to ward off the blow, than by binding himself under a solemn oath to resign the empire to the young prince, as soon as he came to be of age. This having for the present satisfied the too credulous prelate, he was easily persuaded to crown him emperor. As we are no further concerned with any particulars of that usurper's reign, than as they relate to the Nicean empire, to which he now put an end, we shall refer our readers to what has been said of them in a former volume [f]; and only add here, that having soon after, that is, in the second year of his reign, taken Constantinople from the Latins, he removed the seat of the empire from Nice to that antient metropolis, where he caused himself to be crowned afresh emperor of the east. The unfortunate young prince fell a sacrifice to that tyrant's ambition, who caused, not long after, his eyes to be put out, and himself to be proclaimed the sole lawful and rightful possessor of the empire. Arsenius, now convinced, though too late, of his fatal credulity, thundered out an excommunication against him and all his adherents; but neither this, nor the great opposition which he met with from abroad, could wrest the empire from him, tho' it proved a very troublesome and thorny one, as we have elsewhere shewn [g]. This was the end of the Nicean empire, about fifty-seven years after its foundation. As for Nice, the metropolis of it, though it was in a great measure divested of its grandeur by the removal of the court to Constantinople, yet it continued to be so considerable a city, that it passed once and again from the Greeks to the Turks, and back again, till it was at length taken by Orchanes in the manner as has been heretofore related [h].

THIS monarchy, which was founded, as we lately hinted, much about the same time with that of Nice, lasted much longer, and made a much more considerable figure in the world. It took its name from the famed city of Trapezond or Trapesus, which was now made the imperial seat of the Comneni, and metropolis of this their

their new empire (A). David and Alexius Comneni (B), grandsons to the tyrant Andronicus, who had been

(A) Trapesus or Trapezund, called also Trebizond, and by the Turks Tarabozan, was a Greek city in Pontus, founded by the ancient Sinopians, and tributary to them, as we learn from Xenophon, who marched by it in his famous retreat, spoken of in a former volume (1). It is situate on the foot of a hill, which makes a kind of peninsula, on the Black or Euxine Sea, where it begins to turn towards the east. Its port is large and convenient, and the city itself well peopled, and surrounded with steep mountains 2).

It was formerly of such consideration, that the emperors of Constantinople always kept a deputy there; and, since its being brought under the Turks, it is become the residence of a begler-beigh After the overthrow of Mithridates, who had taken it, the Romans restored it, as they did most of the Greek cities in Asia, to its former privileges and liberty (3).

But what rendered it still more famous was, its being made and continued the imperial residence of the Comneni from the foundation of their empire we are now upon, to the taking of it by Mohammed II. of which we shall speak in due place. The reader may see an account of its present situation, commerce, &c. in the volume last quoted.

Aristotle tells us of a kind of honey that was gathered off the box-trees in the neighbourhood of Trapezond, which was an almost infallible cure for the epilepsy; but adds, that if any person in health did venture to eat of it, it bereaved them of their senses (4): he doth not tell us indeed whether it was this very Trapezond, we are speaking of, or some other; for there were more cities of that name, particularly one in Arcadia, said to have been founded by, and named from, Trapesus the son of Lycaon.

(B) The family of the Comneni was very ancient and considerable. The reader may see a long account of it in the author quoted in the margin (5); but it became much more so after its having been honoured with the imperial diadem in the person of Isaac Comnenus, who was raised to that dignity against Michael Stratiotices, by the officers of the army, as we have formerly seen (6). Andronicus, the grandfather of these Comneni, was of that family, and uncle to Alexius Comnenus then upon the throne, but no more than twelve years of age: against him he raised a revolt, in which he caused himself and young Alexius to be saluted as co partners, and took him as his collegue to the empire, but soon after caused him to be murdered; for which, and his other tyrannies and cruelties, he was put to a most shameful and dreadful death (7).

lately put to ſuch a cruel, yet deſerved, death by Iſaac Angelus, as we have formerly ſeen [l], were the firſt founders of it. Theſe, having the good fortune to eſcape out of Conſtantinople together, came and ſeized on the more eaſtern parts of Pontus, Galatia, and Cappadocia, and erected them into an empire; and Trapezond being then the ſtrongeſt and moſt conſiderable city in their dominions, they made it the ſeat of their reſidence, and called their new empire by its name. It doth not indeed appear, that they immediately took upon them the imperial title; much leſs, that they were ſoon acknowledged as ſuch. On the contrary, Vincent de Beauvais ſtiles them only lords of Trapezond [k]; but it is plain, that they ſoon arrived at a conſiderable height of power and intereſt, ſince the emperor Baldwin, about thirty-four years after their ſettling at Trapezond, ſought their alliance and friendſhip, and was by them aſſiſted in ſome conſiderable enterprizes againſt Vataces emperor of Nice, who had invaded ſome of his dominions, as we hinted under the laſt article, and elſewhere [l]. A. C. 1239.

However, it is not improbable, that neither theſe of Trapezond, nor thoſe of Nice, took upon them the title of emperors till ſome time after the foundation of their monarchies; perhaps, as ſome conjecture [m], not till the uſurper Michael Paleologus had ſeized on that of Nice, and got himſelf crowned emperor at Conſtantinople; at which time the Comneni, either in contempt to him, or becauſe they could not brook an inferior title to his, did likewiſe aſſume the imperial dignity. However that be, it is certain, that, after they had once aſſumed it, their ſucceſſors maintained it with great ſucceſs and bravery; and cauſed themſelves to be acknowledged as ſuch by foreign powers, as long as their empire laſted, that is, till it was ſubdued and put an end to by Mohammed the Great, who, like an irreſiſtible inundation, drove all before him, as we ſhall ſee at the concluſion of this chapter.

Their religion, patriarchs, &c.

THE Trapezuntines were of the Greek church, and, after the foundation of this new empire, they had a patriarch of their own; but, whether choſen by the emperor, or the clergy, can only be darkly gueſſed at. After their becoming ſubject to the Turks, the latter ſtill choſe their patriarchs, who were afterwards confirmed by the ſultan. This was done every-where, it ſeems, throughout the Turkiſh conqueſts, in the ſame manner as it was practiſed under the chriſtian emperors, that is, without paying any fine to the treasury. The clergy of Trapezond were the first who caused this dignity to be saddled with one of a thousand ducats; which by degrees came afterwards to extend to those of their other conquests. The occasion of it, being somewhat remarkable, we shall give our readers in the margin (C). As for other particulars of their religion, laws, customs, &c. there is the less necessity to dwell longer on them, considering that these two empires were only dismembered from the grand one, and differed in nothing from it but in their change of government, or rather governors. As for their trade, considering the excellent situation of their metropolis, and of some other of their cities, of which we have formerly given an account in the Pontic histo-

Trade.

(C) The Trapezuntines were at the same time under a patriarch named Mark, who was so ill beloved by his clergy, and by the nobles and people, that they agreed upon depriving him of his dignity, and to nominate unto it one Simeon, a countryman of theirs, then a monk or canon at the great church of Constantinople, a person of merit on several accounts, but especially for his extraordinary hospitality. To compass their design, they fell upon the following doughty expedient; they accused Mark of having introduced a new kind of simony, till then unheard of among them, that is, to have agreed to pay one thousand ducats into the sultan's treasury, as soon as he was confirmed in his dignity. The innocent patriarch in vain endeavoured to wipe off the foul accusation by the most solemn oaths; his enemies had bribed so many considerable persons, some of them ecclesiastics, to swear it against him, that he was adjudged guilty, and not only ipso facto deprived of his dignity, but also worthy of excommunication and banishment. This being done, they took one thousand ducats, and went with them to the sultan, and told him, that since Mark, a person odious to the clergy and laity, had promised him that sum upon his elevation to the patriarchate, they would now pay it to his highness, provided they might be permitted to raise their favourite monk to it.

The sultan, who knew nothing of such a promise, could not at first forbear smiling at the proposal, and hesitated some time whether he should accept of it; at length considering, that this would serve for a good precedent to oblige the future candidates to that dignity to the payment of the like sum, owned to them, that Mark had indeed promised it to him: But continued he, and taking the money at the same time since he is so obnoxious to you, e'en turn him out, and appoint whom you will in his place; which was done accordingly (8).

ry [n], we need not doubt, but the emperors encouraged it all they could; and the medals produced by Tournefort [o], as well as the coins mentioned by du Freſne [p], leave us no room to doubt of the trade and opulence, both of their empire and its metropolis, tho', ſince their falling into the hands of the Turks, they have fared like all the reſt of their conqueſts, and greatly failed of their ancient commerce and ſplendor. It only remains, that we give an account of the Trapezuntine monarchs from Alexius their founder to David their laſt emperor, and of their different wars, by which they maintained themſelves in their high dignity againſt ſo many powerful enemies, ſuch as were, ſome time, the Latins and the Greeks, eſpecially thoſe of the new Nicean empire, and at other times the Turks, Saracens, Perſians, &c. Theſe would doubtleſs make a conſiderable figure in this hiſtory, had they been tranſmitted to us in an uninterrupted ſeries; but the misfortune is, that the Byzantine hiſtorians, from whom we have all our chief intelligence, have only mentioned them occaſionally, and as they were immediately linked with the affairs of the Conſtantinopolitan empire; ſo that we muſt be content with the ſeries of thoſe eleven emperors, and with ſuch few particulars as we find recorded of them. We ſhall only add, that the duration of the Trapezuntine empire was about two hundred and fifty-ſeven, or two hundred fifty-eight years, being founded in the year of Chriſt 1204, and ſubdued An. 1461, or 1462.

Emperors of Trapezond.

1. ALEXIUS Comnenus, ſurnamed the Great, and his brother David, were the ſons of Manuel, and grandſons of the tyrant Andronicus Comnenus. We have already ſpoken of the uſurpation and tyranny, as well as the diſmal end, of the latter. As for Manuel, he was the eldeſt ſon of Andronicus, but was ſo unlike his father in his vices, that he was diſinherited and impriſoned by him (D), and his next brother Alexius the Great

(D) Among other things, by which Manuel diſobliged his father, one was, that he conſtantly refuſed to marry Agnes the daughter of Philip king of the Franks, and wife of Alexius, the depoſed emperor of Conſtantinople, though his father earneſtly preſſed him to it, and promiſed him, upon his complying, to make him partner in the

brother John appointed his ſucceſſor; but, when he found the whole populace exaſperated at it, he then tried in vain to appeaſe them, by pretending, that he always deſigned the empire for Manuel, and promiſing to name him to it. Upon the death of Andronicus, and the reſtoration of Iſaac Angelus, or rather ſoon after the taking of Conſtantinople by the Latins, Manuel's two ſons, Alexius and his brother David, fled into Pontus, ſeized on Heraclea, and ſoon after made themſelves maſters of that whole province, together with Paphlagonia, Colchis, Galatia, Cappadocia, with ſome others, of leſs note; and Alexius fixed his imperial ſeat at Trapezond[q]. He ſoon after made an alliance with Baldwin emperor of Conſtantinople, and aſſiſted him againſt Theodore Laſcaris, as we have already hinted. It doth not, however, appear, that he took the imperial title, moſt authors being of opinion, that it was either his grandſon or great-grandſon that firſt aſſumed it[r]; and that he only took that of duke or lord of Trapezond, as he is called by an antient author, who mentions him on account of his being uſed to furniſh the ſultan of Iconium with two hundred lances[s].

He was ſucceeded by

2. ——— Comnenus; and he by

3. ——— Commenus (E); of whoſe name and father we know nothing but what was hinted in the laſt note.

John, the firſt who aſſumed emperor.

4. John Comnenus; the firſt, as is generally ſuppoſed, that took upon him the title of emperor. We hinted a little higher, that he was married to the daughter of Andronicus the emperor. His refuſal, which, our author ſays (9), he excuſed on account of ſuch a marriage being contrary to the eccleſiaſtical laws, did ſo incenſe the tyrant, that at laſt he caſt him into a priſon, and appointed his next ſon to ſucceed him (10).

(E) We have nothing recorded concerning theſe two, not even their names; only we are told, that John, the next in order, was the grandſon, according to ſome, or the great-grandſon (11), according to others, of the great Alexius. Among theſe the famed Ogerius, protonotary of Michael Paleologus, who wrote about the year 1279, calls the then reigning emperor, that is, the John we are now ſpeaking of, the great-grandſon of Alexius the Great; ſo that, according (12) to his account, there muſt have been two princes between theſe two laſt-named (13).

the probable reaſon of his aſſuming it, viz. out of emulation againſt Michael Paleologus. To this we may add what a cotemporary author, who was protonotary to the ſaid Paleologus, ſays [t]; viz. that John rather ſuffered himſelf to be complimented with it by the Greeks, out of ſpite and contempt to that uſurper, who by his ſubmiſſion to the pope, and uniting the Greek and Latin churches, had rendered himſelf odious to them. Another, who lived near the ſame time [u], hints much the ſame thing, when he ſays, that the province of Trapezond was antiently under the government of dukes, who were ſent thither in that quality by the Conſtantinopolitan emperors; but that one of thoſe governors, having made him abſolute maſter there, took upon him the title of king; and that he, that then reigned there, had aſſumed that of emperor. We do not find, however, that Michael made any oppoſition to this new-aſſumed title. The odium and other misfortunes he then laboured under, of which we took notice under the laſt article, rather obliged him to confirm it to him; at leaſt he thought fit to court his friendſhip and alliance by offering him his daughter Eudocia Paleologina in marriage; which John readily accepted of, and went to Conſtantinople to eſpouſe her: and it is probable enough, that his new title was then acknowledged and confirmed to him by his father-in-law. All that we know further of him is, that he was earneſtly courted by pope Nicholas IV. to engage in the holy war about the year 1291, and that he died about four years after, and left two ſons behind, by his wife Eudocia, viz. Alexius II. who ſucceeded him, and John his younger brother, whom that princeſs took with her, being then very young, to Conſtantinople, ſoon after the emperor's death [w]. A.C. 1231 A.C. 1295

5. Alexius II. was born 1282 [x], and left, by his father's laſt will, under the guardianſhip of Andronicus Paleologus the elder [y]. He married the daughter of an Iberian prince, tho' he had the offer of a much richer wife, which Andronicus Auguſtus had deſigned for him. He defeated the Genoeſe, and ſoon after entered into an alliance with them [z]. He was ſucceeded by his ſon, Alexius II. A.C. 1303

6. Baſilius I. who was forced to fight his way through to gain his paternal inheritance [a]. He was highly courted by Baſilius I. A.C. 1320

pope John XXII. to go over to the church of Rome [b]. His wife, or, as some think, his second, was Eudocia the natural daughter of Andronicus Paleologus the younger [c]. He was succeeded by,

Basilius II. 7. Basilius II called also the younger [d], to distinguish him, as is supposed, from his father. He married Irene Paleologina, the daughter of Andronicus the younger; which shews, that he must be different from the former, who had married Eudocia, another of that monarch's daughters; for it was contrary to the canons of the Greek church to marry two sisters. Irene, however, was afterward set aside to make way for another woman of the same name, with whom the emperor was fallen deeply in love; which so exasperated his queen, that she soon after hatched both their ruins: him she caused to be killed by some private means, and her she sent with her children under a guard to Constantinople. She governed the empire for some time, during which she dispatched some embassadors to her father, to desire him to send some proper person, to whom she might be lawfully married, and have children by, to succeed to the empire. The matter was no sooner known at Trapezond, than an insurrection was made against her; which ended in a civil war, in which Tzanychita, a Trapezuntine nobleman, who was head of one of the factions, was killed [e]. What became of her, or how the matter was concluded, we are not told; only that Basil the emperor died in the year of Christ 1339 [f]. He left children both by his wife, and by his concubine; the latter of which were, as we hinted, sent with their mother to Constantinople. He was succeeded by a son of the former, brother and ſiſter, though their father's name is not recorded by any hiſtorian; neither is it eaſy to gueſs, at what time the former began to reign. As to his ſiſter, ſhe was a lady of extraordinary beauty, and after having been married ſome time to a Turkiſh nobleman of great diſtinction, and having ſeveral children by him, as ſoon as ſhe was a widow, ſhe was courted and betrothed to Manuel the ſon of John, emperor of Conſtantinople, who brought her accordingly thither to conſummate his marriage; but here that old monarch, though decrepit with age, gout, and other infirmities, fell ſo enamoured with her, that he married her himſelf about the year 1380 [g], that is, towards the latter-end of his life and reign, at which time this Alexius was upon the throne of Trapezond. This laſt married, if we may believe Laonicus [h], ſome great lady of the Cantacuzenian family, who being already in love with a Trapezuntine nobleman, ſaid to have been the keeper of the imperial wardrobe, ſhe was reported to carry on a ſhameful intrigue with him. His eldeſt ſon was no ſooner appriſed of it, than he took an opportunity to diſpatch her paramour, and then ſhut her up with the emperor in a room, with a deſign to have ſent them both out of the world by the ſame way: he was, however, prevented by the people from committing that double parricide, and forced to flee into Spain. Alexius was ſo exaſperated at his ſon, that he diſinherited him, and named Alexander his younger ſon to ſucceed him; but John found means, by the help of ſome Spaniards and Genoeſe, to return to Trapezond; where he cauſed his father to be privately murdered, and afterwards to be magnificently interred in the cathedral of that metropolis, to avoid being ſuſpected to have had a hand in his death [i]. Murdered by his ſon.

10. John II. called alſo Calo-Johannes, having thus diſpatched his father, mounted the throne, but found it very difficult to keep himſelf upon it; for the Turks, by this time grown very powerful, fell foul upon him on all ſides, ſo that he was forced to pay an annual tribute of three thouſand ducats to Amurat, and afterwards to his ſon Mohammed II. to enjoy the quiet poſſeſſion of it [k]. At his death he left only one ſon, named Alexius, then but four years of age, who was afterwards carried captive with the reſt of the family at the taking of Trapezond by Mohammed above- John II. 1449.

mentioned, and a daughter named Catharina Comnena, who was by her uncle David given to Aſan Beigh, vulgarly called Uſum Cazanes, in order to prevail upon that monarch to aſſiſt him againſt the continual irruptions which the Turks made againſt him *. This was, however, done with this condition, that ſhe ſhould not be obliged to change her religion. John had theſe two by the daughter of one of the kings of Spain, whom ſhe married during his abode there [l]. Some will have her to have been David's own daughter [m], the laſt emperor of Trapezond, but without any foundation; for Laonicus expreſly calls her the daughter of John; and David himſelf, in his letter to Philip duke of Burgundy, ſays plainly enough, that ſhe was the daughter of Calo-Johannes [n].

David, the laſt emperor.

11. David Comnenus, the third brother of John, and laſt emperor of Trapezond, ſeized on the crown, in wrong of his nephew, the young ſon of Alexius. He was a man of a ſavage and cowardly diſpoſition [o]. He had married the princeſs Irene, of the Cantacuzen family, a lady highly celebrated for her greatneſs of ſoul and conſtancy under adverſities [p]. Againſt David, Mohammed II. ſurnamed the Great, who by that time had made himſelf maſter of Græcia, Raſcia, and Servia, and of the city of Conſtantinople, declared war, under pretence, that he had aſſiſted Uſum Cazanes, king of Perſia, and was become tributary to him. David had neither courage nor ſtrength ſufficient to oppoſe him; ſo that he marched directly againſt his capital, and laid cloſe ſiege to it by ſea and land. The ſiege had laſted a little above a month, when David, having in vain implored the aſſiſtance of chriſtian princes, particularly of Charles VII. king of France, agreed to deliver up this metropolis, and with it the whole empire, on condition, that his and his family's lives ſhould be ſpared, and he permitted to carry with him all his children and treaſures into Europe; and that, when there, he ſhould have a ſufficient revenue aſſigned to maintain him and them. Mohammed at firſt refuſed theſe offers with great indignation, not doubting to be ſoon maſter of that metropolis; but a ſecond parely being deſired, he in appearance accepted of them; but having once got the unfortunate emperor in his power, he treacherouſly cauſed him to be loaded with chains, and to be kept close prisoner. Being now master of the city, he seized on the emperor's wife (G), daughters, and upon the rest of his family, with as many of the nobility as he found in that metropolis, and caused them to be sent in triumph to Constantinople. Of the rest of the Trapezuntines he chose as many as he thought fit for his service, and ordered eight hundred promising youths to be brought up janisaries. The handsome females he distributed among his captains and favourites, and some of the finest amongst his own sons. He left in the city none but the meanest of the people, put a strong garison of janisaries into the castle, another of common soldiers in the town, and made his admiral governor of both. The other cities of the empire submitted to the conqueror in a little while after; so that the whole was reduced to his obedience in few months, and he returned triumphant into Constantinople [q].

The royal family butchered by him. A. C. 1462.

SOON after his arrival thither, he sent the emperor David and his children prisoners to Adrianople; and not long after, upon some motions made, or pretended to have been made, in their favour by the wife of Usum Cazanes, he caused them to be put to death. He strove to root out, as much as lay in his power, the whole Comnenian family; and none of them were spared, but George the youngest son of David, who turned Mohammedan, and one of his sisters, who became afterwards Mohammed's concubine [r]. Thus ended the Trapezuntine empire, in the year of Christ 1462, and in the 257th or 258th of its foundation [s].

(G) So some authors affirm, and add, that she saw, with the utmost constancy, her husband, and seven of her sons, cruelly butchered by the tyrant, because they would not turn Mohammedans; and that she herself died soon after (15): but Laonicus affirms, that she found means, before the Turkish fleet appeared on their coasts, to make her escape to Mamia (16); but what the author means by that word, whether some place of safety, or some relation or friend, is not possible to guess. Another author affirms David to have been killed by a blow, which Mohammed gave him with his doubled fist (17).

SECT. I.

Deſcription of Spain.

Limits and extent of Spain.

AS the only land contiguous to Spain was Gaul, from whence it was ſeparated on the N. by the Pyrenees, we may conſider it as a peninſula. On the other ſides we find it ſurrounded by the Mediterranean, the Sinus Gaditanus or bay of Cadiz, the Fretum Herculeum or ſtreights of Gibraltar, the weſtern ocean, and ſea of Cantabria. It muſt have extended, from E. to W. near thirteen degrees, ſince Liſbon is 9°. 30′ W. of London, and cape de Bauger in Catalonia 3°. 15′. E. of that city; and from N. to S. about 9°. 40′. ſince cape de Ortegal, the northern extremity of modern Spain, is in 44°. 10′. N. lat. and the ſouthermoſt point of Tariffa in 35°. 50′. N. lat. According to this determination, antient Spain, including Luſitania or Portugal, was about five hundred and ninety-four miles long, and five hundred and eighty broad. As the natural limits of antient and modern Spain are the ſame, they may be looked upon intirely as the ſame region. Some modern geographers have aſſigned this kingdom too large an extent, as our readers will find by conſulting them [a].

Names of Spain.

THE generality of the Greek writers call Spain Ἰβηρία Iberia, either from a colony of Iberians, a people bordering upon mount Caucaſus, planted there, or from the Iberus, the Ebro of the moderns, one of the moſt noted rivers of this country. However, the antients, who lived before Polybius, by Iberia underſtood only that part of Spain extending from the Pyrenees to Calpe, or the ſtreights of Gibraltar, and terminated by the Mediterranean; the other part being unknown to, and consequently going under no name amongst, the Greeks and Romans. As the Iberus was by far the most considerable river of this tract, it might have received the denomination of Iberia from thence, as Egypt, according to some, did its name from the Nile, which Homer intimates to have been called Ægyptus. But, notwithstanding what is here advanced, we apprehend, that the true and proper Iberia was originally only that part of Spain, called Celtiberia, from a body of Celts settling in it, bounded by the Iberus, the Pyrenees, and the Mediterranean; which if we admit, it is no wonder that the Phœnicians gave it the name of Iberia. For the Hebrew עבר Eber, as well as the Chaldee, Syriac, or Phœnician עברא Ebra or Ibra, in the singular number, signifies a passage, and in the plural bounds or limits. The Phœnicians, therefore, might either have called the most considerable river of this tract, and one of its boundaries, Eber, Iber, Ebra, &c. and from thence styled the inhabitants of it Iberians; or have denominated the tract itself Iberia, from its situation, it having been generally considered by them as one of the remotest regions, or western limit, of the earth. Be that as it will, we can by no means think it probable, that any part of Spain was called Iberia, from a colony of Iberians settled there, since history does not in the least countenance such a notion. Festus Avienus places the Iberi upon the coast of the Atlantic ocean, to the west of the Iberus, a little river between the Bætis and the Anas, the Rio Tinto, or Rio de Azeche of the moderns. But his authority, with regard to the situation of the most antient Iberi, must give way to that of Polybius [b].

Whence called Spania or Hispania.

IT appears from Bochart and others, that the Phœnicians called Spain, at least that part of it known to them, שפניה Sphanija, or Spanija, from שפן Shaphan, or Span, a rabbet, because it abounded with those animals. In support of this notion it may be observed, that in many manuscripts of Curtius, Justin, Capella, Apuleius, Julius Capitolinus, Athenæus, &c. for Hispania is found Spania, as we learn from Casaubon and Salmasius. From the Phœnician Spanija, the Romans deduced their Spania or Hiſpania; which appellation, as well as Iberia, in common with the Greeks, they applied to the whole continent of Spain. That this country, or at leaſt a conſiderable part of it, produced rabbets in vaſt abundance, may be evinced from the concurrent teſtimony of Varro, Strabo, Pliny, Ælian, and many other writers of good authority; but, that the Saphan of the Phœnicians anſwered to the rabbet, can by no means be allowed. However, as the former, in many particulars, bore a near reſemblance to the latter, the Phœnicians, at their firſt arrival in Spain, might take them to be the ſame animal, and from thence impoſe upon this country a name, which has ever ſince prevailed. The antients ſometimes, from its ſituation, denominated Spain likewiſe Heſperia, and Heſperia Ultima; but theſe, and other poetical appellations, as being applied to other countries, deſerve little or no regard [c].

Various diviſions of Spain.

As Spain, before the Carthaginians made any conqueſts there, was inhabited by many cantons, governed by their own reguli, and independent on one another, it muſt have been originally divided into various petty kingdoms, the preciſe number of which it is impoſſible for us at this day to determine. What number of provinces the Carthaginians divided that part of Spain ſubject to them into, for want of ſufficient light from antient hiſtory, we muſt likewiſe own ourſelves incapable of aſcertaining. As for the Romans, the firſt diviſion they made of Spain, or rather that part of it they had reduced, was into Hiſpania Citerior and Hiſpania Ulterior; and this, according to Livy, took place immediately after the concluſion of the ſecond Punic war. However, for ſome political reaſons, they thought proper to unite theſe two provinces, in the beginning of the Macedonian war; and again disjoined them in the conſulate of Q. Ælius Pætus and M. Junius Pennus. This laſt diſpoſition of Spain remained till the reign of Auguſtus, who altered it, by dividing Hiſ- pania Ulterior into two provinces, viz. Provincia Bætica and Lusitania, and affixing the name of Provincia Tarraconensis to Hispania Citerior. In some of the succeeding reigns we find Hispania Ulterior and Hispania Citerior again mentioned; notwithstanding which, that the division introduced by Augustus continued as long as the Romans had any footing in Spain, appears extremely probable, both from the antient geographers, and many antique inscriptions exhibited by Gruter and Reinesius. Upon this plan, therefore, we shall here beg leave to give our readers a geographical description of antient Spain [d].

THE limits of (A) Lusitania not having been always the same, we cannot take upon us to define them. That it extended from the Tagus to the Cantabrian ocean, or at least the Promontorium Celticum, is intimated by Strabo. That part of it situated betwixt the Anas and the Tagus went by the name of Celtica, or the country of the Celts, as has been observed by Isaac Vossius. After Augustus had made the disposition of Spain above-mentioned, the Anas bounded Lusitania on the south; and the Durius, or Doure of the moderns, on the north; so that the whole tract lying betwixt the Durius and the Cantabrian ocean was annexed to the Provincia Tarraconensis. The interior limits of Lusitania, upon the frontiers of the Vettones and Carpettani, are fixed differently by different authors; which, as Cellarius intimates, may have been owing to a mistake adopted by some of those authors, viz. that the province of Lusitania corresponded exactly with the

(A) Bochart says, that the country called Lusitania derived its name from לוז Luz an almond, because it produced vast quantities of that fruit, as he proves from various authors. But we think, unless our readers shall take it to be of Celtic original, it ought to be deduced from לוז and תאנה or נא Lux and Tani or Tana, an almond and fig; for that Lusitania produced both those kinds of fruit, Bochart clearly evinces in the place referred to. It is plain, therefore, from hence, that the word Lusitania is not of Roman extraction [t].

country of the Lusitani; whereas, according to Pliny, not only the Lusitani, but the Celtici, Turduli, Vettones, &c. were seated in that province. The Lusitani possessed the district bordering upon the Atlantic ocean, and stretching itself from the mouth of the Anas to the Promontorium Sacrum, now known by the name of Cape St. Vincent. As for the Celtici, whose true name was Mirobrigenses, according to Pliny, their situation may be collected from what has already been observed. Some of the antient geographers make the Turduli and Turdetani one nation, particularly Ptolemy and Strabo; though they seem to have been considered in a different light by Polybius. Be that as it will, the Turdetani were undoubtedly a powerful people, since they occupied a considerable part both of Lusitania and Bætica, as appears from Strabo. The same may be said of the Vettones, who spread themselves over a large tract, terminated on the north by the Durius, and on the south by the Tagus. However, as the antients differ with regard to the extent of territory every one of those nations or cantons possessed, it is probable, that their frontiers were not always the same. Some authors assert Vettonia, or the country of the Vettones, to have been a province distinct from Lusitania, and limited on the south by the Anas; and this notion seems to be countenanced by an inscription in Gruter. The principal cities of this province are the following:

Olisipo. Olisipo, or Olissippo, called at present by the English, Lisbon, and, by the Portuguese, Lisboa. It stands at the mouth of the Tagus, and was corruptly named, by some of the antients, Ulyssippo; from whence some have imagined, that it was built by Ulysses, in his return home from the Trojan war. But this notion ought to be looked upon as a mere fiction, destitute of the least shadow of historical proof to support it. We cannot, therefore, but believe, that Olisipo, or Olissippo, which, from Pliny, the Itinerary, and Gruter, appears to have been the genuine proper name of this city, was originally formed from the two Phœnician words עליז עבא alis ubbo, or alis ippo, the pleasant bay. For, that the antient Olisipo was seated on a bay, we learn from Mela; and that the bay, on which Lisbon stands, is extremely pleasant, all the moderns allow. Olisipo, or Lisbon, the capital of the present present kingdoms of Portugal and Algarve, is in 39°. 10'. N. lat. and 9°. 30'. W. of London [f].

Talabrica, or Talabriga, a city seated upon the Vacus, mentioned by Pliny, Antoninus, and Appian. The citizens of Talabriga, from their frequent violations of treaties concluded between them and the Romans, seem to have had an uncommon aversion to that people; which is the principal thing we find related of them [g]. Talabrica.

Langobriga (B), a town situated between the Vacus and the Durius, not far from the sea-coast. As both Pliny and Antoninus take particular notice of it, it must have been a place of some repute [h]. Langobriga.

Arabriga, Sellium, and Concordia, betwixt Conimbrica and the Tagus, seem to have been places of some note, though we have scarce any particulars relating to them handed down to us by the antient geographers [m]. Arabriga, Sellium, and Concordia.

(B) The word Brica or Briga, in the old Spanish language, signified a city, as we learn from Resendius. Therefore Cetobriga, Arabriga, Langobriga, Meidobriga, &c. are equivalent to the city of Ceto, the city of Ara, the city of Lango, the city of Meido, &c. Hence, probably, came the words Brigantes, Brigantii, Brigæcum, Brigobanna, &c. all which are evidently of Celtic extraction (2).

Collippo,

Collippo. Collippo, a Roman municipium, between the Munda and the Tagus, upon the coaſt of the Atlantic ocean. We find this town named, by an inſcription in Grater, COLLIPRO; but, that the R there was originally a P, appears from the beſt manuſcripts of Pliny, as well as another inſcription. Not far from this city, in a ſouth-weſtern direction, ſtood Eburobritium, or, as, in our opinion, it ought to have been written, Eburobriga. As the ſtones, that preſerved the above-mentioned inſcriptions, were in the neighbourhood of Liria, ſome believe, that the ruins of the ancient Collippo are to be ſought for there [n].

Scalabis. Scalabis, or Scalabiſcus, as ſome think it called by Ptolemy, has been conſidered by Cellarius as the fifth Roman colony of Luſitania, ſurnamed Præſidium Julium. The Spaniſh writers almoſt unanimouſly agree, that the ſpot, on which this town ſtood, is at preſent occupied by Santerien, a Portugueſe town about forty miles N. E. of Liſbon; though the Scalabiſcus of Ptolemy had a ſituation aſſigned it to the N. of the Munda [o].

Aritium Prætorium, and Hierabriga. Aritium Prætorium and Hierabriga, in the neighbourhood of Scalabis, are mentioned by the Itinerary. The former place ſtood thirty-eight Roman miles from Oliſipo and the latter thirty [p].

Norba Cæſaria. Norba Cæſaria, a town of repute during the government of the Romans in Spain, on the ſouthern bank of the Tagus, near the famous ſtone bridge built over that river and dedicated to Trajan. Pliny calls the inhabitants of this city Colonia Norbenſis. Some Spaniſh authors believe Norba Cæſaria to have been contiguous to Trajan's bridge. But other writers of that nation, well verſed in the antiquities of their country, maintain the contrary. The latter, in ſupport of their opinion, affirm the city of Alcantara, ſeated on the ſpot adjoining to the noble ſtructure above-mentioned, to have been built by the Saracens; but the former think it may have ariſen out of the ruins of the antient Norba. Pliny and Ptolemy ſeem to favour the ſentiment of thoſe who place Norba at ſome diſtance from the bridge; ſince they make that town, or, which is the ſame thing, the Colonia Norbenſis, to have been ſituated in a territory to the ſouth of the Tagus. Be that as it will, we are informed by an ancient Roman inſcription in Gruter, that the Roman municipia of Luſitania, by ſums raiſed amongſt themſelves, finiſhed the aforeſaid bridge, in the reign of the emperor Trajan. The names of theſe municipia, or rather their inhabitants, have been preſerved by a ſtone, belonging formerly either to the bridge or the town of Norba, viz. Icadita, Lancia Oppidana, Arabriga, Mirobriga, Lancia Tranſcudana, Colarnum, Meidubriga, Interamnia, &c. Some, if not all, of theſe municipia undoubtedly made a conſiderable figure, though we are ſupplied with very few particulars relating to them by the antient geographers and hiſtorians [q].

Bletiſa was ſituated near ſome of the above-mentioned municipia, on the ſouthern bank of the Durius, as may be inferred from an inſcription in Gruter. The modern name of Bletiſa is Ledeſma, according to Mariana, who ſuppoſes the ancient and modern cities, going by thoſe names, to have been the ſame. As to any farther particulars of this place, we are intirely in the dark [r]. Bletiſa.

Salmantica, called at this day Salamanca, was in the neighbourhood of Bletiſa, as appears from the above-mentioned inſcription. It is at preſent famous all over the world, on account of the flouriſhing univerſity founded there, which, for ſeveral ages, has been deemed the principal ſeat of literature in Spain [s]. Salmantica.

Auguſta Emerita, the capital of this province in the Roman times, upon the Anas, was built by a body of ſuperannuated ſoldiers, to whom Auguſtus aſſigned a diſtrict in Luſitania; from whence this city deduced its name. This colony we find frequently mentioned by ancient Roman coins and inſcriptions. Emerita at firſt appertained to the Turduli, according to Strabo; though afterwards it was ranked amongſt the towns of the Vettones, as we learn from Prudentius. This may be eaſily accounted for, if we conſider, that the Vettones, in proceſs of time becoming more powerful than the Turduli, at length made themſelves maſters of their country. Our readers will find a more minute account of this city and colony in the authors here referred to [*]. Auguſta Emerita.

Ebora, called, by the Romans, Liberalitas Julia, was ſeated between the Tagus and the Anas, though it approached nearer the latter than the former river. The ſame ſpot is at Ebora.

present occupied by Evora, where there has long flourished a famous university. This town was a Latin municipium, as appears from several antient coins and inscriptions †.

Salacia. Salacia, the Alacer do Sal of the moderns, stood some miles to the W. of Ebora. From some ancient inscriptions in Gruter it may be inferred, that this place was a Roman municipium [t].

Pax Julia. Pax Julia, the Beja of the moderns, a city in the southern part of the province, stood near the frontiers of the Turdetani, if it did not actually belong to that nation. It is taken notice of by Pliny, Ptolemy, and Antoninus. Near this place a vast number of Roman coins and inscriptions have been found within these few years. All the remaining tract to the south of this city, limited on the east, west, and south, by the Anas, the Atlantic ocean, and bay of Gades, from its figure, was called Cuneus by Pomponius Mela and Strabo. Myrtilis, Balsa, Ossonaba, and other places of this tract, deserve not any great regard. However, it may not be improper to observe, that, according to Resendius, Mortola, or Mertolo, a modern town upon the Anas, and Tanilla, or Tavira, a considerable city of Algarve, answer to the ancient Myrtilis and Balsa. As for Ossonaba, if we will believe the same author, it has for a long time lain in ruins, though some footsteps of it are still remaining, particularly in the walls of Faro, another town of Algrave upon the sea-coast. The Lacobriga of Mela stood under the Promontorium Sacrum, known in these times by the name of Cape St. Vincent, upon a spot occupied at present by a village called Lagoa by the Portuguese, near the city of Lagos, where some remains of it are still to be seen [u].

As the other towns of Lusitania, whose names only have been handed down to us by the ancient geographers, were either insignificant and obscure, or almost all traces of them have been lost, our readers will not expect any account or description of them. Neither is it reasonable in a work of this nature, to take any notice of what merits not the least attention [w].

Promontories of Lusitania. THE chief promontories of Lusitania were the Promontorium Sacrum, Promontorium Barbarium, and the Promonto- rium Magnum, or Oliſipanenſe; to which ſome add a fourth, called, by Pliny, Cuneus. The Promontorium Sacrum, or Cape St. Vincent, formed an angle projecting into the bay of Gades and the Atlantic ocean, which was termed the weſtern extremity of the world by Strabo. The Promontorium Barbarium, at preſent Cape Spichel, lay at the ſouth of Oliſipo, though not very diſtant from the mouth of the Tagus. The Promontorium Magnum, or Oliſiponenſe, ſtyled, by ſome of the moderns, Cape de Rocca Sintra, projected into the Atlantic ocean near Oliſipo, and was made by Pliny the common boundary of Earth, Sea, and Heaven. As for Pliny's Cuneus, it is ſuppoſed to be the promontory at this day known by the name of Cape St. Mary, by Cellarius [x].

Ports and iſlands.

THE principal ports of this province were thoſe of Oliſipo, at preſent Liſbon, and Hannibal. The ſituation of the former is ſo well known, as not to admit of a diſpute; but that of the latter cannot be ſo eaſily aſcertained. Mela, upon whoſe authority it intirely depends, places it near the Promontorium Sacrum; which is all that we can ſay of it. The only iſland taken notice of by the antients on the coaſt of Luſitania, is the Londobris of Ptolemy, the Barlenga or Barlinges of the moderns [y].

Mountains

THE Mons Herminius of Hirtius, the modern Arminno, ſeems to have been the only mountain of note in this country, of which we have nothing farther to ſay, than that, according to Cellarius, Medobriga or Meidobriga, ſtood at the foot of it [z].

Rivers.

THE moſt celebrated rivers of Luſitania were the Anas, the Tagus, and the Durius. The Anas is called at preſent the Guadiana, the Tagus the Tajo, and the Durius the Douro. To theſe may be added the Munda, which now goes under the name of the Mondego; and the Vacus, now called the Voga. They all flow from E. to W. and empty themſelves into the Atlantic ocean [a].

Curioſities.

WE ſhall here only mention two of the natural curioſities of Luſitania: 1. The lead-mine near Meidobriga, from whence Pliny denominates the inhabitants of that place Plumbarii; which ſtill exiſts. 2. The golden ſand, or ſmall particles of gold mixed with the ſand, of the Tagus. This we find atteſted by Pomponius Mela, Ovid, Pliny, Silius Italicus, &c. and the truth of it ſeems confirmed by Reſendius. For that famous antiquary aſſures us, that ſome of theſe golden particles were found intermixed with the ſand of the Tagus in his time; that the laws of Portugal would not permit people to throw up the interior ſand on the banks of the Tagus, with which theſe particles are ſuppoſed to be incorporated, leſt the neighbouring fruitful fields ſhould be thereby damaged; and that the kings of Portugal have a ſceptre of the Tagan gold, than which no purer is to be found in the world [b].

The ſecond province of Hiſpania Ulterior, or further Spain, was Bætica, ſo called from the famed river Bætis, ſince Tarteſſus, and now Guadalquiver, or the great river. We have already mentioned its limits on the weſt or Luſitanic ſide; it was bounded on the ſouth by the Mediterranean and the Sinus Gaditanus, or gulph of Cadiz; and on the north by the Cantabric ſea, now the ſea of Biſcay. As to its limits towards the north-eaſt, or province of Tarraco, they cannot be ſo well fixed, becauſe they are rightly ſuppoſed to have been in a conſtant fluctuation, as each petty monarch had an opportunity to encroach upon his neighbour. Hence antient authors place thoſe on the ſea-coaſt differently, viz. Ptolemy at Baræa [c]; Pliny ſomewhat higher at Murgis [d]; though both ſituated on the Sinus Virgitanus, a little below new Carthage. The ſame may be ſaid of the inland ones, which are likewiſe differently placed, either higher or lower from the province of Tarraco, as may be ſeen by the authors above-quoted. The Bætis above-mentioned divided this province into two parts; on the one ſide of which, towards the Anas, were ſituate the Turdetani (A), from whence the country was

(A) Some add, after Polybius, the Turduli, as different from them. We have already ſpoken of both. They were (1) ſituate on the ſame ſide of the Bætis, but higher up: but as that author rather diſtinguiſhes them only with regard to their ſituation; and Ptolemy ſeems to intimate, that they were but one people (2); we ſee no reaſon for making two of them, any farther than the diſtinction of higher and lower will go; eſpecially as Strabo makes the two names to be indifferently given to them (3); and theſe are by was called Turdetania, but better known by the name of Bæturia. On the other side were ſituate the Baſtuli, Baſtitani, and Conteſtani, along the Mediterranean coaſts. The reader will find, under the next note, all that can be found concerning thoſe people (B). We forbear mentioning a great number of others, of which we know little more than the names. The reader may ſee them in Cellarius above-mentioned, and, if he cares to depend upon the Spaniſh authors for other ſituation, cities, and their particulars, he may conſult thoſe we have lately quoted both in the text and margin.

Its inhabitants.

WE come now to ſpeak of the Roman colonies in this province; and of theſe we ſhall, for brevity's ſake, ſingle out only ſome of the moſt celebrated ones; viz. that of the Accitani, ſituate between the Baſtuli and Baſtitani, along the ſame ſhore. We find it mentioned by Pliny [c], and by ſome antient inſcriptions, under the name of COLONIA JULIA GEMELLA ACCITANA [d], whoſe citizens were called Gemellenſes, becauſe that colony was made up of two legions, viz.

ſome authors (4) affirmed to have been the antienteſt people in all Spain.

(B) Of the firſt of theſe we have already ſpoken. The Baſtuli, ſuppoſed to be of Phœnician or Libyan extract, extended from the ſtreights of Gibraltar, along the Mediterranean coaſt, till, driven from thence by the Moors, they fled into the monntainous part of Galicia, which they then called by their name Baſtulia. The Baſetani or Baſtitani were ſeated higher up on the ſame coaſts. The territories of both theſe made what ſince became the kingdom of Granada, in which there is a ridge of very high mountains, called, from the latter, the Baſtetanian mountains. Mention is made alſo of their capital called Baſtatina, a place of ſuch ſtrength, that king Ferdinand was ſix months a beſieging it, before he could take it from the Moors (5).

The Conteſtani are by ſome placed in this province of Bætica, and by others in that of Tarraco. They were moſt likely ſeated between both. They are ſaid by Ptolemy (6) to have been ſettled there by Teſta one of their kings, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the ſequel, and called from him Conteſtani; as well as a city called Conſtantinum (7); but that king, tho' mentioned alſo by Manetho, is generally ranked among the dubious, if not fabulous.

the third and fixth, as appears by thoſe inſcriptions [e]. It is ſuppoſed to be the preſent city of Guadix in Granada, an antient epiſcopal ſee, formerly called the Accitanus, from Acci, the name of that city (C). Thoſe of Gades, Corduba, Aſtigi, and Hiſpal, were famed for their courts of judicature. The other four, whoſe ſituation is leſs known, together with their other municipal and free cities, in a much greater number than in any of the other two provinces, the reader may ſee in the author above-mentioned [f]; all which confirm what Pliny ſays of this [g], that it excelled them by far; for ſo it did in richneſs, extent, number of cities and harbours, fertility of its ſoil, commodious ſituation for traffic, and many other particulars: and this may be one great reaſon why the Romans cultivated and encouraged it more than they did the reſt.

Their cities.

How few of thoſe antient cities this province had before the coming in of the Romans, is not difficult to gueſs, if we only conſult the beſt antient authors with any tolerable attention; though if we were to truſt to the Spaniſh writers, it muſt have not only abounded with them, but they muſt likewiſe have been vaſtly large, populous, and opulent, even before the coming of the Tyrians, Phœnicians, and other nations, of whom we ſhall give an account in the ſequel. And yet theſe are affirmed by the ſame authors, eſpecially the Tyrians, to have built ſome freſh conſiderable ones, every one in the places where they ſettled themſelves; for all which we have no better grounds, than for that of Ulyſippo and its pretended founder, of which we ſpoke under the firſt article of this chapter: but when we come to examine things more cloſely, we find no ſuch traces of this boaſted number of cities. On the contrary it is plain, when the Turdetani had, at the inſtigation of Hannibal, aſſiſted the brave Saguntines their neighbours againſt the Romans, we read but of one city they had, the name of which is not ſo much as recorded (D); and which theſe cauſed to be razed, and the inhabitants to be ſold for ſlaves [h], as a determent to others from lending their aſſiſtance to any, whom they thought proper to war againſt. Ptolemy mentions but one ſea-port town on the coaſt of the Baſtitani, viz. that of Οὐργὴ Urce, ſince Vergi, in the bay of that name, though we find ſome conſiderable ones on thoſe coaſts; ſuch as Menobia, Abdera, Portus Magnus, Beria, and Murgis, and ſome others. On the iſlands it has likewiſe a conſiderable number, which Pliny, in his Natural Hiſtory, tells us, in his time amounted to an hundred and ſeventy-two. The greateſt part of theſe being, in all appearance, and from the Roman names given them, either founded or inlarged by that nation, ſuch as thoſe of Aſta Nebriſa, Ugia, and Orippa [i], on the banks of the Bætis, below Hiſpal, we have not time to dwell upon them, but ſhall content ourſelves with a ſhort mention of thoſe of the greateſt note. Among theſe is the famed city of Hiſpal, now Seville (E) ſituate on the river Bætis above-mentioned, and the metropolis of this province. It was formerly a great emporium, by means of that navigable river, which brought vaſt number of merchandizes up to this city, and thence quite up to Corduba. This city is ſtyled by Pliny Colonia Romulenſis, and by ſome antient inſcriptions Colonia Romulea. We took notice above, that it was one of the four courts of judicature. The next city in rank to Hiſpal is Corduba, now Cordoua, no leſs famed for its rich mines, and fertile ſoil, or, as the poet calls it [k], aurifera terra, than the other was for its trade. It is ſituate on the banks of the ſame river, was called a patrician colony, and is ſaid by Strabo to have been the work of Marcellus (F). Tarteſſus was once a famed antient

(E) Some pretend, that it was founded and named by Hiſpal one of their fabulous kings, and the ſon of Hercules (9); others, that it was ſo called from the palus, or marſh, on which it was founded; or rather from the pali, or ſtakes, upon which the foundation of it was laid (10). That of Seville, or, as it was antiently written, Civilia, is thought to be only a corruption of Civitas Julia, as it is called in ſome antient inſcriptions (11). But when or by whom it was founded, is not to be gueſſed at.

(F) Our author leaves us in the dark which of the Roman generals of that name he meant, ſo that the Spaniſh writers are much divided tient city, pleasantly situate between the two mouths of the Bætis (G), which made a kind of island, called, after the name of the city [l], Tartessida. This antient city is celebrated by some of the Latin poets, as situate on the farthest verge of the western shore [m]; but, for the other particulars of it, we must refer our reader to the last note, as we must do, for the remainder of the cities of this province, to the authors so often cited already, and especially to the late and accurate Cellarius in the chapter above-quoted; and for Gades or Gadir, now Cadiz, to what we copiously said of it in a former volume [n].

about it. Vasæus, often quoted, thinks, that it was he who was contemporary with Cæsar and Pompey; because he finds no mention made of this city before him (12). But Nonius thinks it to have been of much older date (13), since the same Strabo calls it Coloniam primam, or first colony which the Romans sent into this part of Spain. And it is mentioned by Silius Italicus in the second Punic war (14). As for the title of Colonia Patricia given to it, it is not only mentioned by Pliny, but by some antient inscriptions in Gruter, to which we refer (15); and this is further explained by what Strabo adds, that it was from the beginning inhabited by noble men of the Romans, and other nations (16).

(G) Strabo says, that the Bætis formerly emptied itself into the sea at two different places (17). One of them has been since stopped up. Mela mentions the city of Carteia in the same bay (18), which, he says, some fancy to have been the ancient Tartessus. Hence authors are divided in their opinions, whether these were two distinct cities, or the same with different names. We find nothing that can satisfy our readers on that head, ancient authors often confounding these two names and that of Gades together, as the learned Bochart and others have justly observed.

As for the fabulous account of its having altered its name from Tartessus to that of Gades, on account of Hercules's setting up his two columns there (19), it is rightly rejected. We have given a truer account of the foundation of Gades in a former volume, to which we refer, to avoid repetition (20). As for Carteia, a late author endeavoured to prove it to be the present town of Rocadillo, distant about four miles from Gibraltar (21); but the point is far from being cleared by him, and too dark and prolix for us to dwell longer upon, in a work of this nature.

WE

WE come now to ſay ſomething of the famous bays and ports of this province; the firſt of which, next to Gades above-mentioned, is that called Portus Meneſtæus, mentioned by Ptolemy, and Strabo, who doth likewiſe place here the oracle of that name. The next is that of Beſippo, the country of the famed Pomponius Mela, and ſome others, without the ſtreights mouth. Calpe, Carteia, Barbeſul, Cilniana, Salduba, Suel, and Malaca, within the ſtreight, and on the coaſts of the Baſtuli. Menoba, Selumbina, Abdera, and Portus Magnus, and likewiſe the famed promontory of Charidemus, all which are mentioned by Ptolemy, Strabo, Pliny, Mela, and placed by them on the Baſtitanian coaſts. Beyond the promontory laſt mentioned are the cities of Baria or Barea, and Murgis, in the Virgitanian bay; the former of which is reckoned by Ptolemy, and the latter by Pliny, the laſt ſea-port of the Baſtitani, as we hinted a little higher. Thoſe antient authors are, however, neither well agreed, nor eaſily reconciled, about the ſituation, names, and ſome other particulars relating to thoſe cities. Thus, for inſtance, Calpe, which is by Strabo ſtyled a famed antient Spaniſh ſea-port, Pliny, Ptolemy, Mela, and others, only call a mountain: whence the learned Bochart and Caſaubon have thought, that Calpe, in the former, was inſerted, by the miſtake of the tranſcriber, for Carteia, eſpecially as no mention is made in the others of any city beſides it in that bay. But this has been in a great meaſure anſwered, by ſome learned men, from the inſcription on a medal, with theſe letters, C. I. CALPE; that is, as they read it [o], Colonia Julia Calpe: and this they back with a paſſage out of N. Damaſcen [p]; who ſays, that Octavius overtook Cæſar near the city of Calpia, which is the ſame with Calpe; ſo that Strabo's text wants no amendment. Barbeſul, Aſta, and ſome others of the ſea-ports above-named, appear likewiſe to have been conſiderable colonies, as well as a number of iſland towns, in particular that of Munda, where Cæſar overcame the ſons of Pompey; but, as we are obliged to ſtudy brevity, we ſhall refer the reſt to the author laſt-quoted.

Bays and ſea-ports.

RIVERS of any note there are not in this province, except the Bætis, often mentioned already, or, as it is ſometimes written, Bætes and Betis. It hath, according to Pliny [q], its ſpring-head in the Tugienſian foreſt, ſo named by Tugia, a town mentioned by the Itinerarium of Antoninus (H), in the province of Tarracon, at the foot of the Oreſpodan mountains. Others of leſſer note are the Barbeſola near the city or mount Calpe above-mentioned, the Saduca which ſeems to have divided the Baſtuli from the Accitani, and ſome few others not worth dwelling upon. Mountains, of a conſiderable length and height, this province certainly abounds with. We find, however, but few mentioned by antient authors. Ptolemy takes only notice of two, viz. the Mariani and Hipylæ, the latter of which were ſcarcely known to any other antient writer [r]. Theſe, as they run along the territories of Hiſpal or Seville, were, we are told, called Illipæ; and, as they came nearer to Corduba, Themarini and Orthoſiadæ [s]: the former, which are by Pliny called Ariani (I), run along the famed deſert of the ſame name, now known by that of Sierra Morena, in the neighbourhood of the city of Caſtulo. The region of the Baſtitani was likewiſe full of them, as we hinted in a former note; and all that needs be added, with relation to them all is, that they abounded with metals and minerals of ſeveral kinds, particularly gold, quickſilver, copper, and lead, the greateſt quantities of which appear, however, to have been dug out of thoſe called Mariani, which the Romans improved to no ſmall advantage, having every-where their procuratores rei metallicæ, or overſeers of the mines. That of Calpe, mentioned a little higher, is neither famed for its height, mines, fertility, or on any account but that of its ſituation; and ſo no more need be ſaid of it.

Mountains.

Soil, climate, and produce.

The goodneſs of the ſoil and air of Spain in general is too well known to need any mention here. This province

(H) That author places it in the road between Caſtulo and Malaca, at about thirty-five miles diſtance from the latter.

(I) As theſe mountains are called, by the generality of authors, and by one ancient inſcription, by the firſt name; and, by the ſecond, only by Pliny and the Itinerarium; it is ſuppoſed, that the M, in theſe, was, by ſome miſtake of the copyiſts, dropped; but, whether they were the ſame, or different, is not of any great conſequence to inquire, with ſo little help, and under ſo great an uncertainty (22).

was particularly remarkable for it, and we ſhall have occaſion in the ſequel to give further proofs of it from the healthineſs and longevity of its inhabitants; and ſo little did they know of phyſic, that, if we may believe Poſidonius, they uſed to lay their ſick relations along the public ſtreets and roads, to have the advice of ſuch paſſengers as could give it to them. He adds, that their very women were ſo robuſt and healthy, that they knew not what it was to keep their bed after they were delivered; but uſed to go to their ordinary work, which was commonly agriculture, after they had taken proper care of themſelves and the child. Their mountains, as well as valleys, afforded them plenty of corn for men, and barley for their horſes and cattle, the former of which they bred from the beginning in great quantities, and managed with great dexterity both at home and abroad, and eſpecially in their warlike expeditions. The milk of their kine was, it ſeems, ſo very rich and fine, from the fragrant herbs they fed upon on thoſe healthy mountains, that it could not be uſed either for food or drink, or even, as we are told by the above-mentioned author, to make cheeſe with, without ſome mixture of water. As for fruits of all kinds, they grow there in the greateſt perfection; but theſe are topics ſo well known to every reader, that we need not dwell longer upon them. As for mineral waters, they flow, in the greateſt quantity, both hot and cold; and the kingdom of Granada is famed for them, and for their medicinal virtues; which need not to be wondered at, conſidering the vaſt ridges of mountains that are in it, and the variety of metals and minerals they abound with. Some of them riſe ſo hot, as to exceed, we are told, even boiling water. The moſt famous of the warm kind are thoſe of Hiſpal, Cordoua, and Granada; to which they attribute the virtue of curing the moſt inveterate, and even the venereal, diſeaſes; which is not altogether improbable, conſidering the quantity of ſulphur and other minerals, they are impregnated with, and the great perſpiration which the heat of the climate gives to its inhabitants. There are two others of great fame here, viz. that called Bætis, from a ſmall town near it; it ſprings, in a ſmall rivulet, from the top of a very high rock, and falls, by two ſtreams, into two lakes; and its waters are noted for curing all hæmorrhages, by waſhing. The other is near the town of Antequeria, which is no leſs famed for diſſolving the ſtone, and carrying it off by urine [1]. We ſhould be drawn into too great a length, were we to enter into so copious a subject as that of their artificial rarities; their stately buildings, such as bridges, churches, especially their palaces, whether those of the Gothic, or of the Roman, fashion: but one thing we cannot forbear observing, that there are some yet standing almost in their pristine grandeur, especially in the kingdom of Granada, built by the Moors, in a style peculiar to them, and which has scarce any thing common with the other two, and yet seems to exceed them in taste and magnificence. But as this country, as well as the several authors, who have written upon it, are so well known to us, we shall inlarge no further upon them.

Tarracon was the third province in Spain. It was, as we observed before, styled by the Romans, Hispania Citerior, or nither Spain, and distinguished, by the name of Tarraconensis, from the ancient city of that name, which was then the capital of it, and the residence of the Roman præses, or governor. We have seen, under the two former articles, how hard it is to settle the limits of this province, with respect to those of Bætica and Lusitania, on account of their frequent fluctuation. On the three other sides they are easily fixed, it having the Mediterranean on the east, the ocean on the west, and the Cantabrian sea, and the Pyrenees, on the north, by which last it is divided from Gaul. Tarracon, being by far the largest of the three, had a much greater number of cities, and variety of nations, as well as, in all likelihood, of petty kings and governments. It was divided into two parts by the famed river Iberus, now Ebro, which ran almost across the whole province, having its source on the north-west side of it, not far from the Cantabrian mountains; and very near the sea of that name, and by a south-east course, emptying itself into the Mediterranean, about thirty miles below the city of Tarracon. Along the south-west side of that river were seated the Celtiberians, the ancientest, and by far the most considerable, of all the nations of this province, if the others were not, indeed, so many distinct tribes descended from them, as we are apt to think they mostly were, from the greatest part of their names being of Celtic, rather than of any other, extract. This canton was called from them Celtiberia, and reached from the mouth of the Iberus quite to the country of the Cantabri, on the opposite coasts. Along the course of it, on that side, were, among other people of less note, the Illercaones, seated just within the mouth of it. Higher up are placed the Ilergetani, or Sedetani, Pelendones, Lerones, and, last of all, the Cantabri. Nearer to Bætica, and on the borders of it, were towards the Mediterranean, first, the Contestani, mentioned also under the last article; and, as you went forwards, Cantabrians and Celtiberians.

forwards, acroſs the country, towards the oppoſite ſhore, you found another tribe of the Turdetani, the Lobetani, Luſones, Carpetani, Arevacæ, and Vaccæi; and theſe two laſt were ſevered from each other by the river Duero, which was the confine of Luſitania on that ſide; and, weſt of the Cantabri and Vaccæi, were, on the Cantabrian coaſt, the Tranſmontani and Artabri; and in this laſt was the Artabrum Celticum, called alſo Promontorium Nericum, now cape Finiſter. In the inland are placed the Aſtures, Auguſtani, Lucences, and Gravii. On the weſtern coaſt, between the cape above-mentioned and the Durius, were the Callaici, alias Callæci, whoſe country was called Callæcia, one tribe or canton of which were called Bracarii, and the country Bracara, and theſe were ſeated on the banks of the Durius; the others were diſtinguiſhed by the name of Lucenſes; and both were ſubdivided by Ptolemy into ſeveral tribes, ſuch as we ſhall ſpeak of, upon another occaſion, under the following note (A). All theſe are mentioned by ancient geographers, ſuch as Ptolemy, Strabo, Mela, as ſeated, the former on the other ſide of the Iberus, and the latter on the hither ſide of the Tagus. On the other ſide of the Iberus, along the Mediterranean coaſts, were ſeated the Latetani and Auſetani, who were parted by the river Rubricatus, or, as Mela calls it, Lubricatus, now Lobregat, near the city of Barcelona. Along the Iberus were the Ilergetes, Jacetani, Sueſſitani, Vaſcones, Vardüli, Autrigones, and Concani; and theſe were ſeated between the head of the Iberus and the Cantabrian ſea. Nearer to the Pyrenean mountains, along that vaſt ridge, were the Ceretani, Indigetes, Cenſi, Lacetani, and ſome others of leſs note. Every one of them had its diſtinct metropolis, from which they either took their name, or, which is perhaps more likely, to which they gave that of their own tribe, as may be ſeen by thoſe we ſhall mention (B). We have already obſerved in general on this head, that

(A) This canton, which was ſince called Gallicia, and anciently Celtica, was, in all likelihood, either inhabited originally by the Celtæ, or was a colony of them ſent from Gaul; for many ſuch they were forced to ſend out of that kingdom into this and other countries, for want of room in their own, as we ſhall ſee, when we come to their hiſtory: the latter ſeems, however, the moſt probable, from the names by which they were diſtinguiſhed, ſuch as Cœlerini, Grovii, Limici, Querquerni, and ſome others, which to us appear to be of Gauliſh extract, and bear a viſible analogy with ſome of thoſe which we find in ancient Gaul.

(B) Thus the Bracarii had Bracara, the Artabri Artabrum, the Aſtures Aſturia, the Sueſſitani Sueſſa, the Lacitani Lacca, the Ilergetes that thoſe diſtricts which end in tania, and the cities which end in briga, are of Celtic extract; and we ſhall add here, that this province abounds with ſuch, more than the other two, as may be ſeen by the liſt of the people we have given below; for where their name terminated in tani, the country of courſe ended in tania, as Auſetani and Auſetania.

Celtiberians their warlike fierceneſs.

Is is not our deſign to ſpeak particularly of every one of them, and much leſs of their cities, many of which we know little elſe of, than their names (C). We may ſay of them in general, that they retained more of the ancient Celtic valour, cuſtoms, language, and, we may add, fierceneſs, than thoſe of Bætica, or even of Luſitania, though the Celtiberians of this laſt province are ſaid to have been the braveſt people in all Spain, as we ſhall have occaſion to ſhew in the ſequel. And the reaſon, probably, of it is, that they were neither ſo much under the dominion of the Romans, nor ſo converſant with them, as thoſe in Bætica; for the deſcendants of the Celtes were every-where as famed for their tenaciouſneſs of their ancient religion, laws, cuſtoms, language, &c. as the Romans gates Ilerda, and ſo of the reſt, unleſs where the Romans, ſettling afterwards their colonies, did call thoſe towns by new names, though the people ſtill retained their old ones; eſpecially we find ſome few of thoſe places ſtyled Julia and Auguſta, as Julia Libyca in the canton of the Ceretani; Cæſar Auguſta among the Lacetani, Auguſta Bracara, Porta Auguſta, Auguſti Lacus in Gallicia, and the like.

Here, by the way, we muſt obſerve, that this laſt province was not called ſo from the Galli, as ſome have imagined, but from its ancient metropolis, which was called Calle, ſituate in a pleaſant valley upon the Durius, and near the mouth of it; and the port of it, being become a conſiderable one in time, was ſince named barely Porto and Puerto by the Spaniards, by the Dutch Port a Port, and by us Oporto. From theſe two, Porto and Calle, came the name of Portugal, or Portucalle. As for Calle, it muſt be owned, that it is not mentioned by Strabo, Ptolemy, &c. but we find it in the itinerarium, which places it on the road between Uliſipo or Liſbon and Auguſta Bracara (1).

(C) Thoſe who are deſirous to know more of theſe ancient people, may conſult, if they pleaſe, the Spaniſh writers we have often quoted in this chapter; though, for the moſt authentic account of them, we would rather refer them to the laſt quoted and accurate Cellarius, who has wholly grounded his own on the teſtimony of ancient authors, and rejected all the fabulous and uncertain traſh, which thoſe modern authors have intermingled in theirs upon more precarious, and ſometimes upon no, authority at all.

(1) Vid Cellar. ubi ſup. lib. ii. c. 1 ſect. 3.

were to propagate their own, wherever they conquered; and this was one conſtant cauſe, why the former choſe rather to yield their territories to the latter, when they could defend them no longer againſt them, and to retire into more mountainous lands, where they could freely live by themſelves, than to ſubmit to their laws, and conform to their manners, as we ſhall have further occaſion to ſhew in the ſequel.

WE find, however, the following colonies of note (for we ſhall omit the others for brevity's ſake) to have been in time planted amongſt theſe Celtic ſettlements; viz. in Aſturia, the famed Colonia Auguſta. It is mentioned by Pliny and Ptolemy; and in ſome antient medals, though differently placed [u], and was a court of judicature, according to Pliny, in the place laſt-quoted. It divided the Aſtures into Auguſtanos and Tranſmontanos, which confirms what we have lately hinted, the former being, in all likelihood, of Roman extract, ſettled here, whilſt the latter, of Celtic, removed over the ridge of mountains that parted them; for we find here alſo the ſeventh Roman legion, which was ſurnamed Gemina, ſettled between the Aſturian ſea and the capital of this diſtrict, called Aſturia Auguſta, now Aſtorga, a city ſtill of ſome note (D). This country was alſo celebrated by the poets for the gold it produced. The next was that infamous one of Caligaris, di- Roman colonies. Auguſta Gemina. Caligaris.

(D) Ptolemy indeed makes the Aſtures to have been of Libyan extract, and to have come over with the Carthaginians, and ſettled in this part of Gallæcia. The city was called Aſtorga, from its being ſituate on the banks of a river of that name, which flows into the Durius: and the Romans, having ſeized on it and the adjacent territories, called it Auguſta Aſturica (2). Some derive the names both of the river and of the city, from Aſtir Memnon's coachman, who came thither with other Trojans, and planted a colony here (3), but this we look upon as fabulous.

As for the ſeventh legion above mentioned, we find it called in Ptolemy legio ſeptima Germanica; but as there is no mention of any ſuch, either in other authors, or in any antient inſcriptions, but often of legio ſeptima gemina (4), it is rightly ſuppoſed, that it is in that author a mere error of the copyiſt, who miſtook it for Germanica.

ſtinguiſhed by Pliny by the name of Naſcica, juſtly execrated, by the Roman authors [w], for the inſurrection and dread cataſtrophe of Sertorius, mentioned in a former volume, and too black to be repeated afreſh [x]. The city was at firſt a municipal one, and in ſome inſcriptions ſurnamed Julia (E), and then made a colony, with ſome others mentioned by Pliny [y], particularly thoſe of Oſca, Ilerda, and Turiaſa. Calaguris, ſince Calahorta, was the head town of the Autrigones, ſeated indifferently by geographers on either ſide, but, by the moſt exact, on the other ſide of the Iberus, as we hinted in the laſt note. Grachuris, or Graccuris, mentioned by Ptolemy among the chief cities of the Vaſcones, was, as we are told by Livy [z], built by Tit. Sempron. Gracchus, who took it from the Celtiberians, and called it by his name. Its ſituation is uncertain, only the Itinerarium places it on the road to Cæſar Auguſta, at ſixty-four miles diſtance from it in the road to Tarracō. It is in ſome antient inſcriptions ſtyled Municipium Graccuris. Some chriſtian champions, who ſuffered here for the faith in thoſe early times, are in ſome martyrologies called the Grachurian, and in others the Ilerdan, martyrs, from the vicinity, probably, of thoſe two places. The laſt we ſhall name is the famed town of the Vaccæi called Intercata, celebrated by antient authors, for a ſingle combat, which was fought, at the ſiege of that city, between Scipio Æmilianus and a bold Spaniſh tribune, in which the latter was killed; and the former had no ſooner

(E) It is inſcribed, in ſome Auguſtan coins, Mvn. Calag Ivl. that is, Municipium Calaguris Julia; and, in one of Tiberius, M. C. I. C. Celere, C Recto IIvir. that is, Municipium Calaguris Julia, Caio Celere, Caio Recto, Duumviris.

As there were two cities of that name, viz. this of Naſcica, and another ſurnamed Fibularenſis, ſome authors have placed them differently on the ſides of the Iberus; but Peter de Marca and Cellarius whom we chuſe to follow, place the former on the other ſide of that river. As for the latter, which was at ſome diſtance from it, and inferior to it in point of privilege and opulence (5), it was only remarkable for a manufacture of what the Romans called fibulæ, a kind of buckles or buttons to faſten their garments with; and was diſtinguiſhed by that name, on that account.

escaped one danger, than he exposed himself to a greater, and was the first that scaled the walls of that place [a]. We come now to speak of some of the most celebrated cities of this province, at the head of which we may justly place the metropolis of it.

Tarraco, now Tarragon, situate on the Mediterranean coast, between the rivers Iberus, or Ebro, and the Rubricatus, now Lobregat. It was a colony planted there by the two Scipios, Publ. and Cornel. with a juridical court; and was the capital of Hispania Romana (F), not so much on account of the excellency of its harbour, as Strabo observes, as for its being commodiously situated for all those who travelled into this kingdom, whether by sea or land [b]. But Spanish authors, though they grant those two Roman generals to have planted a colony there, will by no means allow, that they founded the city, but fetch its origin and etymon much higher: we have given two of them in the last note. However that be, this city has been all along very famous, having been, since, the metropolis of the kingdom of Arragon, an archiepiscopal see, and famed for a council or two held there; the first by John the then metropolitan, and his twelve bishops, Tarraco.

[a] Liv. epitom. xlviii Aurel. Vict. in Scip. Æmil. Appian in Iberic. &c. [b] Lib. iii. Plin, nat. hist. lib. iii.

(F) It is placed by antient geographers in the region or kingdom of Cossetani or Cossitani, situate between the two rivers abovementioned. It appears from antient medals to have been a very flourishing city, especially in Augustus's time: and is called by one Colonia victrix, by another Colonia victrix togata Tarraco; and in a third are found these words, Genio Col. V. T. Tarrac. that is, Genio Coloniæ Victricis Togatæ Tarraconensis. There are still, it seems, quantities of such antient coins frequently dug up about the neighbourhood of it; which inclines one to think, it was formerly much larger than it is now, though it is at present very spacious, opulent, and considerable (6).

Those who make Tubal to have been the peopler of Spain, pretend, that he founded this city, to be a kind of safeguard for his flocks and shepherds, of which he had vast numbers; and that both he and this place had the name of Tarraco given them, that is, the gatherer up of shepherds (7). Others will have it to have been built by Hercules, and to have been called Aron; whence the compound word Tarracon was insensibly contracted into Tarraco (8).

Hence that cuſtom hath, it ſeems, ſpread itſelf almoſt all over Spain, to leave off all kind of work from that time [c]. In another held under Berengarius, primate of the ſame place, 1180, it was ordained, that the dates of all public writings ſhould be computed from the year of Chriſt, which before were wont to be reckoned from the reigns of the Frankiſh monarchs [d]. Below Tarraco was the famed city of Saguntus, or Saguntum, on the ſame coaſt, of which having ſpoken amply in the beginning of this volume, and of its dreadful cataſtrophe, we ſhall refer our readers to it [e].

Valentia.

Valentia, another antient city a little below Saguntum, was the capital of the Edetani. It is ſituate on the mouth of the river Turias, about three miles from the ſea, and was anciently ſtyled Colonia Julia, and founded by Junius Brutus, whilſt he was conſul in Spain [f], and given to his army (G). It was afterwards deſtroyed, with Hereminius and his accomplices, by Pompey, and rebuilt by Julius Cæſar. It hath retained its antient dignity and grandeur, was once the metropolis of the kingdom, as it is ſtill of the province of that name, an archiepiſcopal ſee, and one of the moſt conſiderable cities of Spain. The people of this city were formerly as much celebrated for their valour and honeſty, by Tully, as they are now, by their own authors, for their ſuperſtition and bigotry [g].

Complutum.

Before we leave this part of Spain, we muſt not omit the famous city of Complutum, now Alcala de Henarez, ſo called from the river Henarez, on whoſe banks it is ſituate in a pleaſant plain; and, as that river falls into the great Tagus, the cities here along are eaſily furniſhed with all kinds of proviſions and merchandizes. Complutum has now no biſhopric, but only a collegiate church, and is a confiderable univerſity, having been greatly endowed by the celebrated cardinal Ximenes, then archbiſhop of Toledo; under whoſe auſpices, care, and immenſe charges, the firſt polyglot bible was compiled and printed in this city, and is from thence called the Complutenſian polyglot (H). Weſtward of, and between Complutum, and the antient city of Toletum, now Toledo, and on the ſame river Tagus, was ſituate the Mantua of Ptolemy, near which ſpot is ſuppoſed the town of Madrid, the now metropolis of all Spain, to have been ſince built (I); but of this, and many others, both on the ſea-coaſts and in the continent, we ſhall forbear ſaying any thing further, they being ſo well known to almoſt every reader. We have already had occaſion to mention ſome of the moſt conſiderable rivers, mountains, and promontories, in the courſe of this article; the reſt, that are of any note, together with ſuch natural rarities as may be worth obſerving, the reader will find in the following note (K), and in the map annexed.

(H) This glorious Work the firſt of that kind, was performed by men of the greateſt learning, invited thither by that cardinal at a vaſt charge. It was a conſiderable time in compiling, and about four years in printing, that is, from 1514 to 1517; but the whole was not publiſhed till 1520, when it came recommended with a bull of pope Leo X. in ſixvolumes, including the lexicon. It was printed in four languages, viz. the Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, and Latin. The Hebrew was as correct as it could poſſibly be done, according to the original; but the Septuagint, Chaldee, and Vulgate Latin, were corrected in ſuch a vaſt number of places, and from ſuch a prodigious number of manuſcripts, as were procured from all parts at no ſmall expence, in order to render thoſe three verſions more conformable to the original, that it, by degrees, dwindled into diſlike; but hath, however, this merit with the learned, that it ſerved for a model to thoſe which were ſince publiſhed in other kingdoms; among which that of London is juſtly eſteemed, in all reſpects, the moſt uſeful and exact, though not enriched with ſuch a variety of coſtly ornaments as that of Mr. Le Jay, printed at Paris (10).

(I) Hence we find it called by ſome Mantua Carpetana, by others Madritum and Madrit; but commonly now Madrid (11).

K. Beſides the cities above mentioned, we ſhould take notice of a very famed one, namely, new Carthage; but as we have had occaſion to ſpeak of it in the firſt part of this volume, we ſhall refer our readers to it (12). Segobriga, alias Segobrica, was, aswe are told, the capital of the Celtiberi (13), concerning whole ſituation authors, even Spaniſh, differ ſo much, that we can hardly ſay any thing about it. Some think there were two of that name, one in this province of Tarracon, and the other at the foot of the Caſtellan mountains; but the former, which is the moſt conſiderable, the authors above-quoted place in the neighbourhood of the antient Numantia, mentioned, not only by them, but by the Itinerary, which places it between Uxama and Turiaſo, near the river Durius. This laſt was, it ſeems, ſo excellently fortified by nature, that it neither had nor needed either walls, towers, or other fortifications, being ſeated on the top of a ſteep mountain, and ſheltered by much higher hills on three of its ſides, being only acceſſible on the fourth, which opened to a plain, but by ſuch narrow defiles, as could be eaſily guarded by a handful of men. Great wonders are told of this place by the authors under quoted (14); for it would ſwell this note too much, were we to deſcend to particulars. It was, however, quite deſtroyed by the two Scipios; but, ſince we find it mentioned by thoſe antient authors, and by the Itinerary, we need not doubt but it was rebuilt by ſome of their ſucceſſors. We have already given a full account of the Numantine war, and the ſad cataſtrophe of that famed city, and ſhall refer our readers to it (15), to avoid repetitions; and for the ſame reaſon we ſhall forbear mentioning any more of thoſe antient cities, whoſe names and further particulars have been ſufficiently taken notice of in the courſe of the Roman and Carthaginian hiſtory; for thoſe of later date belong not to this, but to the modern, part of this work.

Mountains of note, beſides thoſe already mentioned, are the Pyrenees, which divide Spain from Gaul by a continued ridge of vaſt height and depth, and reaches from ſea to ſea. They are ſuppoſed to have been ſo called, from a fire which ſpread itſelf over the ſurface of them, and burnt with ſuch fierceneſs during ſeveral days, that it even melted the metals within their bowels, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel. The Idubedan hills were another ridge, which croſſed one part of this province, and at the foot of which were the heads of ſeveral famed rivers, ſuch as thoſe of the Tagus and Anas, which flowed weſtward toward the ocean, on one ſide; and of the Iberus and Turias, which ran eaſtward into the Mediterranean, on between the ſtraights of Gibraltar and the river Bætis, and famed, not ſo much for its bigneſs, as for the concourſe of foreign nations thither from the earlieſt times, and for its celebrated city and temple, of which, as well as of its foundation, names, and other particulars, we have already ſpoken in this chapter, and in a former volume [h]. Strabo gives it the length of one hundred furlongs, and a much ſmaller breadth; yet it had, according to him, no leſs than five hundred horſemen in his time [i]: we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of the famed temple of it in the ſequel. As for the city, we have, at the beginning of this volume, mentioned its being plundered by the Carthaginians, and taken by the Romans [k]. It was ſince erected into a biſhoprick, under the title of Epiſcopatus Gaditanus [l]. The next is the ſo much celebrated, and ſo hard to find, iſland of Erythia, where Geryon is ſaid to have kept his fine oxen, which Hercules came and ſtole from him [m]. Some have placed it near that of Gades: others think it was the ſame with it: and others have thought, that it was either ſunk into the ſea, or was to be ſought for among the rocks. We have, however, ventured, in a former chapter of this volume, to offer a conjecture concerning its ſituation; and ſhall refer our readers to it [n]. No leſs difficult has been the ſearch after thoſe ten famed iſlands called by the Greeks Caſſiterides, from whence the Phœnicians, the firſt diſcoverers of them, did fetch ſuch vaſt quantities of tin. We ſhould not have mentioned them here, the learned Cambden having fully ſhewn, that they are our iſlands of Scilly, had not ſome of the antients, as Strabo and Ptolemy [o], placed them on the Spaniſh coaſts, ſomewhat beyond the Promontorium Celticum or Artabrum, or Cape Finiſter; and others ſomewhere on the weſtern ocean, about the upper coaſts of Luſitania [p]. But as the other. The Oroſpedan ridge ſeems to have ſeparated this province in part from Bætica. They were alſo called Mariani Montes, and now Sierra Modena. We ſpoke of them under the laſt article. A great many more this province abounded with, for a further account of which we muſt refer our readers to the antient and modern authors, lately quoted, as likewiſe for thoſe mines, minerals, mineral waters, and other curioſities, they and the neighbouring vallies produced, theb are mention of which would carry us far beyond our deſign.

there never could be found any ſuch iſlands on thoſe coaſts, they have been ſuppoſed to have undergone the ſame fate with that of Erythia lately mentioned. However, as we ſhall have occaſion to reſume them, when we come to ſpeak of the Britiſh iſlands [q], we ſhall ſay no more of them here, but paſs to thoſe which are more conſiderable, and better known to us; and theſe are the Baleares, or Gymneſiæ, as they are called by the antients.

Baleares. These were diſtinguiſhed into Major and Minor, or, as Mela expreſſes it, Majores and Minores. Their bigneſs, ſituation, and other particulars, are ſo well known to every reader, that it were ſuperfluous to dwell upon them. All that we need to ſay of them here is, in what ſtate they were in thoſe antient times. In the former, now Majorca, Ptolemy and Strabo place the two cities of Palma and Pollentia, the one on the eaſt, and the other on the weſt; and theſe are by Strabo, Pliny, and Mela, ſtyled Coloniæ. In the latter, now Minorca, they place likewiſe two cities, viz. Jamno and Mago; which were, however, no more than caſtles or forts, if Mela's judgment, who was of that country, is to be preferred to the others. But as they ſeem to have been both built near the mouths of two convenient harbours, which are in this iſland, it is hardly to be doubted, but theſe ſoon grew into conſiderable ſea-ports, eſpecially that of Mago, which became ſince a celebrated one, under the name of Maon. Theſe two iſlands were, on account of their ſituation and harbours, ſtyled Fortunatæ, and ſtand at about thirty miles diſtance from each other. They were at firſt poſſeſſed by the Phœnicians, who held them till Q. Metellus brought them under the Roman yoke, for which he got the ſurname of Baleariçus [t]. As to the etymon of Baleares, moſt authors derive it from the Greek Βάλλειν, which ſignifies, to throw with a ſling, becauſe the inhabitants of them were particularly famed for their ſkill in it [s]: yet, as the Carthaginians had theſe iſlands before any other, Bochart thinks they did give them that name, which is compounded of two Punic words, Baal and Jarah, which amount to the ſame ſenſe, and ſignify a ſlinging-maſter, or a man expert at throwing, &c. Their other names of Gymneſiæ, or Gymnaſia, is, according to the antient authors above-quoted, of Greek extract, and was given them on account of their inhabitants going naked in ſummer.

Further,

FURTHER, towards the ſtraights, over-againſt the cape Dianium, now Denia, are the two iſlands called Pityuſæ by the antients, from the vaſt quantities of pine-trees which they produced [t]; the one of which, by far the larger of the two, though ſmaller than that of Minorca, was named Ebuſus, now Ivica; the other, Ophiuſa, now Formentera. They are both mentioned by Strabo, Ptolemy, and Pliny; and Mela adds, that the former was not only very fertile, but that it bred no kind of poiſonous, nor even wild, creatures, and that, if any were brought thither, they could not live in it [u], though the iſland abounded with paſture-ground [w], and with great variety of fruits, particularly a kind of figs, for which it was famed: ſome have even added ſugar-canes [x], which, it is ſaid, they boiled into ſugar, and made a traffick of; but this Cellarius has ſhewn to be a miſtake, and that it means no other, than the dried figs above-mentioned [y]. The other, by far the ſmalleſt, is thought by ſome to have been the ſame with that which the Latins called Colubraria; but the author laſt-quoted hath plainly proved, from the teſtimonies of Pliny and Mela that they were two different iſlands; and that the latter was at a much greater diſtance from that of Ebuſus, than the former; and both of them are ſo ſmall and inconſiderable, that we need ſay no more of them. As for Ebuſus, it was the name, both of the iſland and of the city in it, though the latter was more commonly called Ebuſium; for we find, in antient inſcriptions of Gruter, Ordo Ebuſii, and Rp. or Reſpublica Ebuſii; and are further told, that it was a colony of the Phœnicians [z]. The laſt iſland worth mentioning was called Capraria, and now Cabrera, probably from the number of goats it bred, as the Colubraria ſeems to have been from its great quantity of adders. It ſtands on the ſouth of Majorca, and is chiefly noted for being fatal to mariners. All theſe iſlands, and a great number of others mentioned by antient writers, now not to be found, and ſuppoſed to have been ſince ſunk into the ſea, did belong to this province of Tarracon, and underwent the ſame fate of paſſing from the Carthaginian to the Roman yoke. We ſhall conclude this ſection with obſerving from Pliny [a], that this province was divided into ſeven conventus, or provincial aſſemblies, whoſe names the reader will

The religion, laws, government, cuſtoms, learning, &c. of the antient Spaniards.

The religion of the antient Spaniards.

THERE is no doubt to be made, that, where-ever Spain was inhabited by the deſcendants of the Celtes, thither they brought their old religion, government, &c. What theſe were, we have given an account of in a former volume[a]; and ſhall ſpeak ſtill more largely upon in the next chapter, of the antient Gauls, the undoubted and immediate deſcendants of the antient Celtic ſtock; for we muſt neceſſarily ſuppoſe, and ſo, indeed, we find, a great affinity between them in all theſe particulars, as they all ſprang from the ſame origin. But, as the Gauls are better known to us than the Spaniards, we ſhall refer the greateſt part of what we have to ſay on theſe different heads, till we come to their hiſtory: for, could we even admit what the generality of Spaniſh writers affirm after Beroſus, that Tubal, the fifth ſon of Japhet, came and peopled Spain ſo ſoon as an hundred and forty-three years after the flood, Gomer, his eldeſt brother, and the father of the Celtes, muſt have been as ſoon in poſſeſſion of Gaul; and both muſt, of courſe, be ſuppoſed to have brought the ſame religion, laws, government, &c. namely, that which they received from their grandfather Noah: and how tenacious both theſe, and other nations of the ſame Celtic deſcent, were of their own religion and laws, will be eaſily ſeen by the ſequel, eſpecially in the hiſtories of the antient Gauls and Germans. All that we ſhall ſay further of their religion here is, that it was, in all theſe countries, the ſame as that of the old patriarchs: they worſhipped one ſupreme Being, not in temples, as the Greeks and Romans, but in groves conſecrated to him. They believed a future ſtate of rewards and puniſhments, ſuitable to their behaviour in this. They offered victims to him, and celebrated ſome feſtivals in honour of him; and, in moſt things, obſerved a great ſimplicity in all their religious rites, during a long ſeries of ages, till, by intermingling with other nations, they degenerated into ſeveral of their ſuperſtitions, eſpecially into their various ways of divination, of which we ſhall give a fuller account in the next chapter. One bloody and inhuman cuſtom they gave, indeed, into very early, in common with moſt antient nations, viz. that of human ſacrifices; the origin of which having endeavoured to account for in ſome former volumes, we ſhall refer our readers to them, to avoid prolixity [b].

BUT, as this country came to be invaded by ſuch variety of other nations, ſuch as the Egyptians, who are ſaid to have introduced all the heatheniſh ſuperſtition of their country, the Tyrians, Phœnicians, Carthaginians, and a multitude of others, who ſettled amongſt them, as we ſhall ſee in a ſubſequent ſection, it is natural to think, that every one brought their own religion and cuſtoms with them; and what theſe were, muſt be ſeen in the hiſtory we have given of each of thoſe nations in the courſe of this work; for it were endleſs to repeat it here. It is plain, ſuch a mixture of different nations muſt bring, not only a vaſt variety of religious laws and cuſtoms, but produce ſome alterations in each of them, as they mutually borrowed ſome doctrines and notions, rites and faſhions, from one another, as ſuited their taſte or circumſtances. Superſtition has no bounds, and perſons, either out of wantonneſs or impatience, will be eaſily induced to hunt after a variety of deities, and ſuperſtitious ceremonies. This, we find, was the caſe of the Iſraelites, though reſtrained from it under ſuch ſevere penalties: how much more will it be ſo, where every one is left at his own liberty? However, after the coming of the lordly Romans, whoſe conſtant policy it was, to introduce every-where their gods, religion, laws, &c. either by fair or foul means, we need not doubt but thoſe, that fell under their dominion, were obliged to ſubmit to this change. The inundation likewiſe of the northern nations, ſuch as the Suevi, Goths, and Vandals, muſt likewiſe have introduced ſuch changes, as may be better imagined than expreſſed. We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of them in their ſeveral hiſtories here enſuing; only thus much may be ſaid here, that though they had embraced chriſtianity, yet they were all of them infected with the Arian hereſy. This did not, however, ſlacken their zeal againſt the heatheniſh idolatry and ſuperſtition, which had been introduced there by the Egyptians,

[b] Vol. i. 290 (W). 459, ii. 462, iii. 106, in fin. (V).

Carthaginians, Romans, and other nations, whose temples, altars, statues, &c. they destroyed where-ever they came, obliging all that came under their power, to embrace their religion; but both Sueves and Goths did at length exchange their Arianism for the orthodox faith, the former, under the reign of their king Ariamirus, alias Theodimirus, and the latter under Reccaredus, who made open profession of it upon his accession to the crown. Their example was followed by the nobles, bishops, and clergy; and their confession of faith was presented to the famed council of Toledo, where some further regulations were made, for the preservation of orthodoxy, and for introducing a general conformity of worship. This great change was so much the more remarkable, considering the tenaciousness of those nations for their old religion, as it was brought about without persecution or any other violent means. Upon the whole, it must be owned, that the Goths did make many excellent laws and regulations, for the better government in church and state. We shall speak of them, in their history, in a subsequent chapter; and shall only mention here a famed liturgy peculiar to them, known by several names, such as, officium Gothicum, Toletanum, and Mozarabicum (A), and supposed by most authors to have been compiled by Isidore, then bishop of Hispal or Seville. This liturgy was confirmed by the Toletan council above-mentioned, though the pope did not suffer them to enjoy it many years, before he obliged them to exchange it for the Roman, not without a long and strenuous opposition from the Goths, especially those of Catalonia, who sent a number of deputies to the council of Mantua, to expostulate against such a forced innovation. Some extraordinary particulars we are told with relation to this successless deputation, which, as they display the unfair intrigues and arbitrary sway of the Romish court, as well as the superstitious practices of those times, we shall give to our readers in the margin (B).

It

(A) So called from the name of Moxarabes, which they then gave to those christians, who were under the subjection of the Saracens.

(B) The merit of these two liturgies, we are told, was to be decided by single combat; in which one champion was to fight for the Gothic, and the other for the Roman. They did so; and the latter lost the battle; but the Roman party raising some fresh chicane about it, it was again agreed to be tried by fire. Accordingly both books were flung into the flames, from which the Gothic was preserved, and the other burnt. But such was the prevalence of the pope's party, as it was managed by his then legate, that the synod

IT is probable, that, though the firſt inhabitants of Spain were under one monarchical government, upon their firſt ſettling in it, as well as thoſe of Gaul, Germany, and other European nations; yet as they came to increaſe in number and enlarge their territories, they ſplit themſelves into a multiplicity of petty kingdoms and common-wealths. This was the caſe of the Gauls and Germans, when Cæſar firſt came amongſt them, as we ſhall ſhew in due time; and much more may we ſuppoſe it to have been ſo here, conſidering the great variety of nations that came and ſettled amongſt them, of which we ſhall give a fuller account in a ſubſequent ſection of this chapter; for it is more reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that moſt, if not all of them, brought and ſettled their own laws and form of government, than that they ſhould ſubmit to that of the antient inhabitants, eſpecially as many of the former came thither rather as conquerors, than colonies; from all which muſt neceſſarily reſult, not only a vaſt variety, but likewiſe a conſtant fluctuation of them, as they paſſed from one dominion to another, eſpecially when they came under that of the Carthaginians, Romans, Goths, and Vandals (C). Government, laws, &c.

After

ſynod of Leon decided afreſh in favour of the latter. The Gothic, however, was far from being wholly ſet aſide. It was retained by ſeveral congregations, and by ſeven churches of Toledo, during a conſiderable number of years. Neither did it loſe its credit by being diſuſed, ſince even the famed cardinal Ximenes erected a chapel in the city, in which the divine worſhip was to be performed according to the Gothic or Mozarabic liturgy; but in the end means were found to get it condemned, and wholly ſet aſide, and with it the old character, in which it was writ (1).

This character was not, however, the old famed Runic, of which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the German hiſtory, as has been affirmed by ſeveral authors: but the old Gothic, in which moſt, if not all books, eſpecially church ones, were written at that time in Spain and elſewhere; and was near the ſame with the old Roman, but of a coarſer mould; and was particularly uſed in all the Viſigothiſh dominions.

(C) How they were governed under the two former, may be ſeen by their hiſtory in the three laſt volumes; and how by the latter, in ſome of the ſubſequent chapters, as well as in the ſequel of this. One thing we muſt, however, obſerve here, with reſpect to the Romans, that it was their conſtant policy, in their conquered dominions, to diſtinguiſh between thoſe, that, through fear, or ne-

After the expulsion of the Carthaginians by the Scipios, of which we have given an account in a former chapter of this volume [c], Spain was governed by consuls, proconsuls, prætors, proprætors, and præsides, from that very time down to the reign of Tiberius, if not lower; for we find L. Piso prætor of the hither Spain in his time; and a rescript of Adrian directed to the consul of Bætica. The presides are mentioned likewise in subsequent reigns; but that title was of a more general signification, and applied to the governors of every inferior province. However, it continued under the government of forty-six emperors, from Augustus, who is said to have finished the conquest of it, to Honorius, in whose reign the Romans were expelled by the Vandals, Alans, and Suevi. Under these emperors, who governed the empire after their own arbitrary will, Spain was divided into two provinces; but soon after reduced into one, though under several governors, or legati and tribuni [d]. About the reign of Diocletian and Maximian, it began to be governed by comites, or counts; and, if any of these were forced to be absent from their jurisdiction, they left the care of it to substitutes, who were called cessity, had either fought their friendship or protection, or willingly submitted to them; and those, who were subdued by force of arms. The former of these they permitted to preserve their laws and form of government, and only obliged them to pay a certain tribute, and to lend a number of auxiliary forces, and perhaps to quarter a number of their troops; but the others they forced to submit wholly to the Roman laws and government, as we shall have further occasion to shew in the next chapter; though, by the way, it must be observed, with respect to the former, that if they gave the least umbrage to their pretended protectors, they seldom failed of being stripped of their privileges, and of being reduced to the slavish state of the latter. This proved the case of the Spaniards, who were forced by degrees, to submit, not only to the Roman yoke, but to their religion, customs, &c. and even to their language (2).

We find, however, in some antient authors, the names of several petty kings of Spain, both in the times of the Carthaginians and Romans, who governed in their several little kingdoms, and lived in peace with, and acknowledged them both, or paid some tribute, perhaps, to them; such as Mandonius, whom Livy calls king of the Ilergetes, Amusius king of the Lacetani, Andubal mentioned by Polybius, and some others; but to these the Romans only give the title of reguli.

vicarii. And laſtly, in the time of the Goths, thoſe provinces, that were ſubject to the Romans, were ſet under government of duces and præfecti. Under the Goths they were governed by nineteen kings, during the ſpace of two hundred years, that is, from Athanaric, who began his reign in the year of Chriſt 369, to Leovigild, an. 569. The Suevi reigned in Galicia, according to Iſidorus, an hundred and ſeventy-ſeven years, that is, from Hermeric, A.C. 408, to Andeca, who was defeated and dethroned by Leovigild, above-mentioned, and brought that kingdom under his ſubjection, A. C. 581. In this liſt of Suevian kings there is a chaſm of their names for an hundred years, from Remiſmund, who infected that kingdom with Arianiſm, A. C. 464, to Theodimirus, who embraced the orthodox faith, the hiſtorians not having thought them worthy to be recorded. The others are ten in number, including Reccaredus above-mentioned. Laſtly, the united kingdoms of Goths and Suevi, which began at Reccaredus the ſucceſſor of Leovigild, the firſt orthodox king of the Goths, A. C. 586, laſted an hundred and twenty-ſeven years, that is, to A.C. 713, when the Moors put an end to the kingdom, in the third year of Roderic their ſeventeenth and laſt king. Of all theſe, and their different nations, we ſhall ſpeak in the ſequel, every one in their order. As for thoſe of Leon, Caſtile, Arragon, Navarre, and Portugal, they will be ſpoken of in the modern hiſtory.

WHAT laws the antient Spaniards originally had, or what new ones were impoſed upon them by their conquerors, we are left to gueſs at. We are, indeed, told, that Hercules, upon his coming thither, did give them a body of them, ſuch as he had brought from his own country, whether Egypt, Tyre, or Greece; but what they were, we are wholly in the dark about. If we may, however, offer a conjecture from what we read about their neighbours the Gauls, who had a multiplicity of governments, ſome monarchical, ſome ariſtocratic, and ſome even democratic, and, of the former, ſome limited, ſome deſpotic, we may reaſonably conclude, that every one of them had their own laws, and ſuch as beſt ſuited to their genius, intereſt, and the ſafety of the whole; but theſe do not appear to have extended farther, than to the preſervation of each of their particular forms of government; for, in other caſes, each of them had their grand council, to deliberate, enact, explain, and decide, according to the preſent emergency, as they thought for the good of the community. By theſe all controverſies between man and man, town and town, diſtrict and diſtrict, were adjudged; and their power was ſuch, that even their kings, where Laws.

where they had not made themſelves wholly abſolute, of which we ſcarce meet with any inſtance, were obliged to ſubmit to their deciſion, ſave only that in all caſes, where the plaintiff was not ſatisfied with it, he had liberty to challenge his adverſary, and to determine the affair by ſingle combat. The ſame was likewiſe done between city and city, diſtrict and diſtrict, who appointed one or more champions to appear for them, and the cauſe was always adjudged to the conquering ſide; for it was a conſtant maxim amongſt all the deſcendants of the Celtes, that Providence always interpoſed in ſuch caſes, and that, wherever the victory fell, there was the ſureſt right.

In the art of war and military diſcipline, we ſhall hereafter have occaſion to ſhew, that the Gauls, Germans, and other nations of Celtic extract, were very deficient, truſting too much to their ſtrength and bravery, and deſpiſing all other arts, and even defenſive weapons, as beneath a man of true courage; but, in this reſpect, the Spaniards, though no leſs brave and ſtout, had much the advantage of them, which muſt be chiefly owing to their being ſo early and ſo frequently viſited, intermixed, and ſubdued, by other warlike nations, from whom they received freſh and conſtant improvements: whereas the Gauls and other northern nations, being ſcarcely known till after the coming in of the Romans, and having no other wars to wage, except what they did amongſt themſelves, one petty kingdom or commonwealth againſt another, they were quite ignorant of martial diſcipline; and even their weapons were ſo clumſily made and ſo miſerably tempered, that they often became uſeleſs, before half the action was over. In a word, their way of fighting was ſo artleſs and rude, that, in many inſtances, it gave a double advantage to the enemy, as we ſhall ſhew in the ſequel. The Spaniards, on the contrary, had, by their continual wars with ſuch a variety of polite nations, made themſelves maſters of, and placed their chief confidence in, their expertneſs in every branch of the martial trade. Diodorus Siculus tells us [a], that the Celtiberians had ſuch an excellent way of tempering the ſteel, with which they made their weapons, that no ſhield or helmet could reſiſt them (D); and that they uſed them with equal equal dexterity, both on horſeback and foot, and alternately, if occaſion required. He likewiſe commends them much for their extraordinary nimbleneſs in giving or avoiding blows; and adds, that they uſed likewiſe the ſame defenſive weapons that other nations did, ſuch as the ſhield, &c. And this is the reaſon why the Romans were ſo long ſubduing them, and ſpent more years in the conqueſt of this country, than Cæſar did weeks, if we may believe him, in the reduction of Gaul. In the former they were forced to proceed, as it were, inch by inch, againſt a ſtout and warlike nation, that knew how to take every advantage of ground, ſituation, diſpoſition, &c. in the other, every battle gained by Cæſar, and theſe, by his own confeſſion, were eaſily obtained through this want of ſkill, opened to him a way through whole provinces, who were glad to ſubmit to him on any tolerable terms. What increaſes the wonder is, that, at the coming in of the Romans, the Spaniards had ſuſtained ſuch long and dreadful wars, eſpecially juſt before, againſt the Carthaginians, that one might have expected them to have been quite exhauſted of their ſtrength; and much more likely would they have been ſo by thoſe, which they were now engaged in, in a new one, againſt a more potent and numerous enemy; and yet it is plain, they held out againſt them near, if not quite, two hundred years, before they were intirely ſubdued; nor were they then wholly ſo, ſince we find there was a conſtant neceſſity to keep a numerous army and a watchful eye over them, and even quite to diſarm whole provinces, to keep them under a tyranny, which many thouſands of them thinking ſhameful and inſupportable, preferred a voluntary death to ſuch a ſlaviſh ſtate; ſo dreadfully abject did it appear to that fierce and warlike nation, ſays Livy, to live without arms [f]: and indeed what Valerius Maximus ſays of the Celtiberians, or Spaniards, was common to all the Celtic nation and their deſcendants, That they eſteemed nothing ſo glorious, as to die with their ſword in hand, and in defence of their liberty. We ſhall ſee many pregnant inſtances of this noble ſpirit in ſome ſubſequent chapters. Even by the confeſſion of ſome of their own authors, the victories, which they gained over them, did often coſt them ſo dear, that they deſerved nothing leſs than ſuch a pompous name [g]; and many a triumph they have celebrated over them, which, had it had its due, would have been turned into a

doleful mourning for a bloody and signal defeat. Thus much we think is incumbent on an impartial author to say, in justice to any brave conquered people, though it be much more common now-a-days to see them treated with the same contempt and disregard by modern writers, as they were wont to be by their lordly conquerors. We shall conclude this article with a judicious remark, which has been long since made, with respect to this conquest of Spain, that though the Roman conquerors were always eager of taking the surname of those nations they subdued, such as Asiaticus, Africanus, Germanicus, &c. yet none of them, not even Augustus Cæsar, who is complimented by Livy with having put the finishing stroke to it, nor any of his successors, though most of them ambitious enough of such high titles, ever took that of Hispanicus, Ibericus, or any other that this country was called by. Q. Cæcil. Metellus was the only one, who aimed at it, and would fain have obtained that of Celtibericus, but could not. This seems to argue the Romans to have been so conscious of the vast deal of blood and treasure, which it had cost them, more than any other, that they could see no reason for bestowing any such honours upon them; and for which there might not have been the least pretence, had the Spaniards been united into one common interest, instead of being divided into so many governments, and under so many heads; for this, after all, will be found the main cause of their falling under the Roman yoke.

Learning, arts and sciences.

How soon arts and sciences began to flourish in Spain, can only be guessed at. That they have an excellent genius for them, is evident from the great number of excellent men it has produced, of which we shall mention only three of the most illustrious; viz. the famed Stoic philosopher Seneca, who was a native of Corduba; the learned orator Quintilian, and the great cosmographer Pomponius Mela, often quoted thro' this work: and though we find other European nations very slow and late in cultivating them, such as the Gauls, Germans, and others, who affected a singular contempt for them, as unsuitable to, and unworthy of, their martial genius; yet, considering the vast concourse of foreign nations into this kingdom, their excellent situation for trade and commerce, the great quantities and variety of metals which it afforded, it is very reasonable to suppose they must have begun to encourage them much earlier than any of their neighbours; and that whatever natural reluctancy, such as was common to all people of Celtic extract, they may have had against them, necessity ceſſity muſt have forced them to overcome it, in their own defence and preſervation. We ſhall ſay nothing here of thoſe trades and manufactures, for which they have ſince rendered themſelves famous for ſome ages, till they again relapſed into their antient pride and indolence, out of which they were but lately roufed up again. But, with reſpect to their antient ones, though we have not much of them upon record, it ſeems almoſt impoſſible they could have ſubſiſted without them, conſidering the continued invaſions they were expoſed to, and the many enemies they were forced to make head againſt. Even learning and the liberal arts, if we may believe Strabo, began early to flouriſh here [h]; for he tells us, that the Turdetani, a people of Bætica, were become very famous for them, and were poſſeſſed of a vaſt number of volumes of great antiquity, and bodies of law writ in verſe, and other pieces of poetry of above ſix thouſand years ſtanding; which laſt, however exaggerated, doth at leaſt ſhew, that there was ſome foundation for their pretence of having been early encouragers of ſeveral kinds of it: and this is further confirmed by ſeveral other antient authors, particularly one of their own nation [i], but more manifeſtly by what Pliny tells us [k] of one Lartius Licinius, a private perſon, who made no difficulty to give an immenſe ſum (E) for a book of Pliny II's commentaries.

Their language the old Celtic.

WE make no difficulty to affirm, that the original language of Spain was the old Celtic, of which we have given ſome account in a former volume [l], and ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak further of it in the next chapter; for, whether we ſuppoſe, with the generality of Spaniſh authors, that Tubal came thither by ſea and peopled that country, or, as we have elſewhere hinted, that the Celtes, or deſcendants of Gomer his eldeſt brother, ſpread themſelves thither by gradual migrations, the caſe will be much the ſame in this particular, becauſe, on the ſuppoſition of the former hypotheſis, Tubal and Gomer parting ſoon after the flood, their language muſt have been the ſame; that is, the Tubalians, or, as they are called by others, Cetubales, and the Gomerians, muſt have carried the ſame language into thoſe countries where they ſettled, whether we call it by the name of the one, or of the other; with this difference only, that it must have been much purer and nearer that of the antediluvian patriarchs, whether that was the Hebrew or any other; concerning which we shall not here repeat what we have said on the subject at the entrance of this work [m]. But as that Berosian account is now, by most learned men, (except the Spaniards, who are fond of their own antiquity, beyond other nations) rejected as fabulous, we have ventured here and elsewhere to ascribe the first peopling of Spain to the Celtes or descendants of Gomer. And what confirms this hypothesis is, that their antient language, as it is still preserved in some parts of Spain, appears to be the same with that which is spoken by our Welsh, who are descended from Gomer, and retain still their paternal name of Gomerai, and call their own language Gomraeg, as we have shewed in our history, quoted a little higher. We likewise there took notice of the vast affinity there is between it and the antient Hebrew, insomuch that to those, who are masters of both, they plainly appear to be only dialects of the same tongue; or, to speak, perhaps, more properly, the Celtic, or language of the descendants of Gomer, is a dialect of the Hebrew, or language of Noah. And hence the modern Spanish, as it is now spoken throughout that country, will afford us a new proof of what we have advanced on this head. Many learned men have observed, that it retains a great number of names, words, and, we might add, idioms too, which to them plainly appeared to be of Hebrew extract, but have been at a loss how to account for it. It is absurd to suppose, that they were brought thither by the Jews, who fled from their country, whilst Nebuchadnezzar was laying it waste; and came and settled there, as some have imagined; for that nation is rather famed for losing their tongue, than preserving it, much less for propagating it in any country they come to. This made Aldrete to think those words to be of Arabic, and not of Hebrew, extract, and to be of no longer date, than the coming in of the Moors [n]. Had that learned author had recourse to the old language, which is still kept in some parts of Biscay, Navarre, and Catalonia, he would have found [illegible] number of them, as would have convinced him that they are many centuries older than the coming in of the Moors: and, had he known any thing of the affinity there is between the Hebrew and the Celtic [illegible] easily concluded, that all those words and idioms in the modern Spanish, must have come from the latter, and not from the former; which would have removed all the difficulty, without having recourſe to the Arabic. What ſeems to have miſled him into this notion is, that there is likewiſe a great conformity between this laſt language and the Celtic: hence that ſurpriſing number of words and idioms common to the High Dutch and Arabic, which has puzzled ſo many critics, and cannot be otherwiſe accounted for, than by ſuppoſing them to be of Celtic original, which like the old Arabic, was, as we hinted a little higher, a dialect, or, as ſome chuſe rather to ſuppoſe it, both the Hebrew and they were dialects of the original tongue. If we allow then the Celtes to have been either the firſt, or even ſome of the firſt, inhabitants of Spain, there will be the leſs wonder there ſhould be ſtill found, in the modern language of that country, ſuch primitive words, notwithſtanding the length of time, and various changes it may have undergone, ſince it is no more than what may be obſerved, not only in the High and Low Dutch and other northern languages, but even in the French, the fartheſt removed and ſtrangelieſt altered from the old Gauliſh or Celtic. We may add, that the modern Spaniſh preſerves more of the maſculine grandeur, beauty, and energy, of the old Celtic, than any other in Europe. The ſame may be ſaid of the Spaniſh nation, with reſpect to the antient Celtic grandeur and majeſty; and we may ſafely add of their pride, and ſingular contempt for, not only trade, commerce, manufactures and the like, but even for agriculture, which they looked upon as below their dignity and martial genius; and therefore turned them over, as much as they could, to their ſlaves, as we ſhall ſhew, when we come to ſpeak of the Gauls in the next chapter.

BUT whatever the original language of Spain may have been at firſt, it muſt have ſuffered great changes under thoſe different nations, by whom this country was ſubdued, and of whom we ſhall give a further account in the ſequel: but the greateſt of all was under the Romans; for theſe made it their conſtant buſineſs to introduce theirs into every country that fell under their hands; at firſt by founding ſchools, and even univerſities, where youth might, with the Latin tongue and character, be taught the arts and ſciences, which was no ſmall inducement to inſpire them with a fondneſs for it; and where that failed, more forcible means were uſed, ſo that in time almoſt the whole kingdom came to ſpeak it as their mother tongue, only thoſe few tribes of the antient inhabitants, who perhaps, like our Welſh here, fled into ſuch mountainous countries, where they could not be conquered, and retained tained their original one. The Latin continued no longer there than to the coming in of the Goths and Vandals, under whom it began by degrees to dwindle from its purity, as it did in Gaul, Italy, and other parts, where thoſe barbarous nations, as they were called, got any dominion, and to adopt their barbariſms, and to decline into the ſtate, in which we ſee it now. And here it muſt be obſerved, with reſpect to the Spaniſh, that it has ſuffered the leaſt corruption, and retains more of the antient Latin, of any in Europe. This makes us think, that it did not receive any conſiderable alteration under the Moors; otherwiſe it muſt have deviated much more from it, than it actually doth: beſides, it is not likely, whatever Aldrete might infer from his fancied words and idioms of Arabic extract, and of which we have given a more probable origin, that Spaniards, fond as they ever were of their old ways, would have adopted any thing from a nation, which could not but be hateful to them, as invaders and conquerors; and much more ſo, on account of their religion.

Their writing.

FROM what we have lately quoted out of Strabo, it is plain, the antient Spaniards muſt have admitted writing amongſt them many ages before either the Gauls, Germans, or any others of Celtic extract; ſince theſe, as ſhall be ſhewn in due place, made it a religious maxim to commit nothing to writing, either of their hiſtory, learning, or religion, but contented themſelves with preſerving them in proper poems, which their druids and bards learned by heart, and tranſmitted in the ſame way to their diſciples. But it is more than probable, that the former were, in ſome meaſure, forced to it by ſome of thoſe many nations, under whoſe dominion they paſſed from time to time, ſuch eſpecially as the Phœnicians, the Carthaginians, the Greeks, and the Romans: but, which of thoſe different characters was firſt adopted, or became in vogue, we cannot pretend to ſay; only that, from the coming of the Romans, their letters, as well as language, drove out all the reſt, and was in uſe till their expulſion, when the old Gothic of which we gave an account at the beginning of this ſection took place. This laſt, though far inferior to the Roman in beauty, and more tiring to the eyes, continued in ſuch vouge throughout Europe, from the coming of the Goths, downwards, that all church divinity and law-books were written, and (even long after the invention of printing and reviving of the old Roman) were printed in it. We have ſeen there why, and how, it was at length condemned and ſet aſide.

In

IT will not be amiſs here to take notice of an odd way, which the Spaniards of old had of computing of time, and which was peculiar to that nation. It took its riſe in the reign of Auguſtus Cæſar, prevailed all over Spain, and was not aboliſhed till after the middle of the thirteenth century; that is, firſt, in Arragon, by Peter IV. A. D. 1358, in Caſtile, by king John, an. 1383, and in Portugal, by John I. an. 1415. This way was, toreckon the years by æras, or rather from the æra, as they called it, without any other explanation, inſtead of computing from the creation, flood, birth of Chriſt, or ony other remarkable epoch; and this was uſed, not only in their profane, but, what is ſtill more ſurpriſing, in their eccleſiaſtic records. So that it has puzzled the learned not a little, at firſt, to fix the point of time of this æra, and to find out a tolerable etymon for that word thus uſed. It is not worth troubling our readers with their various conjectures upon it; for nothing but conjecture has as yet been offered, and ſome of them, too, forced and far fetched. It ſhall ſuffice to ſay here, that they are all agreed on one point, viz. that the æra did commence in Auguſtus's time, ſome add, that it was inſtituted in honour of him; but they differ about the number of years which it preceded the birth of Chriſt. Some reckon it but barely twenty-ſix years, and think thoſe highly miſtaken, who give it any more [a]. Others think it began on the year, in which that prince ordered the world to be taxed, as the evangeliſt words it; and that it was called æra from the æs, or copper coin which was exacted by that decree [b]. Some carry it higher, to fifty-two years before Chriſt, which was, according to them, the year in which Julius Cæſar was killed and Auguſtus ſucceeded him [c]: the righteſt of them, in our opinion, are thoſe, who deduct the firſt four years out of that emperor's reign, becauſe, as he was then but one of the triumvirs, it is not likely the Spaniards ſhould have begun ſo ſoon to compliment him with this new computation; and conſequently think, that it did not take place till the fifth year of his triumvirſhip, when that country, together with Gaul and ſome other provinces, fell to his lot; and that was forty-eight years before the birth of Chriſt. As for the original of the word, thoſe that do not like that we mentioned above, which is that of Iſidore biſhop of Seville [d], will be leſs pleaſed with ſome others, which Spaniſh critics have fetched ſtill farther. That of Vaſeus, who thinks that æra was a mark ſtamped on the coin, to ſhew the value of it; and that of Reſendius, who affirms that æra was nothing elſe but a term to ſignify a computation, or computed number; would appear moſt probable to us, if they were backed with any good authority[e].

Education. The education of their children in antient days chiefly conſiſted in training them up to martial deeds, uſing them to ſuch food and exerciſes as tended to make them ſtrong and robuſt, active and nimble; in inſpiring them with a love of liberty and a contempt of death. Theſe principles were ſo ſtrongly inculcated into them from their infancy, and ſo carefully riveted in them both by precept and example, as they grew up, as well as by the hopes of a glorious future life to the bold and brave, and of miſery and ignominy to the baſe and cowardly, that the whole nation ſeemed unanimouſly to prefer death before ſlavery, and looked upon it as the moſt glorious of all bleſſings to die fighting in defence of their country. Even their women, by being obliged to train up their children in the martial way, contracted ſuch a habit of bravery, that they ſeldom or never failed of ſhewing ſome ſignal examples of it to them, as often as an opportunity offered itſelf. But we ſhall defer ſpeaking more particularly on this head, till the next chapter, where we ſhall ſingle out ſeveral inſtances of this native valour, in theſe and other Celtic nations, even in thoſe of the ſofter ſex and tender years.

Commerce. We have already obſerved, that this country was not only excellently ſituate for trade and commerce, but abounded with ſuch commodities, eſpecially ſilver, as invited all the trading nations of Europe, Aſia, and Africa, to come thither for them, to ſettle among them, and even to ſubdue them; inſomuch, that ſcarce any kingdom under the heaven ever paſſed through ſo many different dominions as this. Egyptians, Phœnicians, Tyrians, Carthaginians, Greeks, Romans, Gauls, Germans, Goths, Vandals, Moors, and many others, have had their particular ſettlements in it; and the greateſt part of them, if not all, have held it, or at leaſt ſome conſiderable ſhare of it, under their ſubjection, promoted the trade and navigation of it, and founded great and opulent cities, and contributed towards the enriching of it. What condition the country was in, before thoſe ſtrange nations came into it, we dare not ſay, though, if we were to believe one half of what the Spaniſh hiſtorians have written on this head, it muſt have been in a more flouriſhing condition than any other; ſince we are told by them, that, even before the coming of Hercules, it had a great number of rich and ſtately towns and cities, and theſe of great antiquity too[f]: and this ſeems in ſome meaſure confirmed by ancient writers, ſuch as Strabo, Juſtin, Diodorus Siculus, Pomponius Mela, and others; and indeed, if they really had ſuch a ſucceſſion, as we are going to give in the next ſection, of long-lived and opulent monarchs, from Tubal the grandſon of Noah to Geryon, whom that hero overcame, there would be no room to doubt of the truth of ſuch ancient cities having been built before his time. But the misfortune is, that there is no other authority for thoſe reigns, than that of Beroſus, who, as we ſhall ſhew in the ſequel, is juſtly looked upon now as a fabulous author, and that what the Greek and Roman authors mentioned above have ſaid of the pretended antiquity of thoſe cities, and their founders, was in all likelihood taken upon truſt from the Spaniards themſelves, who appear plainly enough to have been as fond of indulging this paſſion for antiquity, as ever the Greeks, or any other of their neighbours; but of this we muſt leave every reader to judge for himſelf.

To cloſe up the character of the ancient Spaniards, they poſſeſſed all the virtues of the old Celtic nation, and inherited fewer of their vices, than any others of their deſcendants; they were brave, noble, and magnanimous, and hoſpitable to a high degree, and ſo famed for their faithfulneſs, that, even after their being conquered by the Romans, ſeveral of thoſe emperors made no difficulty of preferring them to other people, to be their life-guard. They were ſober, frugal, patient under hardſhips, jealous of their honour, and, till a few centuries paſt, rather deſirous, as much as they could, to preſerve their own territories, than to go in ſearch of new ones abroad. As for the vices they had in common with all others of Celtic extract, and of which we ſhall ſpeak more fully in the ſubſequent chapters, thoſe of pride, cruelty, ſuperſtition, and lazineſs, are juſtly laid to their charge, as well as to that of the Gauls, Germans, and others[g]; but it doth not appear, that they imitated them in their ſumptuous banquets, much leſs in their exceſſive fondneſs for ſtrong liquors; on the contrary, they are famed for their averſion to them, by which they preſerved themſelves from ſuch bloody quarrels, as were the natural conſequence of thoſe drunken revels, which we find to have been ſo indulged among their neighbours, and were commonly attended with the worſt effects.

SECT. III.

The origin, antiquity, and chronology, of the antient Spaniards.

Spain, its firſt inhabitants.

WE have, in ſeveral parts of this work [a], proceeded on the moſt probable hypotheſis, founded on the teſtimony of the beſt and moſt ancient authors, that the Celtes, the deſcendants of Gomer the eldeſt ſon of Japhet [b], were the firſt that peopled Europe, at leaſt as far as the Danube and Rhine, and even beyond. Whether this was done by gradual migrations from the place of their diſperſion after the flood, or by colonies brought thither by ſea, will, we think, be more properly inquired into in the next chapter, where we ſhall ſpeak of the Gauls, the immediate deſcendants of thoſe Celtes, and where we ſhall ſhew, from the beſt ancient teſtimonies, that theſe were, from the earlieſt times, found ſettled in every part of it, and even in this of Spain, notwithſtanding its being ſurrounded on three ſides by the ſea, and on the other by the Pyrenees, before any nation that intermingled afterwards among them, of whom we have given an account in the firſt ſection of this chapter, and ſhall have further occaſion to ſpeak at the entrance of the next [c]. According to this hypotheſis, it will be impoſſible to gueſs, about what time either this, or any other country of Europe, were peopled by them, or which of them claims the preference in point of ancientneſs before the reſt, or even to aſſert any thing of this country before the coming of Hercules into it.

BUT the Spaniards, ever fond of their own antiquity, beyond any other nation, having once adopted fabulous Beroſus, have fetched their origin from another ſpring, namely, from Tubal, the fifth ſon of Japhet [d], whom that author affirms to have come into, and reigned in, Spain from the year of the flood 143, to 258, and from whom they pretend to derive a regular ſeries of long-winded monarchs, down to the three Geryons, who were killed by the Egyptian Hercules, to ſay nothing of a much longer one, which they likewiſe draw from this laſt hero, and ſome other new-comers from Libya, down to the time in which they allow the Celtes to have made their firſt entrance into Spain, viz. in the year of the flood 1350; ſo, that according to theſe authors, Spain had been a monarchy, and had laſted, one thouſand two hundred and twenty ſix years before the coming of the Celtes into it [e]. This account, how fabulous ſoever, not only with regard to Tubal's reign, and of his pretended ſucceſſor, but likewiſe in ſome meaſure, with regard to thoſe of Hercules, as it is not only adopted by all the Spaniſh authors in general, but likewiſe by all the followers of Beroſus, we ſhall be obliged, before we go farther, to give our readers a compendious ſketch of it, eſpecially as we have all along in this work given an account of the fabulous, as well as the more certain, part of the hiſtory of each nation; and ſhall do the ſame in thoſe that follow, eſpecially in that of our own.

1. Tubal, having received his grandfather's bleſſing, came, according to thoſe hiſtorians, and ſettled in ſome parts of Spain (A), in the 134th year of the flood, and reigned

Tubal, or Thubal.

(A) This Beroſian fable they think ſufficiently backed by what we read in Joſephus (1), who makes Jubal, or Thubal, as he is called, to have peopled Spain; and by St. Jerom's comment on the prophets Iſaiah and Ezekiel, where he underſtands by Tubal either Italy or Spain; but this, at moſt, will only prove, that ſome of the patriarch's poſterity came and peopled this country, or perhaps came and ſettled in ſome part of it; but not, that he came thither himſelf, and founded a monarchy in it; which has been ſufficiently exploded in ſome former part of this work (2), and by the generality of authors, who have confuted the fabulous founder of that notion (3).

However, theſe partial ones, who have adopted it, have built many other conjectural ſchemes upon it; ſuch as the place where he landed, ſettled, &c. the ſyſtem of religion, laws, &c. he left with them, and the like; inſomuch, that they affirm, that his deſcendants did ed there to the year 258; during which interval Noah, called, by profane authors, Janus, came thither, and built two cities, the one of which he called, from his own name Noela in Galicia, and the other Noega in Asturia, and which, to this day, retains ſtill that of Navia.

Iberus. 2. Iberus, the ſon of Tubal, who began his reign in the year of the flood 258, reigned thirty-ſeven years, that is, to the year 295. From him our authors pretend, that the river Iberus, from which Spain was called Iberia, had its name. We have elſewhere given a much more probable etymon of theſe two names [f]. He was ſucceeded by his ſon, Idubeda. 3. Idubeda, by ſome called Juballa, and Jubalda, who reigned ſixty-four-years, gave name to the famed Idubedean mountains, peopled the province of Briga, now Riola, and called it by that name from,

Brigo. 4. Brigo, his ſon and ſucceſſor (B), who reigned fifty-two years, and left the kingdom to his ſon,

Tagus. 5. Tagus, who reigned thirty years, gave name to the river Tagus, and was ſucceeded by his ſon, Bætus the laſt of Tubal's line. 6. Bætus, from whom the river Bætis, and the province of Bætia, Bætica, formerly Turdetania, and ſince Andaluſia, had their names. He is ſaid to have been ſurnamed Turdetanus, on account of his introducing, as well as encouraging, learning.

ſtrictly adhere to the precepts given to Noah by God, and preſerved themſelves free from idolatry, polytheiſm, and all heatheniſh ſuperſtition, till Hercules brought thoſe plagues from Egypt, and infected Spain with them. But of this we ſhall have a fairer occaſion to ſpeak in the next chapter, where we ſhall enter into a more exact detail of the religion of the Celtes and Gauls.

(B) From him the Briones, or Brigones, ſituate along the long ridge of Idubedean mountains, are affirmed, by the Navarrean hiſtorians, to have been named as well as the city of Cantabria, anciently, according to them, Cantabriga; with the Caſtellani derive both from the Galli Braccati, who came and ſettled there.

The word Briga, which had the ſame ſignification in Spain, and in the cities Cantabriga and Meidobriga, which the ancient Gallic Dur or Dunum, in the names Lugdunum, Noviodunum, and the German Burgh, in Friburg, Ausburgh, &c. is likewiſe affirmed to have had its origin from him. But the word Brig or Bric, from which Briga and Brica differ only in termination, is certainly of Celtic extraction, as we ſhall ſee in the next chapter. Several other things are ſaid likewiſe of this king, without any foundation, which the reader may ſee in the Spaniſh authors lately quoted.

7. Geryon.

7. Geryon an African, or Libyan, of a gigantic ſtature, and a bloody tyrant, who began his reign in the year of the flood 514, and reigned, according to ſome, twenty-five, and thirty-four years, according to others [g]. Againſt him came Oſiris, or, as he is called by others, Dionyſius king of Egypt, with a powerful army, defeated and killed the tyrant (C), and divided his kingdom between his three ſons, commonly called the three Geryons, after having firſt exacted a ſtrict promiſe from them, that they would reign amicably, and abſtain from thoſe plunders, ravages, and cruelties, for which he had ſo juſtly puniſhed their father. Geryon.

8. THREE Geryons, ſaid to have been all of one birth, and the laſt of the Geryonic race, reigned with ſuch ſurpriſing concord, that they are thought to have given birth to the fable that repreſents them with a three-fold body. Theſe being ſuppoſed to have had a hand in the death of Oſiris, in revenge of that of their father, Hercules, his ſon, brought a great army from Egypt,, firſt gave them a total overthrow, and then o- Geryons.

[g] Conf. GARIBAY. compend. VAS. chron. Hiſp. ſub. an. diluvii 514.

(C) This Geryon was alſo called Deabus, and is ſurnamed by the Greeks, Chryſco, on account of the vaſt wealth which he had gotten by his plunders and robberies. He is ſaid to have brought over a number of wild or Scenite Arabs, and to have been the founder of the city of Girona (4). Diodorus Siculus, makes him the ſon of Chryſaor, or the golden ſword, the ſon of Meduſa. From his defeat is ſuppoſed to have ſprung the fable of Hercules's overcoming him, and carrying his oxen away, ſpoken of in a former volume 5). Juſtin, indeed, makes mention of him, and of his vaſt herds of cattle (6); but Strabo and Pliny look upon the whole as a mere fable (7); and Arrian further affirms (8), that there never was ſuch a king as Geryon in Spain. Ariſtotle ſays, that Hercules (whom even ſome Spaniſh authors affirm to have been, not the Egyptian, but the Greek one, and ſon of Jupiter by (9) Alcmena) had been enticed over into Spain by the richneſs of its inhabitants: whence a law is pretended to have been enacted amongſt them, forbidding the uſe or poſſeſſion of ſilver, which was ſtill in force ſome time after the coming thither of the Carthaginians (10). Something like this law was likewiſe among ſome of the ancient Gauls, of which we ſhall ſpeak in the next chapter.

vercame and ſlew them, one after another, in ſingle combat: It is ſaid, that the columns between the Carpean and Abylean mountains were ſet up in memory of this exploit. They had reigned, according to our authors near forty years, when they received this overthrow, and were buried in the iſle of Cadiz [h]. Hercules, who did not come ſo much to conquer that kingdom, as to deliver the world from tyrants and robbers, had no ſooner overcome the three Geryons, than he made ready to paſs into Italy, and left the government of Spain to his ſon.

Hiſpal. 9. Hiſpal (D), who built the city of that name, now called Seville, which was afterwards rebuilt and beautified by Cæſar: and from Hiſpal began a new ſucceſſion of Spaniſh kings. He is ſaid to have reigned ſeventeen years, and to have left his kingdom to his ſon, Hiſpan. 10. Hiſpan, or Hiſpanus, from whom the country took its name, which it hath preſerved ever ſince. He began his reign in the year of the flood 607, and reigned thirty-one years, and is affirmed to have been a noble and magnificent prince (E), and to have made the city of Cadiz his chief reſidence [i].

Hercules. Hercules, hearing of his ſon Hiſpan's death, returned into Spain, and reigned there from the year of the flood 639, to 658. Being grown very old, he bequeathed the Spaniſh kingdom to Heſperus, one of his captains and companions; and died, and was buried at Gades, Caliz, where that ſtately monument was erected to him, which we mentioned in a late

[h] Garibay, ubi ſup. lib. iv. c. 12. ad fin. [i] Id. ibid. in fin c 14.

(D) In this expedition it is pretended that our Egyptian hero introduced the idolatry and ſuperſtition of his Country; to which another adds the bloody rite of offering up human victims (11). He had likewiſe two favourite companions with him, the one named Zacynthus, and the other Baleon; the former of whom gave his name to the famed city of Zacynthum, ſince Saguntum (12); and the other to the Balearic iſlands, now Majorca and Minorca (13).

Another ancient author, who was a Spaniard by birth, adds, that the Tyrians built a ſtately temple to this Hercules, which became famous, both for its antiquity and vaſt treaſures (14).

(E) To him ſome ancient authors have falſely aſcribed, among other ſumptuous works, the aqueduct of Segovia, which was done by the emperor Trajan, and the Pharus or famed tower of Corunna, a maritime city in Galicia, which was erected in Auguſtus's time (15).

note, and which became in high veneration, not only among the Spaniards, but was reſorted to by moſt nations of Europe, Aſia, and Afric (F).

11. Heſperus, from whom both Spain and Italy were called Heſperia, but the former, by way of diſtinction, Heſperia Magna, and his brother Atlas, ſurnamed Italus, had accompanied Hercules in all his excurſions and conqueſts. Upon the death of that hero, Heſperus cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed his ſucceſſor, as by his will and appointment. Atlas, who is ſuppoſed to have been left in Italy, upon the return of the other two in Spain, came thither alſo himſelf, and drove him out of his kingdom, in the year of the flood 669, after he had reigned there eleven years. Heſperus.

12. Atlas, after he had reigned ten years in Spain, is ſaid to have returned into Italy, in order to drive his brother thence alſo; for it ſeems that fugitive prince was fled thither, and was ſo well received there, as to give him new cauſe of jealouſy. Upon his departure he left the kingdom to his ſon, Atlas.

13. Orus or Sicorus (G), who reigned forty-five years. He gave his name to the river Sicoris, now Segre, which falls into the Iberus, or Ebro; and was ſucceeded by his ſon. Orus.

14. Sicanus, who had followed him from Italy into Spain; a prince ſaid to have been liberal and magnanimous. He gave name to the river Anas, now Ana; reigned thirty-two years, during which he is ſaid to have carried his ſucceſsful arms into Italy and Sicily, which was from him called Sicania, as it had been before Trinacria, and ſince, Sicily from his ſucceſſor. Sicanus.

15. Siceleus ſucceeded his father, and reigned forty-four years, during which he is ſaid to have paſſed over into Italy, Siceleus.

(F) It is hardly worth the while to trouble our readers with the various ſentiments of the learned concerning this famed hero; whether he was the Egyptian, Phœnician, or Grecian Hercules: eſpecially as we have had occaſion to ſpeak of him in ſome former parts of this work, to which we muſt here refer our readers (16), as well as to what we ſhall have further occaſion to ſpeak of him in the next chapter.

(G) From this and the two following princes names, Cicanus and Ciceleus, it is ſuppoſed that their proper names were Orus, Anus, and Eleus; and that the Cic was a titular prænomen: and this is further proved by Anus giving his name to the river Anas, and Eleus; to that of Eleo (17).

and performed very great feats, and to have aſſiſted Iaſius, the grandſon of Atlas, by Electra his daughter, who was then at high wars with Dardanus, about the ſucceſſion to certain ſtates in that country. In this prince's reign the Deucalian flood is ſaid to have happened, and that Moſes was then likewiſe performing his wonders before the hardened king of Egypt.

Luſus. 16. Siceleus was ſucceeded by his ſon Luſus, who had accompanied him in his wars in Italy. He is ſaid to have been a brave prince, but vaſtly addicted to the heatheniſh ſuperſtitions that then prevailed. Some attribute the peopling of Luſitania, now Portugal, to him, from whom it was called by that name; others, to another Luſus, a chieftain and companion of Bacchus. We can affirm nothing certain about either. Luſus reigned thirty years, and was ſucceeded by,

Ulus. 17. Ulus, or Sic-Ulus, whom ſome make the ſon of Luſus, others of Atlas. He was ſo warlike a prince, kept ſuch vaſt armies and fleets, that he was called the ſon of Neptune. He paſſed over into Italy, to aſſiſt thoſe Spaniſh colonies, that had been ſettled there by Atlas, repreſſed their enemies there, peopled ſome countries in the neigbourhood of Rome, built ſome cities, aud particularly the famed caſtle of Alſine; thence he paſſed into Sicily, to aſſiſt thoſe Spaniſh colonies, which his predeceſſors had fixed there, and who, it ſeems, were ſadly harraſſed by the other inhabitants of that iſland, which, from his great feats there, he called by his own name. He reigned about ſixty years, and was ſucceeded by what means can ſcarcely be gueſſed [k], by,

Teſta. 18. Teſta, an African, or Libyan, to whom, however, the Spaniſh hiſtorians, give the character of a good and wiſe prince. Some of them affirm, that it was in the thirty fifth year of his reign, that a colony of Greeks, from the iſland of Zacynthus, now Jaſanto, came into Spain by ſea; and, with his permiſſion, ſettled in that part of it, which they called by the name of their native place, though they became afterwards better known by thoſe of Saguntini and Saguntines. Here then is a new and different account of the foundation of that famed city and people, of whoſe valour and ſad cataſtrophe we have ſpoken at large at the beginning of this volume [l]; and this, if right, deſtroys what we mentioned a little higher concerning the origin, which is given them by other authors. Nothing can be advanced on either ſide but conjecture. As for Teſta, after a long reign of ſeventy-four years, he was ſucceeded by his ſon,

19. Romus, who reigned thirty-three years, and is ſuppoſed to have founded the city of Rome, in the province of Tarragona, ſince called Valentia from the Romans calling that city afterwards by this name, and inlarging and beautifying it, and making it the metropolis of it (H). In this prince's reign, the Phœnicians are ſaid to have made their firſt entrance into Spain; and about the ſame time alſo the famed Greek chieftain Iacchus or Bacchus, ſurnamed Liber Pater, with a conſiderable army, not ſo much with a deſign to conquer that country, as to ſpread his fame and colonies on this, as he had done on the other, ſide of the world, where he is ſaid to have carried his conqueſts as far as the Indies. As he travelled through Andaluſia, he built the famed city Nebriſa, in the province of Bætica, ſince called Veneria, and now Lebrixa, the native place of the learned Anthony Nebriſſenſis, often quoted in this chapter; who ſays on this head, that Luſus, the ſon of Bacchus, gave name to Luſitania, and that this expedition happened two hundred years before the ſtruction of Troy. Romus was ſucceeded by, Romus. Bacchus comes into Spain.

20. Palatuus, the ſuppoſed founder of the city of Palentia, or Palantia. This prince had reigned about eighteen or nineteen years in great tranquillity, when a famous warrior, named Licinius Cacus, raiſed a war againſt him, and deprived him, according to ſome, of part, and, according to others of his whole kingdom, and forced him to wander about from country to country, whilſt he reigned uncontrouled, and encouraged all kinds of arts and handicraft trades, which, till then, had been much neglected in that country (I). At length Palatuus found means to recover his kingdom from him, after he had poſſeſſed it thirty-ſix years; and gave him ſeated. Palatuus. Cacus de-

(H) Others will have it, the people of that province built this famed city, and called it by that name, in honour of Romus; and that the Greeks called it Rome, and the Latins Valencia, as names of the ſame import in each language (18).

(I) Some authors are ſo fond of raiſing the fame of this uſurper, that they make him the firſt, who ſet about diſcovering the iron-mines in Spain, and ſet up the fabrication of that metal. He might, perhaps, have given greater encouragement to this manufacture than any of his predeceſſors; but that they ſhould have been ſuch ſtrangers in Spain to the working of ſo neceſſary a metal, is altogether improbable.

a total overthrow near mount Cæus, now Montcajo, so called from him, after this overthrow. Some pretend, that he was slain upon it; others, that he retired into Italy: however that be, Palatuus reigned seventy years, and was succeeded by,

Erythræus 21. Erythræus, in whose reign is placed the founding of the famed city of Carthage, of which we shall say no more here, having given an ample account of it in a former volume [m]. He is said to have given name to the famed island of Erythræa, or Erythia, as it is called by Mela [n] and Pliny [o], an island which has been sought for far and near [p]. We have endeavoured, at the beginning of this volume, to give the best account of its situation, to which we shall refer our readers [q]. Erythræus was the last of the line of Tesla, in which the monarchy had lasted two hundred and forty-five years, according to some; or an hundred and twenty-three according to others [r], including the forty-six years of Licinius's usurpation. He was succeeded by,

Gargoras. 22. Gargoras, surnamed Mellicola, because, as Justin hath it [s], he found out the use of honey and cultivating of bees. He was a Spaniard by birth, a wise prince, and a great promoter of industry. In his reign the famed city of Troy having been destroyed by the Greeks, of which, as well as its long siege, an account has been given in a former volume [t], many of those warriors, who either did not care, or were hindered, by contrary winds, from returning into their own country, came and settled in Spain, and built cities in several parts of it, and, amongst them, those which the reader will find in the margin (K). To Gargoras succeeded, if we may believe Justin [u],

From thence he passed into Galicia, and gave name to that canton (19) He is likewise said to have built the city of Salmantica, now Salamanca, in memory of his own native country; though Stephen of Byzantium, who calls it Elmantica, says nothing of his founding it Amphilochus, a companion of Teucer, is said to have built that of Amphiloqua, since called Aguas Caldas, or hot waters, and now Orense in Galicia. Diomedes built Tyde on the banks of the Minius, now Minho, in memory

23. Habis, his grandſon, by a daughter, and a baſtard, but in all other reſpects an extraordinary prince, whether we conſider the many and ſurpriſing dangers he was obliged to go through, and from which he was delivered, as it were, by as many miracles, or the beauty and tallneſs of his perſon, or the many and ſignal benefits which the Spaniſh nation received from him during his reign, to which he was, ſuch was his apparent merit, nominated by his grandfather in his life. The Spaniards at that time were ſtill ſo very rude and uncivilized, that, they knew nothing of the uſe of bread, or of cultivating the earth. It was he, it ſeems, that firſt taught them to plow their land with oxen, to ſow and reap corn, to grind, knead, and bake it into bread. He likewiſe gave them many excellent laws, obliged them to live in towns, and appointed them ſeven courts of judicature in ſeven cities of his kingdom. Our author adds, that, after his death, his kingdom continued in his poſterity during ſeveral centuries; but we muſt not then ſuppoſe, that either he or they, or indeed any of his predeceſſors, were maſters of the whole country, but only of ſome conſiderable part, as we hinted a little higher, in ſpeaking of their government. How long this laſt king reigned, who ſucceeded him, &c. what other kings reigned in other parts of Spain, and many other things relating to the antient hiſtory of it, we are wholly left in the dark about, down to the coming of the Carthaginians, no antient hiſtorian having left us any thing about it. Only this chaſm is filled up, by ſome fabulous authors of theirs, with ſuch ſtuff as ſmells as rank of the fable, as what we have here in England from our own monkiſh books; we ſhall mention one or two of them, by way of ſample:

memory of his father Tydeus. It retains ſtill the name of Tuy, Teya, and Tude. Some other places and colonies theſe, and a few more, gave name to; as Aſtur to Aſturias, Ulyſſes to Ulyſſpone, now Liſbon, where he built alſo a temple to Pallas. Strabo (20) calls this city Ulixipolis, or city of Ulyſſes. Mneſtheus built and peopled the port, that bore his name, on the coaſts of Audaluſia, near the city of Gades, or Caliz; in which laſt, the Andaluſians ſay, was a ſtately temple, built by the ſame warrior, which became in time famous, and much reſorted to, for its oracle, from all the three parts of the world.

theſe authors, ſuch an extraordinary drought, that it did not rain in all Spain during the ſpace of twenty-ſix years, inſomuch, that all the rivers of it, except the Bætis and the Iberus, were dried up, and the country become almoſt a deſert, for want of inhabitants. If ſuch a long and univerſal drought had really happened, it would rather be a wonder, that there were either man or beaſt alive in moſt parts of that vaſt country. They tell us, indeed, that about the ſame time a certain people, whom they call Almonides, came and ſettled in it; but if ſo, is it not very ſtrange, that no antient author ſhould have taken the leaſt notice of it [w]? for which reaſon the learned author, often quoted in this chapter, juſtly rejects both as fabulous [x]. Fifty-ſeven years after, Homer, or, as his right name was, Meleſigenes, travelled through Spain and Italy. This was before he loſt his ſight; and he, according to Herodotus, flouriſhed an hundred and ſixty-eight years after the Trojan war [y].

Year of the flood 1350. Before Chriſt 1649. The Gauls and the Rhodians ſettle in Spain.

About forty-two years after, the Celtes, or Gauls, are ſaid to have come firſt into Spain, and, about twenty years after, the Rhodians. Of the firſt it is affirmed, that they fought for ſome time with the Spaniards, or Iberians, as they were then called, about their ſettlements; but agreed at length upon a peace and mutual friendſhip; ſo that they, from that time, became ſo blended with each other, by intermarrying and living together, that they became as one people, under the name of Celtiberians [z]. From which account we would obſerve by-the-by, that this could only be one of thoſe colonies, which the Celtes in Gaul ſent into the country: for more than one or two they ſent from thence hither, as well as in other parts of Europe, as often as they were ſtraightened for want of room, as we ſhall ſee in the next chapter. It is, therefore, very probable, that theſe colonies, coming into Spain, after a few battles or ſkirmiſhes, being found, by the inhabitants, to be originally of the ſame ſtock, having the ſame, or near the ſame, language, religion, and cuſtoms, were readily admitted and blended with them. The Rhodians, who came thither by ſea, landed at the foot of the Pyrenean mountains, and built there a city, to which they gave their name. It was a biſhop's ſee till the time of the Goths, but now reduced to a heap of ruins. About ten years after, happened that great fire, which ſpread itſelf all over that vaſt ridge of mountains called the Pyrenees, and, from thence,

Incendium Pyrenæum, or, as others will have it, more properly, that thoſe mountains were thence called Pyrenean. This fire, we are told, was at firſt kindled by ſome ſhepherds [a], and burnt with ſuch fierceneſs for many days, that it ſpread itſelf almoſt over that whole ridge. As for what they add, that the intenſeneſs of the heat melted the ſilver in the mines, and made it boil up, and run down in rivulets along thoſe hills, it is juſtly looked upon as fabulous by Poſidonius, and by Strabo after him [b].

The Phœnicians carry off immenſe quantities of ſilver hence.

IT muſt be owned, however, that Spain muſt have yielded extraordinary quantities of that metal, if what we read in Ariſtotle be not greatly exaggerated, that the Phœnicians, who are ſuppoſed to have come thither about the 1500th year of the flood, exchanged their naval commodities for ſuch an immenſe weight of it, that their ſhips could neither contain, nor ſuſtain its load, though they uſed it for ballaſt, and made their anchors, and other iron implements, of ſilver [c] (L). Theſe are ſuppoſed to have likewiſe ſettled in Spain, and to have built ſeveral other cities, eſpecially in Bætica, and to have had the maſtery of the ſea for the ſpace of forty-one years, after which they went and ſettled in the Balearic iſlands.

Other nations that governed in Spain.

BESIDES the Tyrians, Egyptians, and Phœnicians, already mentioned, who obtained footing and dominion in this country, Euſebius mentions [d] ſeveral other nations, who did the ſame before the coming in of the Carthaginians, ſuch as the Egyptians a ſecond time, who held the dominion of the ſea thirty-five years, and built ſome cities, eſpecially Tarracona, which they ſo called from Tarraco their leader. The Mileſians are likewiſe affirmed, by the ſame author, to have held

Other authors aſcribe the building of it to the Tyrians (22); but we ſhall refer our readers to what has been ſaid of the foundation of that famed place, in a former volume (23). As for the cities of Malaca and Abdera, Strabo plainly ſays, that they were built by the Phœnicians (24).

ſome government there the ſpace of twenty-nine years. Next, the Carians, forty-eight years, from whom Ptolemy affirms, the Cariſti in Spain to be deſcended. The Leſbians ſucceeded them, who built ſeveral cities, and governed, according to the ſame Euſebius, ſixty-eight years. Then the Phocians, in the ſixteenth year of Tarquinius Priſcus, and held the government forty-eight years; and from thence went and ſettled on the ſouth part of Gaul, and built the city of Marſeilles, of which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the next chapter. Laſtly, Nebuchadnezzar, after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and conqueſt of Judæa, is affirmed by Joſephus and Strabo to have reigned nine years in Spain [e], at the end of which it is ſaid that he abandoned it to the Carthaginians: though it is likely, that, as the Spaniſh writers affirm, a great part of that vaſt hoſt, which he had brought with him, ſettled there, and built cities and caſtles, which they called by their own, or ſome Chaldee names, by which they may be ſtill traced up to their original [f]; but upon the whole it ſeems probable, that moſt, if not all, of theſe nations, contented themſelves with the maritime parts, for the ſake of commerce, and the command of the ſea, and penetrated but a little way into the inlands, whilſt theſe might enjoy their own laws and government, and be glad to trade and barter with them, and ſo be leſs ſolicitous who were maſters of the ſea-coaſts and parts adjacent, ſo they could but enjoy the benefit of their commerce, and the produce of their own lands, in peace and quietneſs. If any of theſe ſtrangers were enticed, by the pleaſantneſs and fruitfulneſs of the country, to ſettle amongſt the antient inhabitants, whether this was done by permiſſion and conſent, or by force of arms, yet it could not be long before they became ſo blended with each other, that nothing remained of their origin, but the names they gave to thoſe places, which they either built or lived in. As for the Celtiberi, mentioned a little higher, they increaſed ſo faſt in that pleaſant and healthy country, that they were forced to have recourſe to their old method of ſending colonies abroad. Some of them ſettled in Luſitania, where they founded ſeveral cities, and called them by Celtic names (M); and from theſe colonies colonies the Luſitanians had that of Celtiberi given to them: hence Diodorus Siculus ſays, that of all the Celtiberians the Luſitanians were the ſtouteſt [g]. Another colony of them went into Bætica, where they likewiſe left ſeveral cities, and other monuments of their ſettlement. The goodneſs of the climate, however, joined to their laborious exerciſes and plain way of living, which made them ſo ſtout and long-lived, may be juſtly eſteemed one of the main cauſes of their multiplying ſo faſt, and being obliged to ſend abroad ſuch frequent colonies, a further proof of which we have in the long reigns of ſome of their monarchs formerly mentioned; and we ſhall cloſe this ſection with one more, in the perſon of the famed Arganthonius king of the Tarteſſii, who is ſaid to have reigned at Gades, now Cadiz, full fourſcore years [h], and to have died in the hundred and thirtieth, according to one [i], or hundred and fortieth, according to another, antient author [k], and is mentioned with admiration by others, for his long reign and life [l] (N).

SECT. IV.

Of the conquest of Spain by the Carthaginians and Romans, to the coming in of the Goths, and other northern nations.

THIS remainder of the Spanish history we give here in a separate section, not as designing to treat of it in that ample manner that it would deserve, were it detached from the body of this work, for that were a deviation from our original plan, and on the one hand draw us into superfluous repetitions, their conquest by the Carthaginians and Romans having been fully treated of in the history of those two nations; and, on the other, oblige us to anticipate those of the Gauls, Goths, Vandals, &c. who conquered, or settled in, any part of this country, and which will, therefore, more properly belong to their several histories in the subsequent chapters. Our motives, therefore, for separating this part from that which we gave in the last section, are, first, to distinguish the true from the fabulous, or the certain from the uncertain: of this latter kind, at least, we look upon to be all that has been said in the last section, though, for the reasons mentioned at the beginning of it, we are forced to insert it in such a work as this; and, secondly, because in the remaining part of this history, still to be spoken of, we shall proceed in a more succinct method, to avoid all such needless repetitions, or anticipations, and content ourselves with giving our readers a kind of chronological summary of those conquests, and refer our readers for those, which have already been spoken of in this work, to the volumes and pages, where they are to be seen at full length; and for the rest, to the remaining chapters of this and the following volume, where they will be more amply related.

THEIR conquests by the Carthaginians was, if we may believe Justin and Orosius, occasioned by the Tyrians. These having founded the city of Gades, and built a temple to Hercules, were so infested by the jealous Spaniards, that they were forced to send to Carthage for help; which being readily granted, Mejens was sent with a fleet to their assistance, who suppressed their enemies, and inlarged their territories, by the reduction of several considerable places along that coast [m]. The richness of the country soon invited them to pursue their

conqueſts, and the vaſt treaſures, both in gold and ſilver, with which that country then abounded, could not but be a ſtrong temptation to them [n], as they were engaged in ſuch a bloody and expenſive war with the Romans. This was accordingly performed with great ſucceſs, at firſt, by their great general Hamilcar Barcas, and afterwards by his ſons Aſdrubal and Hannibal, the latter of whom he took with him thither, when but nine years old, that he might inſpire him with greater hatred againſt the Romans, and with a more eager deſire to complete the reduction of this opulent country, to the ſubjection of Carthage. The ſucceſs which theſe generals met with, both againſt the Spaniards and againſt the Romans, whom they had courted to their aſſiſtance [o], has been ſo fully ſpoken of both in the Roman hiſtory [p], and in that of the Carthaginians [q], that we ſhall need only to refer our readers to thoſe places here cited in the margin. Aſdrubal likewiſe, another of their generals, who was left there to command during Hamilcar's return to Carthage, was no leſs ſucceſsful there, and obliged the Romans to come to a treaty with him, of which the reader will find an account in a former volume [r], and which he inviolately kept with them whilſt he lived; but his death, which happened ſoon after [s]; and his being ſucceeded by young Hannibal, put an end to it: and that enterpriſing hero, though then but twenty-ſix years of age, began the war afreſh, and laid ſiege to the famed city of Saguntum. We have given already a full account of that ſiege, and the ſad cataſtrophe of its brave inhabitants, and ſhall refer our readers to it [t]. But Hannibal having undertaken his fatal expedition into Italy [u], the Carthaginian affairs began to decline apace, and their forces to receive many conſecutive overthrows here, both by ſea and land [w], eſpecially under Aſdrubal the ſon of Giſco, who, being defeated by Scipio, was forced to retire to Gades [x]; where being again defeated at ſea, and, to complete his misfortunes, betrayed by Maſiniſſa, he was reduced to ſuch a deſperate ſtate, that, in revenge, he committed ſuch horrid cruelties, as rendered him and his nation odious to the Spaniards and Romans [y]. All this while the two Scipios not only gained ground againſt them by theſe frequnet defeats, but by ſome ſignal inſtances of their politeneſs rendered themſelves amiable to the Spaniards, as his enemies were become hateful to them [a]. At length two deciſive battles, which he won over them, were attended with the retaking of Saguntum, which had been rebuilt by Hannibal. Here he cauſed the Turdetani, who were found there, to be all ſold for ſlaves, for having joined Hannibal againſt that faithful city [a]. We ſhall not repeat here the circumſtances of the death of thoſe two generals; which was like to have quite altered the poſture of affairs, had not the brave Marcius recovered that great loſs by a bold and deſperate act, and with the few troops, which he could gather up, after the loſs of thoſe two battles, ſurpriſed and burnt the Carthaginian camp, which occaſioned, in the confuſion that then reigned, the deaths of thirty-ſeven thouſand of them, beſides near two thouſand more, who were taken priſoners by him [b]. He was ſucceeded by young Scipio, who, though at that time but twenty-four years of age, had been unanimouſly choſen proconſul of Spain, and came thither with a reinforcement of ten thouſand foot and a thouſand horſe. His wonderful ſucceſs there, the immenſe ſpoil he got at the taking of New-Carthage, his ſingular behaviour and continence towards a beautiful female captive, and his generous refuſal of the vaſt ranſom which her parents offered to him, gained him the affections of the Spaniards to ſuch a degree, that they looked upon him as a demigod, and began every-where to revolt from the Carthaginians [c]. Their generals made ſeveral vain efforts to ſtop the progreſs of this young hero, and were as often defeated by him [d]; as were alſo Mandonius and Indibilis, who had revolted from him [e]: at length, having thus far reduced the Carthaginians, he reſolved on a deſcent into Afric, to oblige them to abandon Spain. The ſucceſs of this expedition being foreign to this Spaniſh hiſtory, except that he actually forced the Carthaginians out of this country, and brought it under the Roman yoke, we ſhall refer our readers to thoſe places, where a full account is given of both [f].

to ſeize on all its valuable mines, eſpecially thoſe of ſilver and gold [g], and to ſtrip it of its immenſe wealth; and how conſiderable this was, may be gueſſed by the ſketch we ſhall give in the next note (A), of the prodigious quantities which their prætors,

[g] See 1 Maccab. viii. 3, & ſeq. LIV. OROS. &c.

(A) Thus we are told (1), that Scipio above-named, upon his return to Rome, carried with him fourteen thouſand three hundred and forty-two pounds of ſilver, beſides an immenſe quantity of coin, cloaths, corn, arms, and other valuable things. L. Lentulus is ſaid to have brought away a ſtill much larger treaſure, viz. forty four thouſand pounds of ſilver, and two thouſand five hundred and fifty of gold, beſides the money which he divided among his ſoldiery. L. Manlius brought with him twelve hundred pounds of ſilver, and about thirty of gold. Corn. Lentulus, after having governed the hither Spain two years, brought away one thouſand five hundred and fifteen pounds of gold; and of ſilver two thouſand, beſides thirty-four thouſand five hundred and fifty denarii in ready coin; whilſt his collegue brought from further Spain fifty thouſand pounds of ſilver.

What is ſtill more ſurpriſing, is, that theſe immenſe ſums, amounting in all to one hundred and eleven thouſand five hundred and forty-two pounds weight of ſilver, four thouſand and ninety-five of gold, beſides coin, and other things of value, were brought away within the ſhort ſpace of nine years; for juſt ſo much time elapſed between the firſt and the laſt of theſe Roman prætors (2); and juſt after they had been as ſeverely fleeced, in all likelihood, by their other friends the Carthaginians. Theſe few inſtances ſhall ſuffice to ſhew, how rich this country muſt then have been, and what an immenſe treaſure it yielded to their conquerors; for though theſe laſt never ſlacked their hands, but kept ſtill on bringing freſh ſupplies from thence, yet we do not find, that it was at all exhauſted. On the contrary, it was this prodigious richneſs of the country that invited the northern nations many centuries after to come and ſeize upon, and drive the Romans out of, it, as we ſhall ſee in ſome ſubſequent chapters.

We are, indeed, told by Strabo, that when the Carthaginians firſt came thither, they found ſilver in ſuch amazing plenty, that their utenſils, and even mangers, were made of it (3); inſomuch, that Poſidonius ſaid of this country, that Pluto, the god of riches, had his reſidence in the bowels of it (4). And Pliny mentions ſeveral rich mines of ſilver dug there by the Carthaginians, one of which, called Babel, from the finder of it, yielded Hannibal three hundred prætors, even by the confeſſion of their own authors, carried out of it, and brought into the public, as well as into their own treaſury: but as it would be impoſſible to enter into a detail of all thoſe tranſactions that happened during their Roman bondage, without repeating all that has been ſaid in their hiſtory, in the foregoing volumes, we muſt in this, as well as in the ſubſequent chapters, refer our readers to what has been already ſaid there; and only add here one or two remarkable events, which have not yet been taken notice of, or but lightly touched upon. One of them is the grand embaſſy which the Celtes and Spaniards ſent out of this country to Alexander the Great, to congratulate him upon his vaſt ſucceſſes, to beg his amity, and that he would ſend proper perſons to adjuſt ſome differences that were amongſt them, that is, in all likelihood, between ſome of their petty kings. This embaſſy, it ſeems, was highly pleaſing to that conqueror, who heard of thoſe nations for the firſt time, and, having granted their requeſt, ſent them very honourably home [h]. Oroſius tells us, that the head of this embaſſy was called Mauſinus [i].

Embaſſy to Alexander

THE next is that noble puſh which was made by the Celtiberians in Luſitania, to ſuppreſs the Roman tyranny, and, if poſſible, to drive them further, if not quite, out of Spain. What their ſucceſs might have been, had not their leader Viriatus whom Florus calls a ſhepherd, and Oroſius a banditto, been diſpatched by the treachery of Servilius Cæpio, who hired that general's guards to aſſaſſinate him, may be eaſily gueſſed by the diſpatch he had made in croſſing the Durius, Iberus, and Tagus, ſeizing on Galicia, and ſome other provinces, and putting all the Roman colonies to fire and ſword; but his untimely death put an end to all farther oppoſition, it being found then ſo dangerous to head an army againſt ſo powerful and treacherous a nation as the Romans ſhewed themſelves on this occaſion [k]. How thoſe two brave brothers, Mandonius and Indibilis, fared, for daring to oppoſe them ſome time after, need not be here repeated [l], any more than the dreadful cataſtrophe of Numantia [m], Saguntum [n], and ſome other cities and people, for daring to defend their country againſt them. By theſe cruel and treacherous means theſe Roman invaders ſo far ſuppreſſed that noble love of liberty, for which this nation was juſtly famed, that very few attempts were afterwards made for regaining it; and thoſe did prove ſo unſucceſsful, or, to ſpeak more properly, were ſo ſeverely puniſhed, that it quite deterred them from even betraying the leaſt hope or deſire after their antient freedom, till at length they were quite forced to ſubmit to all their laws, cuſtoms, and religion; and, in a word, to be wholly romanized after their own arbitrary will. However, it is plain, that further Spain was not quite ſubdued till the fourth conſulate of Marius, A. U. 652, nor the Celtiberians till five years after, two years after Dolabella had triumphed over the Luſitanians [o]. The reſt is ſaid to have been conquered by Auguſtus, as we have formerly hinted.

WE ſhall conclude this chapter with a liſt of the Spaniſh prætors, as far as Livy has gone with them, and afterwards of the emperors, under whoſe government Spain continued from Auguſtus to Honorius, in the beginning of whoſe reign the Romans were driven out of it by the northern nations, whoſe hiſtory will follow in due time; by which means the reader will eaſily come at the remainder of the Spaniſh bondage under both, without our being forced to repeat what has been already ſaid in the Roman hiſtory, or anticipating upon what more properly belongs to thoſe of the Goths, Vandals, &c. hereafter; but as we ſhall but barely mention thoſe Spaniſh prætors and emperors, without entering into any further particulars of their reigns, we ſhall give the liſt of them in the following note (B), and ſo paſs over to the Gauls. But, before we leave Spain, we beg leave to add, that though the Romans carried off ſuch immenſe quantities of gold and ſilver out of it, as was hinted in the laſt note, they ſtill left enough behind in it to maintain their numerous armies and colonies, and build great cities, caſtles, forts, and particularly ſchools and academies, for all kinds of learning and exerciſes; to which we may add many other ſtately edifices, which were there reared by their prætors, conſuls, and eſpecially by their emperors; all which ſerved either to allure the Spaniards to the Roman yoke, or to deter them from ſhaking it off.

CHAP. XI.

The antient ſtate of the Gauls, to their conqueſt by Julius Cæſar, and from thence to the irruptions of the Franks.

SECT. I.

Their origin, names, &c.

THE Gauls were certainly deſcended from the Celtes or Gomerians, as has been fully ſhewn in ſome former volumes [a], or, to ſpeak more properly, were the ſame people, under a different and more modern name, given them, in all probability, by ſome of their neighbours, whilſt they ſtill retained their primitive one of Gomerai, or deſcendants of Gomer, as thoſe ſtill do, who retain their antient language in its purity, eſpecially the northern Welſh. Other names they were known by, ſuch as they either ſeem to have aſſumed upon ſome particular occaſions, or ſuch as other nations thought fit to give them; of all which the reader may ſee a ſpecimen in the following note (A).

[a] See Vol. I. p. 368. V. p. 227, & ſeq.

(A) Of the firſt kind we may reaſonably reckon all thoſe, which are of Celtic extraction; ſuch as thoſe of Celtes and Gaul, which ſignify brave and warlike, Armoric, maritime, and the like. Even that

The

The name therefore of Gaul, Galli, and Gallia, is not only a foreign one, but of a recenter date, as are likewiſe thoſe other appellatives, by which Julius Cæſar [b], and other antient authors, diſtinguiſh one part of their country from another. Such are thoſe, for inſtance, of Ciſalpina or Citerior, Tranſalpina or Ulterior, and Subalpina, which was ſituate at the foot of the Alps [c]. The inhabitants however were formerly better known by the name of Celtes [d], and the country, in the whole, by that of Celto-Gallia [e], of which name we have given, in a former volume [f], the beſt etymon we could find. Cæſar afterwards diſtinguiſhed the whole country under the three following names, viz. Belgia, Aquitania, and Gallia Propria, or that which, according to him, was chiefly inhabited by the Celtes or Gauls (B). This laſt was further diſtinguiſhed that of Belga, which ſignifies fierce and quarrelſome, might have been given to that canton by their brethren and neighbours, on account of their retaining their original fierceneſs, from which the reſt had poliſhed themſelves by their commerce and intercourſe with other nations; thoſe of Cis, Trans, and Subalpine, from their ſituation on either ſide of the Alps; that of Celto-Scythians from their being neighbours to, and intermixed with, that nation; that of Celtiberians to thoſe that were ſeated on the other ſide the Pyrenees.

As they ſpread themſelves, by degrees, farther and wider from each other, and their original tongue ſplit itſelf into a great number of dialects, their appellatives became ſo numerous, and ſo vaſtly different from it, that it is with great difficulty they can be traced to their fountain-head. We ſhall therefore venture no farther, than upon ſuch ones as carry a kind of certainty of their extract, and refer ſuch of our readers, who are curious of ſuch etymons, to the authors quoted in the margin (1). He may likewiſe read that vaſt variety of names in Strabo, Ptolemy, Mela, Cæſar's commentaries, Diodorus Siculus, and other antient authors.

(B) His words are theſe (2): "The whole country of Gaul is "divided into three parts, the firſt of which is inhabited by the "Belgæ, the ſecond by the Aquitani, and the third by thoſe whom "we call Gauls, but in their own tongue, are called Celtes. All ed into Comata, whoſe inhabitants wore long hair; Bracha-ta, from their wearing breeches; and Togata, from the Roman toga being worn there. We ſhall endeavour to ſettle the limits of each of theſe in the following paragraph, and refer our readers for the other names by which it was occaſionally diſtinguiſhed, ſuch as that of Armorica, from its lying along the ſea-coaſts of Aquitania, from its abundance of water, Cis and Tranſpadana, and ſome others to the account given of them at the entrance of the Roman hiſtory above-quoted [g]. All that needs be added here is, that the words Celto and Gaul, ſignifying in the antient language, brave and warlike, that of Belga, fierce or quarrelſome, that of Armoric, maritime; theſe names were, in all probability, given them by other nations. As for thoſe of Cimmerians, Cimbrians, Cumbrians, and the like, they are plainly a corruption of their original one of Gomerians or Gomerai, as thoſe of Galatians and Celto-Galatians were of Celto-Gaul.

As for the Galatia, or Celto-Græcia of Aſia Minor; in which theſe European Gauls were ſettled by Nicomedes, who

"theſe have their language, manners, and cuſtoms different." The meaning of which words is generally taken to be, that he ſpeaks here of thoſe parts, which remained as yet unconquered by the Romans, and which retained ſtill their antient language and cuſtoms; whereas thoſe which were already ſubdued, had altered both by that time, to ſuch a degree, as to appear to him different from the reſt; ſuch was, for inſtance, that part, which was called Togata, from their having taken up the Roman dreſs, and, in all likelihood, ſeveral other of their cuſtoms, and by their intercourſe with them, might have very much altered their dialect from the reſt.

One thing is very remarkable, that Cæſar makes this province, which he likewiſe calls Ciſalpina, to begin at the foot of the Alps, and to have extended itſelf along the Po, as far as the Adriatic ſea, and the Rubicon (3); whereas Strabo, who quotes his commentaries (4), and Diodorus Siculus (5), plainly intimate, and the Gauls or Celtes inhabited all thoſe parts from the Alps to the Pyrenees, and we ſhall ſhew by and by, that they extended even beyond the latter, and poſſeſſed the greateſt part of Spain and Portugal.

However, the moſt that can be inferred from the paſſage quoted out of Cæſar, is, that he found Gaul ſo divided at his coming thither; and that by this time their language, manners, &c. were grown very different, though originally one and the ſame, as they were originally one and the ſame people.

had called them thither to his aſſiſtance, we ſhall, as much as we can, refer our readers to what has been ſaid of them in ſome preceding volumes [h], to avoid unneceſſary repetitions. All that need be added here is, that this province had Cappadocia on the eaſt; Bithynia on the weſt; Pamphylia on the ſouth; and the Euxine on the north. Here St. Paul founded a church, to which he directed that epiſtle, which is ſtill known by the name of the epiſtle to the Galatians, and was written to reduce them from thoſe Jewiſh obſervances, to which ſome falſe teachers of the circumciſion had debauched them, and to confirm them in the true Goſpel liberty, which had been preached to them. We know little elſe of theſe Galatians, beſides what has been ſaid in the two volumes laſt quoted, except that we read in the ſecond book of the Maccabees, of a ſignal overthrow, which the Jews gave them in the province of Babylon, where theſe, with a ſmall army of eight thouſand men, defeated and killed an hundred and twenty thouſand of the former. The text ſays nothing further concernig this ſignal victory, nor about the time in which it happened; ſo that we are left in the dark, whether it ſpeaks there of the Galatians ſettled in the province we are ſpeaking of, or, which is more probable, of the Gauls themſelves, who had by this time, if not long before, ſpread themſelves all over Aſia; for it muſt be obſerved here, that the name of Galatai was indifferently given, eſpecially by Greek authors, to the one and to the other. But to return to the antient Gauls:

The extent of Gaul.

We have already ſhewn in the hiſtory of the antient Celtes [i], that they were poſſeſſed of the greateſt part of Europe. There is ſcarce a province, or even a corner of it, in which they have not left ſome evident monument of themſelves, either in the names of cities and towns, cantons, and provinces, or of their rivers, lakes, mountains, promontories, or ſuch like. In every part of it, where either the Phœnicians, Carthaginians, or Romans, ſent their invading bands, there they are affirmed by antient writers to have found the Celtes or Gauls already ſettled [k]: not that they do expreſly mention them by theſe two names, for we have juſt obſerved on what account they had ſeveral other appellations given them, but yet ſuch as plainly appear, from the conformity of their language, religion, cuſtoms, &c. to have meant one and the ſame nation. However, we will not venture to

ſay, that they were all of the ſame Celtic extract that inhabited thoſe parts of Europe, either towards the ſea-ſide, ſuch as Spain, Portugal, and the French coaſts, along the Mediterranean, or towards the north-eaſt, where they ſeem to have been ſo blended with the Scythians and Sarmatians, that it is next to impoſſible to aſſert their boundaries on that ſide. All that we pretend to conclude from thoſe antient writers, who have written moſt clearly and knowingly on this head, is, that the Celtes or Gauls plainly appear to have been the firſt, that peopled and poſſeſſed themſelves of, or claimed a dominion over them. After the general diſperſion that followed the flood, other nations might probably come afterwards, ſome by ſea, others by land, and have been permitted to ſettle amongſt them, there being more want of inhabitants than of room in thoſe early days, and in regions ſo remote from the place of their firſt migrations, as we have formerly hinted at the beginning of this Univerſal Hiſtory, and elſewhere [l].

Gauls in Spain and Portugal.

THE greateſt difficulty, as we hinted in the laſt chapter, is to prove the Gauls, or Celtes rather, to have been ſettled in Spain and Portugal, before any other nation; firſt, becauſe they were here called by the name of Iberians, or, at moſt, Celtiberians, from which ſome are apt to conclude the former to have been the name of the firſt inhabitants of that part, and the latter to have been given to the Celtes, who came over the Pyrenees, and ſettled amongſt them. And ſecondly, becauſe Varro [m] mentions no leſs than five different nations that were found there, when the Romans firſt invaded that country. Theſe were, according to him, the Iberians, Perſians (C), Phœnicians, Celtes, and Carthaginians (D).

As

(C) As it doth not appear from any antient author, that the Perſians ſent other colonies into this country, it is ſomewhat difficult to gueſs, who theſe were, whom our author mentions with the other four. If we may be permitted to offer our conjecture, the name being of Celtic extract, and ſignifying ſevered or divided, it is not unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that it was given to ſome tribe or canton of this nation, on account of their rupture or difference from the reſt, either in their cuſtoms, laws, and ſuch-like, or for retaining their old ones, whilſt theſe had altered theirs, in complaiſance to the other nations they were intermixed with.

(D) We are not without ſome collateral proofs of this. The Phœnicians, as diſtinct from the Carthaginians, were the antient

As to the first, we have formerly shewn, that the word Iberian signified, in the antient Celtic, any people, country, or place, that was situate over, or on the other side of a sea, river, ridge of mountains, and the like [n]; so that these might be naturally called Iberians, on account of their situation over the Pyrenees, by those that lived on this side; and the Celtiberians, to distinguish them from those nations they were blended and intermixed with there. As to what is objected out of Varro, we have had occasion to hint, in the history of antient Spain, that neither the Tyrian, or Phœnician colonies, nor those of the Carthaginians, came thither till a long time after the Celtes or Gauls had been settled there, and peopled a great part of that country. All this seems self-evident, first from the consentient testimony of antient authors, the greatest part of whom expressly affirm it [o], and make those inhabitants to be of the same extract with those that filled the hither parts of Europe, to all whom they give the same common name of Celtes, and Gauls, and sometimes the more antient ones of Cimmerians and Cimbrians [p]. And secondly, from those traces and monuments they here left in almost every canton and province of that country: such as the names of seas, rivers, mountains, cities, and the like, all which are manifestly of Celtic extract.

In Italy. Italy cannot be supposed to have been long unpossessed by them, if they were not the first peoplers of it, concerning which we shall refer our readers to what has been said on that head in some former volumes [q]. It was indeed too fair a spot not to invite such a warlike and populous nation thither, had it been ever so well peopled beforehand; but, we think, we have made it at least very probable, that they came thither sooner than any other; for if the Humbri or Umbri

Tyrians (6); and these are known to have sent a colony, and to have built a famous temple to Hercules, in the isle of Gades, and to have founded several considerable cities in Spain (7). And as to the Carthaginians, who were nearest neighbours to it, we have seen likewise, in a former volume, how early they invaded and settled in it (8).

really were, as they are affirmed by many authors to have been [r], the aborigines, or antienteſt people of Italy, and they were deſcended from the Celtes (E), as their name, and other concurring circumſtances, ſeem plainly to intimate [s], then it will ſcarcely be doubted, that they muſt have entered, and peopled that country very early, when we recollect what dreadful devaſtations the Hetrurians made among them, and how many hundreds of their towns and cities they deſtroyed in that invaſion, which they made upon them, and for the further particulars of which, we refer our readers to a former volume [t]. We ſhall ſhortly come to ſpeak of the Germans, and other northern nations, as well as of the iſles of Great Britain, Ireland, Iceland, and others leſs conſiderable, all which do plainly appear to have been firſt diſcovered and peopled by the Gauls or Celtes: As for the Germans, they were ſo like the Celtes in their language, religion, and cuſtoms, except, as Strabo obſerves [u], their retaining ſome of their original fierceneſs, which was doubtleſs owing to their vicinity, and intermixture with the Scythians and Sarmatians, that they ſeem to have been one and the ſame nation; and this our author thinks to be the occaſion of their being called Germans (F). We ſhall find a much properer etymon for

(E) Pliny derives their name from the Greek ὀμβρος, which ſignifies a ſhower, becauſe they had been diſlodged from their country by a flood, occaſioned by violent ſhowers (9). But this etymon is far-fetched and forced, unleſs we will admit, that it carried the memory of their eſcaping the univerſal deluge with it; in which caſe it muſt be ſuppoſed, that they came early into thoſe parts, and ſet up ſome monuments of their deliverance there. But as to the name of Umbrians or Humbrians, it ſeems rather a ſoftening of the original one of Gomerians or Cymbrians.

(F) The word Germanus was that by which the Romans diſtinguiſhed brothers by the ſame father and mother, from thoſe which were only by the one or the other, whom they termed uterini or conſanguinei; and though the etymon itſelf be certainly falſe with reſpect to the Germans, yet it ſhews the great affinity which that author obſerved between them and the Gauls.

that name in the ſequel. What made us mention it here, was a proof, that Germany was part of the Celtic or Gauliſh territories, at leaſt as far as the Rhine [w], if not as far as the Danube [x], though, as we have already obſerved, all that inhabited the countries between thoſe two great rivers, were very much intermixed with the Scythians, Sarmatians, and other northern (G) nations. All that needs be added here is, that the Helvetii, Rhætii, Norici, and Pannonians, of whom we have given an account in a former volume [y], are ſometimes called Celtes, and ſometimes Gauls, indifferently; and that their troops were ſtill diſtinguiſhed by the name of Celtic and Gauliſh legions in Aurelian's time [z], as were alſo thoſe that lived along the foot of, or upon, the Alps themſelves.

Upon the whole then it appears evidently, that the antient Gauls or Celtes were poſſeſſed of the far greateſt part of Europe; that the Mediterranean on the ſouth, the Atlantic ocean on the weſt, the Britiſh and northern on the north-weſt, were the boundaries of their country; and that they extended towards the north as far as Scandinavia, Polonia, and Muſcovy; though theſe three nations, as well as thoſe that lived between the Rhine and Danube, were intermixed with a multitude of other people, of the greateſt part of whom we know but little, except their names. And thus much may ſuffice for the extent and limits of antient Gaul. How they came afterwards to be reduced within that narrow compaſs, in which we find them, when the Romans firſt invaded them, may be eaſily gathered from what has been already ſaid in the Roman hiſtory, and will further appear in the ſequel of this.

How they came firſt into Europe.

In the mean time it will not be improper, before we come to fix them according to that epocha, to inquire how this antient nation came at firſt to ſpread itſelf, as we have ſhewn they did, all over Europe, that is, whether they advanced by gradual ſteps from the place of their firſt diſperſion, which we formerly fixed in Phrygia [a], or whether they came thither by ſea, and, landing, at firſt, on ſome of the Italic or Mediterranean ſhores, dilated themſelves from thence as far and wide as we find they did. Either hypotheſis has its difficulties. If that of Beroſus and his followers could be credited, that Gomer's ſons ſettled themſelves in ſeveral parts of Spain and Italy, ſo early as an hundred and forty-two years after the flood, the gradual migrations will hardly be thought quick enough to have extended themſelves to ſuch vaſt tracts of ground in ſo ſhort a time; and it will be more natural to ſuppoſe, that they ſailed thither from Leſſer Aſia. But then it will be equally difficult to imagine, how they could, in the ſhort ſpace of an hundred and forty-two years, become ſuch expert mariners, as this ſuppoſes them to have been; and if we allow them a longer ſpace for making themſelves ſo far maſters of navigation, they may be as reaſonably thought to have expanded themſelves thus far by ſuch gradual migrations, as either want of room, curioſity, or deſire of change, may be ſuppoſed to have led them to. That they began by times to navigate, or to coaſt at leaſt, not only the Mediterranean, Atlantic, and other ſeas, but even on the main ocean, we ſhall preſently have occaſion to ſhew, when we come to ſpeak of their arts, commerce, &c. But it is ſcarcely to be believed, all things conſidered, that their rude ſkill in this art could bring them thither, ſo ſoon as the others could get thither by land. However, ſince ſome ancient authors have affirmed, that the firſt inhabitants of Spain came thither by ſea, ſome ſay from Aſia, and others from Afric, the moſt reaſonable opinion ſeems to be that, which allows theſe to have indeed come thither from thoſe parts, and to have ſettled in thoſe countries, though not till ſome conſiderable time after they had been diſcovered and peopled by thoſe, who came thither by land, and by gradual migrations. And this will further account, both for that great variety of names, dialects, and cuſtoms, which ſuch an intermixture muſt, of neceſſity, be ſuppoſed to produce, and for the loſs of that whole country in proceſs of time, when the Gauls were partly driven out of it, and the reſt ſubdued by their conquerors, as we have ſeen in the laſt chapter.

THE ſame fate having attended them, not only in Italy, but likewiſe on this ſide of the Alps, where the provinces of Noricum, Helvetia, Rhætia, and that whole tract, which lies between thoſe mountains and the lake of Geneva, were taken from them, as we have ſeen in the Roman Hiſtory [b], the whole Gauliſh extent came then to reach no farther than from that lake to the Pyrenees, having ſtill the Mediterranean on the ſouth, the Rhine on the north, and the Britiſh channel on the weſt; for, by this time, the Britiſh and other iſlands were detached from the inlands, and lived under princes of their own, though, in matters of religion, they ſtill kept a kind of conformity with, if not rather a kind of juriſdiction over, them, as we ſhall ſee under the next article. This was the ſtate of Gaul, and theſe its limits, when Julius Cæſar firſt came into it, as we have ſeen in a former volume, where we likewiſe took notice of ſeveral other changes, which were made in their boundaries, and new diviſions of their provinces and diſtricts by the conquering Romans, particularly by Auguſtus, and to which we beg leave to refer our readers, to avoid repetitions and prolixity [c].

For the ſame reaſon we think it ſuperfluous to ſay any thing here of its natural or artificial rarities, or to ſpend any longer time in deſcribing a country ſo near, and ſo well known to, us. We have deſcribed its ancient ſtate in a former volume [d], and there given an account of its moſt conſiderable rivers, lakes, mountains, &c. We have there likewiſe taken notice of the fertility of the country, and how early it had begun to be cultivated and improved, even as far back as the times of Mercury, who is affirmed by a learned modern, and not without ſome ſubſtantial proofs, to have reigned in Gaul, when it was in its full extent, and, by his wholſome laws and indefatigable pains to promote its trade and commerce into foreign countries, to have raiſed the Gauliſh nation to a ſurpriſing height of power and glory [e]. This reign hath indeed been very much ſuſpected by ſome other authors, who have written ſince [f], as fabulous and imaginary; but we do not think it as yet confuted by any thing that has been offered either againſt it, or in favour of the Cteſian hiſtory, which, we hope, we have, notwithſtanding all its many and learned advocates, ſufficiently confuted in our Aſſyrian hiſtory [g]. But, waving that intricate and controverted point, it is generally allowed, that this country was in as flouriſhing a condition, when the Romans firſt invaded it, as any in Europe, and their lands, commerce, arts, &c. cultivated and improved by its induſtrious inhabitants, in a manner altogether anſwerable to its excellent ſituation and climate (H) as we ſhall have further occaſion to ſhew in the ſequel.

HOWEVER, it muſt be obſerved here, that theſe improvements were of much later date than their firſt ſettlements; and that, if we except Spain, Italy, and the ſouthern parts of France, the reſt of their territories were too cold and diſcouraging to a nation that chiefly delighted in war, hunting, and ſuch-like exerciſes, and at a time when agriculture was,

(H) The ancient Celtes indeed, and thoſe Gauls, who were intermixed with the Scythians, did ſtill obſerve their old cuſtom of living in tents and waggons, or at moſt in huts built juſt to laſt them one year, after which they removed into freſh quarters; and as they lived chiefly on the fruits of the earth, and the milk of their cattle, they either wholly neglected agriculture, and all property in lands, or, at moſt, built themſelves a little houſe or cottage big enough for their family, in the midſt of as much ground, as they thought fit to cultivate for that year. The Germans and Suevi are obſerved by Julius Ceſar to have followed the ſame cuſtom in his days; who adds, that it was one of the chief taſks of their yearly magiſtrates to aſſign them ſuch lands, according to the exigence of their families; and as ſoon as the year was over, they removed into ſome other country (10).

Hence came the name and uſe of cantons: every tribe had a canton aſſigned to it, which was governed by its own magiſtrates, who were choſen from among them. This cuſtom, being derived from the ancient Celtes, had, it plainly appears, ſpread itſelf all over Europe and beyond (11). The Romans call'ed thoſe cantons pagi, which took up more or leſs ground, according to the largeneſs of the tribe; and, as ſoon as it was parcelled out among their families, each of them built a cot in the centre of his own ground; ſo that there were not any two to be ſeen contiguous to one another (12).

Even when they came to live in cities, as the Gauls did as ſoon any others in Europe, if we except perhaps Italy and Spain, they neither walled nor fortified them, alledging, that ſuch ſtrong places ſerved only to abate of the courage and fierceneſs of its inhabitants, and often proved the occaſion of their being brought into ſlavery (13). Whenever therefore they found themſelves invaded, they all marched out under their leaders, and engaged the enemy in open field, or, if they found themſelves unequal to the fight, they retired into either woods, marſhes, or other places of difficult acceſs, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel.

as it were, in its infancy; and it is moſt probable, that the fruitfulneſs of the warmer climates firſt put the northern inhabitants upon endeavouring to ſupply by art the defects of their ſoil and climate; for even in the times of the Roman emperors, we do not find, that they had either vines, olives, or any other fruit or grain, except corn [h]; and moſt authors, who have written on this ſubject, ſeem to attribute it wholly to the extreme cold to which they were expoſed. It is indeed very likely, that thoſe authors, being uſed to warmer climates, have ſomewhat exaggerated the coldneſs of theſe, which experience ſhews are nothing ſo ſevere as they have repreſented them [i]; but it is, at the ſame time, far from improbable, that they are become much warmer than they were in thoſe ancient times, partly by deſtroying a vaſt number of foreſts, which ſtagnated the air, and intercepted the warmth of the ſun; by draining many ſtanding waters and marſhy grounds; by cheriſhing it with warm manure, and other ſuch improvements, which are obvious to every naturaliſt. The Romans themſelves ſeem to have been ſenſible of this change, though they attributed it to ſome favourable alteration in the poſition of the earth, pretended to have been even foretold by that famous Greek aſtronomer Hipparchus [k]. But, however that be, it is plain, that theſe countries are ſo far from being ſo conſtantly covered with ice and ſnow, and their great rivers from being always ſo hard frozen, as to ſerve them inſtead of bridges, for croſſing whole armies over them in their winter excurſions, that we look upon it now as a kind of wonder, when-ever any of them chance to be frozen at any ſuch rate.

Climate grown warmer.

CHAP. XI.

SECT. II.

The religion of the Gauls.

Their religion derived from the antient Celtes.

WE have already given an account of the religion of the antient Celtes in a former volume [a]; and as the Gauls were deſcended from them, as we have ſhewn under the laſt article, it is not to be doubted but it was continued and propagated amongſt them, in the ſame manner and form as they received it from them, till their intercourſe with other nations, or perhaps rather their ſubjection to them, gave birth to thoſe changes and intermixtures, which it afterwards underwent. To come therefore at a tolerable notion of true Gauliſh religion, we ſhould ſeek it amongſt thoſe Gauls, who were leaſt converſant with other people, and had leaſt occaſion or neceſſity of receiving or adopting any thing from them; inſtead of having recourſe to that of the Greeks and Romans, from whom whatever they might, in proceſs of time, borrow, that might cauſe a kind of reſemblance between them, yet originally they differed as much, not only in this, but in almoſt all other reſpects, as black from white. Much worſe have they ſucceeded in this point, who have transformed the Gauliſh deities into Greek and Roman ones, and ſpent a deal of time and pains to no purpoſe, to prove them to have been ſuch [b]; whereas we hope, in the ſequel, to give our readers indubitable arguments of their being of Celtic extraction. For the ſame reaſon we muſt be very wary, how we depend too much on thoſe few antient authors, whether Greeks

or Romans, who have occasionally spoken of them (A). These few scraps, they have left us of Gaulish religion, sufficiently shew, that they knew little of it; and that, even in those points in which they do not clash against one another (B), they have betrayed such a fondness and partiality for their own, as if they had looked upon it as the mother, and the other as the offspring of it. Upon which account Josephus makes no scruple to affirm [c], that all that the best of these had written of the Gauls, was without any foundation, and owing to an itch of saying such things of them, as no man had ever said before, or indeed could say. And, in fact, it could hardly be otherwise, con-

(A) The most considerable of these are, Julius Cæsar, Diodorus Siculus, Pomponius Mela, Strabo and Pliny, and they have written of it in such a loose, and yet concise, manner, that all their fragments put together would hardly amount to three or four pages; and, if these pages were to be reduced to their just value, would lose one half of their bulk (1); whether it be, that these authors have but just copied one another, or only designed to say the same things.

(B) According to those quoted in the last note, both the religion and customs of the Gauls are drawn in such colours, as would incline one to suspect them of innate partiality, or rather hatred, to that brave nation. Diodorus, among the rest, makes no scruple to tell us, that their ferocity was in nothing more remarkable than in their religious rites, in which, says he (2), nothing could be more impious, than the victims which they offered, nor more inhuman, than the manner in which they offered them. And, if we may believe Procopius (3), it seems as if this barbarous custom had been still in vogue some centuries after their embracing christianity.

A modern writer, however, has been at the pains to quote other authorities, to disculpate them from a great deal of this pretended inhumanity (4), and to prove, that they were famed for their virtue and morality. It is well, if both sides have not exaggerated in their turns. But, at the worst, the Gauls do not appear to have much outdone those other nations, who cry out so bitterly against them, in these execrable customs of offering human victims to their gods, of murdering some captives in their auguries, and such-like. On the contrary, we have shewed in some former parts of this work (5), that not only the antient Egyptians, Canaanites, &c. but even the Romans, Carthaginians, and others, made a common practice of them; and thus far their religions bore a resemblance, which soever of them were the inventors of these bloody ceremonies, concerning which we have nothing to add to what we have said in the volumes above quoted.

fidering that the Gauls made it a conſtant rule never to commit any thing to writing, according to a ſettled maxim amongſt them, that it was more glorious to perform noble deeds, than to ſpeak and write well [d]. Beſides, had they laid more open to their neighbours than they really did (C), yet could theſe have received no great intelligence concerning their religion, ſince their druids or bards made it a main part of their policy to conceal it, at leaſt the moſt conſiderable points of it, even from their own laity, as we ſhall ſhew in the ſequel.

IT will appear ſtill more unreaſonable to ſuppoſe, that the Gauls received any part of their religion from either the Greeks or Romans, if we conſider, beſides what has been hinted at the end of the laſt note, that their gods and goddeſſes, and their very names, plainly appear to be of Celtic extract, and exactly anſwering ſome eminent part of their character (D), not as gods and goddeſſes, but as heroes and heroines, famed for ſome peculiar excellency, and as ſuch deified, if we may be allowed the expreſſion, by the courteſy of their deſcendants; whereas the Greeks and Romans did not adopt, much leſs challenge them

(C) Joſephus (6) tells us accordingly, that their country was, in ſome meaſure, inacceſſible, becauſe nature had fortified them on all ſides with a kind of impenetrable ramparts, ſuch as were the Alps the Pyrenees, the ocean, and Mediterranean, the Rhine, &c. and with ſtrength and courage to defend their frontiers.

It is no leſs improbable, that their religion was brought in amongſt them, either over any of theſe then inacceſſible mountains, ſeas, or rivers; becauſe, on the one hand, the nations that antiently inhabited over the Pyrenees, Alps, and on the other ſide of the Rhine, Danube, &c. were, as we have ſhewn, of the ſame Celtic extract with the Gauls, and had received the ſame religion, laws, and cuſtoms, with them from their anceſtors, ſo that we muſt, of courſe, ſuppoſe, that it was ſettled and practiſed amongſt them ſome ages before they either thought of making excurſions out of their own territories, or others, among whom they had, by their conqueſts, colonies, and warlike exploits, injected an univerſal dread, took into their heads to invade them. On the contrary, it appears from ſome authors, that even the Romans did not make any attempt on them till about four hundred years after they were known to be ſufficiently fixed in their religion, government, and diſcipline (7).

(D) This our reader will be beſt able to judge of, by turning to the fourth ſection, under the note (L), to which we refer, to avoid needleſs repetitions.

for their own, till many ages after, that is, as a learned author ſeems rightly to ſuppoſe [e], not till the former had been ordered by the oracle of Dodona to adopt the deities of the barbarians [f]; and the latter made it a ſtanding law not to invade any nations, till they had previouſly implored the favour of their gods, and promiſed to build them temples, and eſtabliſh their worſhip amongſt them.

Whether the Gauls, or antient Celtes rather, were the firſt introducers of theſe hypotheſes, or whether they adopted them in imitation of other antient nations, is a knot too hard for us to untie. However, it is plain they antiently adored a ſupreme Being under the name of Eſus, which ſeems only a corruption of the old Celtic word Dhew, from which the Greeks probably borrowed their Θεὸς and Ζεὺς, and the Romans their Deus. This notion was religiouſly preſerved by their druids; and if they, for wordly ends, or perhaps to pleaſe the people, whoſe impetuous deſire after this novelty they could not reſiſt, ſuffered the worſhip and images of theſe gods to be introduced amongſt them, yet they never looked upon them as any other than inferior deities, whatever the laity might be indulged to do in proceſs of time; but the worſhip of the true God was ſtill carefully kept up, and the oak eſteemed the ſymbol of the deity, as fire was among the Perſees, of whom we have given an account in a former volume [g]. To frame therefore a right notion of the religion of this, or any other, nation, we muſt not judge of it by the corruptions introduced into it by a mad populace, and winked at by the prieſts and philoſophers, but as it was believed and profeſſed by thoſe, who had the care of it. And in this caſe we ſhall perhaps find the moſt material difference between that of the Gauls and that of the Greeks and Romans, even in thoſe points in which they ſeem moſt to agree, we mean, the worſhip of the ſame gods, with reſpect to the different characters which they gave, and ideas they entertained of, them, the latter ſeeming calculated to ſooth the moſt inordinate paſſions, and authoriſe the worſt of crimes, and the former rather quite oppoſite to it; and this is what the modern author laſt quoted has taken no ſmall pains to ſhew in two main inſtances, viz. from the contrary notions which theſe entertained of their gods, and from the moral doctrines of their druids. It is indeed no hard matter to imagine, how the religion and precepts of Noah (and theſe were free enough from all idolatry, and the ſuperſtitious traſh, which crept in afterwards among his deſcendants) ſhould be preſerved for a conſiderable

time in the family of Japheth, upon which that patriarch had pronounced and intailed a peculiar bleſſing [h]; but we cannot be ſo ſanguine in favour of thoſe druids, as to believe with that author, that they preſerved them ſo pure among themſelves, during ſuch a ſeries of ages, as he ſeems to ſuppoſe. If they did, they were guilty of a very ſhameful remiſſneſs, and condeſcenſion to the laity, in ſuffering them to run themſelves into ſuch vile idolatries, horrid ſuperſtition, deteſtable rites, and corruption of principles and morals, as they muſt be owned to have done, in ſpite of all falſe gloſſes that have been uſed to palliate their degeneracy, or the ſuppoſition of their having been too much miſrepreſented by Greek and Latin authors. We have, on the contrary, ſhewn in a former volume [i], that the antient Celtes, even in the times of their primitive ſimplicity of life, and when they were as yet moſt free from luxury and other corruptions, had yet adopted many inhuman ceremonies into their worſhip, auguries, &c. Even the Scythians, a younger branch of Japheth's family, who lived ſtill in a much greater ſimplicity, and were more unmixed, and had leſs intercourſe, with other nations, did yet even exceed the Celtes in the barbarity of their religion and cuſtoms [k]; and it will evidently appear from what follows, that the Gauls, Germans, and other northern people, did not only copy after, but even outdo them in it; ſo that tho' they muſt be allowed, for reaſons hinted more than once, to have been little known to, and, in great meaſure, deſignedly miſrepreſented by, thoſe authors who have written of them, yet they cannot, without manifeſt partiality, be diſculpated from the charge of having had many bloody and inhuman rites, many abſurd and unſocial principles, as well as corruption of morals, in common with other nations, tho' not in the ſame degree with them. Let therefore the private doctrines of their druids have been what they would, and they be ſuppoſed ever ſo averſe and oppoſite to the general practice of the people, nothing can be ſaid for their countenancing, if not encouraging, thoſe abominable ceremonies, ſuch as their offering up of human victims to their gods by way of expiation, their auguries from the reeking blood and entrails of their captives, and others of the ſame nature, of which we ſhall ſpeak in due time.

WE think ourſelves obliged to be the more particular in our inquiry into the religion of the Gauls, as it is the ſource and foundation, not only of that of the antient Germans and other more northern nations, but likewiſe of that of the antient Britons, who, as we ſhall ſee in a ſubſequent chapter, were deſcended from, and had received their religion, laws, cuſtoms, &c. originally from, them; ſo that what is ſaid on that ſubject in this chapter, will ſerve as a clue to that of thoſe other nations we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of in the following ones; by which means we ſhall avoid many needleſs repetitions, and be able to confine our account of them chiefly to thoſe points, in which they either differed from this their common mother, or, in ſuch caſes, where there appears a neceſſity to ſhew the affinity they bear to each other. As for thoſe of the antient inhabitants of Italy, Spain, &c. who became intermingled with the Gauls, the reader will find the former already done in a former volume [1], and the reſt will come in their turn in ſome of the ſubſequent chapters. And here we ſhall, for order-ſake, begin with an account of the different deities worſhipped by the antient Gauls, and the particular ceremonies and ſacrifices uſed to each of them, not as they were tranſmitted to them from their Celtic anceſtors, concerning which we refer our readers to what has been ſaid in their hiſtory, but as they were found in the times of the Romans invading of, and becoming firſt acquainted with, them.

Eſus the ſupreme Deity.

We have already hinted, that they antiently worſhipped the ſupreme Deity, under the names of Eſus or Heſus (E), and the

[1] Vol. xi. p. 131, & ſeq. 138, & ſeq.

(E) There have been various conjectures concerning the etymon of this word, beſides that which we offered a little higher, and which to us ſeems the moſt natural, becauſe the Celtic Dh being pronounced with a kind of preceding aſpiration, and not unlike our ſofter th in ſuch pronouns as thee, thou, &c. foreigners who are unuſed to it, could not well expreſs the ſound of the word Dhew, but by the letters Eſu. As for the final s, it might be ſuperadded by the Greeks and Romans, according to their way of terminating the maſculine gender in us and os, as they did likewiſe in the plural Eſi, Αἰσοι, as they may be ſeen in Heſychius.

The antient Etruſcans, according to Suetonius (8), called the Deity Æſar; for he obſerves there, that among the other prodigies which preceded Auguſtus's death, a flaſh of lightning having eraſed the C from the word Cæſar, as it ſtood engraved on a pedeſtal that ſupported his ſtatue, the diviners told him, that the C being a numerical letter, ſignifying an hundred, the omen portended, that he had but ſo many days to live, after which he would be deified, becauſe Æſar, or the remainder of the word Cæſar,

the ſymbol of the oak; and it will not be thought ſtrange, that this notion of a ſupreme Being ſhould have been preſerved

ſignified God in the Etruſcan language. If we might therefore be allowed a far-off conjecture concerning theſe two names, Eſus among the Gauls, and Æſar among the Etruſcans, it would be, that they might be both of Hebrew extract; and we have elſewhere ſhewn, that the old Celtic, with which the Etruſcan has a vaſt affinity, appears viſibly to have been a dialect of the Hebrew (9). The word עזוז bezus ſignifies ſtrong and mighty, and is given to God in many places, particularly by the Pſalmiſt (10); and עזר ezer ſignifies help or helper (11), and is likewiſe given to Him, as he is emphatically ſo, when all other helps fail. The patriarch Abraham, and his deſcendants, knew him by the name of אל שדי el-ſadai, the mighty, or ſelf-ſufficient God, till he made his peculiar name Jehovah known unto them (12); and it is remarkable, that the Thracians, a branch of the Celtes, did, according to Macrobius, call the god, to whom they had erected a temple on mount Zilmiſſus, Sabazius, which is a plain corruption of the Hebrew word Tzabaoth, eſpecially conſidering, that, in their religious rites to Bacchus, they were wont to cry out, Evohe Sabbai, which is the Elohe, or, if you pleaſe, the Jehovah, Tzabaoth of the Hebrews, as God is emphatically called by the pſalmiſt in the pſalm above-quoted, and ſignifies Lord of hoſts, a title that well ſuited the martial Thracians. As theſe therefore were rather attributes, than the names, of the Godhead, each nation may be ſuppoſed to have choſen that which ſuited their genius beſt; and the Gauls that of Heſus, as ſuiting moſt with their warlike ſpirit.

That not only the names of the Deity, but this way of worſhiping Him under oaks, and in oaky groves, was common to all the deſcendants of Noah, we have undoubted proof out of the old teſtament, as we ſhall preſently ſhew; and we only mention it here to confute the notion of thoſe, who ſuppoſe the Eſus of the Gauls to have been the god Mars; for neither he, nor any other inferior deities, were worſhipped under theſe oaks, or with the ſame rites with Eſus; and therefore Pliny, in his deſcription of the ceremony which they uſed in gathering the miſſeto of thoſe ſacred oaks, has theſe words, which plainly ſhew, that theſe trees were dedicated to the Deity itſelf: "The druids, ſays he, (13) believe, that the miſſeto "is a ſign, that God hath choſen that tree to himſelf;" and a little lower, after having particularly deſcribed their manner of gathering it, he adds, "That they offered up victims and prayers to "God, that he would bleſs and proſper his own gift to them that "receive it." It is plain from it, that he neither ſpeaks here of Mars, Jupiter, or any other of their gods, but of the Deity itſelf.

among the deſcendants of Japheth, when we find ſuch lively traces of it even among the idolatrous Syrians, Midianites, and even the Canaanites, as in the family of Laban [m], of Jethro [n], and of the two Abimelechs, kings of Gerar in the times of Abraham and Iſaac [o], and ſome others we could name, particularly the Gibeonites in Joſhua's time [p], Adonibezek in the time of the judges [q], and Hiram king of Tyre, in the reigns of David and Solomon [r]; who all not only retained the notion of the deity, notwithſtanding their idolatry, but had likewiſe a peculiar name for it, diſtinct from thoſe of their other gods. To this let us add, with reſpect to the Gauls we are now ſpeaking of, that the natural fondneſs, which they had for the religion and cuſtoms of their foreſathers, the contempt they entertained of other nations, the recluſe and ſolitary life of their druids, who were the keepers and teachers of their theology, and their ſtrict and conſtant practice, founded upon it, of ſacrificing, and performing their other religious rites, under the oak only, as conſecrated to that ſupreme Being, were moſt effectual means to preſerve that fundamental notion ſtill uppermoſt amongſt them, whatever other ſuperſtitions might be, in proceſs of time, introduced amongſt them; for we muſt here obſerve, that they kept conſtant to this cuſtom, or rather, as ſeems, law, of performing their religious worſhip under that tree, or, more properly, in groves of it, even after they had adopted that long regiment of deities, of which we are about to give an account. To this we muſt add, that, in the midſt of thoſe heatheniſh ſuperſtitions, which crept by degrees into their religion, they never erected any either temples or idols unto this Eſus or ſupreme Deity; ſo that he ſeems to have been acknowledged by them much in the ſame manner, that the Athenians did the unknown God mentioned by St. Paul [s]; which notion was far enough from being peculiar to them: others had their unknown God as well as they, and owned themſelves his offspring, though their notion and worſhip of him were very imperfect, and, in many caſes, too unworthy of him, as even the Gauls did, when they came to intermingle the Roman theology with their own. However, antiently they ſeem to have entertained ſome ſublime notions of him, to confirm which we need but add what Tacitus ſays of the Senones, who were a branch of the Celtes, and had the ſame religion; they, ſays that author [t], have no other temples but a wood or grove, where they perform all their religious rites. None is admitted to enter it, unleſs he carries a chain, in token of his dependence on, and owning the ſupreme dominion which God has over him; and, if he chance to fall down, none muſt dare to help him up; but he muſt either roll himſelf, or crawl upon his belly, out of the place. He adds, that their whole religion conſiſts in an acknowledgment, that the deity, which makes its abode there, governs all things; that all things depend on him, and ought to obey him. Strabo ſays much the ſame of the Celtiberians, another branch of the Celtes; and adds, that they worſhipped the God without name, and danced every full moon, before their houſes, all the night, in honour of him [u]. And might it not be upon this account, as an ingenious author obſerves [w], that Lucan rallies the Maſſilian druids, when he tells them [x], that they were the only ones of all men, to whom it was given to know, or not to know, the gods they adored? And then, ſpeaking of their groves, ſays, that their ignorance of the deities they worſhipped under them, was the cauſe of that veneration they paid to thoſe ſturdy and ſhapeleſs trees. He ſpeaks there indeed of deities in the plural, Roman and poet like; but that he did not intend thereby, that any more than one was worſhipped in thoſe groves, is plain from what he ſays at the end of his deſcription of the Maſſilian grove (F); viz. that the prieſt or druid, who officiated there, was afraid of meeting dominum luci, by which he could mean nothing elſe but the deity worſhipped there, a notion probably common to them and the Jews, as we have ſhewn in the laſt note.

[u] Geogr. l. iii. [w] Relig. des Gaul. l. ii. c. 2. [x] Luc. Pharſal. l. iii.

(F) This deſcription, though diſfigured with ſatire and ridicule, being curious and pertinent to our preſent ſubject, we ſhall give the ſubſtance of it to our Engliſh readers. It is as follows: There is without the walls of Marſeilles a ſacred grove or wood, which had never been touched by ax from the creation. The trees of it grew ſo thick and interwoven, that they ſuffered not the rays of the ſun to come through their branches, but a perfect damp and darkneſs reigned through the place. Neither nymphs nor ſylvan gods could make their abode in it, it being deſtined for the moſt inhuman myſteries. There was nothing to be ſeen there but a multitude of altars, upon which they ſacrificed human victims, whoſe blood turned the very trees of a horrid crimſon colour. If antient tradition may be credited, no bird ever perched upon their branches, no beaſt ever walked under them, no wind ever blew through them, nor thunder-bolt did ever touch them. Theſe ſtately oaks, as well as the black water that winds about through the place in different chanels, fill one with horror and dread. The figures of the god of

Their veneration for the oak.

Another remarkable thing in their religion was their great veneration for the oak. This seems likewise to have been common to them and the old patriarchs and Jews, among whom that tree was in high esteem, though not in the same superstitious degree. Abraham is recorded to have pitched his tents under some famous oaks, such as those of Mamre, of Moreh[y]; which, though our version, and some others, have transformed into plants, yet, in the original, do plainly signify an oak, or oaky grove, as we have observed in a former volume[z]. He is said moreover to have planted groves of them; and where-ever he pitched his tent, he is recorded to have built an altar unto the Lord, and to have given some significant name to the place, such as that of Beersheba, Bethel, and the like[a] (G). The Gauls

the grove are a kind of standing, rude, and shapeless, trunks, covered over with a dismal yellow moss. It is the genius of the Gauls (continues he) to feel no veneration for the gods, unless they be thus represented, in a manner quite opposite to the taste of other nations; for which reason their fear and regard for them increases, in proportion to their ignorance of those gods which they worship. There is a report, that this grove is often shaken, and strangely moved, and that dreadful sounds are heard from its caverns; that the yews, if thrown or cut down, grow up again of themselves; that the grove is sometimes in a blaze, without being consumed; and that the oaks are twined about with monstrous dragons. The Gauls dare not live in it, out of respect to the deity that inhabits it, and to which they intirely abandon it. Only at noon and midnight a priest goes trembling into it, to celebrate its dreadful mysteries; and is in continual fear, lest the deity, to which it is consecrated, should appear unto him. Thus far our poet.

We have already observed, that though he expresses himself in the plural in speaking of the Gaulish gods, rather as a poet and a Roman, yet his last words plainly shew, that he intended to speak of one deity here. All that we would further observe of the priest's dread of seeing that deity, seems plainly a relic of that notion, which even the patriarchs and antient Jews had, that no man could see God and live (14). As for the dreadful description of the grove, and its horrid apparatus, if it is not, in a great measure, the fiction of the poet, to ridicule the Gaulish worship, might it not be that of the druids themselves, to prevent their laity, as well as strangers, from entering, and prying too curiously into it?

(G) It must be observed, that the original word alon signifies both an oak, and a grove or thicket of oaks. These were, at first,

Gauls in particular ſeem to have improved upon this patriarchal cuſtom, the origin of which ſeems rather owing to what we hinted in the laſt note, than to any ſanctity, or extraordinary virtue, which either Abraham, or any of his anceſtors or ſucceſſors, could imagine to be in thoſe trees; whereas, among both Celtes and Gauls, the oak was looked upon and reverenced as an emblem, or as the peculiar reſidence, of the Deity. The fruit of it, eſpecially the miſſoldine, was thought to have a kind of divine virtue, was uſed as a kind of panacea for man and beaſt, and applied to both, as well inwardly as outwardly, in wounds, contuſions, and cuticular ailments, as well as for inward diſeaſes, or even barrenneſs and abortion in men, women, and cattle (H). The leaves, or ſome ſmall boughs choſen in thoſe hot countries for the ſake of coolneſs and ſhade; and where the plains were well watered, and fit for paſture, but wanted ſuch woods or groves, they planted them, as Abraham is recorded to have done at Beerſheba. Theſe, in time, came to be in great eſteem by his deſcendants, not only on account of their extreme uſefulneſs and long duration, but out of regard to thoſe patriarchs, who had dwelt and ſacrificed under them. Jacob, we read, buried his beloved Rachael's nurſe under an oak, which he called The oak of mourning. He buried all the idolatrous traſh, which he found in his houſhold, under another (15). This laſt became famous among the Shechemites (16), probably becauſe Joſhua reared a ſtone or pillar under it, in memory of the covenant which he renewed juſt before his death between God and the Iſraelites (17).

This regard, by degrees, dwindled into downright ſuperſtition, not only among the Jews, but even among chriſtians, Mahammedans, and other nations. As to the former, they became infamous for their ſacrificing and burning incenſe in their high places and groves, and at length, as they are juſtly upbraided by the prophets, under every oak and green tree (18), notwithſtanding God's prohibitions, and ſevere threatnings. As for the latter, we have ſhewn in a former volume, in ſpeaking of the oaks under which Abraham dwelt, that they were ſtill ſhewn in Conſtantine's time, and reſorted to with great devotion by chriſtians, Turks, and even heathens (19).

(H) Pliny, who has given us this account more accurately than any other author, tells us (20), that they called the miſſeto, as well as the particular day or feſtival on which they gathered it, by a name which ſignified cures all. We ſhall quote the whole paſſage, as it is both ſuccinct and curious:

boughs of it, were worn by the druids and laity in all their religious ceremonies, which were constantly performed, as we hinted above, under those trees, or in oaky groves. These, if we may guess from the few fragments we have left of them in history, and from some carneads or heaps of stones still standing in some of our isles, especially that of Anglesey [b], and which may be supposed to have been cinctures or fences round the grove, to prevent their entrance between the trees, except where it was left open to the comers, and, not unlikely, guarded by some inferior druids, to stop all strangers from intruding into their mysteries: we say, if we may guess at them by those few antient helps, these groves were of different forms, some quite circular, some oblong, and more or less capacious, according to the number of votaries, or the largeness of the district or canton, to which they belonged. The area, which was in the centre of the grove, was open at the top, and encompaſſed with ſeveral rows of theſe oaks, ſet very thick and cloſe. Within the large circle were ſeveral ſmaller ones, ſurrounded, as is ſuppoſed, with large ſtones, which ſerved for the ſacrifices, and other moſt ſolemn parts of their worſhip. In the centre, or near it, of theſe ſmall circles, were placed ſolid ſtones of a large ſize and convenient height, on which the victims were killed, diſſected, and offered up. Each of theſe being, as we imagine, a kind of altar, was ſurrounded with another row of ſtones, the uſe of which cannot be eaſily gueſſed at, unleſs it was to keep the people at a due diſtance from the prieſts that officiated. Some of theſe interior circles are likewiſe thought to have ſerved, one or more for their courts of judicature, another for their grand council or aſſembly, or for ſuch other purpoſes as can only be gueſſed at [c]; though we very much doubt, conſidering the vaſt reverence that was paid to thoſe groves, as they were conſecrated to religious rites, whether their druids would ſuffer any ſecular matters to be tranſacted in them. We are rather inclined to think, that theſe cinctures might all ſerve for the ſame religious ends, one for human victims, another for thoſe of beaſts, a third for auguries and ſuch-like; not but they may be reaſonably enough ſuppoſed to have had other groves, deſigned for ſuch ſecular purpoſes, as we juſt now mentioned; and theſe might probably enough be of oaks, as the others were, that the ſacredneſs of thoſe trees might ſtrike theſe courts and councils with due awe, and prevent ſuch quarrels and indecencies as might otherwiſe happen. And this conjecture (and the contrary one is no more than gueſs-work) ſeems more agreeable to what we have lately quoted of their worſhip out of Tacitus, Pliny, and Lucan.

How the Eſus, or ſupreme deity of the Gauls, came afterwards to be transformed into, or give place to, Jupiter, which, if we may believe Lactantius, did not happen till about the fourth century at ſooneſt, we ſhall endeavour to account in the ſequel. But, by what we have ſaid of him and his worſhip, and of the oaks and groves conſecrated to him, &c. the reader cannot but have obſerved a great deal of conformity between the Gauliſh and the patriarchal and Jewiſh religion, though, if this had been all, we ſhould hardly have inſerted this remark; neither could Celſus have had ſo much reaſon to oppoſe the antiquity and wiſdom of the druidiſh religion, and its conformity to that of the antient Jews, againſt the novelty of the goſpel [d]. We ſhall therefore beg leave, in ſpeaking of the other branches of the Gaulish religion and ceremonies, to observe to him the same conformity running through very many other particulars, as they have been collected in one view by a very diligent author often quoted under this head[e]; and from which we may be able to satisfy ourselves, that they could never be owing to mere chance, but that both plainly appear to have flowed from the same source.

Affinity between the Celtic religion and that of the patriarchs and Jews.

1. The Gauls had a sovereign pontiff or head of the druidish order, to whom both these and the whole nation paid the highest regard. The same we find among the Jews, to say nothing of Melchisedech, to whom Abraham paid tythes of the spoil he had lately gained. 2. The druids, under this their head, had such an uncontroulable power and sway, that whoever refused to submit to their decisions, not only in religious, but civil, matters (even to the putting an immediate stop to an engagement, when both armies were ready for the onset, if the druids did not like the prognostics), was interdicted from assisting at their solemnities, which was looked upon by the Gauls as the most grievous punishment[f]. The Jewish high-priest, at the head of the sanhedrin, was looked upon as the dernier appeal in all causes; and excommunication, the greatest punishment among the Jews, was to be the lot of those, who refused to abide by their decision[g]. 3. The druids were obliged to assemble themselves in the territories of Chartrain once a year. The Jews had their three grand festivals, on which their males were obliged to repair to Jerusalem. 4. The druids wore white garments. The same did the Jewish priests. 5. The druids lived in woods and groves. The same did generally the patriarchs, the sons of the prophets, and the Essenians, a kind of monks among the Jews. The Gauls had their female druids, prophetesses, and aruspices. The Jews had Miriam Aaron's sister, Deborah, Huldah, and other prophetesses, to say nothing of other women, who kept familiar spirits. Some of those females were in high repute among the Gauls, and bore a great sway in the government. And Deborah was a famed judge in Israel. 6. The Gauls vowed to Mars some parts of the spoil they took in war, and it was death for any one to infringe upon it. The same was among the Israelites with respect to those cities and kingdoms, which were subject to anathema, as in the case of Jericho. The rest they divided among themselves, according to certain laws and customs settled amongst them. Moses, Joshua, and David, made also laws on the same head, what portion should be offered to God, what

given to the prieſts, and how the reſt ſhould be divided between the combatants and thoſe who guarded the camp and baggage. 7. The Gauls worſhipped a brazen bull. And the Iſraelites golden calves. 8. In public calamities they offered a human victim, on whom they threw all the curſes that threatened them. The Jews did the ſame by their ſcape-goat [h]. 9. The Gauls had power of life and death over their ſervants. The ſame had the patriarchs and Jews, and the former even over their families, as one may conclude from the inſtance of Judah and his daughter-in-law Tamar [i]. They began their days from the evening, as the patriarchs and Jews, and, like them, diſtinguiſhed the year only into three ſeaſons, viz. ſpring, ſummer or harveſt, and winter. The autumn was ſo unknown to both, that they had no name for it. The ſame is affirmed likewiſe of the Egyptians by Diodorus Siculus. 10. They gave ſignificant names to their children, to places, &c. as theſe did. 11. The Gauls believed the immortality of the ſoul; ſo that no people under heaven could ſhew a greater contempt of death. The patriarchs and Jews, if we except the upſtart ſect of the Sadducees, were famed for looking on this life only as a mere paſſage into a better. 12. When their life or liberty was in danger, they endeavoured to redeem it by one or more of their own ſervants [k]. We have an inſtance of this in Jephthah, one of the Iſraelitiſh judges, and his raſh vow [l], though it was more common among the Phœnicians, and other antient nations. 13. The Jews had the waters of jealouſy to aſſure them of the fidelity or infidelity of their wives. The Gauls had ſome kinds of ordeals or trials to the ſame ſenſe; and Julian the emperor tells us, that the waters of the Rhine had ſome ſecret virtue to puniſh thoſe wives, who had gone aſtray (I).

(I) This is not a proper place to ſpeak of thoſe ordeals and other trials, as paſſed, in all probability, from Gaul into Great Britain, and which might, in all likelihood, have their riſe from the Jewiſh waters of jealouſy. But that, which the apoſtate Julian mentions concerning the Rhine, can ſcarcely be owing to any thing elſe.

He tells us (21), that, when a Gaul ſuſpected his wife of infidelity, he obliged her to throw, with her own hands, the children that were born of her body into that rapid river. If they ſunk, the woman was deemed guilty, and put to death. If they ſwam, and moved towards the place where ſhe ſtood trembling at a convenient diſtance, and ready to receive them, ſhe was cleared, and reſtored to her huſband's favour.

The

The druids made it a conſtant maxim not to commit any thing of their laws, philoſophy, or hiſtory, to writing, but to couch them in ſet poems and canticles, to be learned by heart, and ſung at proper places and ſeaſons. Theſe ſongs were, it ſeems, ſo multiplied in Cæſar's time, that it took up ſome druids (for they were all obliged to it) near twenty years in learning them [m]. We do not find but that this was the antient cuſtom of the patriarchs and other nations in Canaan before Moſes, who quotes ſome of thoſe canticles, and compoſed ſome of them himſelf, as did other prophets after him, in memory of ſome ſignal victories, deliverances, and the like. Some Gauliſh nations carried their gods along with them to the war, as did the Iſraelites their ark, and their apoſtates the tabernacles of Moloch, Chium, and Remphan. The Gauls did perſonify and deify their rivers, lakes, woods, &c. and might not this be a corruption of that laudable elegance of the ſacred poets, who call upon thoſe and all other creatures to praiſe God? as, in all probability, their offering human victims, common likewiſe to other nations, and even to the apoſtate Iſraelites, in imitation of them, ſeem to have had its riſe from the example of Abraham's readineſs to ſacrifice his ſon Iſaac, concerning which we ſhall refer our readers to what we have ſaid in a former volume [n]. We ſhall now give our readers a ſhort account of this inhuman rite, as it was practiſed among the Gauls, and leave our readers the pleaſure of diſcovering, in the ſequel of this hiſtory, many more inſtances of that conformity we have been ſpeaking of, which we are forced to omit, to avoid being tedious.

Human victims how offered.

As to this bloody cuſtom of ſacrificing human victims, which began ſo early with the Gauls, and which, if we may believe Procopius [o], did not end till ſome centuries after their embracing chriſtianity, we can only ſpeak of it as it was tranſacted out of their groves or places of worſhip; for, as to what was done within them, no ſtranger being made acquainted with, much leſs admitted to ſee, it, we muſt be wholly in the dark about it, as their druids committed nothing of it to writing. Concerning thoſe unhappy ones, that were offered abroad, Cæſar and Plutarch give us the following account [p]: When a man's life is in danger, either through ſickneſs or other accident, they immediately ſacrifice, or at leaſt make a vow ſo to do, ſome human victims; for, beſides that they think them the moſt perfect and pleaſing to the gods, they believe, that one man's life cannot be redeemed but by that of another, without which no ſatisfaction could be made to them for their goodneſs to men. And theſe are the ceremonies eſtabliſhed amongſt them upon all ſuch occaſions: They erect a huge, hollow pile of oſier, which they fill with theſe unhappy wretches, who are quickly ſuffocated by the ſmoak, and reduced to aſhes ſoon after. They imagine, however, that criminals of any kind are much more acceptable victims; but, where they are not to be had, the innocent muſt go in their ſtead. In their funerals, which are very magnificent, they throw into the burning pile every thing that the deceaſed delighted in, even to living creatures; and it is not long ſince they threw likewiſe into it all his favourite ſervants and ſlaves. Some of his near relations, continues Cæſar, did likewiſe fling themſelves into the flames, in hopes of living happy with him in the next world. This cuſtom was exactly like that of burying the Jewiſh kings, except the burning of living and human creatures, as the reader may ſee in a former volume, where we have given an account of that ceremony [q]. At funerals.

We lately hinted at their imitating, in ſome meaſure, the Jewiſh ſcape-goat, by devoting ſome vicarious victims to death, and praying, that all the curſes due to them might fall upon it. The Maſſilians, among the reſt, are reported to have, in times of peſtilence, made choice of ſome indigent perſon, that offered himſelf voluntarily, whom they took care to fatten with the daintieſt fare during a whole year; after which they dreſſed him with garlands and other rich ornaments, and led him thro' the ſtreets, loaded with the bittereſt imprecations, to his death [r]. We have formerly had occaſion to account for this cuſtom, which was likewiſe common to other nations, as well as the Gauls, and had its riſe from the ſame ſource [s]. However, if the Gauls, in ſuch calamitous times, could procure any of the handſomer and nobler ſort to offer themſelves to ſuch a voluntary death, they not only preferred them, but encouraged them by large rewards and encomiums. Theſe were led, like the poorer ſort, out of the city, and ſtoned, and the former thrown down from ſome high precipice. The common notion among them was, that ſuch a ſpontaneous death for the good of the commonwealth intitled them to a rank among the gods. In other caſes they either tied or nailed them to ſome tree or poſt, and ſhot them to death with arrows. Others they burnt, with a number of beaſts, on a pile of hay [t]. It was alſo cuſtomary among them to reſerve their criminals to the fifth year, and to burn them in In their auguries and other ſuperſtitions.

sacrifice with the first-fruits of their ground [u]. The same author adds, that they threw into the fire an incredible quantity of gold and other rich things, which it was death for any one to meddle with afterwards [w]. As for their brute victims, they were left, in some measure, to the choice of the offerer, or perhaps rather of the druids, who were the butchers of them, and always officiated in white garments (K), both in this and all other parts of their worship. Only the horses which they took in battle, or at least part of them, they burnt with the bodies of the slain [x]. All these sacrifices were occasional and unlimited, except those which Lucan calls national, and which were constantly performed at noon and at midnight, as we have hinted above. As the Gauls were addicted to all kind of superstition (L), they used to be exceeding

(K) Some add that they were striped with purple, which dwindled, either at one or both ends, into a point like a spindle, to distinguish them from the laity. But there seems to be no need of supposing such a distinction, seeing the white robe was peculiar to the druids, and no one dared to wear it but they and the druidesses, of whom we shall speak in due time (22).

(L) According to the Greek and Roman writers, the Gauls exceeded all other nations in cruelty and superstition; and yet, if we compare them together, even according to their own writings, we shall scarce perceive any difference between them, but what is on the opposite side. It must be owned, however, that some of the Gallic nations were very famed for their superstition, since Alexander Severus is upbraided with having even outdone some of them, viz. the Vascones or Gascons, in it (23).

Our design is not to extenuate those inhuman and abominable practices of the Gauls, but to observe how little reason other authors, especially the Romans, had to blacken them above all other nations, when they themselves outdid almost all that ever went before or since. We have given a sufficient number of instances of it in their history under several of their emperors, especially Severus above-mentioned, Nero, and Julian; and we shall close this note with another, which happened just upon the breaking out of the war between the Gauls under Viridomarus and them, when, as Plutarch tells us (24), they found themselves obliged to obey certain oracles, which they found in the Sibylline books, and to bury alive in the beef-market two Gauls, and two Greeks, a man and a woman of each nation, to whom, says he, they still offer some private sa-ing watchful of the singing and flight of birds, and other such kind of ominous trash. They never undertook any thing of consequence, without the advice of their aruspices, who were, for that reason, in high request among them. These carefully examined the entrails, blood, &c. of their victims; and when they offered any human one, as they did constantly before they held a council, whether of the nation or district, they stabbed him behind with a cutlass, a little above the diaphragma, watched the manner of his falling, whether on his right or left side, or on his face, how the blood flowed at the wound, and from thence gave their judgment, which was exactly followed, let the case be what it would, or the appearances be ever so much against it: insomuch, that they have come to the head of an army, and stopped the fight, which was just going to begin, their kings and generals not daring to contravene them upon any account [y].

Their altars.

WE have already hinted, that their religious groves had some large stones, which were supposed to be the altars on which they offered up their victims. Some of them are still extant in several parts of France, Germany, England, Wales, Ireland, and the isle of Anglesey, and are of such a monstrous size, that the bringing and rearing of them was thought, by the superstitious inhabitants, to have been the work of those demons, that were supposed to attend on that kind of worship, especially considering that, as it is pretended, there were no quarries of such stones within any reasonable distance from the place where these altars stood. Of these one, that is to be seen in the confines of Alsace, measures about thirty-six foot in circumference, twelve foot and an half in breadth, and four foot and a quarter in thickness. It is reared on a parcel of other stones about three foot and an half from the ground [z]. Some of these altar-stones were round, others oval, some square, others oblong, and some triangular. Some appear to have been adorned with a kind of ornament either of bas-relief or inscriptions, others to have been quite plain; but whether originally so, or by time and weather, is not certain. Others there were, which had a kind of hollow crifices in the month of November, which the people are not allowed to be present at; which very sacrifices, we are told by two of their own authors (25), were since repeated at the same place on several occasions, especially at the first opening of the Punic war, which immediately succeeded that of the Gauls above mentioned.

or baſon on the ſurface, ſuppoſed to have been deſigned to receive the blood or entrails of the victims [a]. One of theſe is recorded to have had a hollow kind of naſty paſſage under it, through which they made thoſe ſtrangers, whom they deſigned for ſacrifice, to paſs, pelting them all the way with filth and dung; from which that paſſage is, it ſeems, called to this day cunnus dæmonis, duvels-ſkut, or devil's hole [b]. The antiquaries of each nation have been very curious and diligent in their accounts of theſe altars, and other piles of huge ſtones, which are to be met with in almoſt every kingdom and province of Europe, together with ſuch other monuments as deſcribe thoſe ſacrifices that were offered upon them, and the apparatus and inſtruments that were uſed in them; but they generally deal ſo much in conjectures, and agree ſo little with each other, that it is no wonder that kind of learning has been ſo diſreliſhed by the far greater part of the learned; ſo that it would be loſt time for us to enter farther on this ſubject, and all that we think worth adding to it is, that the Gauls are affirmed by the generality of authors to have conſtantly aſſiſted at theſe ſacrifices armed cap-à-pé, and to have carried ſome ſmall thing belonging to the victim away with them in their mouths or hands [c], after it had been offered up or had been led to the altar.

They had no temples till long after Cæſar.

Temples, we have already hinted, they had not before the coming in of the Romans, nor, in all likelihood, for a long time after Cæſar's conqueſt of them. An author, who lived long after him, tells us expreſly, that they had not any other ſtatue of Jupiter but a tall oak [d], which could hardly be ſuppoſed to be growing in a temple, any more than thoſe coloſſian piles of hay and other combuſtibles, in which, we are told by other authors [e], they uſed to burn their numerous human victims, can be imagined to have been reared in any ſuch cloſe places, much leſs ſtill the trees on which they faſtened thoſe whom they pierced with arrows. Their groves, ſuch as we have deſcribed them, were much fitter for thoſe ceremonies; and this appears to have been one main difference between the Gauls and the Greeks and Romans [f]. When Mars came to be adopted among their inferior deities, they only worſhipped him under the figure of a naked ſword, that was repoſited upon an altar in one of thoſe groves; but as they had then a cuſtom to vow to him what ſpoil they took from their enemies, Cæſar tells us they generally depoſited them in any place where they chanced to be. There they ſacrificed all the cattle they found, and laid up the reſt of the plunder in vaſt heaps in the open country, which were nevertheleſs held ſo ſacred by the people, that none dared to touch any part of it, though there were amongſt them great quantities of gold and ſilver and other rich ſtuff; for he tells us, that thoſe conſecrated heaps were to be found in moſt cities in Gaul [g]. This ſeems likewiſe another material point, in which they differed from other nations, who choſe to ſhut up thoſe treaſures in their temples, as in places of greateſt ſafety; whereas the Gauls left them expoſed under the canopy of heaven, and in the open fields, or, at moſt, in ſome lakes and groves, which were on that very account eſteemed ſacred (M). The Germans

(M) It muſt be owned, however, that ſome of theſe authors give to theſe places the name of temples or oratories, and Cæſar is affirmed to have rifled them to ſupport his army (25); but then they ſpoke like Greeks and Romans, among whom it was cuſtomary to record ſuch ſacred treaſures in their moſt famous temples, and even to call ſuch conſecrated places by the names of ἱερὸν and templum. Thus Tacitus, though he affirms, that the Germans had no temples, tells us, that their goddeſs Hertza uſed ſometimes to come out of her grove or Caſtum nemus, to air herſelf, and, when ſhe was weary of rambling, was carried back, and placed in her own temple, which, the ſame author tells afterwards, was no more than a lake within the wood where that goddeſs reſided (26).

The ſame may be ſaid of that famed one of Thouloufe, upon whoſe account the aurum Tholoſanum became famous, even to a proverb, or account of the vaſt quantity that was repoſited in it. This place Strabo, ſpeaking of it, calls a temple: There was, ſays he, a very famous temple at Thouloufe, the veneration and credit of which made it grow immenſely rich, becauſe none dared to touch any part of what was conſecrated in it (27); and yet the ſame author, when he accounts for the vaſt quantities of gold that were found there, from ſome rich mines which he ſuppoſes to have been in the neighbourhood, and which, joined to the plain frugal way in which the inhabitants lived, made it increaſe upon them to ſuch a ſtupendous height, adds, that they had other treaſures in many ſuch-like places, which, ſays he, were depoſited and conſecrated, in whole ingots, in lakes, as in ſo many ſacred aſyla. So that this Thouloufan temple, and thoſe other lakes he ſpeaks of, where in all probability the ſame thing, or meant, at moſt, but ſome more ſacred and private part of the lake, to which he gives the name of temple, only on account of the deity to whom that metal was conſecrated.

What

Germans appear to have been ſtill more averſe to the introduction of temples amongſt them, as we learn from Tacitus and other authors, and ſhall ſee in the next chapter; and even the Britons, who certainly muſt have had them, if any other Gauls had, becauſe they were the ſtandard of the Gauliſh religion, from whom all the others received it; for we are told [h], that theſe uſed to croſs over in great numbers into Britain, or, as ſome think, into the iſle of Angleſey [i], and to ſpend there ſome years in the ſtudy of their religion and myſteries, as it was indeed the ſeat and nurſery of it, and the reſidence of the grand druid, or chief pontiff, and conſequently of all the learned doctors of the Gauliſh religion; and yet, when Tacitus ſpeaks of the deſcent of the Romans into this iſland [k], he tells us, that their firſt care was to deſtroy thoſe groves and woods, which the druids had polluted with the blood of ſo many human victims; and would they not, upon the ſame account, have done ſo by their temples, if any ſuch had been in this country? And ſince all the other Gauls appear to have regulated their whole religion, and its rites, from theſe, it cannot be ſuppoſed, that they could, at leaſt in Tacitus's time, have had any temples any-where elſe, whatever they did afterwards more by force than out of choice, as we ſhall ſee by-and-by. Some ſtatues they might have, and in all probability had, before Cæſar's time; but it would be difficult to prove, that they bore any reſemblance with thoſe of the Greeks and Romans, either as to their figure or deſign, or that they were ſet up by the prieſts, and not rather by the people, who are often hurried away by imitation, though contrary to the conſent of their guides, who appear to have been moſt

What confirms it ſtill more is, that Strabo, ſpeaking of the ſacrilege committed by Cepio (28), mentions only the lake out of which this famous Thouloufan gold was taken; and Juſtin, ſpeaking of the Tectoſagi, whom he ſuppoſes to have brought it from the temple of Delphos, ſays, that, being returned to Thouloufe, and afflicted with a grievous plague, they were ordered by their augurs to fling their ill-gotten pelf into that lake (29). We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more particularly of this Thouloufan treaſure, and its being expoſed to ſale, in the ſequel; and we only mention it here to ſhew upon what account Strabo called it a temple, though it was more than a ſacred lake, with a σηκὸς or niche, with ſome emblem of a deity in the richeſt, and, conſequently, moſt ſacred part of it.

ſtrict obſervers of the old patriarchal way of worſhipping the Deity; for as, on the one hand, they ſeem to have kept all along ſome kind of tradition from their progenitor, who was but a third in deſcent from Noah, not to ſay any thing of thoſe before the flood, of which they could not ſo ſoon loſe all memory, and whoſe cuſtom it was to worſhip God without temples or images; ſo, on the other, their great veneration and tenaciouſneſs for their antient rites and cuſtoms, joined to the contempt they had for thoſe of other nations, muſt have proved an effectual and long-winded preſervative againſt their introducing them. At leaſt it is very probable, that theſe ſtatues or images we are ſpeaking of, if there were really any ſuch among them, might be no other than monuments of ſome eminent perſons and tranſactions, ſuch as that which Laban and Jacob reared in memory of their mutual reconciliation, or that which the latter ſet up in the place where he buried his favourite Rachel[1]; or perhaps to point out thoſe ſacred treaſures, which were conſecrated in the manner and places already mentioned, and to deter people from profaning or ſeizing upon them; all which might be eaſily miſtaken for ſtatues and idols, by thoſe Greek and Roman authors, who beheld or heard of them.

BEFORE we diſmiſs this point, it will not be thought unſeaſonable to make ſome further inquiry into thoſe vaſt piles of ſtones which remain to this day both in England and in other parts of Europe; concerning which ſo many different conjectures have been offered by learned antiquaries and others, whilſt ſome have maintained them to have been erected by the Romans, others by the antient Gauls and Britons; one ſort taking them for monuments erected in memory of ſome famous battle or victory, others for burying-places, and a third ſort, though with leſs reaſon, as we think, for temples or places of worſhip. We ſhall, however, willingly ſave ourſelves the trouble of entering into a detail of them, conſidering how difficult it is to deſcribe ſuch kind of antiques, ſo as to give our readers any tolerable idea of them, without having conſtant recourſe to ſome iconography of them, which are not in many caſes eaſy to be had, and in moſt not without greater expence than they would perhaps think they deſerve. But ſince that famous one of Stonehenge, which has been ſeen by all the curious, and of which we have ſo many deſcriptions in many of our Engliſh authors, may be juſtly affirmed to exceed all the reſt, as well in the largeneſs of the ſtones as the perfection of its figure, we ſhall, notwithſtanding it's more properly belonging to a ſubſequent chapter, venture to ſpeak of it here, and give the beſt

light we can concerning that truly curious piece of antiquity; eſpecially as we propoſed, at the beginning of this chapter, to treat of every thing that related to the Gauls, and thoſe other nations that are deſcended from them, in ſo full a manner, as might ſave us the trouble of needleſs repetitions in thoſe that follow. But what more effectually calls upon us to treat of it here is, that a reverend and learned author lately, in that curious and elaborate account he has given of that ſtately edifice [m], hath endeavoured to prove it an antient druidiſh temple, which, if it had been ſuch, would overthrow all that we have hitherto ſaid, on the teſtimony of ſo many antient authors as we have produced, in favour of the oppoſite opinion. Had that learned author contented himſelf with calling it a druidiſh edifice of any kind but that of a temple, we ſhould have readily agreed to it; becauſe we think he has given us full proofs of its being not only much antienter than the Romans, and, conſequently, much more ſo than the Saxons, but has further demonſtrated, as far as the ſubject is capable of demonſtration, that it could never be a fabric of the former; ſo that upon the whole it muſt be owned to have been a Britiſh or druidiſh work: and thus far we readily agree with him, though we ſhall take the liberty, as we think we ought, to differ from him in his origin of the druids, as well as in this of their having erected temples in imitation of the patriarchs, who are no-where recorded to have reared any thing but bare altars of unhewn ſtones, or, at moſt, ſome groves over them, rather for ſhade and coolneſs, than out of any ſuperſtitious regard for either the oaks, or any other trees. And as our author offers nothing but far-off conjectures on a ſubject of ſuch remote and dark antiquity, there ſeems to be one inſuperable obſtacle againſt his hypotheſis of their coming from Phœnice; namely, that if theſe druids had [n] been of ſo different a nation from the Celtes the anceſtors of the Gauls, let them have come into Britain when they would, either before or after the Celtes, it is not to be ſuppoſed, that theſe, much leſs all their Gauliſh deſcendants, who were ſo ſuperſtitiouſly tenacious of their antient rites, laws, and cuſtoms, could have ever paid ſuch a blind and univerſal ſubjection to them, not only in religious, but in all civil and military, concerns, as we have ſeen from the univerſal conſent of Greek and Roman authors they actually did; and if thoſe druids had had ſuch ſublime notions of the Deity, and been ſuch ſtrict followers of the patriarchal religion and rites, it is ſcarcely to be imagined they could have fallen into ſuch horrid exceſſes, ſuper-

ſtitions, and cruelties, as we have ſhewn they did, even from the earlieſt times.

WE come now to ſpeak of this famous fabric of Stonehenge, and to give our readers ſuch an account of it, as may afford them an idea of the excellent taſte of thoſe druids, who were the projectors and conductors of it; and may ſerve to ſhew the nature and deſign of all other works of this kind, that are extant in any parts of Europe (N), where they bore any ſway; and herein we ſhall make no difficulty to follow our learned author's deſcription of it in every caſe but that we have excepted above, it being, in all other reſpects, the moſt exact and accurate we have; though we ſhall refer thoſe, who deſire a fuller account of it, to his late elaborate deſcription here referred to.

THE name of Stonehenge being of Saxon extract, and ſignifying barely a heap of hanging or gallows ſtones, is ſo contemptible a one for ſo noble a work, that it plainly ſhews it to have been reared long before their coming into England. Had they been the builders of it, or capable of judging of the magnificence of that work, or had there, in their time, remained any traces of its builders, and their deſign in it, they would doubtleſs have called it by a much more honourable name. The antient Britons, in the time of the Romans invading them, ſpeak of it only by long and immemorial tradition, and as of a work far above

And not built by either Saxons or Danes.

(N) Though there are many of theſe to be found in Germany, France, Spain, Brabant, Holland, &c. yet they are no-where ſo frequent as in theſe Britiſh iſles, even, as our author obſerves, from the very Land's-end in Cornwall to the utmoſt promontory in Scotland, where the Roman power never reached. They are to be ſeen in all the iſlands between Scotland and Ireland, in the Iſle of Man, in all the Orkneys, and numerous in Ireland; and all pretty near after the ſame deſign, being generally arches of rude ſtones of different diameters, upon elevated ground, open heaths and downs, and chiefly made of ſtones taken from the ſurface of the earth, tho' ſome of them appear to be of different forms, and ſo decayed and diſfigured by time, that it is hardly poſſible to gueſs at their original uſe or intention, but from ſome analogy which they ſeem to bear with thoſe that are more perfect, as this we are upon (30).

Thoſe on the continent have ſuffered ſtill more, not only from the Romans, who took ſingular pride in deſtroying them, and introducing ſome of their own in their ſtead, and bringing the Gauls over to their religion and cuſtoms; but likewiſe from the blind zeal of weak chriſtians, who looked upon it as a piece of merit to deſtroy or deface them, as monuments of idolatry and ſuperſtitious cruelties. The reader may conſult concerning them the authors quoted in the margin (31).

human power; and called it, in their language, Choir Ghaur, which ſome interpret the choir or dance of giants, on account of a general notion that ran through all thoſe countries, where ſuch heaps of vaſt ſtones were ſet up, that it was done by giants, though others, more abſurdly, by the aſſiſtance of dæmons, probably from the reputation which the druids were in for their ſkill in magic, and by the help of which they were ſuppoſed to have reared thoſe ſtupendous piles in the form they ſtood; though our author very judiciouſly obſerves, that Choir Ghaur might be more properly rendered the grand choir, as it exceeded all other works of this kind in bigneſs, and, not unlikely, in dignity, on account of the arch-druid, or of his holding his grand aſſembly of all the inferior ones in this place. This etymon is altogether ſuitable to the grandeur of the fabric, and to the deſign of it, whether we ſuppoſe it, with our author, to have been a temple, or, as ſeems more probable to us, for ſome other public uſe, in either of which it appears equally grand and noble. And this will go a great way to convince us, that it never was reared by the Romans; for the antient Britons would hardly have given ſuch a grand name to a fabric of theirs, in their own language: but our author has taken a much more effectual way to convince us, that it could be none of their work, much leſs ſuch a one as our famed architect Inigo Jones (if he really was the author of that plan and performance which Mr. Webb publiſhed under his name, and has been ſo amply confuted by Dr. Charlton [o] and Keyzler) has endeavoured to prove it, and in which he aſſerts it to be a round Roman temple, like the Pantheon (O).

The notion of its being a Roman temple confuted.

Dr. Charlton, though he fully exploded that notion, yet failed in proving his own, which attributed it to the Danes;

[o] Chorea gigant.

(O) That great architect, or, as is commonly thought, his publiſher, to make the dimenſions anſwer to his ſcheme, has been forced to alter and miſrepreſent them, to diſplace ſome of thoſe huge ſtones, and remove them at ſuch a diſtance as beſt anſwered to his imaginary plan. All which was afterwards diſcovered by a new ſurvey of it before perſons of taſte and judgment. Jones not publiſhing his account, though he lived thirty years after he had taken a view of it, makes one conclude, that he never deſigned it; and that, upon a ſerious examination of it, he found it impracticable. But upon his death, Mr. Webb his ſon-in law, it is thought, found an expedient of ſurmounting that difficulty, by the alterations we have mentioned, and by way of ſalvo tells the world, that if his father in law had lived to finiſh it, it would have appeared in a much better guiſe.

upon which he was ſoon after confuted by Olaus Vormius[p], there being really no ſuch monuments to be found among the Gothic nations. Beſides, this of Stonehenge is mentioned in ſome manuſcripts of Ninnius, who wrote two hundred years before they ſet foot in Britain; all which is a ſufficient confutation of its being a Daniſh work. Keyzler, for want of being thoroughly acquainted with our Britiſh antiquities, after having confuted the notion of Inigo Jones, of its being a Roman temple, or having any relation to the public worſhip, and the vulgar error of its being built by giants, or by magic art, or of its being ſome old broken remains of the flood (P), endeavours to prove it a ſepulchral monument erected by the Anglo-Saxons [q]. We hope we have already ſaid enough to prove, that, if it was ſuch a ſepulchral fabric, it is of too old a date to have been reared by that nation, or indeed by any but the antient Britons; though he is pleaſed, in order to prove them every way unqualified for ſuch a work, to repreſent them as ſuch ignorant ſavages, and ſo like the wild Americans [r], that he thinks it argument ſufficient, and indeed it is the only one he gives, againſt any one believing them to have been the contrivers of it. But how truly ſoever this character may ſuit to his antient Germans, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the next chapter, we hope to ſhew in the ſequel of this, beſides what has been occaſionally ſaid of the Britons and their druids, that they were the very reverſe of what he has painted them: he has ſucceeded much better in his proofs, that it was a monumental work, from many more of the like nature and form, which are known and allowed to be ſuch. Our very author himſelf tells us of one in Ireland, which, by his deſcription, is Stonehenge in miniature, and which he owns to [p] Faſt. & Monument. Danic. [q] Antiquit. Septent. p. 50, & ſeq. 97, & ſeq. 109, & ſeq. 230, & ſeq. [r] Ibid. cap. 4, 5, 13, & ſeq.

(P) There are two other vulgar errors more worthy of confuting than any of theſe, becauſe they have proved exceeding detrimental to theſe antient monuments. The one is, the notion of the ſtones being factitious, or caſt by art, which hath and doth ſtill induce ſtupid pretenders to antiquity to come and diſfigure thoſe curious ſtones with chizels and hammers, to find out whether they are really ſo or not. The other is, their digging near and round about them, in hopes of finding out ſome hidden treaſures, or other curious antiquities; by which means many of them are fallen down, and others ſo very near doing ſo, that, if this humour continues much longer, thoſe noble fabrics will be reduced, in time, into a heap of ruinous fragments, and no traces be left either of their ſtructure, deſign, or magnificence, but what we find in ſuch deſcriptions as thoſe given by this and other author have been the monument of a famous druideſs [5]; though he inſinuates it to be her temple likewiſe. What he mentions in order to prove the great pile being rather a temple than a ſepulchral monument, viz. the horns, bones, charcoal, and other things that were dug up from under it, is quite inſufficient, it being common, at the funerals of antient Britons and Gauls, not only to offer hecatombs of victims, which alone would anſwer for theſe horns, bones, &c. but likewiſe to bury their favourite horſes and ſlaves, as we ſhall ſee in its due place: and if the reader will be pleaſed to look back at what we have ſaid of the funerals of their brethren the Scythians, eſpecially of thoſe of the higheſt rank [t], and compare it with the form and diſpoſition of the ſtones in this place, he will be apt to think it a more decent refinement upon that antient and inhuman Scythian cuſtom; and only rearing a number of huge ſtones in this form, inſtead of the ſkins of men and horſes, which they uſed to ſtuff, and ſet up round their monuments; for as it ſavoured leſs of barbarity, ſo it was of a much more laſting nature. But this we offer only as our own conjecture, and conjecture is all that can be offered in favour of any other hypotheſis about it at this vaſt diſtance of time, and with thoſe little helps we have left. For this reaſon we ſhall omit mentioning ſome other notions which people have entertained; ſuch as, that it was the place where the grand council of Britain met, a Roman trophy, the monument of the famous queen Boadicea, of king Vortigern, and ſuch-like, all which, carrying ſtill leſs probability than any of the preceding ones, are not worth dwelling longer upon.

We ſhall now give a ſhort deſcription of the fabric itſelf, out of the accurate ſurvey which the reverend author laſt quoted made of it. It is ſituate on a pleaſant part of Saliſbury plain, about two miles from Amberſbury, and ſix from Saliſbury, and is ſituate not upon the ſummit of a hill, but very near it; and, for more than three quarters of the circuit, you have a gentle aſcent to it from the lower ground; at half a mile diſtance the appearance of it is quite ſtately, awful, and auguſt, eſpecially on the north eaſt ſide, which is the moſt perfect. According to his plan or iconography of it, the circumference of it exceeds that of the outſide of St. Paul's cupola. The height of the outward cornice is eighteen foot complete, and that of the inner twenty-four at a medium; for theſe, for reaſons to be mentioned hereafter, are not all of equal height. Thus the height of the inner circle, or rather elliplis, as our author has proved it, bears a juſt proportion to the curve of the circumference, which is above one hundred feet, and was one fourth part of it, though at present some of these stones either stooping, or by long time being sunk lower, come somewhat short of the proportion above-mentioned. The nobleness likewise of their lights and shades, as well as the variety arising from their circular form, adds to the elegance of the prospect; so that it is not without reason, that our great Jones blamed Mr. Camden for calling it so senslessly as he doth in his Britannia, insana substructio, a huge, or, as he englishes it, a wild kind of structure; whereas it plainly appears to have been the very reverse. But it is manifest, that he never saw it, or took but a slight view of it; and his description is so faulty and incorrect, that he seems not to have thought it worth a more exact survey, though he had seen those of Mr. Aubrey and Inigo Jones; but these likewise he seems to have had but little opinion of, and rather mentions their account of it to confute them, than to rectify his own by them; and we own, that he has very judiciously exploded both their notions, as well as all those other vulgar ones, which ascribe the rearing of this odd edifice, as he thinks it, to any but to the antient Britons. But to return to the fabric itself: the whole is inclosed within a circular ditch, which being crossed, one ascends thirty-five yards before he comes to the work, so that the area, as it is inclosed by the ditch, is three times the diameter of the building; and therefore the distance from the ditch withinside, quite round, to the fabric, is equal to the diameter of the fabric. When you enter the building, whether on foot or horseback, you are struck with astonishment at the sight of the vast stones, whether you view those that are still standing in their antient site, or those which lean forward, and are ready to fall, or those which lie down, and, by their immense weight, have crushed a number of others under them, especially that which our author supposes to have been the altar-stone (Q), and is broken into three large pieces by the fall of one of the large architraves. What in-

(Q) And so it may really have been, let the fabric be supposed a temple, a sepulchral monument, a grand court or council, or any thing of the like nature, seeing that, as we have observed before, sacrifices were used in great numbers in all those solemnities, and an altar cannot but be supposed to have been fixed in some convenient part of the building; but why so close to one part of the cell or nich as Mr. Jones has made it, and not in the centre, where Kysler would rather have it, this reason may be well enough assigned, that it is most likely to have stood where we find the huge fragments still lying, and crushed by one of the large imposts falling upon it; for, had it stood in the centre, it would have been out of the reach of it, and have remained whole to this time.

creaſes the wonder, eſpecially to a man verſed in theſe antique works, is, that, among thoſe dreadful dilapidations, in which every ſtone lieth, like the carcaſe of a giant, with a number of horrid ruins under it, there remains ſtill as much of it undemoliſhed, as enables one to recover an idea of what it was when in its perfect ſtate, and enough of every part to give one a notion of the whole. To all this we may add the beautiful contraſt which the view of the inſide gives you, when joined to the vaſt and beautiful proſpect of the country about it. The one, if you look up to thoſe huge ſtones, and the vaſt ponderous impoſts over them, the chaſm of ſky between the jams of the cell or inner circuit, you imagine you ſee whole quarries mounted in the air; and if upon the rude havock below, it looks like the bowels of a mountain turned inſide out. The other gives you a moſt ſpacious and variegated proſpect of the country round about, bounded only by the horizon. One of them is what they call Veſpaſian's camp; a beautiful proſpect it is; another the antient hippodrome, or place for horſe and chariot-races; a third the grand avenue to the fabric, which, as our author ſuppoſes, begins ſome miles from it. The plain is here-and-there interſperſed with a vaſt number of mounts, or, as they are called, barrows, ſome larger than others. The largeſt of them is incloſed about with a ditch an hundred cubits in diameter. Theſe are ſet thicker and cloſer in one place, and thinner at another; and, upon digging ſome of them up, there have been found human bones, urns, and ſome kinds of beads, and other pieces of glaſs, cryſtal, jet, amber, and ſuch-like female trinkets, of different colours and metals; as alſo ſome ſwords, hatchets, and other weapons [k], have been dug out of them; which plainly ſhew them to have been burying-places; but whether of the antient Britons, Romans, Saxons, or Danes, is not eaſy to determine, though the firſt ſeems moſt probable upon one account, which the reader will find in the margin (R). Theſe

The barrows are burying-places.

(R) The author obſerves, that the via Iceniа or Ikening-ſtreet, a road made by the Romans, which reached from Norfolk into Dorſetſhire, infringes upon one of thoſe barrows, and croſſes ſome part of it; from which it is reaſonabie to conclude, that theſe barrows were older than that road (20).

In theſe barrows, beſides thoſe human and other bones and materials, which have been digged out of them, there was a broad ſword taken out of one, and ſent to Oxford; in another was found a wea

Theſe barrows, however, are ſo thick about the neighbourhood of Stonehenge, that, from ſome heights, one may tell one hundred and twenty-eight in ſight [l]. Among them one may obſerve, in ſome places, two or more, ſometimes to the number of ſix or ſeven, incloſed in the ſame circle or ditch, of which one is larger than the reſt, and ſeems to be the tomb of ſome head of a family, and the reſt that of the family itſelf. The moſt remarkable of all the reſt are, that which is called the tomb of king Carviſius, who was the famed king of the Iceni, who fought againſt Julius Cæſar. It ſtands on the other ſide of Wilton, antiently Carvitium, ſo named, as is ſuppoſed, from, if not built by, him. It is ſituate on an eminence, and of a handſome height, and has four tall ſtately trees planted on the top. From this mount you have the proſpect of Old and New Sarum, of Wilton houſe and park, the Ikening road, and ſome diſtant hills. The other, called Buſh-barrow, is beautifully planted by the ſhepherds, and commands the proſpect of Stonehenge, of the Curſus or antient races, and of all the barrows around that plain, beſides a moſt elegant and ſpacious landſchape [m]. Thus much may ſerve to give an idea of the grand proſpect, which this noble ſtructure affords you from without.

BUT, before we come to ſpeak of its ſymmetry and the form and bigneſs of its ſtones, it may not be amiſs to obviate a diffipon of the ſame metal like a pole-ax, which weighed twenty pounds, and given to colonel Wyndham; out of a third was dug a braſs inſtrument, called celt, and is ſuppoſed to have belonged to ſome druid, and to have been uſed for cutting the miſſeto off the oaks. We have taken notice above, that the Gaulish druids uſed one made of gold for that purpoſe. In one of the female barrows was found, beſides ſome other ornaments and trinkets, the head of a javelin of braſs, at the ſocket of which were two holes for the pins that faſtened it to the ſtaff, and a ſharp bodkin, round at one end and ſquare at the other, where it went into a handle. Some of the trinkets ſeem to have been originally covered with metal; and one of them had ſtill a thin film of gold: all which ſufficiently ſhew this barrow to have been the ſepulchre of ſome heroine.

All that is further worth obſerving on this head is, that thoſe materials, as well as the bones, appear to have ſuffered the fire in ſome, though not in others. In ſome likewiſe the aſhes were depoſited in a ſmall urn of reddiſh earth unburnt; and, in others, the bodies were buried at full length, generally north and ſouth. From all which it is concluded, that the cuſtom of burning dead bodies was in uſe among the Britons, as well as that of burying without it, before the times of the coming in of the Romans.

culty, which will, in all probability, occur to our readers, from what he have juſt now ſaid of thoſe barrows; for ſince they evidently appear to have been burying-places, and to bear a kind of relation to the fabric itſelf, which is, as it were, the centre and kebleh of them, will not this deſtroy our ſuppoſition of the latter being likewiſe a ſepulchral monument? Will it not appear abſurd to ſuppoſe ſuch a noble fabric tohave been ſubſervient to the ſame ends with thoſe hillocks, which are ſeen around it? And will it not be more reaſonable to ſuppoſe it, with our author, to have been a temple, than a monument? To which we beg leave to anſwer, that we ſhould have made no difficulty of admitting it ſuch a temple, had we not ſo many convincing arguments, that neither Celtes, nor Gauls and Britons, had any ſuch buildings till long after the coming of the Romans. We have already given our reaſons, and hope they will appear as ſatisfactory to them, as they do to us, when duly weighed. However, to ſhew that our conjecture is not ſo inconſiſtent at the bottom, as it may appear at the firſt ſight, we ſhall obſerve, firſt, that there is a manifeſt difference between a monument and a burying-place; and that the latter is deſigned only to incloſe the remains, and the other to preſerve the memory, of the deceaſed. Theſe might be appropriated for the ſepulture of the great ones and their family, and this to burn their bodies, to be afterwards depoſited in urns, and conveyed to their proper burying-place. Again, the ſtone fabric might be the ſepulchre of kings, and conſequently deſerve greater magnificence; or it might be that of the druids, then in very high eſteem; or more particularly of the head of that order, or grand druid, and require not only to make a more ſtately appearance, but likewiſe to bear ſome kind of affinity, as, in fact, it ſeems to do, in its ſtructure, to thoſe ſacred groves, in which they performed their religious ceremonies. But laſtly, and to name no more, that which appears to us the moſt probable conjecture, from the relation which thoſe barrows bear to the building, is, that this laſt was, as it were, the centre or kebleh, that is, in other words, the point of view, or rather of diſtance, to all the reſt, and might be erected at the charge of the whole nation, and be deſigned, not only as a magnificent monument, or rather an open and majeſtic edifice for the performance of funeral rites to the whole people, and more eſpecially to thoſe of a ſuperior rank and merit, but likewiſe to aſcertain the property of each barrow to its reſpective family, by the number of cubits or furlongs they ſtood eaſt or weſt, &c. from it; for that they had a clear notion of the points of the compaſs and of geometry, is evident from the very planting, ſtructure, ſituation, and ſymmetry, of the

the fabric, as has been demonſtrated by our author himſelf, as well as by ſome others, who have written before him of it.

THIS conjecture being allowed, as indeed every thing about this noble pile ſeems to confirm it (viz. the long and ſpacious avenue to and from it, its dividing itſelf at a convenient diſtance, the one road towards the curſus, and the other to Radſin and the adjacent plains, the ſituation and ſtructure of the edifice, its proſpect and command over all the country, eſpecially the barrows and curſus above-mentioned), we may carry it on a little farther, and ſuppoſe the corps of the deceaſed, eſpecially if a prince, a grand druid, a celebrated warrior or heroine, to have proceeded with a ſuitable funeral pomp, ſuch as we have formerly ſhewn was obſerved by the Scythians to their monarchs[n], from the place of his reſidence to this ſepulchral monument. Here the druids and bards received it, and performed the funeral ceremonies over it, which conſiſted chiefly, at leaſt as far as related to their office, in offering ſacrifices, rehearſing the genealogy and heroic exploits of the dead, ſinging their encomia on him and his anceſtors, and if the body was to be burnt, in aſſiſting to, if not performing, that ceremony, committing the aſhes to the funeral urn, and conveying it, with all its apparatus of ornaments, weapons, &c. to the proper place of its interment. The area on the outſide might ſerve for exhibiting ſuch games, ſhows, and fights, as were uſual on ſuch occaſions, to the numerous ſpectators round about, and of which we ſhall ſpeak in due place. After which the company might proceed to the curſus, and there cloſe the ceremony with races, and other ſuch-like exerciſes. Every one of theſe places ſeems indeed ſo excellently ſituate, as if they had been deſigned for this grand ceremony. They all ſtand at a convenient diſtance from one another, and each commands the proſpect of the others, and may be viewed at a great diſtance by the largeſt number of ſpectators which we can ſuppoſe to have aſſiſted at it. We ſhall only add, that this notion, which we have been offering here, doth include all the various conjectures, which our beſt antiquaries have been able to make of it, either from the various antient traditions of it, or from their own diſcoveries. It anſwers to that of a temple, by reaſon of its ſacredneſs, its reſemblance to the antient religious groves, and the ſacrifices and other rites performed there. It anſwers to that of a ſepulchral monument, on account of its being appropriated to the grandeſt funeral ceremonies, and its being the centre or kebleh to all the adjacent mountains round about: to that of an amphitheatre, on account of the funeral games and ſhows exhibited at it; and may alſo have ſerved for a convening place of the national council for the election and proclamation of a new king, general, or grand druid, whilſt they aſſiſted at the obſequies of a deceaſed one. Laſtly, it appears not to have been reared by either Romans, Saxons, or Danes, becauſe it is evidently prior to them all, for the reaſons we have alledged a little higher, to which we ſhall ſubjoin one more, as we are come now to ſpeak of the huge ſtones, that compoſe this ſtupendous fabric.

The ſtones whence and how brought hither.

We have already hinted, that their monſtrous largeneſs, joined to their apparent great diſtance from any quarry, and the many ups and downs through which they muſt have been conveyed hither, led the unthinking vulgar into the notion, that they were brought hither bg magic, of the help of demons, according to ſome, and by giants, according to others, either of which were readily enough ſuppoſed able to bring them upon their backs from Africa (S); whilſt the wiſer ſort rather imagined them to be factitious, and caſt from ſome ſuch compoſitions as ſand and mortar, and the like, and hardened by the weather. This notion, as we hinted in a late note, has been ſufficiently, and, we may ſay, experimentally, diſproved, though to the great detriment and diſfiguring of the ſtones themſelves, and the endangering of the ſtructure. Theſe ſtones, rough and battered as they have been by theſe pretended curioſoes, as well as by a long ſeries of ages, appear to have been originally ſmoothed by the chizel, at leaſt as far as they ſtand above ground; for, as to that part which lies buried in the earth, it ſhews itſelf upon digging round it, to be in its primitive roughneſs, and as it was digged up out of the quarry, or, as our author rather ſuppoſes, and with greater ſeeming probability, as they were found lying on the ſurface of the ground in great numbers and various dimenſions, perhaps ever ſince the creation of the world (T), and as they are to be ſeen ſtill in vaſt quantities upon

(S) From a notion, which our author has likewiſe adopted, which ſuppoſes Afer to have been the ſame with Hepher, one of the ſons of Abraham by Keturah, to have come hither from Africa with Hercules, and to have brought with him the druids, who erected the fabric we are now ſpeaking of.

(T) This is at leaſt our author's conjecture (30), which we muſt be content to ſubmit to our readers, till a more probable one be found out. We never had an opportunity of viewing thoſe Grey Wethers but at a diſtance, whence they appeared as huge ſtones dug upon Marlborough downs near Abury, at a place called from thence the Grey Wethers, and are of the ſame kind, viz. a baſtard white marble. Hence another argument is drawn of its being of antienter date than the coming of the Romans; for, by this time, the Belgæ, a colony of the Gauls, had ſeized upon, and ſeated themſelves in, that part of the country; ſo that the Britons muſt have fetched theſe ſtones from, and drawn them ſome miles through, an enemy's country, unleſs we could ſuppoſe, that thoſe Belgæ were the builders of Stonehenge; which is leſs probable than that the Britons did, becauſe theſe have left ſuch kinds of monumental piles where-ever they can be traced, as we hinted a little higher. The difficulty is, to conceive how ſtones of that immenſe weight, one of which, tho' neither the largeſt nor heavieſt, has been computed, by proper judges, to weigh between thirty and forty tons, and conſequently would have required about an hundred and fifty oxen to have drawn it, could be conveyed from their original ſeat to Stonehenge, which is ſixteen computed miles, and along ſuch uneven ground, and in ſuch quantities as compoſe the fabric. Sure it is, that no carriage can be conceived, which would not have been ſunk into the ground by ſuch a monſtrous weight, unleſs it be that of rollers; but even this muſt appear a more than Herculean labour; the arduouſneſs of which cannot be extenuated, but by the ſuppoſition, that the whole, or at leaſt the greateſt part, of the nation contributed their help towards it in their turns.

from ſome neighbouring quarry, which, though not now to be found, might have been exhauſted or covered up; in which caſe, theſe might have been deſigned by our antient Britiſh druids for ſome other edifices of the ſame nature, which they were obliged to ſet aſide, upon their being forced from this iſle into thoſe of Ireland, &c. and of which we ſhall ſpeak in due place; but doubtleſs our author, who has been a curious examiner into all theſe particulars, had his reaſons, though he doth not mention them, for not thinking them to have been dug out of any quarry, but to have lain there ſcattered from the beginning.

One thing is remarkable, that all theſe Britiſh ſtructures in Wiltſhire, and no others, are built of the ſame kind of ſtone as that of the Welſh hills; whereas the cathedral of Saliſbury, all their great churches, and other large edifices, are of quite another kind, and were hewn out of the quarry called Chilmark, in the ſame county and neighbourhood.

Difficulties and form.

The rearing of them afterwards in such form and situation was a work of no less difficulty; for though we may reasonably suppose, that they were all pecked and chizelled, had their mortises and tenons wrought, and every thing done, that could lighten and fit them for the design, at the place where they were brought from, yet every man will easily perceive what an immense labour it must be to rear stones of that vast bulk and weight, to place them in their proper places, and at such due distances, that the architraves or imposts, that locked them to each other at the top, should fall so exactly every mortise upon its own tenon, as we find they actually do to this day; for it is plain to every eye that views them carefully, that each of these tenons is so exactly fitted to its mortise, that if either of the standing stones had been set ever so little out of its place, and perpendicular, they could never have locked one in the other, till they were reduced to their due distance and position; especially considering that there were at least fifteen in number of this large sort, set up two and two, the whole in a beautiful oval, nearest to a circle, and exactly locked each to the other by architraves of proportionable bigness. Each tenon is a druidish cubit, somewhat above twenty inches in diameter (V) on the broadest side; for they are of an oval figure, and the mortises exactly answerable to it. By this contrivance the imposts or architraves lie firm locked upon the uprights, and these are kept firm to each other. Where the imposts are heaviest, the tenons are shortest; and where those are lightest, and consequently more in danger to be shaken, as in those of the outward circle, these are made longest, and the mortises deeper accordingly. If the bottom face of the impost be divided into three squares, the two mortises will be found in the middle of the two outward ones: draw diagonal lines from corner to corner, and where they intersect is the centre of the mortise; which central distance from one to the other is seven druidish cubits, or about eight of ours. We might mention several other curious particulars, which make the whole appear to have been done geometrically, and from such plain and simple principles, as would best answer every purpose of the grand design; but

(V) Dr. Stukeley hath clearly demonstrated, that this fabric was never built according to the Roman measure, from the great number of fractions and uncouth numbers, that occur in the measuring of each part, but according to the antient cubit, &c. which was common to the Hebrews, Phœnicians, Egyptians, &c. as well as, as it appears here, to the druids and antient Celts. His proofs the reader will see in the work itself (31); for it is not for us to dwell on it.

for these we must, in a work of this nature, refer our readers to the author's account [o], to avoid prolixity. But from what has been said, the reader may frame an idea of the curiousness, as well as arduousness, of the work, which, considering its regular complexity and symmetry, must be owned to outvie all that we read of single obelisks, pillars, and statues, how gigantic soever, if we except the pyramids of Egypt and the Rhodian colossus, of which we have given an account in former volumes [p].

The fabric described.

THE whole fabric consisted of four circles, or rather ovals, of stones, the most considerable of which had ten uprights and five architraves or imposts, making up five trilithons, each trilithon consisting of two uprights and one impost, which locked them together at the top by the tenons and mortises above-mentioned. These trilithons were not all of the same height, as our author observed, and is indeed the only one we know, that has taken notice of this elegancy; but each of them raised its head or impost somewhat higher, as it drew nearest to that before which the altar is judged to have stood, and which appears to have been not only the highest, but finest, both for the smoothness and beauty of the stones. The height of these trilithons, with their architraves or cornice, is computed, in a medium, to be about twenty-four feet; for there is no coming at an exact dimension in a work so decayed by time and weather; the uprights being between twenty and twenty-one feet high, and lessening a little upwards to the top, and the cornice computed about three feet and a half, making up the complement of twenty-four feet. These imposts, on the outward face, bore the same sweep with the oval, which they composed; but, on the inside, went in a strait line. They seem likewise to have been somewhat broader on the top than at the bottom; so that their sides bear a little slant downwards, whether to preserve them the better from the weather, or to make up the shortning, which is caused by their elevation from the sight. The gradual ascent of these three orders, as they may be termed, of trilithons, is, according to our author [q], thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen, druidish cubits. The breadth of each trilithon is computed, in a medium, about ten cubits of the same measure, and is consequently the length at least of the impost. Each upright is about three feet nine inches thick, and twice that, i. e. seven feet and a half in breadth, or four cubits and a half druidish. Each trilithon, which composes this oval cell, stands at such convenient distance from the other, as to yield a beautiful prospect into it, which is not a little heightened by the space which

ſtands between the two uprights, and which widens upwards, as theſe leſſen in their breadth, and form an oval from its two centres, whoſe longeſt radius is fifteen, and ſhorteſt twelve, druidiſh cubits; ſo that the ellipſis is formed by a line of ſixty cubits; which, being joined at the two ends, and turned round the two centres, give a diameter of thirty cubits at the longeſt, and twenty-five at the ſhorteſt, five cubits being the ſuppoſed diſtance between the two centres (W).

This was the figure and greatneſs of that which Mr. Jones called the cell, and our author the adytum or the concha, of, what they ſuppoſed the fabric to be, the temple, and which we have taken the more pains in deſcribing, as it is indeed the grandeſt part of the whole. As for the remainder of the ſtructure, though it bears an exact and beautiful proportion with it, we ſhall content ourſelves with mentioning the moſt remarkable parts of each, without entering into a detail of all the particulars. Within this grand oval, is another of much leſſer, tho' harder and finer, ſtones. This circle, together with the long ſtone now broken, which is ſuppoſed to have been the altar, and is of a darkiſh-blue marble, ſuch as is often ſet upon common alter tombs, and about ſixteen feet in length, conſiſts of twenty ſtones, the greateſt part of which are ſadly broken and mangled; but not ſo much as to hinder a curious obſerver from recovering the form and order in which they ſtood, tho' their uſe and deſign is hard to be gueſſed at. Another circle or oval of forty ſtones ſurrounded the cell or adytum at a proper diſtance. Theſe were likewiſe of a much leſſer ſize; after which one comes out to the greateſt or outer circle, compoſed of thirty ſtones, likewiſe harder, and ſomewhat of a pyramidal form. It ſeems as if the founders had wiſely provided, that their leſſer bulk ſhould be compenſated by their ſolidity. The difference between this outward circle, and that of the cell or adytum, conſiſted in this, that the architraves of the trilithons of the latter did not touch one another, but preſerved the ſame

(W) Hence, among ſeveral other arguments, one may infer, that this nich or cell could not be originally ſuch an hexagon, as Mr. Jones ſuppoſeth it; much leſs could it be formed, as he pretended, at the ſix points of three equilateral triangles; for, if this had been the caſe, there muſt have been ſix inſtead of five trilithons. But there is not the leaſt footſtep of a ſixth, no ſtump or fragment of it, nor cavity in the earth, where it may be ſuppoſed to have ſtood; ſo that three ſtones of that immenſe weight and magnitude, as we have deſcribed them, muſt be imagined to have been ſpirited away by the ſame magic art, by which the vulgar ſuppoſed the whole to have been reared, before we can think, that it ever had this trigonometrical figure.

distance with the two uprights, on which they were locked; whereas, in the former or outward circle, the ſtandards were joined by a continued cornice. Each ſtandard or upright here had two tenons, at equal diſtances on the top, by which the two impoſts were locked by their mortiſes, and ſo continued quite round, in the form of a crown or cornice. The whole was ſurrounded by a vallum or deep ditch at a proportionate diſtance, as we have hinted above; and this, with the grand avenue, and the gradual aſcent up to the fabric, afforded a noble proſpect, both as you advanced towards it, and much more when you viewed from it all the champain country round about it. And thus much ſhall ſuffice for us to ſay on this ſtupendous Britiſh fabric, which has aſtoniſhed and puzzled all the architects, antiquaries, and curioſoes, that have either ſeen or read of it. We hope we have made a ſufficient apology for our anticipating this ſhort account of it here, which might otherwiſe have more properly belonged to the Britiſh hiſtory; and that the accurate author, from whom we have taken the moſt conſiderable and curious part of it, will not take it amiſs, that we have not followed his hypotheſis of its having been a druidiſh temple, when he conſiders the reaſons we have given for our aſſerting, that neither Gauls, Germans, nor antient Britons, had ever any ſuch buildings, till long after their being conquered by the Romans, and being forced to introduce a foreign religion amongſt them, that is, the worſhip of Jupiter, Mars, Mercury, and a great number of other inferior deities. How and when this was moſt probably brought about, we ſhall endeavour to account for in the next ſection.

SECT. III.

How, and when, the antient Gauls introduced the worſhip of inferior deities among them.

IT is plain, by what we have quoted out of Cæſar, Strabo, Lucan, and others, that though the Romans had had a conſiderable footing in Gaul before the coming of that conqueror, yet they had not been able to perſuade them to imitate them in their rearing of temples to any deity. If they had, Cæſar would not have failed hinting ſomething of it, it being one of the chief maxims of this republic, to ſpread their religion, laws, and cuſtoms, where-ever they came; ſo that, if the Gauls had ever been forced, or prevailed upon, to build any ſuch temples in their country, it can hardly be ſuppoſed, that he would have omitted mentioning it; he who took ſuch pleaſure to tell us how many petty kingdoms and commonwealths he had brought over to the Roman intereſt, and to a fondneſs for ſome of their cuſtoms. Since then there is not the leaſt hint of it either in that or any other author, but the contrary plainly appears to have been the practcie of this nation, we may ſafely conclude they had not begun, even in his days, and under his government, to introduce this foreign cuſtom, tho' could it be made appear, that any ſuch ſtructures had been reared then, yet would it not from thence follow, that it was done by the Gauls, but would appear more probably to have been done by the Romans, who, as we obſerved at the beginning of the laſt ſection, made it a part of their religion to adopt the gods, to vow temples and ſtatues, and afterwards to rear them in every country they conquered; whereas the Gauls made it a conſtant maxim of theirs to wage open war againſt, to plunder and demoliſh, all ſuch ſtructures, from a principle bred amongſt them, in common with the Perſees, that it was offering an indignity to the Supreme Being to confine him within any place; which made Cicero, who was not deeply verſed in the Gauliſh religion, ſay, that it chiefly conſiſted in a hoſtile contrariety to all others (A).

(A) Whether it was his ignorance or contempt of their principles, or done out of a deſign to make his client's cauſe appear more juſtifiable (1), he expreſſes himſelf in theſe virulent terms againſt the Gauls, that they profeſſed no other religion than that of waging war againſt thoſe of all other nations, and againſt the very gods themſelves. He accuſes them of having left their native ſoil, and croſſed immenſe tracts of land, merely to go and attack the Delphic Apollo, and plunder the oracle of the whole world. This, continues he, is that holy nation, which had the boldneſs to beſiege our capitol, and even the great Jupiter himſelf in it.

We ſhall have occaſion, in the ſequel of this hiſtory, to explode the greateſt part of this charge, for which that orator ſo foully inveighs againſt them. All that we ſhall obſerve here is, that they had, at that time, neither regard for the pretended gods of other nations, nor for the pretended ſanctity of their temples, but rather a ſingular contempt for the one, and abhorrence of the other; and this ſhews, that they had not as yet adopted any of the Greek or Roman rites into their religion, whatever they did afterwards.

One thing may be obſerved, that the general character, which the authors of both theſe nations give of the Gauls, is a continued contradiction, one while repreſenting them as a people of no religion or principles, and at other times as the moſt addicted to all kind of ſuperſtition of any nation under heaven: all which can be only reconciled by allowing, that they actually had a religion of their own, of which they were ſo tenacious, that they deſpited all others for the ſake of it.

(1) Orat. pro M. Fontejo.

We

WE cannot affirm with the ſame certainty, that they did not imitate the Romans in another part of their religion, the worſhip of a plurality of gods and goddeſſes, before their conqueſt. We are told, that they worſhipped Mars under the emblem of a naked ſword, and that Mercury was in the higheſt veneration among them all over Gaul [a], doubtleſs on account of the vaſt benefits and improvements, which their trade, commerce, arts, and ſciences had received from him, and of which we have ſpoken in a former volume [b]. Here is indeed no mention of temples, altars, but only of ſtatues reared to them; and probably that worſhip might, at firſt, be no more than a civil one, though it grew up, in time, into downright idolatry and polytheiſm. Theſe two deities, as well as Uranus, Saturn, Jupiter, Apollo, Juno, Venus, Diana, &c. being all of Celtic extraction, as has been formerly ſhewn, it was much more natural for the Gauls to deify them, as having formerly reigned over their nation, than for the Romans and Greeks to adopt or challenge them from others as their own, and, in proceſs of time, to ſtrive to outvie them in thoſe divine honours, which the reſt of the world paid to them. This will, in ſome meaſure, lead us to the motives of that great change, which they ſuffered to be made in their antient religion, for thoſe temples which they erected, and for thoſe ſacrifices which they offered, to all thoſe deified monarchs, till at length they ſunk down into the ſame abſurd notions concerning them with the reſt of the idolatrous world; and the notion of Eſus, or ſupreme Deity, was ſwallowed up into that of a Jupiter, as it had been everywhere elſe; and this might reach no farther neither than the vulgar, whilſt the druids and wiſe men among the Gauls, as well as the philoſophers among the Greeks and Romans, ſtill preſerved the notion of one Supreme Being, and either pitied, or perhaps laughed and winked at, the reſt of the pretended deities, heathen theology, and fooliſh ſuperſtition.

The druids forced to it.

BUT neither is this account altogether ſatisfactory, conſidering the averſion and contempt which the Gauls had of all other religions; and this extraordinary change will perhaps be better accounted for, if we can ſhew, with any probability, that they were rather forced to it by thoſe, under whoſe tyranny they came afterwards to groan, than out of any vain imitation of their neighbours, or affectation of reſpect for their deceaſed princes and heroes. It is not to be doubted, but to ſuch a brave and warlike nation as the Gauls, among whom one conſtant maxim was univerſally followed, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel, to prefer

the worſt of deaths to the loſs of liberty, the Roman yoke muſt appear intolerable; and that they could not be expected to ſubmit to it longer than they were forced to it by the ſuperior power of their tyrants; and as theſe made it their conſtant practice to introduce, either by fair or foul means, their religion, laws, and cuſtoms, where-ever they conquered, the druids, tenacious as they were of their own, could not but be extremely averſe to all ſuch changes, and uſe all their power and authority, which was ſtill very great, and almoſt uncontroulable (B), either to oppoſe them, or to prevail on the people to ſhake off the yoke. This their hiſtory will ſhew they did upon all favourable opportunities that offered; ſo that there was a kind of neceſſity for the Romans to find out ſome plauſible pretence to ſtrip them of their great ſway, and force them to a blind and thorough ſubmiſſion. Accordingly we find, that ſeveral emperors took an effectual method to ſuppreſs the druidiſh

(B) It plainly appears, that this high power of theirs, except what related to religion, was not of very antient date; and that they raiſed themſelves to it in proceſs of time, by the help of the people's ſuperſtition. Antiently the women ſeem to have had a greater ſway in all civil matters, and even about making peace and war. This privilege they had even before their firſt expedition into Italy; and it appears that they held it ſtill, when Hannibal paſſed through Gaul to croſs the Alps; for, in the treaty they made with him, it was agreed, that, if a Gaul offered any injury to a Carthaginian, he ſhould be tried before the court of the Gauliſh women (2). The reaſon of this great ſway is variouſly accounted for: ſome think, that they were looked upon as inſpired; others think, it was owing to their having ſhewn a ſuperior degree of wiſdom in quenching a civil war, which the men had kindled among themſelves. The Germans, according to Tacitus (3), allowed them the very ſame privileges, and we find ſomething like this practiſed by the Eleans, who, having in vain ſued for ſatisfaction from Demarchoon tyrant of Piſa, agreed with the Piſans, after his death, to ſubmit their difference to a court of ſixteen women, to be choſen out of ſixteen cities of the Eleans. Our author adds (4), that their deciſion ſo pleaſed both parties, that they appointed a perpetual college of ſixteen matrons to preſide over the Junonian games, and to aſſign the prize to whom they thought worthieſt of it.

However, with reſpect to the Gauliſh women, though we cannot aſcertain the time when they loſt this their authority, yet it is plain, by what Cæſar ſays of that extenſive one (5), which the druids had in his time, that they had found means to ſtrip thoſe female heroines of theirs.

power (C), by issuing out some severe edicts against their bloody custom of offering human sacrifices. Augustus was the first who issued out a decree against them, and at the same time introduced a census among the Gauls; upon which the whole nation was just ready for a revolt. But by the address and authority of Drusus who was left there by him, they were not only prevented from rising, but prevailed upon to assist at the dedication of Julius Cæsar's temple, and to build an altar to Augustus [c]. However, it is plain, that the edict of the latter was not executed there, and the druids, by this time in less authority with the people, might buy it off, by rearing the above-mentioned altar to him; and this is the reason why Claudius renewed it against them. But, whatever the pretence of those edicts might be, it is scarce credible, that religion had any hand in them; and they might as well have fallen foul upon all other nations under their empire, nay, and upon their own, since none was exempt from this barbarous custom, much less the Romans, as the reader may infer from what we have said in their history, and elsewhere [d]. However that be, it doth not appear, that even these took any more effect against them than that of Augustus, since we find them still not only in high vogue some

(C) We are told by three Roman authors, that Claudius did quite abolish this sect, and their inhuman superstition (6). The last quoted calls him indeed Tiberius, from which some have ascribed this edict to the emperor of that name, though wrongfully; for he only calls Claudius by his prenomen, Claudius being called Tiberius Claudius Nero Drusus; and it doth not appear, that the other Tiberius made any such edict against that custom, but only against astrologers, whom he banished from Rome (7). And here we beg leave to rectify a mistake, which inadvertently slided into our Carthaginian history (8), where we said, that the emperor Tiberius punished the African priests for their practise of these human sacrifices; whereas it should have been said, Tiberius the proconsul of Afric under the emperor Adrian; for it appears by Tertullian's account of it, that his own father was a centurion under him (9); which can by no means agree with the rank, nor with the times of the emperor of that name. We hope our readers will be candid enough to overlook such oversights in a work of this extensive nature, especially when they find how ready we are to acknowledge and rectify them, as soon as we have discovered them.

centuries after, but even authorized by the emperors Severus, Aurelian, and Dioclesian. They ſubſiſted ſtill, even down to the times of Solinus, Polyhiſtor, and of Euſebius of Cæſarea [e], and much longer ſtill in their chief abode in the province of Chartrain, where whole towns continued in their antient paganiſm, even down to the fifth century [f]. Neither did thoſe edicts ſuppreſs the practice of human victims amongſt the Romans themſelves, among whom they continued to the time of Conſtantine the Great, and even down to that of Gratian, who gave the finiſhing blow to it [g].

How and when introduced.

From all this it appears very probable, that theſe edicts againſt the druids, and their bloody rites, were not ſo much iſſued out to aboliſh their ſect, and religion, as to intimidate them, and ſuppreſs their exorbitant power, which, ſomewhat before this time, was grown to ſuch a height, that they over-ruled in all courts and councils, raiſed whom they liked to the higheſt dignities, and even to the crown, and often aſpired at, and obtained it for ſome of their own order. They directed in the making of peace and war, and, even after they were conquered by the Romans, could ſtir up the people to a general revolt; and ſo jealous were they grown of their uſurped authority, that they puniſhed, as we have hinted a little higher, all that diſobeyed or diſputed their commands with excommunication, and even with death. Nothing could therefore be more ſuitable to the Roman policy, than to uſe all poſſible means to ſuppreſs and cruſh ſo dangerous a ſet of men; and ſince religion was the common pretext to all their exorbitant ſway, ſo that there was no poſſibility of pulling down the one, without aboliſhing the other, it was natural for their conquerors to uſe all their power and addreſs to bring about ſuch a thorough change, and introduce their religion amongſt them; and there might not perhaps be a more favourable opportunity than that which this period afforded them, when the Gauliſh nation, groaning under a double, and, we may add, a divided, tyranny, that of their conquerors and that of their druids, would, in all likelihood, think it no ſmall eaſe to be rid at leaſt of one of their yokes, and that perhaps which, at that time, ſeemed the moſt intolerable of the two; for it muſt be remembered, that the Romans ſeldom made uſe of force, when they could gain their ends by cajoling and flattery, by fair promiſes, or even bribes and rewards; whereas the druids, if we may believe the Roman authors, bore all down with an arbitrary and uncontrouled ſway, till being overpowered by their enemies, and forſaken by their own people, they were at length forced to submit to, and exchange their religion and rites for, those of their conquerors.

THIS at least appears, by several concurring circumstances, Gaul, at to have happened about the time of these edicts; for, in Cæ- length, sar's time, who left the Gauls to the free enjoyment of their over-run rites, and even of many of their laws and customs, there was with them. not as yet any temple built, or any place of worship, but their oaks and groves. In the very next reign, we find the Lugdunenses building a stately temple to that conqueror, and an altar to Augustus, then on the throne, and a professed enemy to the druids and their religion. Under his successor Tiberius, their chief deity Esus is transformed into Jupiter, the god of heaven and earth, or rather, as it should seem, divides his worship with him for a while (D). Both are worshipped at first in groves, and under oaks; and at length the former is quite swallowed up in the latter, and temples, altars, and statues, are erected to him after the Roman manner over all the conquered parts of Gaul. After a few reigns more, during which they were still greatly oppressed, and made several vain attempts to regain their liberty, especially under Caligula and Claudius [h], who succeeded Tiberius, the whole country is filled with Roman temples, all their deities adopted and worshipped, and scarce any

(D) This is inferred from ancient bas-reliefs found in the great church of Paris, in which both these deities are carved one close to the other, the inscription of which is indeed to Jupiter; but the ceremony of the oaky mistleto, with the words Senani veilo, shews that Esus was looked upon still as the chief godhead there represented.

We would not rely too much upon these dark and enigmatic monuments, which every antiquary wrests according to his own favourite hypothesis. Sure it is, that, in the name of Maximus Tyriensis, who lived about an hundred years after Tiberius, Esus was already transformed into Jupiter, and worshipped under the type of a large oak (9). The author of the life of St. Boniface, bishop of Mentz, tells us, that that prelate found no better expedient to bring his people from their old superstition to christianity, than by cutting down an oak of a very large size, called the oak of Jove, and strength of Jove (10). The same is said to have been done, with like success, by still later preachers (11). So long did this veneration for those trees continue, as one may say, in the heart of christianity. We may add, that the name of Jupiter doth not appear to have been adopted by the Gauls, but only that of Jove, which we have already shewn is of Celtic original (12).

traces left of their antient religion, but their bloody rites of offering human victims to these new deities, and perhaps also in their auguries; which occasioned the above-mentioned decrees against them. To these we may add the great veneration which they still retained for their oaks, notwithstanding their multiplicity of temples, and which continued, according to some authors, till the twelfth and thirteenth century. One of these was dedicated to an hundred deities, as appears by an inscription engraven on a neighbouring column, which the reader will find in the margin (E). However, the sluice thus broken, an inundation of superstition and idolatry ensued, which nothing could resist; and the Gauls, having once shaken off the yoke of their druids, became so enamoured with the pageantry of polytheism, that they deified at length lakes, rivers, marshes, and even fountains, to all which they ascribed some peculiar deity, and extraordinary virtues; upon which account it was looked upon as the highest sacrilege to fish in them, to draw or drain them, and especially to lay hands on any treasures that were committed to their care and protection (F). To all these changes

Run into all kinds of superstition.

(E) This oak being afterwards cut down by St. Severus, the inscription engraven was to preserve the memory of it; ARBOREM DIVUS SEVERUS EVERTIT CENTUM DEORUM. Our author adds, that, in rooting it up, they found a head full of gold and silver, which was laid out by that saint in the building of a church since dedicated to him, as appears by the epitaph upon his tomb (13).

(F) Of these lakes, fountains, &c. some were dedicated to one deity, some to another. Tacitus pretends to give us the reason why the Gauls deified them, because, says he, they were nearer heaven, and consequently nearer the ear of those deities, to whom they pray from thence (14). This is a very foolish one; and it is more reasonable to suppose, that they fancied those deities, to be more immediately present there. However, such regard they had for them, that the same author tells us, that the Hermunduri and Catti waged a bloody war against each other for the property of one of these fountains, which was a salt one; and that the former at length gained their point against the latter, by a vow which they made to sacrifice their enemies, and all their spoil, to Mars and Mercury; which was accordingly done: the Catti were all massacred without mercy, together with their horses, cattle, and all their spoil, and flung into the lake (15).

However, unless it be upon such bloody devowments, we do not find, that they offered any victims to them; but abundance changes the druids found themſelves obliged to ſubmit, to avoid the penalties of thoſe edicts; and ſo compliable did they ſhew themſelves, that, from that time, whether to ſhew their complaiſance to the Romans, or to take off the odium which their name laid them under, they exchanged it for that of Senani, which, in their language, ſignified the ſame as elder or venerable with us. From hence we may date their downfal, though not their total abolition, till ſome ages after; for, being once reduced to ſuch a low ebb of authority, or rather being once ſtripped of it, and become ſuch ſervile creatures to their new and potent maſters, it is not to be ſuppoſed, that theſe would ever ſuffer them to recover it again; but, if they ſtill permitted them to make a gain of religion, it ſhould be only in the worſhip and rites of thoſe new deities, which they had now adopted. This was an effectual means to induce them to give into all kinds of Roman and Greek ſuperſtitions, and even to outdo them in it, ſince it would open a new door to their intereſt, inſtead of the old one that had been ſtopped up. We have taken notice, in the laſt note, of the immenſe treaſures, which were flung into their conſecrated lakes, rivers, and afterwards into their temples; and who can imagine thoſe druids and prieſts to have been as ſcrupulous as the ſtupid laity, of converting any part of it to their own uſes? But this we muſt ſubmit to our readers, who will be better able to judge of it, if we ſubjoin here ſome few more inſtances of this kind of ſuperſtition; for it were endleſs to mention them all, they were grown to ſuch number and variety.

ONE lake they had in ſome part of Gaul neareſt the ocean, which received its name from two white ravens, with whitiſh wings, which conſtantly kept about it. Incredible wonders were told of it [i]. Amongſt others, it was much reſorted to in matters of controverſy between parties. Each of the contenders brought a kind of cake, and laid it at the end of the ſame of gold, ſilver, rich cloaths, and other coſtly things, they flung into them, which it was ſacrilege to touch. We have ſpoken of the famous lake of Tholouſe dedicated to Apollo, whoſe treaſures, eſpecially in gold and ſilver ingots and maſſy utenſils, amounted to immenſe ſums, and was continually increaſed by freſh offerings (16). In time, theſe places became ſo liable to be plundered by foreign nations, as well as perhaps by their neighbours, that they began to repoſit thoſe ſacred treaſures in their temples, of which they had ſoon after a vaſt number, as we ſhall ſee in due time.

plank, which was ſet afloat on the lake, to be expoſed to thoſe ravens, whoſe cuſtom, it ſeems, was to devour one of the cakes, and to crumble and ſcatter the other; and this laſt gave the cauſe to its owner. Another we read of at the foot of a mountain in the neighbourhood of Savoy, dedicated to the moon, under the name of Helanus, which ſignifies ſplendor. It was reſorted to by all the neighbouring people once a year, who threw into it ſome cloaths, linen, fleeces of wool; others bread, cheeſe, wax, and the like, according as they could afford it. Here they kept a ſumptuous feaſt, which laſted three whole days, a ſufficient quantity of proviſions being brought in waggons to the place. On the fourth day, we are told [k], when they were ready to return home, there conſtantly aroſe ſuch ſtorms of wind, thunder, rain, and hail, as made them afraid for their lives. We have taken notice how they uſed the waters of the Rhine to diſcover the fidelity of their wives, and the legitimacy of their iſſue. They ſeem to have had a much greater veneration for this river, than for any other. The offerings and ſacrifices offered to it were of a peculiar kind: whole armies called upon it for help and victory, and the ſight of it, or of any of its waters, inſpired the ſoldiers with courage and bravery [l]. Each river, fountain, lake, or pool, was looked upon as inhabited by ſome deity, and had ſome peculiar and extraordinary virtues aſcribed to it, for the ſake of which the credulous people reſorted to them in ſhoals, and with proper offerings, every one according to their ability. Some others of their ſuperſtitions we ſhall have occaſion to hint in the ſequel; and theſe ſhall ſuffice to ſhew into what lengths they ran in their imitation of the Greeks and Romans, and what profit their druids, bards, &c. are like to have made of them (G).

This multiplicity of deities, or rather of lakes, marſhes, &c. conſecrated to them, did not hinder them from building temples, altars, and ſtatues, to them after the Roman manner, and not only in great number, but ſome of them very ſtately, and in the grand taſte, as one may infer from ſome remains of them, and other monuments of that nation; but yet in theſe they commonly ſacrificed to the gods only brute victims, and offered their vows and rich donatives in them; but, as to human ſacrifices, they ſtill offered them, it ſeems [m], under their oaks and in their groves; but whether they did it for privacy, or for fear of the Romans, and to avoid the penalty of their edicts, or ſtill retained their antient notion of that Supreme Being, to whom they thought them more peculiarly to belong, is not eaſy to determine (H). To give our readers a ſpecimen of theſe new buildings, we are told, that the ſtatues of theſe gods, ſuch as Pennin, Mercury, Diana, &c. of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the ſequel, were placed ſometimes on a pedeſtal, which ſerved likewiſe for an altar, ſometimes on a column of a prodigious height [n]. In ſome they were expoſed to the open air, and in others ſheltered by an edifice of poliſhed ſtones in form of a cupola or cone. Their temples were no leſs rich and magnificent, witneſs that famed one called Vaſſo at Clermont in Auvergne, the walls of which are affirmed to have been thirty feet thick, covered, on the outſide, with carved ſtones, and on the inſide with ſmall ones nicely wrought and poliſhed, and on the top incruſtated with marble, and compartments of Moſaic work. The pavement was likewiſe of marble, and the top covered with lead [o]. A learned French antiquary mentions eight of theſe ſtately fabrics of an octagonal form, and whoſe eight faces were adorned with a number of Gauliſh deities, generally eight in number in thoſe which he himſelf obſerved; which made him ſuſpect, that this combination of numbers contained ſome druidiſh myſteries, which are now quite out of our reach [p] (I). Their temples deſcribed

(G) It may not be amiſs to obſerve here to our readers, that this deifying of lakes, rivers, and ſprings, might probably be owing to ſome extraordinary qualities and virtues they obſerved in their waters, eſpecially ſuch as were of a hot and medicinal nature. Even lakes and rivers, though leſs extraordinary on any ſuch account, might yet riſe to this height of veneration, on that of their perpetual flowing, and diſcharging ſuch conſtant ſtreams of water, without being exhauſted; of all which the druids, though well enough acquainted with the natural reaſon (for they were great philoſophers, might yet make a myſtery with the vulgar, for their own politic ends.

(H) The former ſeems the moſt probable, becauſe they did likewiſe chuſe to offer theſe victims in caves, rocks, precipices, and other deſert and unfrequented places, which they choſe ſometimes by mere chance, and as they fell in their way; at other times by their auguries and lots: all which ſeems to intimate, that they avoided being ſeen at theſe bloody ceremonies by any other people (17), eſpecially the Romans, who had ſo ſtrictly forbid them.

(I) The author of the religion of the Gauls has, however, diſproved the conjecture of that learned antiquary, by ſhewing (18),

(17) Vide Burchard. decret. l. x. c. 10. Keyzler. antiq. ſeptentr. apud relig. des Gaul. l. i. c. 15. ad fin. (18) Ibid. c. 16.

We ſhall refer our readers to the two authors laſt quoted for a further account of thoſe famous edifices, that we may not draw this ſection into an exceſſive length, and content ourſelves with giving them a ſhort deſcription of one of the moſt curious of them in the next note (K), and figure, by which they may frame that this octagonal form was common among the Romans as well as the Gauls; and that the latter had temples of different forms, ſome round, ſome oblong, ſome decagonal, without any apparent myſtical deſign. The thing is not worth diſputing at this diſtance; and it doth not appear, that the Gauls had any ſuch regard for the number eight. They had indeed a greater one, if we may believe Pliny (19), for the number ſix, which was held ſo ſacred amongſt them, that they overturned the order of months, years, &c. in honour of it; but on what account they did ſo, doth not appear.

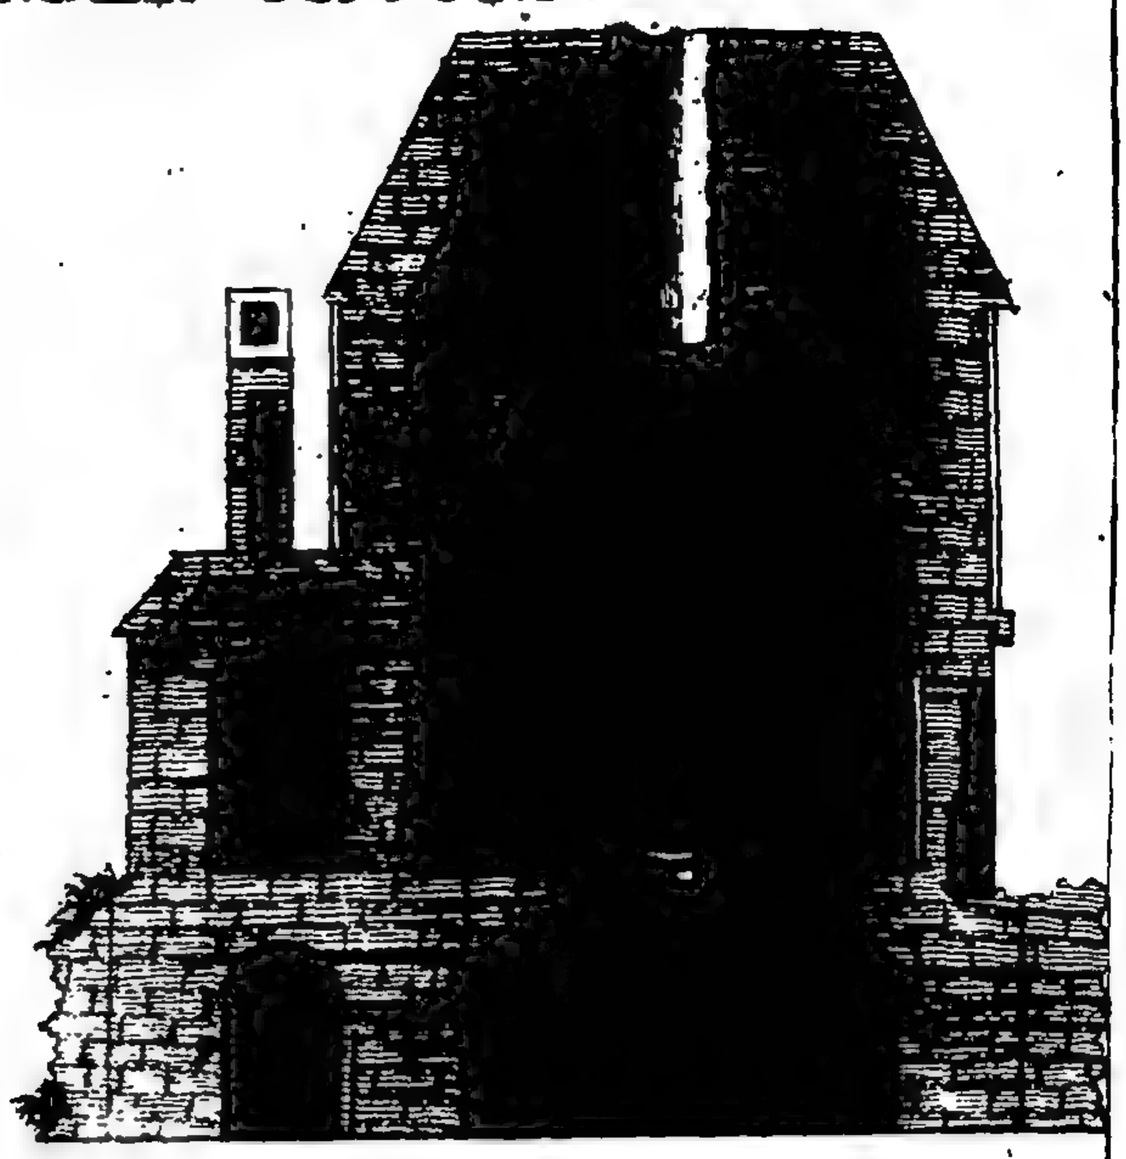
(K) This octagonal ſtructure ſtands at Montmorillon, in the province of Poitou, and conſiſts of two temples, one above ground, and the other under it, ſomewhat like our St. Faith and St. Paul, the loweſt of which is much narrower than the upper, and its wall as thick again. The upper received its light from eight windows, in form of portals, under the arch of each of the eight faces; but now walled up, except that over the gate or entrance into the fabric; and another which leads to a kind of wing or portico, which projects from the fabric, on the oppoſite ſide. The great overture in the centre of the roof, which reſembles that in the Rotonda of Rome, gives likewiſe ſome light to the building, though not much, becauſe it deſcends through a hole in the roof, like a cylinder, of twenty-four feet in length, and about ten in breadth. The rain, that falls through it, gathers itſelf to the centre of the pavement, which is made with a proper declenſion, and empties itſelf through another, and much leſſer, hole, into the lower temple, and is ſucked up by the earth, this laſt having neither ſink nor pavement.



The wing, at one of the ſides of the octagon, is equal to it, that is, eighteen feet in breadth without and within. That, which leads into the lower, is much narrower than that which leads into the upper building; and at the end of the former is a ſtair-caſe, that leads up to the latter. This place appears to be of the ſame age and ſtructure as the octagon, and has, on the top, a kind of ſquare tower of about the ſame height with the roof of the inner temple; but whether it had a bell in it, as ſome think, who imagine it to have been ſince turned into a church, is not eaſy to determine. This advanced building ſeems to have ſerved for a kind of veſtry to the prieſts and druids. Juſt over-againſt this, acroſs the temple, is the gate that leads into it; and on the one ſide of it, in the ſubterranean temple, begins a covert-way above ſix feet broad, and about ſix hundred in length, which leads to the neighbouring river, to which, it is ſuppoſed, the druids went to waſh themſelves and their victims, whenever they performed the prieſtly function.

frame an idea of the Gauliſh taſte in architecture. All that we ſhall add here is, that, by the multitude of niches that appear in

Over the gate of the temple were eight human figures coarſly carved, ſuppoſed to have been ſo many Gauliſh deities. Of theſe ſix are of the male kind, three in a group or nich, and the two others, one at each end, are females. The former are differently dreſſed. Thoſe that face you, and ſtand fartheſt out, have a kind of antique mantle; the others have on a kind of tunic. One has a long gown quite down to his feet, and open from top to bottom, and all of them are girdled up. In one group, the figure that faces you is ſhod, and the other two on each ſide are bareſooted. In the other group, that which faces you is unſhod, and the other two ſhod. In the one they appear old men, with long beards; in the other, all young and beardleſs; ſo that in the firſt there are two old men unſhod, and one ſhod; and in the other two young men ſhod, and one unſhod. This odd contraſt was not, doubtleſs, without ſome myſterious meaning.

Of the two women, which ſtand one at each end, the one had a long head of hair plaited hanging on each ſide before her, and is dreſſed ſomewhat in the modern form, that is, in a kind of ſtiff-bodied gown. She holds her hands on her ſides, and hath a kind of mittins which cover about one-half-way her arms. That, which ſtands on the oppoſite ſide, is quite naked, and hath two ſerpents twiſted one round each leg, and both twining between her thighs, rear their heads up to her breaſts, as if they were ſucking at them, whilſt ſhe holds them by her hands, as it were, cloſe to the ſides of her belly. From this combination of eight figures over the gate of an octagonal temple, our learned author infers, that that number was looked upon by the Gauls as ſacred to the gods, as we hinted a little higher.

The intablature over it was not without its ornaments, which chiefly conſiſted of a great variety of heads oddly variegated, the meaning of which, if it was done with any, is not eaſy to gueſs. As to the figures themſelves, this is the conjecture of our author, for the proofs of which we ſhall refer our readers to the place quoted in the margin (20): The naked woman, with two ſerpents, he ſuppoſes to have repreſented the moon, to whom therefore he concludes the temple to have been dedicated. The three old men he takes to have been three druids, and the three young men to have been their diſciples, and the number ſix to have been deſigned to ſignify the ſacredneſs in which it was held by the Gauls, it being on the ſixth day of the moon that they performed their grand ceremony of gathering the miſleto, as we have already hinted. The ſerpents, ſucking at her breaſts, may ſignify properly enough the virtue, which that planet imparted, not only to that plant, but to all other vegetables, as the ſnakes are ſaid to renew their age with their ſkins.

(20) Idem, l. i. c. 31.

in ſome of them, they ſeem to have had a vaſt number of ſtatues in them, which are ſince moſtly demoliſhed, upon their converſion to chriſtianity; and ſome of them, ſince dug up out of their ruins, are ſo ſadly broken and mangled, that it is hard to gueſs, whether they were Gauliſh deities, or ſtatues of any other kind. Our two authors differ in their judgment about them; but, ſince the Gauls were grown ſo fond of multiplying their deities, as to dedicate one oak to an hundred of them, as we lately hinted, why may we not believe with Montfaucon, that they might ſhew the ſame fondneſs for multiplying their idols in thoſe temples, in imitation of the Romans? A great many of theſe edifices have been preſerved here, as they were in other countries, upon the planting of chriſtianity, by being converted into churches, though a much greater number were then demoliſhed, of which there are ſtill ſome fragments remaining, and may be ſeen more particularly deſcribed in the authors above quoted.

The gods worſhipped by the Gauls.

We are now come to ſpeak of the gods that were afterwards adopted and worſhipped by the Gauls. We have already ſeen how their ancient Eſus came to be changed into Jupiter, at firſt indeed under the ſymbol of an oak, and even of a ſhapeleſs ſtump of a tree. But at length, as they gave wholly into the Roman ſuperſtition, they came to erect altars and ſtatues to him, and to repreſent him after the Roman manner: thus in ſome ancient ſtatues and bas-reliefs he is carved with a lance in one hand and a thunderbolt in the other, and with his arms and boſom bare; his head is ſometimes ſurrounded with a radial crown;

his name of Jupiter is never met in any of his inſcriptions, but only that of Jou, or Jovis, which, being of Celtic extract, was deſignedly retained by them, inſtead of the Roman. He is likewiſe ſurnamed Taran, which, in the ſame tongue, ſignifies thunderer: we would not, however, pretend to affirm,

As for the other woman, he ſuppoſes her to have been deſigned for Venus, becauſe ſuch a kind of figure had been dug up at Chalons, with her treſſes plaited ſomewhat like this. If ſo, we would rather ſuppoſe the three young men, which ſtand next to her, to have been deſigned for her prieſts. But if the naked one, ſuckling two ſerpents, ſignifies the new moon, why may not the other, which is dreſſed in a cloſe-bodied gown reaching up to her neck, have been deſigned to expreſs the old one, and to ſignify, that, after ſhe is paſt the full, ſhe ceaſes to communicate her influence? for the druids, being well verſed, for thoſe times, in aſtronomy, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel, and much addicted to aſtrology, it was natural for them to think, that as the increaſe of that planet did daily approximate her virtue to the earth, ſo her decreaſe did divert and elongate it from it. But whither are we running with our conjectures?

that this laſt name is the Taramis, or Taranis, of Lucan, or that the Gauls did not give it to any other god but the great Jupiter: but we may be well aſſured, that that of Jovis was peculiar to him, and has been preſerved not only by the antient Gauls and Welſh, but is ſtill retained by the French in many of their compound words (L). In that part of Gaul nearer the Alps he was called Peninus, and thoſe high mountains Peninæ, from the old Celtic word Pen, which ſignifies a head, a height, a ſummit (M). He was repreſented as a young man naked, on a column reared to him on the top of mount St. Bernard the Leſs, by L. Lucilius, and is ſtyled Optimus Maximus; whence it is concluded, that he was the ſame with the Gauliſh Jovis. What ſeems to confirm this beyond all queſtion is, that the column on which it ſtands is indifferently called the column of Jove and of Peninus, and the carbuncle that was placed on it, the eye of Jove, and the eye of Peninus[l]; but ſince by the eye of Jupiter was meant the ſun from all antiquity [m], and the carbuncle was a very proper emblem of this laſt deity, why may we not as well ſuppoſe this ſtatue, naked and youthful as it was, to have been dedicated to it rather than to Jupiter? However, that be, as this laſt ſucceeded their great Eſus, they paid much the ſame worſhip to him, and, in particular, offered human victims to him, as the Romans did to their Jupiter Latialis;

(L) Particularly in thoſe that follow Joudy or Jeudy, Thurſday, or day of Jove; Joumont, Joubarb, the mount of Jove, a mountain ſo called by the Romans, and the beard of Jove, an herb ſo called, from its reſemblance to it; and many more of the like nature. As for that of Taran, which is ſtill kept in many words which expreſs any loud and fearful noiſe, and from which we take the Greek ταραχὴ and ταράττω to be derived, it is not unlikely, that it may have been alſo given to Mars, on account of the thundering noiſe which the Gauls made upon their ſhields, when they invoked him, either before an onſet, or after a victory.

(M) This deity is called Apenina by Cato the elder, who derives it from Apis, the firſt king of Italy, with whom, according to him, ended the golden age (20). Servius (21) calls her Penina. But the figure and inſcription which Guichenon has given us of it ſhew it to have been erected to a male deity. The inſcription is, LVCIVS LVCILIVS DEO PENINO OPTIMO MAXIMO DONVM DEDIT. The column was of marble, and about fourteen feet high.

ſome inſtances of which we have given in the laſt ſection of this chapter, and in a former volume [m].

Mars. THEIR next deity was Mars, whom they eſteemed as the chief protector of the Gauliſh nation. Their invincible warlike temper inſpired them with ſuch a veneration for, and confidence in, him (N), that whenever they went to war, they made him heir of all their poſſeſſions, and about the time of the onſet they vowed to him all the plunder [n]. If they came off with victory, they frequently ſacrificed their priſoners, as well as their cattle, to him, and hung the heads of their ſlain enemies about the necks of their horſes, in token of their valour. They even incloſed ſome of the moſt conſiderable ones in frames of cedar, and, upon proper occaſions, ſhewed them to ſtrangers, and at no time could be prevailed upon to part with them [o]. Another barbarous cuſtom they are juſtly branded with, of poiſoning their arrows with a juice, which they extracted from a tree not unlike our fig-tree, but of a quite deadly quality [p]. In times of ſickneſs, or imminent danger, they immediately ſacrificed ſome human victims to Mars, or vowed to do it, as ſoon as they had it in their power; and performed it accordingly. It was even common with them, in preſſing dangers, to vow all their enemies to that deity, and to maſſacre them, as we have formerly hinted, without mercy or diſtinction. We have already taken notice, that he was formerly worſhipped under the emblem of a naked ſword, and under the name of Mars, or Mavors, or Mawr-ruiſc, which ſignifies warlike or powerful. Since then, we find him repreſented in the habit of a Roman warrior, with a ſpear in one hand, and a ſhield in the other, and with the ſur-

(N) Julian the apoſtate, among his many other chimerical notions, attributed all the bravery and ſucceſs of the Gauls to the influence which the providence of the Creator of all things had endued that deity with, when he put them under his protection (22). But it is far more reaſonable to think, that their natural bravery, joined to their hatred of the all-conquering and enſlaving Romans, directed them to the choice of that deity for their protector, and which they antiently worſhipped, not as a god, but as one of the attributes of the Supreme Deity, which ſquared moſt with their warlike temper, as we have had occaſion to hint in a former note (23).

name of Camulus (O). We are told, that the Accitani of Spain, or the inhabitants of Cadiz, a Gauliſh colony, repreſented him ſurrounded with rays of light, becauſe, ſays our author [q], the boiling of the blood, and flow of animal ſpirits, which are the cauſe of a martial temper, were produced by the heat of the ſun. The variety of inſcriptions, that have been dug up by the curious, ſhews him to have been in the higheſt eſteem.

[q] MACROB. Saturn. l. i. c. 19.

(O) This appears from two inſcriptions which Gruter has given us, the one on a bas-relief, with figures of five gods, viz. Arduinne, Camulus, Jove, Mercury, and Hercules; all which have their names engraven over their heads. The inſcription underneath ſhews it to have been dedicated to them by one Quartinus, who is there ſtyled Civis Sabinus Remus; from which that great critic, not obſerving, that the laſt word ſhews him to have been a citizen of Rheims, miſtook thoſe deities to be of Sabinian extract, and Camulus to be the ſame as Camillus (24), one of the names which the Sabines gave to Mercury.

But there is another inſcription, of older date by an hundred years, which ſhews, that the Rhemenſes in Gaul worſhipped Mars under that title. It runs thus: MARTI CAMULO OB SALVTEM TIBERI CLAVDI CÆS. CIVES. REMI TEMPLVM CONSTITVERVNT (25). Hence it is plain, that if Camulus was known in that part of Italy, it was by the means of this Quartinus, a Rhemiſh citizen, who dedicated this inſcription there to him, under the reign of Antoninus; whereas that city appears, by the ſecond inſcription, to have dedicated their temple in that of Claudius: ſo that, upon the whole, all theſe five deities here appear to have been Gauliſh, not only by their names, which are of Celtic extract, but from the reſemblance of their dreſs, attitudes, &c. with thoſe that have been found among the antient monuments of Gaul, eſpecially in the great cathedral of Paris (26).

As for the etymon of Camulus, it is not eaſily decyphered It may be derived from the Celtic camp, a field of battle; from campa, to fight, and ulvu, a fire, blaze; whence perhaps the Greek cammonia, by which they called the victory gained in ſingle combat. It may perhaps alſo come from the cam or chant, or ſongs, which the Gauls uſed when they went to fight. But we have had frequent occaſion to obſerve throughout this work, that there is nothing more uncertain, and apt to miſlead men, than ſtrained etymologies. Beſides, the Gauls having received, as we have ſeen, their polytheiſm from the Romans, it were unreaſonable to expect, that names and ſurnames of thoſe deities ſhould all be of Gauliſh extract. As for Arduina, her dreſs, as well as name, ſhews her to have been Diana, who was worſhipped in Gaul, as well as in Greece and Rome.

(24) P. 40. num 9. (25) Idem, p. 56. n. 11. (26) Vide relig. des Gaul. l ii. c. 36.

We

We took notice formerly, that all the treaſures and plunder, that were vowed to him, were laid up in heaps in the next convenient place in the open fields, and were looked upon as ſo ſacred, that no Gaul dared to meddle with them. Some ſtones have been found, with eight or nine human heads buried under them, which, by the inſcription, appear to have been dedicated to him, and theſe heads to have belonged to thoſe human victims, which they were accuſtomed to vow to him in times of peril and ſickneſs. In ſome of theſe inſcriptions he is called plainly Mars; in others he has the title of Segomen; in others Vincius or Britovius, the meaning of which names is not very clear. The reader may ſee the moſt probable conjectures about them in the next note (P).

Apollo. Apollo was another of their deities, and in as great veneration, on account of his being the god of phyſic, as Mars was for being the god of war. The druids, who were as famed quacks as prieſts, failed not to celebrate him as the implanter of all the virtues that they attributed to their materia medica, which chiefly conſiſted in vegetables, accompanied with a great deal of ſuperſtitious traſh, which they uſed in the gathering, preparing, and adminiſtring (Q). The Aquileians and Tectoſagi choſe

(P) That of Segomen appears to be Celtic, and ſignifies rich, or making rich. Hence the Segones, who inhabited the moſt fruitful part of Gaul, and were reckoned the moſt opulent, are thought to have had their name. That of Vincius ſeems to have been given him on account of his ſtately temple at Vincia, now Vences, in Provence; and, in all likelihood, that of Britovius from ſome other city, where he was more particularly worſhipped; perhaps that of Britonium in Galicia, which was a colony of the Gauls, and became afterwards an epiſcopal ſee, but is now deſtroyed (26).

(Q) We have already given ſome hints of this, in ſpeaking of their miſleto, and their time and method of gathering it. It were needleſs, as well as tedious, to follow them through all their other ſuperſtitious quackeries; but one inſtance we cannot omit; becauſe it ſhews not only the ſtupidity of them, but likewiſe their fondneſs for them; ſince this laſt continued in vogue, it ſeems, till the eleventh century.

They had an herb dedicated to Apollo, or Belenus, which they called, from him, Belinuncia, and the Romans Apollinaris; and is ſuppoſed to have been a kind of henbane. The Spaniards and Hungarians retain ſtill the former of theſe names, the one calling it Veleno, and the others Belend. With the juice of this herb they poiſoned their darts, when they went a ſtag-hunting; and could poiſon the creature with a ſlight wound, and eſteemed the fleſh the choſe him for their patron and protector. The latter, who occupied a vaſt territory about Tholoſa, had a very rich and magnificent temple dedicated to him in that city, which was their metropolis. This is ſuppoſed to be the ſame that is mentioned by an antient author [r], on account of Conſtantine's repairing thither, to give thanks for his late ſucceſs (R), and the extraordinary preſents he made to it; upon which occaſion that author ſtyles it the fineſt temple of Apollo that was then in the world. The building was a decagon, in which there was a vaſt number of niches and ſtatues, and, among the reſt, that of Apollo, repreſented as a lively youth; upon which account, the panegyriſt compliments that monarch with joining to the youthfulneſs of the god, the grandeur of an emperor. Some words he adds, which ſeem to imply, as if the oracle of the god had juſtly promiſed him the empire of the world; from which one more tender and luſcious for it. Amongſt other ridiculous uſes they made of this plant, the following is remarkable, as well for its oddity, as long continuance.

Whenever the country laboured under a great drought, the women aſſembled themſelves, and choſe from amongſt them a young virgin, to be the leader of the dance She ſtripped herſelf naked, and went at the head of the reſt, in ſearch of this herb, which they then called Bæliſa. When ſhe had found it, ſhe plucked it up by the roots, with the little finger of the right hand, and tied it to a ſtring, the other end of which was faſtened to the little toe of her right foot. Her company did then cut off each ſome boughs, and carried them in their hands after her, whilſt ſhe dragged the plant after her, towards the next river, where ſhe plunged it in the water: the reſt dipped, likewiſe, their boughs, and ſprinkled her with it. When this ceremony was over, they all returned to the place whence they ſet out, but took care to make the young virgin walk backwards all the way (27).

(R) Conſtantine had, it ſeems, juſt taken the city of Marſeilles, and in it Herculus, his father in-law, who had ſworn his ruin; ſo that he was now enabled to reſume the purple which he had been forced to quit. And this being before his converſion, he went to pay his acknowledgment to Apollo, at this ſtately temple, which, upon many accounts, is ſuppoſed to have been that of Thoulouſe.

The ſame panegyriſt tells us, that there was another temple of that god at Autun, where there was likewiſe a ſpring of hot waters, which were uſed for the puniſhment of perjury, and which, though they ſent up a continual ſmoke, had neither ill taſte or ſmell, but were both pleaſant and wholſome.

(27) Idem ibid. Burchar. decret. l. xix. c. 5.

might be induced to believe, that there had been likewise an oracle of that god there, in imitation of that of Delphos; and that Constantine had been consulting it. But we would not lay too great stress on the swoln expressions of a panegyrist. However that be, as Apollo was the same deity with the sun, the Gauls worshipped him under several names and different forms. He is sometimes called Apollo, Belenus, and Abellion, which signify fair; sometimes by the Persic name of Mithras; sometimes that of Pennius, of which we have spoken under that of Jupiter; and at other times Dolichenus. We shall not trouble ourselves with diving for fresh etymons of all those names, which may, perhaps, have risen from the places where he was more particularly worshipped, or from other circumstances not now to be come at. He was generally represented youthful, naked, with a radiant crown, or golden tresses *. In some antient bustoes found of him, as well as in some ancient coins, he is represented with a pole or ring (S), and a link of a chain fastened to his scull, by which he was, it is supposed, suspended to the roof, in imitation of the sun, whom they fancied to be suspended by a golden chain †. But, after all, might not such hanging figures of that deity have been the effects of some vows which the Gauls and others used to make to that deity in time of sickness; and who, upon their recovery, hung up the promised figures in his temple, without any regard to the ridiculous notion above-mentioned? One head of his was dug up at the castle of Polignac, which place is supposed to have been so called from Apollo, and is still there to be seen against the wall that surrounds it. It is but ill carved, on a bluish stone, butween four and five feet in height and breadth, and is

(S) To understand what the antients meant by these kinds of poles, we must have recourse to Diodorus Siculus, who is the only one that has given us any light into it, and who, speaking of Alexander's funeral procession from Babylon to Alexandria, tells us, that in the canopy which was over the car or herse, there was a pole so nicely wrought, that neither the roughness of the roads nor the jolting of the wheels could move it (28). Hence his interpreters have concluded this pole to have been a kind of hinge or ring, to which a certain number of springs were fastened, which kept the whole machine tight and immoveable (29). And hence it is supposed to have been called a pole, from the number of chains and springs which centered in it, to keep the hanging statue steady. But whether they have hit the point, we will not affirm.

ſurrounded, all over, with rays, which, when the ſun ſhines upon it, caſt a kind of golden or fiery luſtre, and ſhew that thoſe rays had been formerly gilt. What is remarkable in this antique is, that he is carved with his mouth wide open; from which it is concluded, to be here repreſented as delivering his anſwer [u]. And, truly, the druids were, by this time, become ſuch zealous mimics of the Greeks and Romans, that we need not doubt, but they had ſome one or more of theſe oracles among them, though we could not find any other footſteps of it. There is an inſcription in this temple of Polignac, out of which the head above-mentioned had been taken, which the antiquary above quoted judges to have been put up by the emperor Claudius, who has of Lyons, and conſequently had lived in the neighbourhood of this caſtle, and had been there, perhaps, either to conſult the oracle, or, more probably, to pray to that god for the recovery of his health, as he was a very ſickly prince, when he cauſed his name and titles to be ſet up there. For Cæſar tells us, that even in his time the Gauls looked upon Apollo as the god of phyſic [w]; and another author adds [x], that the ſick perſons, that addreſſed themſelves to him for health, uſed to ſend thither that part of their body where the ailment was, carved out in wood, or caſt in braſs. At Marſeilles was found a ſtatue like that of a Roman warrior, armed cap-à-pé, about eleven or twelve feet high, and ſtanding on the crupper of a bull, between the belly of which, and the pedeſtal on which it ſtands, is carved an eagle, as it were, ſitting ſquat; and on the pedeſtal an inſcription, importing, that Octavius Paternus had dedicated it to the god Dolichenius. The bull and the eagle have made ſome antiquaries ſuppoſe that deity to have been Jupiter; but another author, often quoted in this ſection, has given ſome convincing proofs that it was Apollo: we ſhall refer the curious, for thoſe proofs, to the book itſelf [y], to prevent running into too great a length. All that needs to be added, with reſpect to this antique, is, that the name, which is a Greek one, and ſignifies, according to ſome, a hippodrome, according to others, the poſts that directed the races, ſeems to intimate, that Apollo was looked upon by the Gauls to preſide over thoſe exerciſes.

BUT the deity in greateſt veneration among the Gauls was Mercury. We have already given ſome reaſons for it in the Celtic hiſtory [z], Other deities had particular cities and pro- Mercury.

vinces where they were more particularly worshipped; but this, after he was adopted as the god not only of trade and commerce, of which he was antiently esteemed the author and chief promoter, in Gaul, but likewise of arts and sciences, of the highways and travellers, of pregnant women, and even of thieves and robbers, statues, altars, and temples, were erected to him every-where throughout this country. He is called, by several antient authors, Theutat, and Theutates [a], the signification of which name we have given, as well as that of Mercury, in the volume above quoted; and we need not doubt but they both meant the same deity, or that he was worshipped under both by the Gauls, since both are of Celtic extract, and expressive of the excellent notion they had of him upon both accounts (T). That

(T) To these two names, and those we mentioned in a former volume, we must add that of Ogmius; mentioned by Lucan, and which, tho' that author gives it to Hercules, by mistake, yet, in all appearance, belonged to Mercury. The description he gives of him, as he saw it in Gaul, being somewhat curious, tho' the humour of it be somewhat exaggerated, we shall give our English readers the substance of it.

" The Gauls, says he, call Hercules Ogmius, and represent him " as a decrepit old man, bald, and wrinkled, and weather-beaten, " like some old sailor. One would sooner take him for old Cha- " ron, or any one else, than for Hercules But if one considers " him with his lion's skin, the bow and quiver in his left, and the " club in his right, hand, he looks quite like a Hercules. What is " most curious is, that the good old man holds a multitude of peo- " ple tied to him by the ear; the chains are of gold and amber, " and, though very fine and slight, not one of them seems to strive " to break them, or even unwilling to follow him. On the con- " trary, they seem so pleased, and the chains so loose, that there " appears a visible eagerness in them to keep close to him. His " hands being both full, the painter has represented those chains as " fastened to a hole through Ogmius's tongue, whilst he looks back " smiling on his followers."

Lucan, having expressed his surprise at the oddness of the picture, introduces a Gaul accounting to him for it, in words to this effect: " You will cease to be surprised at it, when I tell you, that we " Gauls make Hercules the god of eloquence, contrary to the " Greeks, who give that honour to Mercury, who is so far inferior " to him in strength. We represent him as an old man, because " eloquence never shews itself so lively and strong as in the mouth " of old people. The relation which the ear hath to the tongue, " justifies the picture of the old man, who holds so many people fast

That of Theutat signifying the father of his people, they acknowledged him under that name, at first, as their founder; and afterwards boasted themselves to be sprung from him (V), in

" by his tongue; neither do we think it any affront to Hercules, to " paint him with his tongue bored; since, to tell you all in one " word, it was that which made him succeed in every thing; and " that it was by his wisdom that he subdued all hearts unto him." Thus far Lucan: and it is not easy to guess whether he was imposed upon by his Gaul, or whether he himself introduces this story as a burlesque upon the Gaulish nation, who depended so far on their strength and bravery, whilst they as much valued themselves upon their eloquence, as if they had excelled the world in it; and so expose themselves for their veneration for Hercules rather than Mercury. It is plain, however, that these slight and brittle chains, which held so many pleased captives fast by the ear to the tongue of the god, could not belong to Hercules in any case, but to Mercury, the god of eloquence; and, accordingly, attributed to him by the generality of antient mythologists. On the other hand, the club, the quiver, &c. were indifferently given to Mercury, to whom, we are told, Hercules consecrated them, after some successful fight against the giants (30). Accordingly, we read, that the emperor Commodus, who affected to appear at public shows in the habit of Mercury, used to wear the caduceus in his hand, whilst his officers carried the club, lion's skin, &c. before him. And, in giving these to that god, the meaning was plainly this, that where ever wisdom and eloquence were, there could be neither strength nor courage wanting; because the former was ever able either to procure, or, at the worst, to supply the want of, the latter.

Many other reasons might be assigned to prove, that this picture of Ogmius represented a Mercury, and not an Hercules; however Lucan came to give it to the latter (31), wherein he has been followed by the multitude of antiquaries. As for us, we think it unnecessary to dwell longer upon it, in a work of this nature; and those who rather chuse to follow that author, have a Hercules here as worshipped by the Gauls, under the name of Ogmius, or, rather, as joined into one with Mercury by them, as he was antiently by the Egyptians and other nations. But it is plain, Lucan had no mind to admit the latter amongst the Gaulish gods, when he makes him tell Jupiter, that he doth not know which way to summon these to the assembly; because, as he was a stranger to their language, he could neither understand them, nor be understood by them (32)

(V) We are told, that the famed Pythagoras, having passed over into Gaul, to learn the mysteries of the druids, was so taken with this notion of theirs, that he boasted the same descent, and that god

had

in imitation of the Thracian kings, who were another branch of the antient Celtes. Mercury was with them the god of riches[c]; no man could attain to them without his help; and hence he came to be confounded with Pluto, and to share in his honours and attributes; or, if we may be allowed to guess nearer to the truth, Mercury, being dead, became Pluto, the god of riches and of the lower regions; and hence both Gauls and Thracians claimed their descent from these two deities, after they had, by length of time, split them into two, in imitation of their neighbours. Some inscriptions shew, that not only Mercury, but even Venus and Mars, were reckoned among the infernal gods (W). As he was worshipped as their progenitor, he is often joined, in those statues and inscriptions erected to him, with the goddess Postverta, to assist women in labour. This goddess has much puzzled all mythologists, and may be only an epithet of Proserpine, whom, Strabo says, they worshipped as their mother[d] (X); or, perhaps of Diana, who had the same office. According to all these distinctions, one may reckon three Gaulish Mercuries, or rather the same god worshipped under three different titles, and represented in three different forms.

had promised to grant him whatever favour he should ask, except that of being made immortal (33).

(W) Diis infernis Veneri, Marti, & Mercurio sacrum (34). With relation to his being the god of riches, we find an antient witty inscription at Lyons, in Latin, to this effect: "Mercury pro-" mises you gain here, Apollo health, and Septumanus a lodging; " but he that brings his dinner with him, will fare the better. Af-" ter this, stranger, you must look out where to lodge (35)." As this city was one of the most trading ones in Europe, the scarcity of inns in it, at that time, might make the opulent and generous Septumanus give strangers this odd invitation.

(X) As she was supposed to assist women in labour, the names of Postverta, and Anteverta, might be given her on account of her turning the child to the right position for the birth. Those who make two goddesses of them think, that the one had power to remedy what was past, and the other to prevent what was to come. In one of those inscriptions, under a double busto, one of Mercury, and the other of that goddess, she is called Rosmerte; in some others it is Mercury, and Fort. Verte, or Fortuna Verte, or happy return; as he is often styled in others, Mercurio Negotiatori Nundinatori, &c. (36).

As

As the god of eloquence, he was represented in the manner we have described him from Lucan, in a late note, as an old man, with his bow, quiver, club, and lion's skin, holding a willing multitude chained to his tongue by their ears. As the god of merchants and travellers, he was represented naked, and without sex and beard, and with his winged cap, his caduceus, &c. He is under this head, likewise represented with a purse in one hand, and sometimes with a cornucopia in the other, and with wings on his heels, as the messenger of the gods. In some statues he has a crescent, over the wings of his cap, and was often joined with the moon in the Gallish worship; and that, probably, upon these two accounts: First, as the one was the dispenser of wealth, and the other the giver of fertility to the earth; and, secondly, as both presided over the highways, upon which account the latter was called Trivia; and both protected the roads, the travellers, thieves, shepherds, and shepherdesses [e], as he is affirmed to have followed their life; upon which account, these likewise offered sacrifices to him [f]. As an infernal deity, we conjecture him to have been represented with a beard; his winged cap rather resembled a disk, and instead of a caduceus, he held in one hand an odd kind of sceptre, and in the other a purse. His body was surrounded with a kind of imperial mantle, or Paludamentum, tyed, or fastened, by some ornament, on one of his shoulders. This we infer from an ancient monument, an account of which may be seen in the margin (Y), in the inscription of which he is styled Augustus. There have been many other conjectures offered, both concerning this ancient monument, and the title there given him, as well as ſome others, which are met with in thoſe old inſcriptions [g]; ſuch as that of Artaius, Ciſſonius, Arvernus, and ſome others, which we ſhall not tire our readers with: we ſhall likewiſe paſs by ſome other dreſſes and attitudes with which the luxuriant fancies of the Gauls have repreſented him, and only add, that from what we have obſerved of thoſe mounds in which the Gauls and Britons buried their dead, ſuch as thoſe we deſcribed on Saliſbury plain, and what Livy ſays of ſuch a kind of tumulus, or ſepulchral mount, which Scipio takes notice of in the neighbourhood of New Carthage in Spain, and which the natives called Mercury Tutat [h], one may draw a probable conjecture, that he was buried there. We have formerly ſhewn, that he reigned in Gaul [i], which comprehended then the greateſt part of Europe, and particularly Spain; and may be reaſonably therefore ſuppoſed to have been there interred, after the Celtic or Gauliſh manner. Other heaps or mounds there were, which likewiſe bore his name: but thoſe were of a different nature, as the reader may ſee in the next note (Z). How he was worſhipped

Three Mercuries among the Gauls.

(Y) This appears, from a large bas-relievo, between five and six feet long, and about three in breadth, and near two in thickness, dug up out of a gentleman's vineyard, near one of the gates of the city of Beauvais. The inscription is, Sacrum Mercurio Augusto C. Julius Healissus V S L M. It is plain, from some other inscriptions in Gruter, that a bearded Mercury was common in Gaul, tho' not among the Greeks and Romans; and the title Augustus, which we find in several antient medals given to other gods and goddesses, or rather to emperors and empresses deified under their names, inclines us to think, that this monument was dedicated to Mercury, after he had been deified by the Gauls, and reckoned among the infernal deities. Some distinction, doubtless, there must have been of his dress, &c. under this last denomination, and this seems the most likely to have been it; but it is here offered only as a probable conjecture.

(Z) Theſe laſt are known to have been heaps of ſtones, and other obſtacles, of which the highways were either cleared by his command; or in honour of him, as he was thought the god that preſided over them. Whenever, therefore, any traveller met with any ſuch, he took them up, and carried them till he found one of theſe heaps, which were in great numbers, and flung it in among the reſt; by which means they grew larger, and higher, and were called by his name (37)

The author of the vulgate verſion has alluded to this cuſtom, where he makes Solomon ſay (38) that "He who doth honour to "a fooliſh man, is like him that throws a ſtone in one of Mercury's "heaps." But the text in the original has no ſuch alluſion, but only compares the latter to one that binds a ſtone in a ſling. Theſe heaps were generaliy gathered up at ſome croſs ways, and placed where roads divided, and where there generally ſtood a terminus, or figure at half body; at the foot of which they threw thoſe ſtones (39).

Theſe ſerved, likewiſe, to remind people of the heavy curſes which this deity was thought to inflict on thoſe who abuſed travellers, or refuſed to put them in the right way (40). Their repre-

ſhipped by the Gauls under any one of theſe three denominations, is hard to gueſs; only as he was, in imitation of the Romans, deified as the god of traffick and riches, we may ſuppoſe they borrowed ſome of their rites from the worſhip which the Roman merchants paid to him there, and which is beautifully deſcribed by the poet [k], who cloſes his account of it with this reflection, that Mercury could not but be inclined to forgive all the cheats and perjuries of theſe his votaries, when he remembered how himſelf had been guilty of the like [l]. The chief victim, with which they concluded his feaſt, was a ſow with pig.

THESE were the chief male deities which we find worſhipped by the Gauls; ſome others they had likewiſe adopted, ſuch as Mithras, from the Perſians (A), Neptune, Erebus and Orcus, ſuppoſed both to be the ſame with Pluto; Bacchus, and ſome others, whom they adopted from the Greeks and Romans, concerning which we know very little, either of their worſhip, or of the notion which the Gauls had of them. As to their goddeſſes, the chief of them were, Diana or Luna, Juno, Minerva, Venus, Proſerpine, Arduina, whom we take to be Goddeſſes.

ſenting him of no ſex, as he was the god of commerce and riches, was, in all likelihood, to intimate, that neither of them were confined to either ſex, but that both had an equal title to his protection and bleſſing; and we may add, that it might be likewiſe done in a modeſt oppoſition to the Greeks and Romans, who repreſented him as ambiſex, and with a ſpear in one hand, and a diſtaff in the other (41).

(A) It appears from ſeveral antient monuments and inſcriptions, that Mithras, the Sun, and Mercury, were worſhipped, among the Gauls, as one and the ſame deity; at leaſt, Mithras being the ſun, among the Perſians, is often repreſented as conjoined with him, that is, with a ſun over his head, and ſometimes on his breaſt, and with this inſcription, Mercurio ſoli ſacrum. Hence the author of the Gauliſh religion has been at the pains to collect a number of other arguments to prove that thoſe two deities were looked upon here as one and the ſame, or, at moſt, as aſſociated both in their virtues, and in their worſhip. And might not this be on account of the great and conſtant nearneſs the two planets, which bear theſe names, have to each other (42)?

the moon, as we hinted a little higher, and Cybele, a ſtatue of which was dug up at Paris with a head crowned with a kind of hexagonal temple, and was particularly in great veneration in the city of Autun, and whoſe prieſts were, it ſeems, all caſtrated in honour of her (B), and from thence called Galli (C). Before

(B) This appears, from what we read in the acts of Syphorianus, a zealous chriſtian ſince ſainted, who, being brought before the governor of that city, for refuſing to worſhip her idol, on a day in which her ſtatue was carried about in proceſſion, alledged, among other reaſons for his refuſal, that he could not acknowledge a deity, whoſe myſteries and worſhip conſiſted in a ſhameful and unnatural caſtration. But whether theſe Galli, or prieſts, were Gauls, or ſent for from Phrygia, or elſewhere; or whether the Gauls, who appear to have had an abhorrence for all kinds of mutilations allowed of theſe Galli; or whether they did not rather belong only to the Romans, as ſome authors believe (43), we ſhall examine in the next note.

(C) That Cybele, or the mother of the gods, as ſhe is called, was a deity of Syrian, and not of Gallic, extract, is univerſally acknowledged. So that if her worſhip was introduced into Gaul, it was either by force, or in imitation of the Greeks and Romans. If we conſider their abhorrence to all mutilations, we ſhall hardly think that they could willingly give into ſuch a kind of worſhip as this, which required every prieſt, and encouraged every votary of the goddeſs to become an eunuch, as Heliogabalus is ſaid to have done, in one of his mad fits (44). We are, moreover, told, that thoſe Galli were had in ſuch abhorrence, that no other people would converſe with them; and that they were put upon the level with ſorcerers, gladiators, and hangmen (45); ſo that they had no other way of living, but by carrying their goddeſs about, and begging charity for her ſake; all which was moſt oppoſite to the genius of the Gallic nation.

Accordingly, St. Jerom has a paſſage which plainly intimates, that the Romans forced this emaſculated prieſthood upon the Gauls, and called thoſe eunuchs Galli, in order to fix a perpetual ignominy upon that nation, for having taken their metropolis, and beſieged their capitol (46). And we are told, by Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, that no Roman took that office upon him, but that they had a Phrygian male and female to perform it. This might be true, in part; and if what is reported of Heliogabalus, who became one of them, be to be credited, it will only ſhew, that he minded the laws and cuſtoms of Rome no more in this caſe, than he did in all others (47).

However

Before we close this section, it will be necessary to give our readers some account of the Gaulish druids, bards, &c. and of such of their doctrines and tenets as have not been yet touched upon, at least as far as we can gather them from ancient authors; for it cannot be expected, that we should know much concerning that set of men, considering that they made a mystery of their religion and philosophy, and a constant rule never to commit any thing relating to either to writing [m].

Their druids.

WE have already observed, that the order of the druids had the sole care of all religious matters which they so artfully and dextrously introduced into every other concern, both public and private, that nothing could be done without their appro-

However, St. Jerom seems to have been mistaken in his derivation of the word gallus and galli; which, if we may believe Pliny and other Roman authors, were so called from a river of that name in Phrygia (48); and, in particular, Ovid, who, probably, to expose the unnatural castration of these priests, tells us, that the waters of that river had such a dangerous quality, that whosoever drank of them did run stark mad (49). But be that as it will, the contemptible name of Gallus may well enough have been given to the Gauls by way of pun upon their national one, let those priests have been called so on any other account. So that, upon the whole, if any Gauls were ever seen in that office, they must needs be supposed to have been forced into it by their imperious conquerors: but, after all, this worship of Cybele, though established in Gaul, as well as in Rome, may yet, for aught appears, have been countenanced by the latter, and disaproved by the former.

Before we close this note, it will not be amiss to mention a noble testimony which a Roman writer gives of this aversion of the Gauls to mutiliation (50); where, having amply expatiated on their known valour and bravery, their contempt of difficulties and dangers, and even of death, he adds, "We never find any of them do, as some "of us do in Italy, cut off their thumbs, for fear of going to the "wars, and upon which account they call us in derision, Murci."

To understand the sting of this saying, it must be observed, that Murcia was reckoned, amongst the Romans, the goddess of cowards and idle fellows; whence her infamous votaries were called Murci (51). And from this shameful custom of cutting off their thumbs, to disqualify themselves for service, came the old Gallic word poltron, from pollex and trunco, which is still retained to this day, by many other nations besides the French.

bation [n]; and that this abſolute ſway of theirs laſted till at leaſt ſome time after their conqueſt by the Romans. They were called by ſeveral names (D), beſides that of druid, of which we have given the etymon in a former volume [o]. Their antiquity is looked upon of the ſame date with the brachmans of India, Perſia, the Chaldees of Babylon and Aſſyria, and, in a word, with the oldeſt ſects of philoſophers [p]. And, indeed conſidering their vaſt diſtance from each other, and the conformity of their doctrine, we can ſuppoſe no other but that they all received it from the ſame hand, viz. from Noah and his immediate deſcendants, and carried it each to the different places of their diſ-

(D) One of them was that of Semnothei (52), given to them, doubtleſs, on account of their greater veneration for, and knowledge of, the godhead. Diodorus Siculus gives them that of Saronides, on account of their great regard to ſuch old oaks as were decayed, and ſtripped of their bark; for that is the meaning of that word, according to Heſychius.

A Gauliſh antiquary, not content to derive that of druid from the Celtic dreow, an oak, compounds it with that and hud, inchantment; whence he infers the Greeks dryades to have come (53): but though they are charged, and that perhaps juſtly, to have uſed many ſuch practices, and in a moſt inhuman manner; yet it is not reaſonable to think, that they would add ſo odious a ſyllable to their name: neither can the Greeks or Romans be ſuppoſed to have done it, becauſe the monoſyllable, being Celtic, was unknown to them. Dryades was, therefore, no more than a Greek termination of the word druid.

The laſt name we ſhall take notice of was, that of Senani, which we hinted above was, probably, taken up by them as more pleaſing to the Romans, it properly ſignifying a wiſe or venerable man; as their druideſſes were called ſenoe, and ſenes (54). This was probably done in imitation of the ſect of gymnoſophiſts, who agreed with them in many things, particularly in having their ſocieties compoſed of males and females, like the Gauliſh druids, in ſtudying philoſophy, aſtrology, prying into futurity, living in celibacy, and the like (55). Theſe were by the Greeks called Semnones; the Gauls, among whom the mn was, and is ſtill, in many provinces, pronounced like nn, called them Sennones, and, in the Latin termination, Sennoni and Sennani.

perſion; for they can never be imagined to have communicated it to each other, as there could be no communication or commerce between them in thoſe early times; at leaſt the druids of Britain, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the next chapter, and from whom the Gauls received all their religion and philoſophy, cannot be ſuppoſed to have had it from any of theſe foreign ſects, to whom they were utterly unknown. The Gauls, tenacious as they were till their conqueſt, of their religion, laws, and cuſtoms, never belyed their origin, but owned themſelves to have received all from the Britiſh druids: thither they ſent their own to be inſtructed. Here was the grand ſeminary where they received their inſtruction, and here was the ſeat of the arch-druid, or head, and high-prieſt of their religion; to whom they appealed, as to their dernier reſort, in all doubtful and controverted caſes [q]. It were, therefore, abſurd to ſuppoſe, as ſome have done, either that theſe travelled into ſuch vaſt remote parts to learn their doctrines from the ſemnes of India, or any other ſects; or much leſs, as others too eagerly contend, that theſe travelled into Gaul and Britain to learn theirs from them. And it is much more reaſonable to derive that great reſemblance which is obſerved between them all, from thoſe antient times, when they were, in ſome meaſure, but one people, or great family; and that each carried, and carefully preſerved them in thoſe parts of the world where they ſettled themſelves (E).

AMONG other inſtances of the exceſſive power of the druidiſh tribe, Cæſar mentions one [r], by which we may gueſs at Their exceſſive power.

(E) Some antient Roman authors, ſuch as Cæſar, Valerius Maximus, Am. Marcellinus, &c. have indeed affirmed, that the druids learned their doctrines from Pythagoras; and the ſame ſome have affirmed of Numa (56), though he was of ſo much older date. But we have formerly obſerved, that Pythagoras had made a voyage into Gaul, and had learned a great deal of his from them, as he did alſo from the brachmans (57). The truth is, Pythagoras was in ſuch high eſteem, that no man was hardly eſteemed wiſe or learned that was not his diſciple (58). And the Gauliſh druids, being found to have many doctrines in common with him, were of courſe ſuppoſed to have received them from him. Though that of the tranſmigration of ſouls, which was likewiſe attributed to them, doth not appear to have been at all held by them, and it is likely that philoſopher brought them from thoſe of India.

the reſt, viz. that they choſe the annual magiſtrates of every city, who had that year the ſupreme authority, and ſometimes the title of king. And yet theſe could do nothing without their approbation and advice, not ſo much as call a council; ſo that, notwithſtanding their great pomp and ſtate, ſays another author, they were but the creatures and ſlaves of the druids [s]. They uſed the ſame arbitrary power in their courts of judicature, and all other caſes, and were every-where eſteemed as the chiefs of every Gauliſh commonwealth, and had the ſole management and inſtruction of youth in every thing but the training up in the art of war. For in this laſt reſpect, the druids, and their diſciples, were not only exempt from going to war unleſs they pleaſed, but from all kind of tribute likewiſe [t]; and this did not a little increaſe their credit with the people, as well as the number of their diſciples. For their order was not fixed to any particular families or nation of Gaul, but every man had power to ſtand candidate for it, and, if approved by the ſociety, was admitted into it. As for their grand druid, he was choſen from amongſt them by the plurality of votes; and, when any diſpute aroſe, it was often terminated here, as in other caſes, by the ſword, as we ſhall have occaſion to hint in the ſequel. We have already obſerved, that they made it a part of their religion not to commit any thing to writing, but to couch all their myſteries and learning in verſe; and theſe, it ſeems, were multiplied in time to ſuch a number, that it took ſome of them twenty whole years to learn them all by heart. And Cæſar aſſigns theſe two reaſons for this cuſtom, viz. that their doctrines might appear more myſterious, by being unknown to all but themſelves; and, ſecondly, that having no books to recur to, they might be the more careful to preſerve them in their memory [u]. And what contributed much to this laſt was, their living in ſeparate ſocieties, chiefly in woods, and obſerving a conſtant celibacy.

Their principles.

The three grand fundamentals of their religion conſiſted 1. In their worſhip of the gods; 2. In abſtaining from all evil; and, 3. In behaving with intrepidity upon all occaſions [x]. In order to enforce this laſt, on which they valued themſelves moſt, they taught the immortality of the ſoul, and a life after this, of bliſs or miſery, according as they had lived. And this inſpired them with incredible courage, and contempt of death, of which we ſhall give ſome pregnant inſtances in its due place. This notion of a future life was ſo firmly believed by the people, that we are told, they uſed to fling the account-books of the deceaſed into his grave, or, if he was burnt, into the fire, that he might make ſuch uſe of them in the next world, as would make his life more eaſy and comfortable there [y]. Several other ridiculous cuſtoms are recorded of them, with reſpect to this notion of a future life, which can hardly be credited, and which, for that reaſon, we ſhall juſt mention in the margin (F). They alſo pretended to great ſkill in ſome branches of geography and aſtronomy, ſuch as the knowledge of the bigneſs and form of the earth, the motions of the planets, their influence, and that of the ſtars; from which they aſſumed a knowledge of the divine will, to pry into futurity [z], and to foretel ſtrange events. And if that paſſage which Diodorus Siculus has preſerved to us out of Hecateus [a], and which the reader may find in the margin (G), be to be depended upon, and that the druids of Britain,

(F) They are ſaid to have lent and borrowed money, &c. in order to repay it in the next world; to have ſent letters to the deceaſed perſon, by flinging them into the fire, or into his grave (59). There have been found in thoſe antient ſepulchres, on Saliſbury plain, ſpoken of before, ſome ſmall plates of ſilver, and other metals, ingraved with a kind of old writing, which are ſuppoſed to have been ſent from the living to the dead by this conveyance. But theſe, and ſuch like ridiculous cuſtoms, ſeem rather invented by thoſe authors in diſparagement of the Gauliſh nation, and are juſtly laughed at (60).

(G) This paſſage is to the following purport: That there is, according to that author, a northern iſland of conſiderable bigneſs, little leſs than Sicily, ſituate over againſt the Celtæ, and inhabited by thoſe whom the Greeks call Hyperboreans. It is fruitful, pleaſant, and dedicated to Apollo; that god, for the ſpace of nineteen years, uſed to come and converſe with them, and, which is more remarkable, they could (as if they had the uſe of teleſcopes) ſhew the moon very near them, and diſcover therein mountains, &c. He concludes, that over their ſacred grove and temple there preſided a ſet of men called (by the then Greeks, it is ſuppoſed) Boreadæ, who were their prieſts and rulers.

From the author's deſcription and ſituation of this iſland, every body will eaſily perceive that it could be no other but either Great Britain or Ireland; for the Mona, or Angleſey of Rouland (61), is vaſtly too ſmall and inconſiderable to have been meant here. It is mentioned as known to the Greeks, as well it might, by means of the

tain, for that ſeems to be the iſland meant by that author, could, as with teleſcopes, ſhew the moon nearer, and diſcover therein mountains, rocks, &c. it cannot but be ſuppoſed that they had made greater progreſs in theſe arts and ſciences, than is generally imagined. The nineteen years converſe of Apollo, which is the cycle of the moon, and the notion of the moon's opacity, of its mountains, rocks, &c. argue them to have been no bad aſtronomers; and if they had really any inſtruments to draw the moon nearer, and make ſuch diſcoveries upon its ſurface, we may conclude them to have been pretty good artiſts for thoſe early times. Pliny adds, that they ſtudied natural philoſophy, and practiſed phyſic [b]. This laſt conſiſted chiefly in the knowledge and uſe of ſimples, but they ſoon found out a way to render it more intricate and myſterious, by intermingling aſtrology, and other ſuperſtitious traſh, amongſt it. The configuration of the planets muſt be conſulted, the herb muſt be gathered with one hand, and not with the other; the hand muſt be covered with the oppoſite lappet of the man's robe; he muſt be dreſſed in white, his feet waſhed and unſhod, and a great deal more to the ſame purpoſe; but all which rather betrays that author's fondneſs of expoſing the Gauls, than to inform mankind. To give one inſtance for all, the reader needs but hear what he ſays of their ſerpents egg, which, as it is related by him, would ſcarcely, upon any other account, be worth inſerting in this hiſtory, but that, whilſt we give him the ſubſtance of it in the margin (H), we ſhall endeavour to ſtrike out a more probable and advantageous meaning of this pretended piece of ſuperſtition, than that author could, or was, perhaps, willing to do.

Practiſe phyſic.

[b] Vide nat. hiſt. l. xxiv. & ſeq.

We

tin which the Phœnicians fetched from it, of which we ſhall ſpeak in due time. The author adds, that one Abaris, who became afterwards a diſciple of Pythagoras (62), went from hence into Greece, and contracted an intimacy with the Delians. And might he not be ſuppoſed to have followed that philoſopher from Gaul thither? But we ſubmit that to the reader.

(H) According to his fabulous account, this egg, which was unknown to the reſt of the world, was formed by the ſcum of a vaſt multitude of ſerpents twiſted and conjured up together. As ſoon as they began to hiſs, it was raiſed up into the air, and muſt be caught before it touched the ground; and he that caught it muſt immediately get on a fleet horſe, and ride for his life, from the fury of the ſerpents, which purſued him till a river ſtopped them ſhort.

The

WE muſt firſt take notice of an antient Gauliſh monument in the great cathedral of Paris, on which this ceremony of catching the egg is repreſented pretty near in the ſame manner as Pliny has given it. Another has been found in Italy [c], on which are carved two ſerpents, the one holding the egg in his mouth, and the other ſhaping and poliſhing it with its ſpittle. If the reader remembers what has been ſaid in the coſmogony of the world, at the entrance of this work [d], of the Phœnicians and Egyptians looking upon the egg to be the principle of all things; that it was repreſented as coming forth out of the mouth of a ſerpent, the emblem of the Godhead, or perhaps rather of wiſdom; and if we add what Plutarch obſerves, that the theology of the antients did aſcribe to the egg the priority of time, and the ſeed of all things; he will eaſily decypher a much ſublimer meaning in the mythology of this egg, than that Roman author could, or was perhaps willing to, ſee in it, either from thoſe emblematic monuments, or fabulous reports, from which he took his ridiculous account. For it muſt be further obſerved, that the druids were very fond of wrapping up all their learning, and

[d] Vol. i. p. 27, 34, 37.

The egg was then to be flung into the water, with a golden ring, which they faſtened about it, and muſt ſwim on the ſurface with it. Its virtues were then almoſt as numberleſs as thoſe of Fortunatus's cap, a great many of which our author mentions, as well as its colour and ſhape; and concludes with telling us, that the emperor Claudius cauſed a Gauliſh nobleman to be put to death merely for having been found with one of theſe eggs in his boſom, and which, it ſeems, he wore there with a view of gaining a law-ſuit in which he was engaged (63).

What increaſes our wonder of this ridiculous credulity is, that a modern author (64) has endeavoured to confirm, in a great meaſure, what Pliny has related, by aſſuring us, that in ſeveral parts of Dauphiné, eſpecially one place he names near the confines of Savoy, there is ſuch a prodigious concourſe of all kinds of ſerpents from the 5th of June to the 15th of Auguſt, that there is not one to be ſeen for the ſpace of ten miles round the place. He adds, that the ground where they aſſemble is left covered with a kind of ſcum, which fills one with horror. But he ſays, that no care had been taken to inquire after the ſtory of the egg, whether it was fact, or only an impoſture of the druids. If any thing could perſuade us that the antient Gauls could give into ſuch ridiculous ſuperſtitions, it would be the ſeeing of them ſo eaſily ſwallowed by the modern ones.

even moral precepts, in ſuch kinds of myſterious and enigmatic figures. However, we would not deny, but after their power came to dwindle, as it began to do from the coming in of the Romans, they might ſlacken apace from their antient purity, and make a trade of ſuch ſuperſtitious fooleries as they would have deſpiſed whilſt in the height of their wealth and ſway, when nothing could well tempt them to it. It is, doubtleſs, to theſe later times, that we muſt ſuppoſe the antient comedy, called Querulus, or Aulularia, which expoſes the druidiſh knavery with ſo much wit and ſharpneſs, to have referred to; and perhaps, alſo, that which another author ſays of them [e], that in their lectures of morality they gave this for a maxim, that the fertility of their fields depended upon their riches and the largeneſs of their revenues. One doctrine, he tells us, they taught, that fire and water would at length abſorb all things.

BEFORE we leave this ſubject, we muſt not omit ſaying ſomething of their famed druideſſes, and the great eſteem they were in among the Gauls, as well as among the Germans [f]. We have already ſhewed, that antiently the Gauliſh women bore a great ſway in this country, of which the druids, in time, ſtripped them; but it is likely, that the druideſſes held ſtill great part of their own credit, eſpecially on account of their being thought endowed with the ſpirit of prophecy; for we cannot find, that they were famed for any thing elſe; and ſome of them, we find, were among the loweſt rank of people. Witneſs Dioclefian's hoſteſs, who, when he was but a private man in the Roman army, then in Gaul, foretold him, that he ſhould become emperor after he had killed a boar, or, rather, Aper, as the iſſue ſhewed it [g], a little time after. We have ſeen likewiſe, in the Roman hiſtory, that their emperors were not above conſulting, and being adviſed by, them; particularly Severus [h] and Aurelian, the latter of whom aſking ſome of them how long the empire would laſt in his family, they made no difficulty to tell him boldly, that that of Claudius would one day become the moſt illuſtrious [i]. We ſhall not take upon us to inquire how they came by this extraordinary gift, or whether it was real, or a mere cheat and pretence; only we would obſerve, that the latter cannot be ſuppoſed, without allowing at the ſame time, that the druids themſelves were likewiſe impoſed upon by them; elſe it is not likely they would have allowed them to reign ſo long, and bear ſuch ſway in all religious and civil matters, contrary to the practice of the Indian brachmans, and other ſects of antient philoſophers, who never admitted their women into any of their myſteries [k]. There were three claſſes of druideſſes in Gaul, the chiefeſt of which was of thoſe who kept a perpetual virginity; for theſe were thought to have the ſpirit of prophecy. The next was that of thoſe, who, tho' married, were yet obliged to abſtain from the matrimonial intercourſe, except one ſingle time in the whole year, in which they were allowed to go and have children by them; after which, they returned to their office, which was, to aſſiſt the druids at their religious functions. The laſt were a kind of attendants, or ſervants, on the others; and this we learn rather from ſome antient monuments and inſcriptions [l], than from antient authors, who have ſaid little more of them than that they were propheteſſes. Both druids and druideſſes pretended to a great knowledge in aſtrology, calculated peoples nativities, erected figures, and foretold ſtrange things, both by that, and, much more, by their inhuman auguries: of which bloody cuſtom, we ſhall give a ſpecimen in the margin (I): but thoſe which were ſtyled propheteſſes, were thought to have a gift ſuperior to the reſt, and which was looked upon as ſupernatural; theſe were called by ſome ſuperior title, ſuch as that of dame

Three orders of them.

[k] Vide PLIN. ubi ſupr. TACIT. l. iv. STRAB. l. xv. [l] GRUTER. p. 62. Relig. des Gaul. l. i. c. 27.

(I) It appears, by comparing what antiquaries have been able to collect from ſome antient Gauliſh monuments concerning this bloody ceremony, with what Strabo ſays of it (65), as it was practiſed among the Cimbri, who were a branch of the old Celtes, that there was no material difference between them in this reſpect. We ſhall, therefore, give the purport of what that antient author has left us of it, which is as follows:

The druideſſes were, on theſe occaſions, like the druids, cloathed in white tunics, faſtened with hooks, and girt with a braſs girdle, and without ſhoes. As ſoon as the Cymbrians had taken any captives, theſe women flew upon them with drawn ſwords in their hands, and threw them down; thence they dragged them to a large capacious labrum, or ciſtern, by the ſide of which was a kind of foot-ſtool, on which the druideſs then officiating ſtood, who plunged a long knife into the breaſt of each of theſe unfortunate wretches, one after another, as faſt as they were brought; and from the flowing of their blood ſhe formed her predictions. The other druideſſes, who aſſiſted, took up the breathleſs bodies, opened and examined their entrails, and from thence likewiſe foretold ſome new things, which were immediately communicated to the whole army or council, and as readily believed.

was heretofore among us; and were in the higheſt requeſt, not only among their own people, but likewiſe among foreign nations. As for the others, they were much leſs regarded, and their night-aſſemblies about ponds and marſhes, to worſhip and conſult the moon, and ſome other ſorceries they pretended to uſe, made them be looked upon as downright witches, canibals, lamiæ, pythoniſſæ, ſtriæ, and every thing that is black and horrid, by chriſtian authors, from the ſixth century downwards [m].

The next order amongſt them, in great eſteem, was that of the bards. Some authors have, indeed, confounded them with the druids, and looked upon the former to be only a more modern name given to them. But there is a paſſage in Strabo which quite explodes that notion, where he ſays [n], that the druids were in the higheſt power, and gave laws to the vates, eubates, and bards, who were every-where to give them place, when they pleaſed to challenge it, and were not allowed to do any thing without their conſent and approbation. Beſides, we are told by that, and a number of other authors, that theſe bards were ſo called from their office, which was to ſing the praiſes of their heroes [o], and to accompany their ſongs with muſical inſtruments. And we are told, that their compoſitions were held in the higheſt eſteem, as the moſt effectual means of eternizing the memory of thoſe who had the merit or good fortune to be celebrated in them. One of the authors laſt quoted adds, that they could at any time put a ſtop to a whole army's engaging, by their interpoſition: ſo great a power had wiſdom and the muſes over thoſe barbarians [p]. It was their buſineſs to accompany the Gauliſh armies with their ſongs, which were generally calculated to inſpire them with valour and intrepidity, with the love of liberty, and contempt of death [q]. During the onſet, they uſed likewiſe to give ſome loud ſhouts, ſometimes as of victory, other times to intimate their danger, in caſe they did not fight valiantly, or were ready to give way. So that, though they did not really fight themſelves, they were ſo intermingled with the army, that they ran, in ſome meaſure, the ſame riſque with thoſe that did (K). By this means they were

(K) This may be inferred from what we read of one of them, named Pomponius, a man in great eſteem, both as a bard, and a poet; who finding himſelf in great danger from the enemy, made a vow to Mars, their great protector, to ſacrifice to him a boar, if he eſcaped were eye-witneſſes of the behaviour of the combatants, and either celebrated their praiſes in their ſongs, or cenſured thoſe that had not done their duty. And as theſe might in time degenerate, and be often bribed to extol thoſe who had been faulty, or in praiſing either too much or too little, for favour or intereſt, it is thought they acquired the name of paraſites[r]. But this ſeems very inconſiſtent with what we read of the great eſteem they were in, unleſs we allow that epithet to have antiently carried a more favourable meaning than it doth now (L). To theſe two orders we may add thoſe of the vates and euvates, or eubates, which ſeem to have been ſtill inferior to that of the bards; but whether they were ſo to each other, or the ſame under two names, is not eaſy to gueſs, with that little light we have from antient authors. All that can be conjectured upon the whole is, that the druids preſided over all religious matters, and bore a great ſway in thoſe of a civil nature. The bards were the recorders of all tranſactions, and treaſured up in their poetic compoſitions the knowledge of things and perſons, and communicated as much of it to the laity, by their ſongs, as the druids thought proper. The vates and euvates might be ſingers of theſe bardiſh compoſitions, and be further retained in the families of the great, to celebrate their praiſes and heroic acts; but as the druids were more known to ſtrangers than the reſt, their name was given to all indifferently, by antient hiſtorians.

Vates and euvates.

Diodorus and Cicero ſeem to mention a fifth ſort, viz. the ſaronides; but we have ſhewn, a little higher, that it was but another name for that of the druids, as the learned Bochart has eſcaped ſafe (66). It was likewiſe, as we formerly hinted, cuſtomary among their generals, upon all ſuch occaſions, to vow to that god all the plunder, and even the priſoners of war, if they came off victorious.

(L) This epithet, though by length of time become a term of reproach, might not carry ſo harſh a meaning in our author; if it had, it is hardly credible thoſe bards could have kept up their credit ſo long, and in ſo brave and warlike a nation. But, in our opinion, that name was given only to an inferior ſet of bards, who are judged to have been a kind of clients, or ſoldurii, who entered themſelves into the ſervice of ſome noblemen or generals, and bound themſelves to live and die with them, and whoſe buſineſs it was to ſing the praiſes of their patrons, in poems compoſed by the bards, before numerous crouds of people, who never failed to ſurround and liſten to them (67).

fully proved [a]. As for the flamens, or flamines, though they have been ſuppoſed to have belonged to the druidiſh order, yet biſhop Stillingfleet has frequently diſproved them to have been of Celtic or Gauliſh extract. They were of the Roman kind, and of much later date than either druids or bards. We have ſpoken of them in a former volume, and to that, and the learned prelate above quoted, we ſhall refer our readers, and cloſe this ſection of the Gauliſh religion with obſerving, that, in ſpite of all the ſevere edicts of the Roman and Chriſtian monarchs, there were ſtill very viſible traces of it, and of the very worſt part of the druidiſh rites practiſed, not only long after the ſettling of chriſtianity in Gaul, but even to the middle of the ſixth century, as appears by a notable inſtance of it, which we ſhall give in the margin (M).

The end of druidiſh ſuperſtition.

(M) This fact is taken from Procopius, who was himſelf an eye-witneſs of it, and is as follows: Theodebert I. having penetrated into Italy at the head of a conſiderable army, and taken poſſeſſion of the bridge of Pavia, his men offered in ſacrifice the wives and children of the Goths, whom they had ſurpriſed, and caſt their bodies into the river, as the firſt-fruits of that war. "For, ſays he, the Franks, "though chriſtians, do ſtill obſerve a great many of their antient "ſuperſtitions. They offer up human victims, and uſe many exe-"crable rites in their auguries." And another author, who lived till the latter end of the ſeventh century, has a long catalogue of ſuch ſuperſtitions, againſt which, as he was a biſhop, and ſince ſainted for his piety, he forewarns his chriſtian flock. The reader may ſee the paſſage at length in the authors quoted below (68).

SECT. IV.

Of the antiquity, government, laws, learning, arts, ſciences, commerce, and cuſtoms, of the antient Gauls.

WE have already ſpoken at large of the origin and antiquity of the Gauls, in the hiſtory of the Celtes, their anceſtors [a]; of their migrations and ſettlement in Europe, and of their antient monarchical government there [b]. How and when it came afterwards to dwindle, and ſplit itſelf into that variety of

forms in which the Romans found them afterwards, were in vain to inquire after, considering their inbred contempt of learning, and that they kept neither history nor records, but what was couched in the songs or ballads of their bards and druids, who kept them, as much as possible, from public knowledge, and only sung or repeated them on certain times, or upon particular occasions, rather to stimulate the people to an imitation of their heroes, than to preserve any regular series of their transactions. All that can be offered concerning this great change, would be only such conjectures as are obvious to every reader, which may, therefore, be easily spared here, since all our intelligence, concerning this their new government, must be fetched from hints and scraps of such foreign authors who have written of them, since they became more known to their neighbours, and of which this is the best account that can be given.

THE Gauls were by this time (though still under the same name, using the same language and customs, and governed by the same general laws) under different governments, some of which were monarchical, others aristocratical, others partly so, and partly democratical, and these were, by way of distinction, called free [c]. Tacitus reckons no less than sixty-four of these cities, or, as Cæsar better explains it [d], regions or districts, who were under this kind of government. These little commonwealths were chiefly governed by the advice of the nobles, but antiently every year they chose a magistrate for civil, and a general for military, affairs [e]; yet these, as well as those that were under a kingly government, observed one constant law, to call every year, at a certain time, a general council of the whole nation; in which, whatever related to the common interest of the whole nation, was debated and settled. And, indeed, these warlike people were in no small need of such a general council, since they made war one of their chief employments, and were no sooner free from a foreign one, but they immediately fell a quarrelling among themselves: so that, to prevent these intestine broils, the chief business of that grand assembly was, to find out some plausible pretence for carrying it against some of their neighbours, either to pull down those that were over-grown, and raised their jealousy, or to protect the oppressed, or furnish some allies with a number of auxiliaries, and such-like [f]. The free commonwealths had, moreover, a law common to them all, that whoever heard any report, or common rumour, among their borderers, which concerned the common interest, they were obliged to acquaint their magistrates with it, and to conceal it from the people. The magistrates were to conceal what they thought proper, and acquaint the people with the rest; for it was not lawful for any person to talk of matters that related to the whole community, but in the council [g]. All that can be gathered, relating to this grand assembly, out of the same historian, the reader may see in the subsequent note (A). Upon the whole, then, this grand council was the dernier resort of the Gauls, wherein every thing relating not only to peace and war, but to property, boundaries, territories, distribution of plunder, and such-like, between district and district, was finally determined. For if, for instance, after some successful victory, or excursion, any debate happened about the plunder, as it seldom failed to be followed with a great deal of bloodshed, if not timely prevented, and, if Polybius may be credited, such bloody frays did often happen for such trifles as the plunder of a good store of victuals, and especially of wine [h]; the dispute was referred to the assembly of the district, or commonwealth. But whenever it happened, as it often did, between district and district, the grand council must either determine between them, or else they were sure

Common-wealths.

(A) The Gauls, says that conqueror (1), demanded that a general council of their whole nation should be summoned, and that it might be done by his consent. A council was, accordingly, assembled at Bibracte, where was a vast concourse from all parts of the nation (2). And elsewhere he tells us, that he summoned that Gallish council to meet in the spring; and the Treviri, Senones, and Carnuti, not coming with the rest, he adjourned it to meet at Paris (3).

Among them who opposed his measures were Dumnorix, one of the chiefs of the Æduan commonwealth, against whom he had sent an order to have him slain, who, thereupon, applied himself to the council, alledging, that he was a member of a free commonwealth, and begged to be protected by them (4). Another was Vercingetorix, who, Cæsar says, flattered himself that he should be able to unite such commonwealths to him, as dissented from the rest of the Gallish cities, and to form such a general council of all Gaul, as the whole would should not be able to withstand (5).

This is all that we can meet with concerning those grand councils; but as to other particulars relating either to the extent of their power, the time, manner, and place, of their being summoned and held, and the like, history leaves us wholly in the dark to butcher one another, till one ſide was forced to give over. So that Tacitus had great reaſon to ſay of them, as he did of their neighbours the Germans; "If they will "not be in friendſhip with us, let them at leaſt fall out "among themſelves: fortune can do no greater ſervice, than "to ſet them at variance among themſelves [i]." All that needs be further added, with relation to theſe ſmall commonwealths, is, that they ſeem to have had ſuch an averſion to kingly government, that one of them, that of the Ædui (B), ordered the great Certillus, the father of Vercingetorix, mentioned a little higher, a man in great power and credit, and eſteemed the firſt man in Gaul, to be put to death, for having aſpired to the kingdom [k]. At the ſame time, they were ſo extremely jealous of each other's power, that they were obliged to enter into combinations againſt each other, and the little ones to put themſelves under the protection of the great ones; an inſtance of which we gave in the laſt note. Cæſar doth ſometimes call the former tributary and ſubject to the latter, but moſt commonly confederate with them. Upon his firſt entrance into Gaul he found it divided into two factions: the Ædui were at the head of one, and the Arverni at the head of the other; and both, he tells us, had for many years contended for the ſuperiority [l]. What increaſed the diſſenſion ſtill more, was, that the Bituriges, a people in the province of Berri, and neighbours of the Arverni, were ſtill in ſubjection to the Ædui; and the Sequani, who

(B) The Ædui were one of the three chief commonwealths in Gaul (6), and ſituate near Autun; the country is now called Lower Burgundy.

The other two were the Arverni and the Rhemi. The former of theſe were ſited on the river Loire; their capital was called Arvernum, now Clermont, the capital of Guienne; and they became, in time, ſo powerful, that, according to Strabo, they made war againſt Cæſar with 400000 men (7), and, a little before the arrival of their conqueror, had quite weakened their rivals the Ædui, by withdrawing moſt of their clients and dependents (8): and it was, probably, upon this juncture, that they condemned that great commander of theirs to loſe his head, and choſe his ſon in his ſtead.

The Rhemi were the antient inhabitants of the country of Rheims, whoſe antient and famous metropolis ſtill bears the ſame name, and is one of the greateſt, and moſt populous, cities of France.

lived in Upper Burgundy, now Franche Compté, and neighbours to the Ædui, were under the protection of the Arverni.

Kings. Such were the unhappy divisions between the Gaulish commonwealths (C), which gave so great an advantage to the Romans against them, and which they failed not to improve, according to their wonted policy, as we shall see in the sequel. Cæsar, finding the Arverni too strong for, and averse to, him, entered into an alliance with the Ædui, who were by this time become vastly inferior to them, complimenting them with the title of friends and brothers to the Roman people. Their example was soon followed by others, so that partly by cajoling some, and sowing jealousies and discords among others, he facilitated the conquest of that noble and warlike nation, which, had it been more united in interest and form of its government, must, in all appearance, have proved too hard for him.

But, notwithstanding this great multitude and variety of commonwealths, it is plain, that both Gaul, Germany, and Spain, still swarmed with petty kingdoms, that is, with districts governed by kings, whom the Romans styled reguli, or petty kings, but the Gauls styled kings (D), though their dominions

(C) Accordingly, we find the Senones, or rather the Semnones, who inhabited some part of the Lyonois, joining in league with that of the Parisians, and both soon after putting themselves under the protection of the Ædui. The Bellovaci, a very populous commonwealth, and in great repute and authority among the Belgæ (9), were likewise allied with them. Their capital, then a very considerable city, was called Bellovacum, and Cæsaromagus; their country still retains the name of Beauvois.

Cæsar reckons, moreover, five different people under the dominion of the Nervii (10), another antient, fierce, and warlike, people of Belgia, supposed to have dwelt in the now diocese of Cambray; these were the Centrones, or inhabitants of Courtray. Grudii, supposed to have dwelt about Bruges; the Lævaci, about Louvain; the Pleumosii, or Pleumasii, whose situation is uncertain; and the Gorduni, situate in the neighbourhood of Ghent. The Eburones and Condrusi, who lived in the territories of Liege and Namur, were clients to the Treviri, or inhabitants of the country of Triers, the then principal nation in Belgia prima. The Veneti, or inhabitants of Gallia Armorica, or Britany, composed so powerful a commonwealth, that our author (11) tells us, their dominion was one of the most extensive.

(D) The word rex seems plainly enough to be of Celtic extract, viz. from rhey, prince, or lord: hence we have shewed in a former volume (12), Rhea, Jove's mother, to have had that name given her,

minions were ever ſo ſmall. Theſe differed from the magiſtrates of commonwealths, in that they enjoyed their dignity during life; and from common monarchs, in that it was not hereditary (E), but ſometimes conferred by the people upon ſuch as were her, as implying a lady, or princeſs, as ſhe really was. The name of Rhey might therefore be given to thoſe antient monarchs, till their vaſt kingdom came to ſplit itſelf, as we have ſeen above, into ſo many petty principalities and commonwealths; at which time, it is probable, thoſe petty kings came to be called Tyrannes, or, according to the old Celtic, Tyr-rhamwir, from their being the perſons who divided the people into ſuch diſtricts, or communities, and ſettled the boundaries of each, as well as the portions of land which every family under them was to be intitled to. Hence the tyrannoi of the Greeks, and the word tyrant, might at firſt carry a much better meaning, till their degeneracy made it to become ſo odious, that they changed it for thoſe of princes, dukes, earls, &c. (13).

The author of the Mona antiqua, above quoted, thinks the name and office of theſe tyrans to be of much older date; and that, in all probability, ſome ſuch power or dignity is tacitly implied in one of the ſtatutes of the ſons of Noah, called de judiciis (14). We have formerly given our ſentiment concerning that rabbinic book (15), ſo much diſcredited by ſome, and ſo ſtrongly defended by our learned Selden. But, without having recourſe to ſuch queſtioned authorities, reaſon plainly tells us, that from the firſt diſperſion there muſt have been ſome ſuch Tyr-rhamwirs, or land-aſſigners, as the word implies, to prevent the continual quarrels that muſt inevitably happen for want of them. And theſe were moſt likely the heads of families, whoſe paternal authority carried a kind of divine right. For if mankind ſprung from one man, then the original of government muſt be ſuppoſed, of courſe, to have been not only monarchical, but ſuch by divine appointment, and veſted in the heads of families.

Moſes further obſerves (16), that the three families of Noah's ſons were, after the flood, divided after their tongues and families, begojchem, in their nations, that is, into ſeparate communities, over whom the chief, or head, preſided, and was the rhey, or lord, and tyr rhamwir, or aſſigner of their proper lands in each ſettlement. But however that be, in ſuch a change of government as here happened among the Celtes or Gauls, nothing can be more evident, than the neceſſity of ſuch a kind of deſpotic diſtributers and aſſigners of lands in each new kingdom or commonwealth; and who could be fitter for ſuch an office, than thoſe who bore the greateſt authority?

(E) At leaſt J. Cæſar mentions ſeveral eminent private men, whoſe anceſtors had been formerly inveſted with the regal dignity, and, among theſe, Caſticus, whoſe father had been many years were in the greatest esteem for justice, wisdom, and bravery. Sometimes they were forced by one nation upon another, as the Bituriges did one over the Celtæ, in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus [m]; sometimes a brave and powerful man forced himself upon the throne: and even those who seem to have come to the crown by succession, were far from being arbitrary, or having an unlimited power, but were as much accountable to the people as those that were chosen by them. This is, at least, what Ambiorix, king of the Eburones, owns, with relation to himself. "The constitution of our government, says "he, is such, that the people have no less power and authority "over me, than I have over them [n]." This form has been, indeed, much admired by Aristotle, Polybius, Cicero, and especially by Plato, as by far the safest and most excellent; because, as the last of these rightly observes, should kingly government be left without a bridle, when it hath attained the supreme power, as it stands upon such slippery ground, it easily falls into tyranny. "For this reason, says he, it ought to be "restrained, as with a curb, by the authority of the nobles, "and of such chosen men as the people have impowered for "that end and purpose [o].

Their power limited.

It is not easy to guess from Cesar's commentaries, from which we have the greatest part of this intelligence, either how many of these kingdoms there were in Gaul, or what nations were governed by them, and which by a commonwealth; but both were equally courted by the Romans, and for the same reason, viz. to withdraw from, and weaken the force of, those that opposed their conquests. These petty kings, especially, were often corrupted by dint of gifts, promises, or some fine titles, such as that of friends and confederates of Rome, to embroil the Gallish affairs, and foment dissensions among their little kingdoms and republics: even the poorest and most inconsiderable amongst them were thought worth their while to bring over to them; and if they found them busy and active in their interest, they failed not to reward them in such a manner as king of the Sequani (17); Piso, whose grandfather had reigned in Aquitania (18); and Tasgetius, whose ancestors had been kings of the Carnutes (19), and whose territories retain still the name of Chartrain. So that they seem rather to have been magistrates for life, than real kings, especially as their power is affirmed to have been limited by the people.

was moſt likely to draw others into the ſame treacherous practices. Among thoſe, whom Cæſar mentions among the friends and allies of Rome was Catamantales king of the Sequani [p], the grandfather of Piſo, mentioned a little higher, who reigned in Aquitain, and [q] whoſe name the conqueror has not thought fit to record; and Olevico, king of the Nitiobriges, or people of Agenois, who had that title beſtowed upon him by the Roman ſenate [r]. Among thoſe who made the nobleſt reſiſtance againſt the Romans, was Divitiacus, king of the Sueſſones, a brave people of Gallia Belgica, who was one of the moſt potent princes of all Gallia. His territories were large and fruitful: he had twelve conſiderable cities, one of which, Noviodunum, now Noyons, Cæſar afterwards reduced, and with it that whole nation, as we have elſewhere ſhewn [s], notwithſtanding they had brought 500000 fighting men againſt him. This prince's dominions is ſaid to have extended even to Little Britany. He was ſucceeded by Galba, at the time when Cæſar invaded them [t]. Thus much for the Gauliſh government, which we ſhall cloſe with a ſevere reflection which that conqueror makes upon it, and which will ſhew how much their inteſtine feuds contributed to his conqueſt of them. "Among the Gauls, ſays he [u], not "only all their cities, cantons, and diſtricts, but even almoſt "all families, are divided and torn by factions. Theſe are "generally cauſed and fomented by their princes and demagogues, who exerciſe a kind of arbitrary power and authority "over their inferiors and dependents, and manage all public "matters with an uncontroulable ſway." Tacitus obſerves much the ſame thing [w] of it; ſo that, in ſpite of all their bravery, their ruin ſeems no leſs than inevitable, when ſo torn and diſmembered from within, and invaded by ſuch powerful and politic enemies from without.

WHETHER theſe diſaſters were occaſioned through the want of a good body of laws, or through the neglect and violation of them, is not eaſy to determine. We have, indeed, obſerved, in a former volume, that Mercury is ſaid to have civilized the Celtic nation, in many reſpects, and, amongſt other things that he gave them a ſet of laws [x]. Another author gives the credit of this to one Samothes, a man of profound learning and wiſdom among them, and ſaid to have been the founder of the Celtic monarchy [y]. But what thoſe laws were, if any ſuch were, indeed, compiled for them, we are wholly in the dark. The Their laws.

druids and bards, who had the keeping and interpreting of them, were too cautious to divulge them to ſtrangers, or even to any of their own nation, except to thoſe of their own order; ſince they obſerved the ſame ſhyneſs with relation to all other branches of learning, which they carefully concealed from the people. But whatever that ſyſtem of laws may have been, it muſt have ſuffered a total change, upon the abolition of the monarchy, and the diſmembering of the whole into ſo many petty kingdoms and commonwealths. And, indeed, by all we can gather from Cæſar, or any other antient author, they ſeem ſo far from having been tyed by any common body of laws, that, except that of holding a general aſſembly every year, and another of permitting all private quarrels and conteſts to be decided by ſingle combat [z], which every community was obliged to permit, they rather appear to have been wholly governed by the deciſions of the council, whether of each diſtrict, or of the whole nation, unleſs where kings did bear an abſolute ſway, if any ſuch there were; for, as far as we can find, moſt of this ſort were as much ſubject to the people, as they to them. If we may, however, gueſs from ſome inſtances of their hiſtory, they ſeem to have held one general maxim, viz. that the longeſt ſword had the beſt title, and that it was the deſign of the ſupreme being that the ſtrongeſt ſhould ſtrip the weakeſt; and that he who had not power enough to defend his right, ought to yield it to him that was capable of taking it from him. The following inſtance, out of Livy †, is a pregnant oneth at this was an eſtabliſhed principle amongſt them.

They founded their right on their ſwords.

The Senones, of whom we have ſpoken a little higher; finding themſelves too much ſtraightened in their territories, fell foul upon the city of Cluſium, whoſe territories happened to lie very convenient for them; upon which, the beſieged applied to the Roman ſenate for help, who being, at that juncture, unwilling to enter into a war with the aggreſſors, contented themſelves with ſending them three young patricians of the Fabian family, in a friendly embaſſy to them. Theſe opened their commiſſion before the general aſſembly of the Gauls, which was, in ſubſtance to require the Senones to ceaſe all further hoſtilities againſt the Cluſians, otherwiſe the ſenate would be obliged, againſt their will, to ſupport the oppreſſed, againſt whom they could alledge no cauſe of complaint. To this the Gauls anſwered, with their uſual politeneſs, to the following effect; viz. that though they were not acquainted with the Romans, they could not but have a great notion of their bravery, ſeeing the Cluſians had implored their aſſiſtance under their preſent unhappy ſituation. "Your principals, continued they, having "choſen to ſend an embaſſy to us, rather than their forces to "ſupport their allies, we do not refuſe the peace which you "offer to us provided the Cluſians, who hold more lands than "they can cultivate, agree to yield ſome of them to us, who "are in want of them. This is the only condition upon which "we can make peace with you, and we deſire a poſitive anſwer "before your departure. If the Cluſians will not agree to it, "we are ready to give them battle, even now, before you, "that you may be able to inform your countrymen, how much "the Gauls are ſuperior to other nations, in point of bravery."

To this the embaſſadors replied, without ſeeming to underſtand the force of the laſt words, that they could not but look upon it as a piece of great injuſtice, to inſiſt upon a people's yielding the territories they were lawfully poſſeſſed of, and to wage war againſt them becauſe they refuſed to do ſo. Whereupon Brennus the Gauliſh leader, without farther ceremony, anſwered, that the Gauls carried the right at the point of their ſword; and that the brave had the beſt title to all things. "You yourſelves, ſaid he, have made no ſcruple to ſtrip the "Albans, Fidenates, Volſci, &c. of the greateſt part of their "territories; and yet you did nothing, in all this, that we pre"tend to cenſure, as either ſtrange, or unjuſt: for you did only "follow the prime and moſt antient of all laws, which ob"liges the weak to give way to the ſtrong. This law ſeems "to be derived from the deity itſelf, and extends down to the "very brutes, amongſt which, the ſtrongeſt naturally ſeek to "ſubdue the weakeſt. Ceaſe, then, to take the part of the "beſieged Cluſians, leſt the Gauls ſhould one day think them"ſelves obliged, in their turn, to ſhew the ſame compaſſion "towards thoſe whom you have oppreſſed." This was, indeed, an argument ad hominem, and ſuch as the Romans could never anſwer, but tacitly approved and followed, though they had not the ingenuity to own it, as the Gauls did, upon all ſuch occaſions (F). What the ſucceſs of this embaſſy was, is foreign to our preſent ſubject: we have given a full account of it

(F) A remarkable inſtance of this, we have in the ſame Gauliſh general, who having promiſed the Romans to raiſe the ſiege of the capitol, and to retire from them, upon condition they paid him a thouſand pounds weight of gold, when the money was brought to be weighed to him, ordered falſe weights to be made uſe of; and being aſked by the Roman tribune what he meant by them, proudly anſwered

it in a former volume [a], and only repeat it here to shew, by what laws this nation was chiefly governed, viz. that of the strongest arm; and that if ever they had any other laws, they suffered them to be superseded by this, which they falsly called the law of nature.

Neither was this maxim of theirs confined to foreign conquests, but extended itself to the decision of private right among themselves; for when any debates arose amongst them, about their possessions, about any injury or affront, given or received, especially among those of the better sort, in case the council or public magistrate did not give sentence to the satisfaction of both parties, they generally decided the point by single combat. Neither could their magistrates deny them that liberty, when once insisted upon by either party; nor could the opposite decline the challenge, without giving up the point, and being branded with ignominy. Antiently, indeed, that is, whilst the whole Gallish nation were under a monarchical government, the druids and bards, who, as we have formerly hinted, were the keepers and interpreters of their laws, and presided in all their courts and councils with such an uncontrouled sway, that it was the most dangerous thing to contravene their decisions, such disputes may have been, and, it is most likely, were actually decided by these courts and councils; but after they came to be separated into so many different governments, they began to look upon such subjection as a kind of outrage to their freedom and honour, and to substitute this way of single combat to it, not only as the shortest, but as the more honourable, and more answered him, "What should it mean, but woe to the conquered (19)?"

In like manner, a little before the battle which Marius gained over the Cimbri, another tribe of the Gauls, we find one of these sending a challenge to fight the stoutest of the Romans in single combat, and overcome by the brave L. Opimius (20). Soon after this, Bojorix, one of their kings, came in person to Marius's camp, and challenged him to appoint a day and place for a battle, there to decide their right to the territories they were then disputing about, pursuant to their general and received maxim, that providence was always on the side of the strongest and bravest (21). The same notion was common among the Germans, and was alledged by their king Ariovistus, who, having conquered the Sequani, told Julius Cæsar, that the right of conquest intitled the conqueror to use the conquered as he pleased (22).

agreeable to that received maxim of theirs, that providence was engaged to ſide with the right party; and that ſucceſs was a ſure token that the conqueror had the beſt title to the thing in diſpute. And as the party who thought himſelf injured had a right to appeal to this way of duel, to juſtify his diſſatisfaction, even though the king himſelf had given ſentence againſt him, and his opponent was obliged to ſubmit to it; ſo if the caſe of the two contenders was ſo intricate, that the judges could not readily determine it, they uſed to adjudge them to this method of ending the conteſt. Even the very witneſſes, if their depoſitions chanced to contradict each other, were obliged to clear themſelves by fighting. In a word, whatever was decided by ſingle combat, was looked upon as of greater weight and authority than any ſentence, that was paſſed either by king, or court of judicature. Accordingly, we read of two contending brothers in Spain, between whom Scipio would fain have compromiſed their diſpute about the ſucceſſion, who told him, with one accord, that they would ſubmit to no judgment, either of God or man, but to that of Mars [b]. Herodotus, who often confounds the Scythians with the Celtes, tells us, that they were wont to keep, and ſhew to the ſtrangers, that travelled through their countries, the heads of thoſe whom they had thus overcome in ſingle combat, in quarrels about property, honour, and ſuch-like [c]. The ſame cuſtom was alſo practiſed among the Germans, who are reported to have lulled Varro aſleep, by complimenting him with having found out means to end quarrels and diſputes by the way of juſtice, which they were wont to decide by the ſword [d].

To ſuch a degree of fondneſs for theſe ſingle combats were Strange they grown, that the very candidates for places of honour and fontineſs truſt, when their pretenſions or merit were eſteemed nearly for duels. equal, had recourſe to it; and even among the druids themſelves, the choice of a chief, when the old one died, was often decided by it, whenever any diſpute aroſe about the number or validity of the votes of thoſe who had the chuſing of him [e]. And, what was ſtill more prodigious, theſe challenges were often ſent for mere punctilios and trifling piques, eſpecially at their feaſts and drunken revels, and many times but of mere oſtentation, and to make parade of their ſtrength and bravery; of which, the two following are pregnant inſtances, and plainly ſhew how tenacious they were of this general law of deciding all controverſies by the ſword. Livy, ſpeaking of the funeral obſequies which Scipio Africanus performed to the memory of his father and uncle, who both died in the Spaniſh wars, tells us, that there came vaſt crouds of perſons of diſtinction to Carthagena, a city in Spain, ſaid to have been built by Aſdrubal, to honour that ceremony by ſingle combats. "These, ſays he, did not "fight like the common gladiators, either by force, or for mo-"ney, but of their own accord, and free-will." Some were ſent thither by their princes, to diſplay their bravery, for the credit of their nation; others declared they came to do honour to their general. Some came to fight there out of oſtentation; and others becauſe they could not refuſe the challenge that was ſent to them. Amongſt them there were ſome, who having law-ſuits, or ſome controverſies with others, agreed among themſelves to put off the deciſion of them to this time and place, and with this condition, that the eſtate or thing in diſpute ſhould fall to the conqueror [f]. The other inſtance, which we have out of the ſame author [g], is of ſome Gauliſh mountaineers, who were generally looked upon as ſome of the rudeſt and fierceſt of that nation, whom Hannibal had taken priſoners; theſe the Carthaginian general ordered to be brought at the head of his army, and, having provided them with a ſufficient number of Gallic arms, offered them their liberty, upon condition that they ſhould engage in ſingle combat, and vanquiſh every man his antagoniſt; promiſing, moreover, that every victor ſhould be preſented with a horſe and a ſet of warlike accoutrements. This they readily accepted, and, in ſight of the whole army, fought with ſuch intrepid bravery, that the ſpectators knew not which to admire moſt, the victor, or the vanquiſhed (G).

(G) The Romans ſeem to have preſerved ſome ſuch barbarous cuſtom, at an antient temple of Diana, in the neighbourhood of Rome, where the high-prieſt was to be a fugitive ſlave, and could keep his dignity no longer, than he had the good luck to kill ſuch other fugitive ſlaves as came to diſpute it with him. Whoever killed him, was immediately declared his ſucceſſor, and continued in that office till another took it from him in the ſame way (23). But whether this cuſtom was introduced in imitation, or, rather, as ſeems moſt likely, in contempt, of the Gauliſh and Celtic duelling, we leave to our readers.

Some think, however, that when the Romans exchanged the old Italic religion for that of the Greeks, they thought fit to turn over that pontifical dignity to their ſlaves, which expoſed the owner of it to

ſuch

How long this duelling humour has been preſerved among ſome of our neighbours, and how little to their credit, in ſpite of their ſpecious pretence of honour, we need not here obſerve; their anceſtors, it is plain from their hiſtory, made war their chiefeſt trade and higheſt glory; and if they carried that favourite paſſion to exceſs, this may be ſaid, in extenuation of it, not only that the ſame warlike phrenſy reigned all over Europe, and far beyond, but, likewiſe, they were under a kind of neceſſity of indulging it to the utmoſt, in order to put a ſtop to the encroachments of a neighbouring nation, who aimed at no leſs than the enſlaving of all the world (H). No wonder, then, if in ſuch a caſe they uſed all poſſible means to inure themſelves to martial deeds, to inſpire their youth with a contempt of death, and thirſt after glory and liberty, and to prefer an honourable death to an ignominious ſlavery. This became, accordingly, ſuch a ſettled maxim among them, that they ſeemed to have no other concern in this world, than either to preſerve their liberty, or to avoid ſlavery by a noble death [h]. Whenever, therefore, we ſhall ſee their deſcendants encourage theſe kinds ſuch continual and dangerous inconveniencies (24). Caligula is reported to have put an end to it, by ſending an expert gladiator, who deprived him at once of his dignity and life (25).

(H) The Gauls, as well as Germans, Spaniards, &c. had the more reaſon to oppoſe the Romans, with all their might, becauſe they knew, by the experience of other nations, that where-ever theſe new conquerors got the better, they overturned their fundamental laws, put an end to all their public councils, gave them new governors and magiſtrates, diſarmed the people, loaded them with ſuch heavy taxes, and ſubjected them to ſuch a new form of government, as appeared to them intolerable.

To all theſe we may add a much greater inſtance of the Roman tyranny, which was, that when any of theſe brave nations, that had been unfortunately brought under their heavy yoke, did make any attempt, as it was natural and laudable in them to do, or were even but ſuſpected by their deſpotic maſters to have a deſign, to regain their liberty, they were ſure to be made ſuch dreadful examples to the reſt, as can hardly be mentioned without horror: we ſhall refer our readers to the Roman hiſtory, for numberleſs inſtances of their cruelty to thoſe brave nations, and only obſerve here, that nothing could more effectually inſpire ſuch a brave warlike one, as this of the Gauls, with a ſpirit of liberty, and deteſtation of the Roman tyranny, than thoſe diſmal cataſtrophies of their unfortunate neighbours, which they had before their eyes.

(24) Strabo, l. v. Gell. aut. amand. (25) Serv. in Æneid. vi. verſ. 136. Vide Pallatier. Hiſt. C. P. l. ii. c. 11.

of ſingle combats from the ſame laudable motives, we ſhall readily own them to follow in the ſteps of their warlike anceſtors. But if their views rather tend to rob other nations of their liberty, than to preſerve their own, they will be juſtly chargeable with having improved the Gallic ferocity, by the ſupperaddition of the Roman ambition and tyranny. But to return to the antient Gauls: They had ſuch a ſingular contempt of life, when not accompanied with liberty and martial deeds, that either upon the appearance of ſervitude, or incapacity of action thro' old age, wounds, or any chronic diſeaſes, they either put an end to their days, or elſe prevailed upon their friends to do it, eſteeming this laſt ſtate as much a kind of ſlavery, as falling into the hands of their enemies. In cities, when once they found themſelves ſo ſtraightly beſieged by their enemies, that they could hold out no longer, inſtead of thinking how to make the moſt honourable terms of capitulation, their chief care, many times, was, to put their wives and children to death, and then to kill one another, to avoid being led into ſlavery. In the field, when they were forced to make ſuch a haſty retreat, that they could not readily procure carriages for thoſe who were not able to follow them on foot, as the ſick, wounded, and the like; they made no ſcruple to diſpatch them out of hand. And this was ſo far from being reckoned a hardſhip on them, that it was what they begged, with the greateſt vehemence and earneſtneſs; of all which we have ſeen very many inſtances thro' the courſe of this work, and ſhall beg leave to add two more, very remarkable in their kind.

Signal inſtances of it.

THE firſt is of their famous, and, till then, ſucceſsful general, Brennus, who being dangerouſly wounded, in that unfortunate expedition which he undertook againſt Greece, and ſeeing his army deſtroyed, partly by the enemy, and partly by hunger, cold, and other accidents, called together the broken remnant of his troops, and adviſed them to chuſe Cichorius for their leader, who ſhould firſt diſpatch them, and all the ſick and wounded, and afterwards head them back into their own country. The thing was accordingly executed by him, and 20000 of thoſe unhappy wretches were put to death. Brennus, only, choſe to die by his own hands, as the moſt glorious death of the two, in his opinion [i]. The other is of thoſe Gauls, who, being on the eve of giving battle to Antigonus, and being threatened by their aruſpices with a total overthrow, went firſt and killed their wives and children, and then reſolutely marched to meet that glorious death, which their ſoothſayers had foretold to them [k]. With the ſame ſpirit of liberty did thoſe act, who were unfortunately taken priſoners by their enemies, before they had time to diſpatch themſelves: for if once the conqueror began to treat them as ſlaves, to load them with chains, or condemn them to hard labour, they ſeldom failed taking the firſt opportunity of putting an end to their ſlavery by a voluntary death; even the very loading them with chains, as was commonly uſed by all nations, has raiſed this ſpirit in them to ſuch a height, that they have ruſhed upon, and butchered, one another, by mutual conſent [l]. Neither was this love of liberty confined to the men, their women are no leſs famous for it in hiſtory; nor did they come ſhort of the Spartan, and other female heroines, but rather excelled them, in this deſperate kind of fury; inſomuch that, when they have perceived their men to give ground, they have ſallied out, armed with axes, and ſuch other weapons as came firſt to hand, and, with moſt hideous outcries, fallen foul both on the fugitives, and on their enemies; on the firſt, as betrayers of their country; and on the others, as invaders of their liberties. We ſhall give ſome remarkable inſtances of this female valour under the next head.

IN the mean time, it will not be improper to take notice of a judicious reflection which Strabo makes upon this exceſſive love of liberty, and contempt of death, which reigned among the Gauls, viz. that it did very much facilitate the conqueſt of that nation; becauſe their pouring thus furiouſly their numerous troops upon ſuch an experienced enemy as the Romans were, under Cæſar, their want of conduct and circumſpection, made them rather increaſe the number of the vanquiſhed, than ſtop the progreſs of the conqueror; whereas thoſe in Spain, by dividing their forces, and a prudent choice of the moſt advantageous grounds, and ſtrongeſt paſſes, and diſputing with them every ſuch place, inch by inch, made their conqueſt more difficult, and longer in completing [m]. This remark is certainly very juſt, and the Spaniards, by joining policy to their valour, did put off their ſlavery ſome few years longer; whereas the Gauls, truſting too much to their number and bravery, were more ſpeedily reduced: yet were the former wanting in a main point of politics, and as they were, like the Gauls, divided into ſo many petty ſtates, had they, like them, joined their forces againſt the common enemy, they might, in all likelihood, have baffled all the Roman valour and policy. For, as the ſame hiſtorian obſerves, in another place [n], it was by this way of conquering one little ſtate after another, that both Carthaginians, and, after them, the Romans, made themſelves maſters of that country.

This is not a proper place to inquire into the cauſes that occaſioned the loſs of liberty to the Gauliſh nation: it will more properly be done, when we have brought their hiſtory down to that ſad cataſtrophe. The point we are upon is, their valour, and love of their country, laws, and liberty, in which noble virtues no nation ever diſtinguiſhed themſelves more than this, or was more dreaded by the Romans for them. Witneſs that law which the latter made, and is recorded by ſeveral of their own writers [o], whereby all diſpenſations formerly granted to prieſts, old men, and invalids, were to be made void, in caſe they were threatened with any tumult or danger from the Gauls; which law is, moreover, taken notice of by Cicero [p], and by Cæſar himſelf [q]; ſo that there was a time when they were more afraid of the Gauliſh valour, than of any other nation, or even their neighbours the Germans, whoſe ſuperiors they proved themſelves ſo far in this point, that they forced their own colonies upon them beyond the Rhine, whenever their vaſt increaſe made their own territories too ſtraight for them. Tacitus doth, indeed, tell us, in his life of Agricola, that they were by that time very much degenerated from their antient valour; which is neither improbable, nor a great wonder, conſidering how many of their petty kings, and little ſtates, had been corrupted, partly by Roman gold, partly by pompous titles, and high promiſes, which introduced amongſt them luxury and indolence, haſtened on the loſs of their virtue and liberty, and turned them into traitors againſt the reſt of their countrymen. We ſhall beg leave, in juſtice to them, to conclude this article with a remarkable paſſage or two out of Juſtin, which are as follow [r]:

"The Gauls, finding their multitudes to increaſe ſo faſt, "that their lands could not afford them ſufficient ſuſtenance, "ſent out three hundred thouſand ſouls to ſeek for new habi- "tations: part of theſe ſettled in Italy, and theſe both took and "burnt the city of Rome; another part penetrated as far as the "ſhores of Dalmatia, and, having deſtroyed there an infinite "number of barbarians, ſettled themſelves at laſt in Pannonia. "A bold, hardy, and martial nation this, who ventured (next "after Hercules, who, by the like attempt, raiſed himſelf to "the higheſt pitch of reputation, and title to immortality) to

" croſs the almoſt inacceſſible rocks of the Alps, and places " ſcarcely paſſable through their exceſſive coldneſs; where, " having totally ſubdued the Pannonians, they waged war with " the neighbouring provinces for many years."-----And a little after,----" Being encouraged by their ſucceſs, others ſubdivided " their parties; ſome took their way to Græcia, ſome to Ma- " cedonia, deſtroying all before them with fire and ſword. " and ſo great a terror did the name of Gauls ſpread round " about them, that ſeveral kings, not in the leaſt threatened by " them, came of their own accord, and purchaſed their peace " with large ſums of money."---And in the very next book he adds, that, " So great was the fruitfulneſs of the Gauls at that " time, that they filled all Aſia with their ſwarms; inſomuch " that none of the eaſtern monarchs either ventured to make " war without a mercenary army of them, or, if driven " out of their kingdom, fled to any other but to them, for " refuge."

WE ſhall have the leſs room either to doubt of, or to wonder at, what we read in antient authors concerning the ſingular valour, and love of liberty, of the Gauliſh nation, if we conſider, that it was as remarkable in their women as in their men; ſo that both ſexes had it, in ſome meaſure, transfuſed in their blood; they ſucked it at the breaſt, and learned the firſt rudiments of it in the very nurſery. We have hinted a little higher, what pains theſe viragoes took to keep up their men from giving ground to the enemy, and with what intrepid fury they fell, indifferently, upon thoſe who turned their backs upon them, and upon thoſe who purſued them; we ſhall now, according to our promiſe, add ſome few inſtances more of this female bravery, from undoubted authority.

THE Ambrones, ſays Plutarch [s], a Gauliſh people, who Italy lived near the foot of the Alps, between Switzerland and Provence, having been defeated by Marius near Aix in Provence, were purſued by the Romans quite to their carriages: there they found the women armed with ſwords and hatchets, who, mingling themſelves with victors and vanquiſhed, did, with one hand, ſtrive to wrench their bucklers from them, and, with the other, to diſpatch them, and never let go their hold but with their lives. This might be imputed to their fury and deſpair; but when they found themſelves loſt beyond recovery, they ſent to demand of the conqueror three things (I); viz. firſt,

(I) Florus, in the place above quoted, attributes this cruelty to the Cimbrian women: theſe were another branch of the Gauliſh nation, firſt, Their liberty, that is, that they might not be condemned to ſlavery: ſecondly, That their chaſtity might be preſerved inviolate: and, thirdly, That they might be employed in the ſervice of the veſtals. Theſe conditions having been rejected by Marius, they were all found, on the next day, either hanging on trees, or wallowing in their own blood, with their children butchered by them, and by their own hands. We have given, in a former volume [t], another, and even more dreadful, inſtance of this female love of liberty in the Cimbrian women; the circumſtances of which are ſo ſhocking, that we hope we may ſave ourſelves the trouble of repeating them here. The ſame deſperate reſiſtance Julius Cæſar is reported to have met with from the Helvetian women, when, having defeated their huſbands, he came to take poſſeſſion of their camp and their baggage: for both the women, and their young ſons, defended themſelves to the laſt, chuſing rather to be cut in pieces, than to be carried into ſlavery [u]. The Dalmatian women are likewiſe reported to have ſet fire to their baggage, and to have thrown themſelves, and their children, into it; whilſt others hurried themſelves, and them, into the next river [w]. The ſame we read of thoſe of Iſtria, Illyrium, Spain, and other Gauliſh nations [x], as well as of thoſe of Germany, who retained more of the old Celtic ferocity than any of the reſt: of theſe laſt we ſhall give a remarkable inſtance, as they ſhewed this love of liberty, not in the heat of deſpair, but in cool blood; for a number of theſe being taken priſoners by the Romans, and ſcorning to be reduced to a ſtate of ſlavery, having it offered to their choice, whether they would be publicly ſold, or be maſſacred; did, unanimouſly, prefer the latter. The emperor, however, not taking them at their word, cauſed them to be expoſed to ſale; upon which they all ruſhed into a voluntary death; many of them having firſt ſent their children before, in the ſame way [y]. The ſame ſpirit may be ſaid to have run through all the deſcendants of the antient Celtes [z], and extended

even to their children. The author last quoted mentions a ſtripling in Spain, who, ſeeing his whole family taken priſoners, and having, by chance, ſtumbled upon a ſword, fulfilled the orders which his father had given him, to free them from their miſery, and put them all to death with it. He mentions, likewiſe, a woman, who ventured to free a number of other priſoners in the ſame way: ſo that we may conclude this article with what Oroſius ſays of the Gauliſh nation, when, ſpeaking of thoſe Iſtrian Gauls who choſe to burn themſelves, rather than capitulate with the beſiegers, he adds, that there was neither man, woman, nor child, that did not prefer death to ſlavery [a].

Their martial diſcipline.

WHAT their military diſcipline was, is hard to gueſs: by what we have hitherto ſeen, it ſeems to have been very imperfect; and their falling, in ſuch vaſt multitudes upon the enemy, with more fury than diſcretion, without either taking the advantage of the ground, or dividing their numerous hoſts as occaſion required, but truſting altogether on their numbers, and reinleſs bravery, ſufficiently ſhews them to have been greatly wanting in this reſpect: and this ſeems the true reaſon why they had ſuch ill ſucceſs, whenever they engaged with other nations, eſpecially the Romans. One might, at leaſt, have expected that thoſe continual wars which they waged with theſe laſt, and their being ſo conſtantly hired as auxiliaries, ſometimes by them, and oftener by other warlike people, would have, in time, rendered them the moſt expert nation in the art of war, conſidering their hereditary fierceneſs, intrepid valour, contempt of death, thirſt for glory and conqueſt, and their invincible dread of ſlavery; all which were ſo ſtrongly rooted in them by education (K), and continual exerciſe in martial deeds, as we have ſeen

[a] L. v. c. 14.

(K) Beſides what we have lately ſaid of their excellent way of training up, and inuring their youth to the military trade, we muſt remind our readers of an excellent method they learned of their anceſtors the Celtes, which was, to have their martial laws couched in ſome kind of verſes, or ſongs, ſet to proper tunes, and adorned with all the embelliſhments of rhetoric and poetry. Theſe the youth were obliged to learn by heart, and to ſing upon proper occaſions; ſo that they had learned all the rudiments of military diſcipline long before they were able to bear arms (27); and it is not unlikely that they likewiſe initiated them in the practice before that time.

In theſe ſongs, or poems, were, moreover, recorded, the actions of the great and brave, the victories which they gained over their enemies, the names of thoſe who ſignalized themſelves in them, and ſeen under the laſt article. But whether it were owing to their too tenacious fondneſs for their antient cuſtoms, or to a contempt of thoſe of other nations, their hiſtory plainly ſhews, that they never ſtrove to excel in foreign martial diſcipline. Their chief talent ſeems to have conſiſted, principally, in invading, rather than defending, in pouring in their numberleſs troops with incredible fury and ſpeed, and ſpreading terror where-ever they came; in ſurmounting all the difficulties, and enduring all the hardſhips that fell in their way, and falling upon their enemies with dreadful ſhouts, and deſperate eagerneſs, maintaining the combat with an intrepidity almoſt peculiar to them; and, when all theſe failed, as it often did, whenever they were engaged with troops that were better diſciplined, and trained up in all the politic arts, and ſtratagems of war; their laſt reſource was, to ſignalize their valour and love of liberty, by ſuch deſperate exits as thoſe we have lately hinted. Much of their ſucceſs was owing to their horſe and armed chariots, in both which reſpects they diſplayed ſuch a wonderful dexterity, as, joined to their bravery, ſeldom failed of doing conſiderable execution. When they came to be divided into ſmall kingdoms, and commonwealths, their method was, to divide their armies, in time of action, in the ſame manner, that the merit and proweſs, as well as the faults and miſbehaviour, of every nation and tribe, might be better known, and that every man might be thereby ſpurred to advance the honour of that to which he belonged. But this, though excellently well deſigned at firſt, was attended with great inconveniencies, and often threw things into confuſion, either for want of a general diſcipline, or through the the jealouſy and miſunderſtanding between their commanders, and eſpecially from the time the Romans undertook the conqueſt of Gaul, through the treachery of thoſe who had been corrupted by them.

the monuments which were erected in memory of them. For as theſe bards and ſongſters never committed any thing to writing, or (if they did, for their own ſakes, and the better remembering the vaſt number of ſuch pieces, which time, and their continual wars, muſt of courſe occaſion), yet they never let them go out of their keeping, they were wont to rear up monuments, which were nothing but rude heaps of huge ſtones, artfully, and by main ſtrength, laid one over another, without any inſcription: ſo that the people were obliged to have recourſe to thoſe poems for the meaning of theſe monumental heaps, of which the reader will find many inſtances in the authors quoted in the margin (28).

ONE thing more we muſt not omit, concerning their military diſcipline, which is, their extreme ſuperſtition, in which they ſeemed to outdo all other nations: they were very careful in obſerving the moon, in particular; and avoided, as much as poſſible, engaging the enemy before it was paſt the full. An eclipſe of it was looked upon as ſuch a bad omen, that no appearing advantage, how great ſoever, or, indeed, any thing but abſolute neceſſity, that is, nothing but their being attacked, and forced either to defend themſelves, or die, could induce them to fight; and then they did engage more like deſperadoes, than regular troops. They gave, moreover, particular heed to their druids and aruſpices, who, in their auguries, are branded with uſing ſome very inhuman ceremonies, of which we have given ſome hints in ſpeaking of their religion. If the augury promiſed them ſucceſs, thoſe diviners uſed to march before them with ſongs, and dances, and muſical inſtruments, until the onſet began; but if it proved otherwiſe, they forbore fighting, if poſſible, till they met with a more favourable one: and ſuch a ſway had this order of men amongſt them, that they have protracted, or even hindered, the fight, even at the very inſtant they were going to engage. But dreadful was their caſe, whenever they were forced to engage after a ſiniſter omen, or threatening augury; for then ſuch panic horror and deſpair reigned through their hoſts, that they rather ſtrove to avoid ſlavery by a ſpeedy death, than by a brave defence to annoy the enemy, and give the lye to their knaviſh aruſpices, and their conjuring tricks.

THEIR weapons and armour, as they were antiently in uſe among the Celtes, we have elſewhere given an account of [b]; but whether thro' a ſhow of bravery, or a contempt of thoſe which were more peculiar to other nations, we do not find they had any others in their wars with the Romans, but their bows and arrows, the ſword and lance, which laſt was either longer or ſhorter, according to their fancy, and the ſhield; and yet it was with theſe weapons that they performed ſuch aſtoniſhing feats, as made them, a long time, a terror to their enemies. They deſpiſed the helmet, cuiraſs, and other ſuch defenſive armour, and rather choſe to fight half, and ſome quite, naked. They were utter ſtrangers to thoſe machines which other nations uſed in ſieges; they had, indeed, learned the method of undermining, but they rather laid their chief ſtreſs on a briſk and fierce attack, which they began with throwing clouds of ſtones into the place, to clear the walls of their defendants; after which they ſcaled them, with the utmoſt fierceneſs and rapidity. This fierceneſs did often prove fatal to them, eſpecially when they have chanced to meet with a ſtout repulſe, as they frequently did, from the Romans; for, in all ſuch caſes, they loſt all their courage, and preſence of mind, and ſuffered themſelves to be butchered, without offering to make any defence. Thoſe who choſe rather to ſurrender, did lay down their arms, and preſented their left ſhoulder bare to the enemy, and the women their naked boſoms, in token of ſubmiſſion; after which, they ſcattered ſome of their money, plate, and fine cloaths, amongſt them, to bribe their conquerors. Theſe inſtances, however, of ſubmiſſion were but ſcarce and rare amongſt them, in compariſon of thoſe in which they preferred death to ſlavery. But we have, by this time, followed them long enough in that bloody tract; let us now take a view of them in their pacific excellencies, in their arts and ſciences, trade and navigation, &c.

Their language.

We begin with their language, which being univerſally allowed to have been the old Celtic, or Gomerian, of which we have given a full account in a former volume [c], we ſhall have the leſs to ſay of it here, except it be as far as relates to the changes it underwent, after it divided itſelf into as many dialects as the whole nation was into little eſtates. There is ſcarcely any doubt but this old Celtic was the common language ſpoken all over Europe. A modern author has not only given undeniable proofs of it, which, barely to abſtract, would carry us too far, and be thought perhaps, too dry a ſubject for the greateſt part of our readers; but he has further confirmed what we had formerly advanced as a probable conjecture, that the German language was originally a dialect of the old Celtic [d]. We ſhall have occaſion to mention ſome of his proofs, in the hiſtory of the antient Germans immediately following: in the mean time, ſo far as relates to the Gauls we are now treating of, it is manifeſt, that they all uſed this language, and that it was that ſame which is ſtill preſerved in ſeveral parts of Europe, particularly in Biſcay, Britany, Cornwal, and Wales, but no-where more purely than in North Wales.

What occaſioned this to be called in queſtion, by ſeveral learned men, was, that Julius Cæſar [e], in his diviſion of the Gauls into the Belgæ, Aquitani, and Celtæ, affirms, that they differed not only in their cuſtoms, but language. To which we may add what Strabo [f] and Ammianus Marcellinus [g] ſay of them, that they were not of one language, but differed a little from one another; or, as we take their meaning to be, uſed different dialects of the ſame language: for ſo it will appear plainly, to thoſe who ſhall take the pains to trace thoſe antient dialects to their true origin, as it was brought from the Gauls into our iſle, and is ſtill retained in its priſtine purity, in that part of it called North Wales, and compare it with thoſe alterations which it did, in time, undergo, in thoſe other parts of Europe where it is ſtill preſerved, though nothing ſo pure and unmixed, ſuch as are South Wales, Cornwal, Ireland, the iſles of Man and Angleſey, and ſome parts of the highlands of Scotland amongſt us, and in Britany, Biſcay, and ſome other parts of the continent: ſuch a ſcrutiny will eaſily diſcover, not only the true original mother from her ſpurious offspring, but the different chanels by which this odd and corrupt mixture conveyed itſelf into the latter. We formerly obſerved, that not only moſt of the modern European languages were manifeſtly dialects, more or leſs diſtant, of this old Celtic or Gomerian, but that even the Greek and Latin, and other antient ones, had ſuch a ſurpriſing affinity with it, as if they had ſplit themſelves from the ſame block, and that very many of them plainly appeared to be of Celtic extract (L). We may add what Quintilian obſerves of the

(M) There is another proof of the antientneſs of this old Gomerian, or Celtic, viz. its ſimplicity, and near reſemblance to the Hebrew, and other primitive tongues, of which we have formerly ſpoken (32), and to which we ſhall only add an inſtance, to ſhew by what ſteps they came to adopt words of other languages to ſupply the poverty of theirs.

The antient Celtes, as well as their deſcendants the Gauls, were, as we have had frequent occaſion to ſhew (33), excellent horſemen great number of words and idioms from their conquerors, we might ſtill behold a much greater nearneſs between the Low Briton, Biſcayaneer, Iriſh, &c. and the pure North Welſh. So that the only reaſon why theſe laſt have retained it in ſuch purity, muſt be attributed to their never having been conquered, and thereby keeping themſelves from intermixture with other nations. Thus we find the Iſraelites, during their long abode in Egypt, preſerving their original Hebrew, which they ſuffered to be greatly corrupted, and, amongſt a great part of them, almoſt loſt in a ſeventy years captivity. Now, as it is univerſally allowed, that moſt of the Aſiatic tongues, ſuch as the Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Armenian, &c. borrowed moſt of their radical or primitive words from the Hebrew, ſo this old Celtic or Gomerian, which was the language of Gomer and his deſcendants, who firſt inhabited Europe, was the mother of moſt of the European languages, at leaſt as far as Scythia and Sarmatia, which were peopled by Gog and Magog, two other branches of Japhet's offspring: and as there is ſuch a vaſt affinity between thoſe two mother-tongues, we mean the Hebrew and Gomerian [i], or antient Celtic, it is not to be wondered, if we find the ſame reſemblance diffuſing itſelf through all their derivatives; ſuch as the High and Low Dutch, the Latin and Greek, the Arabic, Perſian, &c. and, particularly, between the Greek, Roman, and old Celtic, as the authors laſt quoted have ſufficiently ſhewed, as well as accounted for.

and

The notion of their ſpeaking Greek, explod.d.

WE have been the more particular on this ſubject, becauſe ſeveral learned men have maintained, that the Gauls commonly uſed the Greek tongue [k]. Nothing can be more wild, or more contrary to all that we meet with in antient authors concerning and charioteers; and yet the North Welſh, among whom the language is preſerved in its antient purity, had not, neither have they to this day, proper names for a bridle, ſaddle, ſtirrup, or ſpur, becauſe they antiently deſpiſed the uſe of them; but are forced to expreſs them by circumlocution; as a leading and a covering leather, for a bridle and ſaddle; a mounting and pricking iron, for a ſtirrup and ſpur. Theſe, and many more ſuch deficiencies there are in that language, which their neighbours the South Welſh, as well as the Britons, &c have ſupplied by Greek or Latin words: ſuch as that of ffrwn, frænum, for a bridle, &c. which the others would never adopt; though, in other points, they are now grown very remiſs in preſerving that antient tongue; and, if they go on, in the ſame neglect much longer, it is much to be feared, will ſuffer it to be intirely loſt.

the Gauliſh language, than ſuch an aſſumption, which may be eaſily overthrown, by one or two expreſs paſſages we meet with in Julius Cæſar. The one is, that in a conference which he had with Divitiacus, an Æduan or Gauliſh lord, he was obliged to make uſe of an interpreter; and yet Cæſar was a perfect maſter of the Greek [l]. The other, which is ſtill more expreſs, is, that when that conqueror found himſelf under a neceſſity to write to Quintus Cicero, who was then beſieged in his camp, he made uſe of the Greek tongue, leſt his letter ſhould fall into the hands of ſome of the Gauls, and diſcover his deſigns to them [m]; a precaution which would have been quite ridiculous, if that had been the common language of that nation. Strabo doth indeed tell us, that the Maſſilians cultivated all ſorts of polite literature, and, particularly, that of the Greek, to ſuch a degree, that the reſt of the Gauls were, by their example, become great admirers of that tongue, inſomuch, that they began to write their contracts and bargains in it [n]. But then it is plain, firſt, That he only ſpeaks of thoſe Gauls who were neighbours to Marſeilles, many of whom, not only private men, but whole cities, invited ſeveral learned men out of that famed city to inſtruct their youth, or ſent their children to be educated there: ſecondly, If the reſt of the Gauls did afterwards follow their example, it is plain they had originally another language of their own: and, thirdly, That this faſhion of learning and uſing the Greek tongue did not begin till Strabo's time. Accordingly, St. Jerom tells us, upon the authority of a paſſage which he has preſerved out of Varro, that the Maſſilians ſpoke three ſorts of languages, the Greek, Latin, and Gauliſh [o]. Hence we may conclude, that the Greek tongue was only introduced among the learned, but was not the original language of the Gauls. We might further confirm this from a number of antient monuments, and eſpecially from the antient names of provinces, cantons, rivers, cities, mountains, &c. but we think the caſe ſufficiently plain, without any ſuch further proofs. The Greek characters, indeed, were in uſe among them in Cæſar's time, as we ſhall hint under the next head; but as for their tongue, it plainly appears to have been brought into uſe much later ſtill, and that only among the learned and polite (N). As to the preſent language of that country, thoſe who

(N) There is, indeed, one paſſage in Cæſar's commentaries, from which ſome authors pretend to prove the contrary. It is that where who are ever ſo little ſkilled in antient ones, may eaſily perceive it to be a medley of other tongues, the greater half of which is taken from the Latin, as the Romans were very induſtrious to propagate it, and cultivate it, in all their conquered dominions (O). The reſt is plainly a mixture of the old Celtic, of the Frank or German, as this did afterwards greatly deviate from its original; and the reſt ſeems to be of Greek extraction. For it has been obſerved, by judicious men of that nation, that many Greek words have been adopted by them into common uſe, which were not borrowed from the academies of the druids, who, for aught that apppears, knew little of it, but from the ſchools of the Maſſilians we have lately ſpoken of.

The genius of their ſtyle, and language.

BEFORE we diſmiſs this article of the Gauliſh language, it will not be amiſs to make a ſhort remark on its pretended rudeneſs and harſhneſs, againſt which both Greek and Roman authors have raiſed ſuch an unanimous outcry. According to them, it was enough to hear a Celte or Gaul ſpeak, to make one judge of their natural ferocity; and the greateſt part of their words, where he affirms, that in all other public and private concerns, Græcis utuntur literis (34); which, compared with the explication which Strabo, who wrote after him, gives of it (35), ſeems to imply, that they made uſe not of their characters, but of their language. But to this it is anſwered, by two learned critics (36), that the word Græcis has been foiſted into Cæſar's text. And, indeed, it plainly appears, that Cæſar meant no more in this place, than that the druids did not ſuffer any of their doctrines or principles to be committed to writing, though, in other matters, they allowed them to write letters, accounts, and the like, which they did accordingly, in the Greek character, as we ſhall prove by and-by.

But whether the phraſe, uti literis, properly ſignifies to uſe the letters, or character, as it often doth among Latin authors; or, as others would have it, to uſe the language, as it may ſometimes do, though in a kind of figurative ſenſe; yet, in this place, if the word Græcis be really part of the text, it can only be meant of the character; elſe it would be abſurd in our hiſtorian, after he had ſaid a little higher, that the Gauls were unſkilled in the Greek, to ſay, that all their public and private accounts, tranſactions, &c. were written in that tongue.

(O) This plainly appears from what Valerius Maximus, Tacitus, and Auſonius, tell us, of their ſetting up ſchools at Autun, Lyons, Bizançon, and other places of that kingdom, as ſoon as they conquered them. And we need not doubt, but, according to their wonted lordlineſs over all their vaſſals, they uſed all proper means to encourage and oblige them to learn it especially of their proper names of men, women, towns, rivers, &c. were so very harsh, that they could not be pronounced by strangers, or written in other languages, without great difficulty; neither could they be inserted in a poem, without murdering the verse [p]. A foreigner could hardly hear them spoke without having his ears grated, or almost flayed with it [q]. The emperor Julian says, that it resembled the croaking of a raven, or the growling of some wild beast [r]. There must needs be allowed to be some exaggeration in these expressions, considering how uncouth and barbarous any language appears to those who are unaccustomed to, or ignorant of, it. It is not to be questioned, but even the French and Italian, emasculated as they have been of late, do appear so at first hearing: it must, however, be confessed, that, with respect to the German, there is less of the hyperbole; and perhaps the antient Gaulish might originally have a great deal of that kind of harshness, which guttural and some other hard consonants, as well as too great a colluvies of them, will naturally cause, unless softened by the interposition of vowels. We do not, therefore, pretend wholly to disculpate the latter, but would only observe, that there is a vast difference between those two languages in this respect; and that the true Celtic, or North Welsh, though seemingly crouded with a number of consonants, has yet a peculiar sweetness, and is much more adapted for music and poetry, than we are apt generally to imagine: and, for proof of this, we shall refer our readers to what has been said in a former volume [s]. And here it will not be amiss to remind them, that their custom of couching and preserving all their laws, records, history, &c. in verse, inured them to a style more swollen, figurative, and emphatic, than that of other nations (P); on the other hand, their fierce and warlike disposition might, in all probability, make them fonder both of that, and of their sonorous and masculine language, than of the smoother Greek and Roman prose. To which we may add, that their natural aversion for the Roman nation might not a little contribute to this opposition, especially as they had reason to consider all their sweetness of language, style, and behaviour, as so many snares to entrap people

(P) Hence the German poetry, which preserves still its antient roughness, is judiciously enough compared to those cataracts of the Nile, whose sounding falls are rather apt to inspire one with dread, than to afford pleasure to the hearers; and their swollen style to that of men that are ever mounted upon stilts.

out of their liberty. If we may believe Diodorus Siculus [t], their ſtyle was not only ſwollen, conciſe, and Laconic, but intricate and obſcure, full of ſynecdoches and hyperboles; which the reader will find, perhaps, better accounted for by what we ſhall ſay, in the ſequel, concerning their manners and cuſtoms; in which, as well as their loftineſs and pompouſneſs of ſtyle and language, they ſeem to have been more cloſely imitated by the Spaniards, than by any other European nation.

Their writing and characters.

THE Gauls had originally no characters of their own, but adopted, in proceſs of time, the Greek ones; yet, as we have already hinted, they did not do it till very late, and till their commerce with other nations obliged them to it; their contempt of foreign learning was a great obſtacle to it, and their druids or bards, whoſe intereſt it was to keep their own from the people, did all they could to improve this their prejudice againſt committing any thing of moment to writing, under pretence that it rather tended to deſtroy, than preſerve, the memory of them, as it was likely to be a kind of diſcouragement to them to learn them by heart out of their poetical compoſitions; whereas this laſt, they pretended, was the moſt effectual means of preſerving them, both from oblivion, and from falling into the hands of ſtrangers [u]; ſo that it was looked upon as a diſhonour for any of them to learn to read or write (Q). And even after they began to introduce the uſe of letters, in their contracts, bargains, and the like civil concerns, the druids never ſuffered them to commit any thing relating to their hiſtory, laws, and much leſs of their religion, to writing [w]. Hence Origen might well tell his antagoniſt [x], that he never heard of any of their writings; and hence that ſcarcity of materials we meet with, with relation to their hiſtory, ſince they committed all their learning, laws, religion, and tranſactions, to thoſe ſongs and verſes which they carefully kept from ſtrangers; and periſhed, in all likelihood, with their liberty, or, at leaſt, with their old heatheniſh religion, upon their embracing chriſtianity (R). It were to be wiſhed, that the chriſtian prieſts and monks had not imitated, ſo cloſely, this druidiſh policy, of confining all learning to their own order and monaſteries; eſpecially in Gaul and Germany: for they ſeem to have ſo well cultivated this prejudice againſt it, among the laity, that they were forced to have recourſe to them whenever any will, grant, or public act, was to be made; and then both the perſons concerned in it and the witneſſes ſet their own marks, and the ſcrivener their names to it. But, with reſpect to the mercantile part, among whom there was a kind of abſolute neceſſity to make uſe of writing, the Greek character ſeems to have been that which was in uſe amongſt them, according to Cæſar, Strabo, Pliny, and others, above quoted (S); and was brought amongſt them from Marſeilles,

(Q) Ælian has preſerved us a paſſage out of Andretion, to this purpoſe (37), that the antient Thracians, and, in general, all the barbarian nations, ſettled in Europe, were not only quite ignorant of letters, but had a ſingular contempt for them, though they were commonly uſed by thoſe that ſettled themſelves in Aſia. The ſame is affirmed of the Huns by Procopius (38); and this humour ſeems to have been ſo deeply rooted among them, that even Theoderic, king of Italy, could never be prevailed on to learn to write his own name, tho' he had ſpent a conſiderable part of his younger days among the Romans; but is reported, whenever he was obliged to ſign an edict, to have only made uſe of a golden plate, that had the four initial letters of it, Teod, engraven upon it, and which he traced with his pen (39).

(37) Var. hiſt. l. viii. c. 6. (38 Goth. l iv. c. 18. (39) Excerpt. auct. incog. ap. Valeſium, ad calc. Ammian. Marcel.

(R) It is probable, indeed, that upon their converſion to the goſpel, they might, by degrees, be ſo far ſhamed out of their ſuperſtitious fondneſs for concealing their laws, hiſtory, &c. that they might ſuffer them to be committed to writing from thenceforward: but as for thoſe hymns and poetic compoſitions, of which we are ſpeaking, it is not to be ſuppoſed, that they were ever preſerved, ſeeing both parties, that is, both the new converts, and thoſe who remained in their antient idolatry, were equally concerned to ſuppreſs them: the latter out of their natural zeal to conceal them, and the former on account of thoſe praiſes that were ſung in them to their falſe deities, heroes, &c. and of thoſe abominable and inhuman rites that were performed in the worſhip of them. Jornandes tells us, indeed, that thoſe, which were in uſe among the Gaths, were ſtill extant in his time. If they were, it is plain they have ſince periſhed, and, moſt probably, for the very reaſon juſt now aſſigned.

(S) We have obſerved, a little higher, that this paſſage is controverted by ſome learned men (q), who think that the word Græcis is interpolated in the place there quoted: however, as they do not ſubſtitute any other character to it, and ſome other paſſages ſeem expreſs, ſuch as the muſter-rolls, and ſome other public writings which were found amongſt them; we make no doubt, but the Greek were the firſt and chief letters in uſe amongſt them.

This carries ſuch an evidence with it, that the author of the religion of the Gauls, who makes theſe to have come originally out of Marſeilles, which was a colony of the Greeks, or Gallogreeks. How their conqueſt, and intercourſe among the Romans, did afterwards introduce their character amongſt them, is obvious to every one, and we need not dwell any longer upon it.

The probable origin of their poetry.

As to their poetry, as it is altogether loſt, we can ſay little of it; yet it will not be amiſs to mention an ingenious conjecture of a modern hiſtorian [y], who thinks that the want of learning and characters, or, as he expreſſes it, the reigning ignorance and contempt of letters, gave birth to thoſe poetical compoſitions, at leaſt in Europe. This was, indeed, the moſt effectual method to preſerve the memory of ſuch momentous truths and facts, as they either could not, or cared not to, commit to writing, and which, by this means, were not only eaſily learned, and remembered, but, likewiſe, concealed from other nations (T). And ſuch fondneſs did both Gauls and Germans conceive for theſe kinds of performances, eſpecially as they were ſet to

Phœnice, and to have brought their own character from Aſia into Europe; doth yet allow it undeniable, that they likewiſe uſed the Greek amongſt them: and to the authorities above quoted adds ſome others, taken from antient medals, and, particularly, an antique inſcription, whoſe legends are in the Gauliſh tongue, and Greek characters (41). So that if theſe be really as old, and as authentic, as he, and the authors from whom he has taken them, do ſuppoſe (42), there is not the leaſt room to doubt of thoſe letters having been in common uſe among the Gauls.

(T) This remark, however, is far from being deſigned to derogate from that purer and nobler origin, which pious chriſtians have given to this excellent art, viz. the love of the Supreme Being, and the contemplation of his attributes and works. But however true this laſt may be, with relation to the people of God, who ſo early, and ſo much, excelled all other nations in it, as we have fully ſhewn in a former volume (43), it can never be imagined to have been the caſe of the fierce Gauls and Germans, whoſe religion and genius was quite oppoſite to ſuch a ſuppoſition. As for thoſe who make Bacchus and Venus the parents of poetry, if they will but add Mars to it, they may be well enough allowed to have gueſſed righter, with reſpect to the nations we are here ſpeaking of; and though their compoſitions have not reached our times, we find reaſon enough to gueſs, from their tempers and diſpoſitions, their banquets and drunken revels, of which we ſhall ſpeak in its proper place, that great part of thoſe ſongs and poetic compoſitions owed their riſe to them.

proper tunes, that they ſeemed to reliſh nothing elſe, and ſhewed a natural contempt for thoſe of the profaic ſort. And this humour did ſtill prevail ſo ſtrongly, even ſo low as the ninth century, that when Lewis the Debonnaire undertook to have the Saxons inſtructed in the holy ſcriptures, he was obliged to employ one of their poets to put them into Saxon verſe [z]. The ſame was done by Ottofridus, with reſpect to the four goſpels, which he cauſed to be tranſlated into German, and put into verſe: for, as they could neither read, nor cared to learn, they conſented to learn them by heart, provided they were put into verſe, and ſet to muſic for them, and they permitted to ſing them on proper occaſions. Some ſuch compoſitions Charles the Great is ſaid to have found amongſt them, which were very antient and rude, and contained the wars and exploits of their antient kings, and which he cauſed, likewiſe, to be tranſcribed, for the ſame end [a]. We have already hinted, more than once, what were the chief ſubjects of thoſe antient poetic compoſitions: as to their metre, and other particulars relating to them, we are wholly in the dark, unleſs we gueſs at them by ſome of a more modern date; ſuch as thoſe which the author of Mona Antiqua has given us [b] out of Talieſin, who was poet laureat to Maelgwyn, about the time of Auſtin the monk's coming into England. But neither from theſe, nor from the character which antient authors have given us of the old Gauliſh language, can we conclude them to have been either ſmooth or elegant, except with reſpect to the loftineſs of their expreſſions and figures: yet would it not be fair to conclude, that they were all of the ſame kind; and we ſhould have framed but a very wrong idea of the Greek poetry, if we had had no other poems to judge by than thoſe of a Pindar, Lycophron, and ſome others of their bards.

Arts and ſciences. We need not here repeat what we obſerved, in the laſt ſection, concerning their ſkill in aſtronomy and geometry, from which we may juſtly infer, that if they were maſters of thoſe two ſciences, they muſt, of courſe, have cultivated many others, eſpecially ſuch as are depending on, or leading to, them; but to what a number, or degree, cannot be eaſily determined, any more than what new ones thoſe were which they afterwards learned from the Maſſilian ſages. As for arts, next to the military, which, though their great favourite, was but indifferently cultivated among them, as we have ſhewed above, eloquence was that wherein they prided themſelves moſt, and which, indeed, was moſt natural to them. They received, from their

infancy, moſt of their inſtructions from thoſe poems which were compoſed by the bards and druids; they heard them, upon all public occaſions, either read, or ſung; and as the greateſt part of them were of the heroic kind, ſo it inured them to a pompous and high-flown ſtyle. We have ſeen that they repreſented Mercury, the god of eloquence, with the ſymbols of Hercules, to ſhew what vaſt power that art had over them, above all others. Theſe emblems they ſeem to have taken from the Romans (V); and though they were ſo far from imitating them in their long-winded periods, flow and pompoſity of words and figures, but affected, in the main, a conciſe and nervous ſtyle, yet they could not forbear being taken with ſuch artful declamations and pieces of oratory. This is, at leaſt, what Cerealis, a Roman general, upbraided them with in Veſpaſian's time[c]; and Cato the cenſor tells us, that the Gauls made this eloquence, and exerciſe of arms, their chief ſtudy. And, indeed, nothing could be more natural, or neceſſary, in ſuch a country as this, where every little kingdom and commonwealth had its particular council, before which all matters relating to peace and war, and every matter, both public and private, was debated by the parties concerned, beſides the grand council of the whole nation, where the rights, privileges, pretenſions, and other concerns, of every private ſtate, were to be debated, and finally determined, as we have ſeen above. But, after all, we would not venture to affirm, that this art was equally cultivated all over Gaul; it is more likely, that theſe countries, which remained ſtill unconquered by the Romans, retained ſtill ſomething of their natural ferocity, and contempt for ſuch arts and ſciences as were moſt admired among foreign nations: and we may very well ſuppoſe, that the druids, where-ever they ſtill bore any ſway, did all they could to cheriſh this antipathy. And it is, perhaps, in order to leſſen this averſion, as well as to inſpire thoſe that were ſubdued, with a greater love of this art, that ſeveral emperors thought fit to found academies in ſeveral parts

(V) It is known, that the Romans, in all places of their public exerciſes, placed Mercury and Hercules in full view. The Greeks uſually ſet a Cupid between them, to ſhew, that love hath its origin from the other two, i. e. from ſtrength and eloquence (44); and we read, that the Megalopolitans had but one temple for thoſe two deities (45), or even repreſented them under one and the ſame emblem (46).

of Gaul, with conſiderable rewards and honours to thoſe who gained the prize of it. We are told, that that of Autun had, in Tiberius's time, 40000 ſtudents [d]: we read, beſides, that other public ſchools were erected at Lyons, Bourdeaux, Thouloufe, Narbonne, and other places, beſides that ſo famed one of Marſeilles, of which we have already ſpoken [e]. Hence we need not wonder, that this country has been ſince ſo celebrated for the great number of its rhetoricians and orators [f]; and if it has not been equally famous for their excellency in this kind, as for the number of them, it is becauſe it has happened here, as it doth every-where, and in moſt other ſtudies, many labour hard at them, but few are qualified for them [g].

Commerce. We have already taken notice, from the great regard they paid to the god Mercury, as he was the god of traffic, that they drove as great a commerce as any other nation. This is, moreover, proved, from a great number of antient inſcriptions, and, particularly, a famous one ſet up by the Paris merchants, and dedicated to Jupiter the good. The reader will ſee it in the margin (W), together with a hint or two of ſome curious conjectures,

(W) The inſcription runs thus: Tib. Caesare Avg. Jovi optvm. maxvm. m. navtae Parisiaci posvervnt. From the diſpoſition of ſome of the letters, which, for want of room at the end of the line, are put juſt under it, inſtead of beginning the next, our author ſuppoſes the Gauls to have had the antient way, which is aſcribed alſo to the Greeks, of writing βουστροφηδὸν, that is, as the oxen ploughed, backwards and forwards (47). He endeavours to confirm his notion by ſome antient coins, whoſe legend runs, in ſome, from the right to the left; and, in others, from the left to the right: we do not, however, mention it here, as if we were ſatisfied, that he has fully proved it from either, but only to excite our curious antiquaries to a fuller inquiry into it, from ſuch old coins and monuments as may fall into their way

Our author further pretends, that the Celtes, or antient Gauls, brought the Greek letters with them from Phœnice (48), contrary to the general conſent of antient authors, who affirm, that they borrowed them from the Greeks. As his arguments for it ſeem very far from concluſive to us, we have followed the current opinion, until ſomething more evident ſtrikes out from thoſe hints he has jectures, which a modern author has drawn from it, which would be too long for us to dwell upon. The whole country ſeems to have been divided into three eſtates, viz. the druids, with their underlings, the bards, &c. the nobles, and the mercantile part, which was, by far, the greateſt. The two former had their revenue partly from the latter, and partly from their own lands, and the ſpoils of war; and were ſo opulent, that riches ſeemed to flow upon them on all ſides, ſo that their chief buſineſs, eſpecially in time of peace, was to encourage arts and ſciences, as the beſt means to preſerve, if not to increaſe, their opulence. What ſeems moſt ſurpriſing, if what an antient author tells us may be depended upon, is, that ſome of the Gauliſh nations interdicted the uſe of gold and ſilver, which was to be all dedicated to Mars, and ſo become ſacred and inviolable; and allowed of no coin, but that which was made of copper and braſs [h]. The paſſage is too curious to be wholly omitted, eſpecially as it will convince the reader, that the war, which the Gauls waged againſt the temples of other nations, was not owing to their greedineſs after thoſe treaſures that were ſtored up in them, but from the averſion they had, in common with the Perſes, ſpoken of in a former volume, againſt all ſuch buildings, they being looked upon by both as derogatory to the Supreme Being, which cannot be confined within walls, but fills, with his preſence, both heaven and earth. We ſhall give the ſubſtance of this paſſage in the next note (X). But it is too likely, given us; which is far from being impoſſible, conſidering the difficulty there is to imagine how it was poſſible for the druids to retain in their heads ſuch a vaſt variety of the moſt copious and important ſubjects, by dint of memory, and without having ſome kind of books, or writings, to refreſh it, or to have recourſe to, when that failed; and how eaſily might they conceal ſuch a help, if any ſuch they had, as they did ſo many other things, from the reſt of the world?

(X) "Among the Gauls," ſays that author (49), "the Cordiſti" (he means the Scordiſci, of whom we have ſpoken in a former volume (50), as is plain by the ſequel) "do not ſuffer, to this day, "any gold to be brought into their country, tho' they make no "ſcruple to ravage other nations. They are a remnant of thoſe "who went to beſiege the temple of Delphos, under the conduct of "Brennus. Bathanatius cauſed them to be ſtopped on the banks "of the Danube, and forced them to ſettle in that neighbourhood; "and, from his name, they have called that voyage Bathanatia, likely, that this contempt of these two superior metals did vanish away, upon their becoming more acquainted with other nations, especially upon their becoming subject to the Romans; who, as we observed before, made no scruple to rifle those treasures [i], which, before that time, lay exposed to the wide world untouched, and, perhaps, to corrupt them into slavery with it, as Herodian reports them, and especially Severus, to have done by the German nation.

Hunting, and other exercises.

The Gauls, as well as all the other northern people, made hunting a considerable diversion; and, indeed, considering the vast forests which the country abounded with, and which bred vast multitudes of wild beasts, such as bears, wolves, wild boars, foxes, &c. (Y), if they had not made it their business to hunt and

"and his descendants Bathanates. The Scordisci consecrate all "their gold, and suffer none to use it in their country: but they "would do much better to proscribe their sacrileges, instead of "that metal; for it can be no credit to forbid the use of it, whilst "they commit so many unjust robberies to procure iron and copper; "for if they chance to be in want of these, they take up arms, and "lay them not down till they have got a sufficient supply."

Thus far Athenæus. And though he only mentions one nation of the Gauls, yet, if we remember what hath been said of their leaving their treasures of gold and silver, and consecrated to Mars, exposed in the open fields, especially those vast ones which were thrown into the lake of Thoulouse, and which consisted in ingots, and rich utensils of those metals; and that, according to Posidonius and Strabo, those treasures remained sacred and untouched; and if we add, to all this, what another author says, that the Gauls never shut their doors (51); we may safely conclude, that all the rest of the Gauls suffered no other use to be made of those metals, but to dedicate them to their deities, at least till such a time as the Romans, coming to plunder these asyla, as Cepio did that of Thoulouse (52), used those metals against them, lessened their veneration for the one, and made them set a greater value upon the other.

(Y) Cæsar (53), Pliny, and other authors (54), mention several other wild beasts which used to be hunted by the Gauls, of which we know nothing now but the names: and some of them, by the description there given us, seem to have been of a very strange kind, if there ever were any such in being: such are the alces, the bonasus, the wild ass, &c. The alces, according to Cæsar, had no joints in his legs, and was forced to sleep leaning against a tree.

and deſtroy them, they muſt, in time, have been over-run with them. But, beſides theſe, they hunted the elk, the deer, hare, and other harmleſs animals: they made, likewiſe, fowling a diverſion, and were, it ſeems, ſo dextrous at it, that they killed them flying, with a dart [k] thrown by hand, though they are likewiſe ſaid to have uſed the ſling, and the bow and arrow. We have, in a former ſection, taken notice of a way they had of poiſoning thoſe darts and arrows which they uſed in hunting, with the juice of a plant which they called, in their language, lineum, or limeum [l], which ſome have taken for ellebore [m], ſome the nightſhade. Strabo ſays, it was a kind of wild fig-tree, whoſe fruit, he had ſomewhere read, reſembled the Corinthian chapiter. The wound failed not, it ſeems, to kill the creature, and make its fleſh more ſweet and tender; but they took care to cut off that piece, and throw it away. The profeſſed huntſ-

The ſame animal is mentioned by Pliny and Solinus, without that particularity The bonaſſus, according to ſome authors (55), had a horſe's face, and the reſt reſembled a bull, its horns bending ſo far back, that there was no riding upon it.

Much the ſame wonders they relate of ſome of their birds, one ſort of which caſt ſuch a bright light from their feathers (56), that travellers made uſe of them to ſee their way in the darkeſt nights: but enough of theſe fictitious animals.

The real ones, not mentioned above, were, the wild bull, called urus, and which, Cæſar ſays (57), was a little leſs than the elephant, though it was not much bigger than a common bull; the elk, which was generally caught in traps, and, being tamed, could be taught to draw a chariot, or ſledge (58); the wild goat, of which there were then great quantities, and divers kinds; beſides badgers, otters, and other ſuch, not worth mentioning.

For all theſe kinds of creatures they had a breed of proper hounds, which they trained up to the ſport, and generally hunted on horſeback, unleſs it be ſome of thoſe creatures which chiefly lived among the rocks, and which they were forced to hunt on foot (59). So fond were they of their hounds, that the antient Burgundian laws obliged a man, publicly convicted of ſtealing one of them, to pay five ſhillings, one half to the owner, and the other to the public treaſury; and, if inſolvent, he was obliged to kiſs the dog's poſteriors (60).

men held a feaſt every year to Diana, and, among other offerings, each of them preſented her with a purſe, in which was a certain ſum for every beaſt they had taken during that year; ſuch as a farthing for every hare, a drachm for every fox, and ſo proportionally for the reſt. Their devotions being ended, they adjourned to a ſumptuous entertainment, and concluded the day with it [n]. Other exerciſes, of the manly kind, they were, likewiſe, very fond of. We have often obſerved, what excellent horſemen and charioteers they are ſaid to have been, above all other nations in Europe, which ſkill could not be attained but by dint of practice. Accordingly, we find, they had their hippodromes, horſe and chariot races, tilts and tournaments; at all which the bards aſſiſted, and, with their poems, ſongs, and muſical inſtruments, in which they celebrated the praiſes of thoſe who had formerly won the prize, inſpired the new candidates with a noble ardour to ſignalize themſelves upon all ſuch occaſions. And happy were they looked upon, who could obtain a place in thoſe records of fame. All their exerciſes in general tended to render them lighter, ſtronger, hardier, and long-winded; and we are told, that the youth were obliged to keep their belly within the compaſs of a girdle of a certain ſize, either by faſting, running, riding, ſwimming, or any other laborious diverſion: for if they grew fat enough to exceed the bounds of it, it was not only a diſgrace to them, but they were, likewiſe, fined for it [o]. Swimming was alſo an excellent expedient, not only to harden their bodies, but to fit them for paſſing the wideſt and rapideſt rivers; in which they were ſo very expert and famed, that they could croſs the Rhine, Danube, and Rhoſne, without breaking their ranks [p].

Feaſtings. THESE may be looked upon as ſome of their laudable and beneficial diverſions; but they had a moſt predominant one, which can ſcarcely be ranked in that claſs, and yet ſeemed generally to accompany all the other public ones, or, rather, the others ſerved only to introduce this; we mean their feaſtings, in which they were generally very profuſe, though very negligent in the order and decorum of them [q]. All their public aſſemblies and exerciſes, all their feaſts, birth-days, weddings, burials, and anniverſaries of them, were always accompanied with ſuch ſumptuous banquets, in which they intermixed with their good chear both vocal and inſtrumental muſic. bles, eſpecially, were moſt fond of them, becauſe their greatneſs and intereſt conſiſting chiefly in the number of their clients, vaſſals, and ſoldurii, there was not a more effectual way, either to ſecure the old, or procure new ones, but ſuch kinds of entertainments: for the Gauls, as well as the Germans and other northern nations, were ſuch exceſſive lovers of good eating and drinking, that nothing won their hearts more than theſe kinds of feaſts: and to what height theſe were carried, may be ſeen by ſome few inſtances we ſhall give in the margin (Z). To theſe feaſts, thoſe who were moſt famed for valour and wiſdom were always reckoned the chieſeſt gueſts, becauſe their example did bear the greateſt ſway in all ſuch elections. The reader may not be diſpleaſed, perhaps, to ſee a ſhort deſcription of theſe feaſts of the antient Gauls out of Poſidonius, who had himſelf been in that country: we ſhall give it in the margin (A).

It

(Z) We read of the famed Luernius, king of the Auvernians, and father of Bituitus, who was afterwards defeated by Fabius Maximus, that he made an incloſure of twelve furlongs ſquare, in which he entertained all comers, during ſeveral days, with all manner of exquiſite meats and liquors (61); and of one Ariamnes, who cauſed lodges to be erected upon the high roads, each of which could entertain four hundred perſons, and treated them in the ſame ſumptuous manner a whole year (62). Neither ſuffered they any ſtrangers, who happened to be at the place at the times of theſe feaſts, or were travelling that way, to paſs by without being invited, or even compelled to come, and take ſhare of them; and, if their time could not permit them to ſtay, they obliged them to drink a glaſs or two (63).

The following is a remarkable inſtance of their fondneſs for theſe entertainments: The ſame Luernius having given another ſuch feaſt, and invited a famed bard to come and ſing his praiſes, as it was uſual for them to do; the bard coming juſt at the latter end of it, was ſo deeply affected at the diſappointment, that he tried, in vain, to ſing out his deſigned panegyric: he was, at length, conſtrained to change it into deep lamentations, for being forced to take up with the reliques of ſo ſumptuous a banquet (64).

(A) According to him, their tables were very low; they eat but little bread, which was baked flat and hard, and eaſy to break into pieces; but devoured a great deal of fleſh, boiled, roaſted, and broiled, which they did in a very ſlovenly manner, holding the piece in their hands, and tearing it with their teeth. What they could not part by this way, they cut off with a little knife, which they carried in their girdle. When the company was numerous, the coryphee, or chief of the feaſt, who was either one of the richeſt,

It was likewiſe cuſtomary, to drink hard at theſe kinds of feaſts; yet it ſeems, according to the ſame author, that the coryphee, or head-gueſt, always began firſt, and put the cup, or rather pitcher, about to his next neighbour, till it had gone round: for, it ſeems, they all drank out of the ſame veſſel, and no man could drink till it came to his turn, nor refuſe when it did. And hence, in all probability, the cuſtom of drinking to one another, which was, it ſeems, common to the Perſians, Greeks, and Romans [r], as well as to the Scythians, Gauls, and northern people. The misfortune was, that at theſe feaſts they uſed to begin to talk of affairs as ſoon as the cups went round, and as they generally ſat at them till the next morning, they ſo heated themſelves with liquor, and wrangling, that they ſeldom ended without duels, the Gauls, ſays our author, ſetting ſo little value upon their lives. If the feaſt proved a peaceable one, it was generally accompanied not only with muſic and ſongs, as we obſerved above, but with dances, likewiſe, in which the dancers were armed cap-à-pé, and beat the meaſure, with their ſwords upon their ſhields. On certain feſtivals, likewiſe, ſuch as that of Mithras, they uſed to dreſs themſelves in the ſkins of ſuch beaſts as were dedicated to him, and accompany the proceſſions that were made on that day: others dreſſed themſelves in maſquerade habits, ſome of them very indecent, and played ſeveral antic and immodeſt tricks; and this cuſtom was retained ſo long among them, even ſince their converſion to chriſtianity, that ſome of their councils and biſhops not only cenſured and condemned them, but appointed faſts, and proper prayers, to be uſed on thoſe days [s], to divert them from that heatheniſh cuſtom.

or nobleſt, or braveſt, ſat in the middle, with the maſter of the houſe on his ſide: the reſt took their places next, each according to their rank, having their ſervants behind them, holding their ſhields. The guards had their table over-againſt them, and after their maſters had done, the ſervants were, likewiſe, regaled. He adds, that no one was allowed to eat of a diſh, till the coryphee had taſted of it (65).

Diodorus Siculus ſays, that the Gauls uſed to eat ſitting upon the ground, which was covered with ſkins of wolves and dogs; and the diſhes were brought by children of the family, or by other boys and girls. He adds, that near every table there was a ſtove, or fire-place, which abounded with ſpits, pots, pans, and other ſuch kitchen-furniture (66).

(65) Athen. l. iv. c. 13. (66) L. v.

THEIR chief liquors were beer and wine, the former the moſt common of the two; for they did not begin to cultivate the latter till very late. Strabo obſerves, of the Luſitanians, that one ſuch feaſt, as thoſe we have ſpoken of, uſed to exhauſt all the vintage of that year [t]; but, by degrees, they came to like it better, and left the beer to the Germans and northern nations, and made wine their chief liquor. Their martial temper inſpired them originally with ſuch contempt for agriculture, that they committed the care of it, at firſt, to their wives, old men, and ſlaves. The Germans and they are juſtly blamed for it by the Romans, and a great piece of pride and folly it was in them, to chuſe to purchaſe the conveniencies of life at the expence of blood and wounds, rather than by the ſweat of their brow [u]. But the ſame may be ſaid of all handicraft trades, which they looked upon as vaſtly below the care of a warlike nation; but one may ſay, in general, that when the Romans came to pour their conquering armies upon them, they forced them, by degrees, to procure thoſe things by their labour, which they were formerly wont to get, either by the ſword, or by commerce: neceſſity ſoon made them feel the ſweet of encouraging agriculture, and all other kinds of trades; and, by degrees, likewiſe of the liberal arts and ſciences; in both which branches they became, in time, as expert and famed as any other nation. So that one may ſafely look upon their conqueſt by the Romans to have been the mother of all theſe. Contempt of agriculture, &c.

WE ſhall conclude this ſection with a ſhort review of the other vices and virtues which are recorded as being peculiar to the antient Gauls. As for their vices, they are reducible to theſe three, which are attributed to them by the generality of antient writers, viz. drunkenneſs, lazineſs, and fierceneſs; all which we ſhall have the leſs occaſion to dwell upon, becauſe we have occaſionally given ſo many pregnant inſtances, in the courſe of their hiſtory. As for their drunkenneſs, we have given ſome inſtances of it in ſpeaking of their feaſtings; but we cannot ſee why that vice ſhould be reckoned more peculiar to them, than to their neighbours the Germans, who vaſtly exceeded them in it. Beſides theſe, Plato has given us a liſt of other people who were equally guilty of it, viz. the Lydians, Perſians, Carthaginians, Thracians, Scythians, and Spaniards [x]; and we need not direct our readers where to look for ſome others, who may juſtly come under the ſame cenſure. But the Gauls were more envied for their bravery, both by Greeks and Romans, and were, therefore, made oftener the ſub- Their vices. Drunkenneſs.

ject of their reflections. Accordingly Livy and Plutarch[y] pretend to have it from antient authors, that thoſe Gauls who lived near the Alps, having once taſted the Italian wine, became ſo enamoured with it, that they immediately reſolved to go and conquer that country. And Diodorus Siculus tells us, that they were ſo fond of that liquor, that they would give a man, that is, one of their ſlaves, for a gallon of wine[z]; which made the merchants very ready to furniſh ſuch cuſtomers with that beloved commodity, both from Greece and Italy. It is likewiſe pretended, that they were more than ordinary greedy of it, on account that it made them fight more courageouſly, or rather furiouſly, and more apt to deſpiſe all manner of dangers and fatigues; and yet, in fact, nothing is plainer, than that, if thoſe authors have not exaggerated their accounts, the Gauls could not encounter a worſe enemy than wine proved to them, upon all occaſions, ſince, according to them, it ſeldom failed throwing whole armies of them into diſorder and confuſion; and, which was ſtill worſe, by baiting them with ſome large quantities of that liquor, it either ſo overcame them, that they fell down dead-drunk, and expoſed, as it were, naked and defenceleſs, to their enemies, by which means they have been all cut in pieces; or, as it often happened, it ſet them a fighting one againſt another, ſo that they became an eaſier prey to them[a]. One would, therefore, be apt to think, that, after they had ſo oft and ſeverely ſmarted for their greedineſs, after that deſtructive liquor, their kings and generals would have made ſome wholſome prohibitions againſt ſo dangerous a cuſtom: and what may incline us to believe they did ſo, is, that though the Greek and Roman authors charge the whole Gauliſh people, in the lump, with this vice, yet the inſtances they give are but few, and happened ſometimes to one nation, ſometimes to another of them (B). However, though

(B) Thus, for inſtance, we are told, that thoſe Gauls who took the city of Rome, and thoſe who ravaged Greece, were moſtly cut off in their drunken revels (67). The ſame fate, we are told, overtook the Goths in Thrace (68); one ſort were defeated by Cyrus, in the ſame manner; and another by the Romans (69). But theſe are hardly more than ſingle inſtances, that happened to one tribe or other of them.

this abuſe has been ſomewhat exaggerated, yet we own, that there muſt have been ſome foundation for it, ſince Charles the great was forced to make ſome ſevere laws againſt it; one of which obliged the judges on the bench, and the pleaders to continue faſting; others, which forbad the forcing of any one to drink more than he cared for; others, which forbad the ſoldiers, whilſt in the field, to invite any man whatever to drink under pain of excommunication, and being condemned to drink water till they had been ſufficiently puniſhed for their fault [b]. This vice, it ſeems, was ſo univerſal, that even the Myſians, a kind of monkiſh tribe among the Scythians, who were obliged to abſtain from all fleſh, wine, and ſtrong liquors, had yet a way amongſt them of intoxicating themſelves by the ſmoke of ſome odoriferous weeds, ſomething, perhaps, of the nature of our tobacco, which made them exceeding chearful and merry, tho' without being attended with the ill effects which are commonly cauſed by exceſs of wine, &c. [c] (C).

THE lazineſs, imputed likewiſe to them, appears, by what we have ſaid a little higher, to have been rather owing to their pride, than to any diſlike they had to labour, under an honourable title: for it is plain, that in their exerciſes, as well as their wars, they accuſtomed themſelves to hardſhips and fatigues of any kind; ſo that if they neglected agriculture and handicraft trades, it was rather becauſe they looked upon them as a kind of ſlavery unbecoming their martial genius. And it was upon this account, that they ſo readily ruſhed upon any deſperate death, to avoid being taken priſoners, eſpecially by the Romans, who, they knew, were wont to make ſlaves of them, and condemn them to the hardeſt and meaneſt employments. And though, after their conqueſt, we have ſeen them take up with a laborious life, cultivate their lands, vineyards, and uſeful trades; yet the ſame ſpirit reigns ſtill among their gentry and nobility, both in Gaul and Germany, where they retain ſtill a Idleneſs.

(C) The ſame, we are told, was practiſed by the Scythians and Thracians, who had no wine (70). The men and women, it ſeems, ſat round a good fire, into which they threw theſe weeds: ſome call it a grain, or ſeed (71), the ſmoke of which they ſucked up in ſuch large draughts, that, in a little time, it ſet them all a laughing, dancing, and ſinging.

contempt for all the laborious and mercantile part, and chuſe rather to live in a ſhameful ſloth, and even poverty, than ſupport themſelves and families by any other way than that of arms. They even carry this punctilio of honour ſo far, as to look upon it as diſhonourable, to the laſt degree, for a nobleman, in how low circumſtances ſoever, to marry the daughter of a mechanic, or even merchant, though her fortune was ever ſo large, and capable of enriching him and his family.

Ferocity. As to their laſt vice, viz. their ferocity and cruelty, there will be the leſs occaſion to wonder at it, if we conſider, that they were brought up with a peculiar contempt of death: for how can it be expected they ſhould be tender of other peoples lives, that were ſo careleſs, and even laviſh, of their own? And if ſlavery appeared ſo terrible to them, that they preferred any death to it, might they not deem it a mercy in them, to maſſacre their priſoners of war, or ſacrifice them to their gods, rather than to make ſlaves of them? But we obſerved before, that this exceſſive love of liberty had made them look long ago upon other people, eſpecially upon the Romans, not only with a jealous eye, but inſpired them with an invincible hatred againſt them, and all whom they obſerved, like them, diligent and ſucceſsful in enſlaving other nations. And this might add not a little to their native fierceneſs, and to that cruelty with which they thought they ought to treat ſuch open invaders of public liberty, as well as thoſe who baſely aſſiſted them in it. This will appear leſs improbable, if we come now to examine ſome of thoſe ſocial virtues for which they were famed, even by the confeſſion of their enemies, ſuch as their hoſpitality, frugality, juſtice, and fidelity.

Their virtues and hoſpitality. It will, doubtleſs, be thought ſtrange, that a nation, ſo cruel to their enemies, and ſo touchy and fierce among themſelves, as to have recourſe to ſingle combat upon every trifling affront, ſhould yet be ſo famed for their hoſpitality and humanity, not only to ſtrangers but to ſuch as refuged themſelves among them; and yet they are highly cried up for this admirable virtue, both by Greek and Roman authors. It was, it ſeems, a conſtant cuſtom amongſt them, to invite their ſtrangers to all their feaſts, and, after it was over, to inquire who they were, and wherein they might be ſerved [d]. This was practiſed, according to the ſame author, by the very Celtiberians, who were looked upon as ſome of the cruelleſt among the Gauls, inſomuch, that they came in crowds to invite a traveller to their houſes; and happy was he thought whom he choſe for his hoſt: if he pitched upon one whoſe circumſtances would not permit him to afford him a very long entertainment, (for they generally treated them very ſumptuouſly) he always took care to turn him over to another that could do it. If any Gaul was convicted of having refuſed this courteſy to a ſtranger, he was not only looked upon with abhorrence by all his acquaintance, but fined by the magiſtrate: witneſs that law which was enacted among the Burgundians, which laid a fine of three crowns on all ſuch inhoſpitable delinquents; and one of double that ſum to any Burgundian that ſhould direct a ſtranger to the houſe of a Roman. In ſome other places they added a corporal puniſhment to the fine; and Tacitus doth that juſtice even to the German nation, as to give ſeveral inſtances of their tender regard to ſtrangers[g]: and Cæſar adds, that they eſteemed all ſuch perſons as ſacred and inviolable, and to whom every houſe was to be opened, and every table free [h]. They even conducted them from one territory to another, and puniſhed thoſe upon the ſpot, from whom they had received any damage, or ill treatment [i]. They even puniſhed the murder of a ſtranger more ſeverely than that of one of their own nation, viz. the former by death, and the latter by baniſhment. As for thoſe who took refuge amongſt the Gauls, and a more ſafe and ſtedfaſt ſanctuary they could not meet with in any other nation, they were ſure to be protected and maintained, according to their rank. Hence that great number of diſtreſſed kings, princes, and others, who fled thither, preferably to any other country, for refuge and defence, of which we have already had occaſion to ſpeak in ſome former ſections of this hiſtory; and with what faithfulneſs they were protected by them, may, out of many more inſtances, be inferred, from that which we ſhall give our readers in the margin (D), to avoid dwelling too long upon ſo known a ſubject.

(D) Toriſin, king of the Gepidæ, had a noble refugee at his court, named Ildiſgus, who had a lawful right to the crown of Lombardy, but had been excluded from it, after the death of king Waccs, by Aduin, who ſeized upon it. This laſt cauſed Ildiſgus to be demanded of the Gepidæ, and procured his demand to be backed by the emperor Juſtinian's embaſſadors. Toriſin, who had juſt concluded a peace with the Romans and Lombards, called a council of all his nobles, and acquainted them with Aduin's requeſt, and the danger he was in, if he refuſed. Upon this, that truly auguſt aſſembly unanimouſly agreed, that it were better that their whole nation, men, women, and children, ſhould periſh, than to give way to ſuch a ſacrilegious demand (72).

Fidelity and justice.

THESE instances are no less an argument of their justice and fidelity: the confidence which the emperors, princes, and commonwealths, placed in them, not only in courting their alliance and friendship, and in hiring great numbers of them as auxiliaries, but likewise in the former chusing them for their life-guards, is another proof of it. And if they could be thus faithful to even Roman emperors, such as Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Nero, Claudius, and others; we need not doubt of their being so to other nations, to whose service they had not such a natural reluctance: though it must be owned, that the Germans gained, in time, a greater degree of confidence in those monarchs than the Gauls had done; and, perhaps, on this very account, that they did not shew such natural aversion to the Roman yoke as the Gauls did, who took all opportunities that offered to shake it off. But before even the time of Augustus, we find the Gauls and Spaniards in great credit and trust with Juba, king of Mauritania [l], with Herod, king of Judæa [m], with Cleopatra [n], and with most princes far and near; an account of which hath been given in every proper place of this work. They have, indeed, been branded with the reverse vice, by several Greek and Roman historians [o]; and it must be owned, that they have sometimes receded from their fidelity, notwithstanding their valuing themselves so much upon it above all other nations; and we have formerly given several instances of it, though, for want of knowing what motives induced them to it, we have been obliged to condemn them for actions, which, if those authors had rightly informed us of the true springs of them, might have passed uncensured. Neither Greeks, Carthaginians, nor Romans, were famed for their strict adherence to their treaties, any more than scrupulous about the means of obtaining them: and Cæsar, for instance, has laid the blame on the Gaulish perfidy, which Cato has bravely retorted upon him [p]. And who knows what provocations they may have had, whenever they have departed from their usual

Even among the ruder Slavonians, who lived on the other side of the Elbe, it was permitted to set any man's house on fire, who refused sanctuary to a stranger; and, in such cases, every one strove to punish the violation of hospitality (73).

fidelity and juſtice? But not to dwell too long upon uncertainties, we may affirm, that, in the main, they long enjoyed that noble character, however their conqueſts afterwards, and ſince them their unmeaſurable ambition, have hurried them into the quite oppoſite extreme.

Frugality.

OF their frugality we have likewiſe given ſeveral inſtances, ſuch as their contempt of gold and ſilver, of trades and manufactures, and the like; the antient plainneſs of their diet, dreſs, houſes, &c. Their cloathing was a kind of veſt and breeches, light and neat; they wore their hair long, and a collar about their neck, and bracelets about their wriſts, and above the elbow. Thoſe who were raiſed to dignities wore them of gold, the reſt of braſs. The druids were always cloathed in white when they officiated, and the freemen, on all public occaſions, appeared with their arms [q]. We know little of their marriages, except that they do not ſeem to have allowed polygamy, and that they had power of life and death over their wives: at leaſt this laſt plainly appears, from a paſſage of Pomponius Mela, who, being a Spaniard, muſt underſtand the Gauliſh laws and cuſtoms better than any Greek or Roman author that has written of them. We ſhall give the ſubſtance of it in the margin; firſt, becauſe it contains ſome curious particulars about the Gauliſh funerals, with which we ſhall cloſe this ſection: and, ſecondly, becauſe the author doth therein clear that nation from having entertained the Pythagorean doctrine of the tranſmigration of ſouls, which other writers have abſurdly charged them with, and which we promiſed, in a former ſection, to diſprove (E). Their burning of the dead bodies, we have ſeen, in

(E) Among other tenets which the druids hold, ſays that author (74), there is one, which they endeavour to inculcate into every Gaul, in order to inſpire them with greater bravery; namely, that of the immortality of the ſoul and a future life. Accordingly, ſays he, when they burn the bodies of their dead, and bury their aſhes, they bury, likewiſe with them, their books of accounts, and the notes of hand of the moneys they had lent whilſt alive, that they may be of ſervice to them in the other world. Sometimes, likewiſe, their near relations and friends have flung themſelves into the funeral pile, to go and live with them there. Hath this doctrine of a future life any thing in common with the Pythagorean tranſmigration? Could theſe account books, receipts, and notes, be of any ſervice to ſouls which paſs into other bodies, either of men or brutes? Can in a former ſection, by thoſe urns which contained their bones and aſhes, with ſome other trinkets which they mingled with them, of more or leſs value, according, as may be ſuppoſed, to the condition of the deceaſed; but that they likewiſe buried without burning, may be alſo gathered from thoſe intire bodies which have been found, eſpecially in the mounds of Saliſbury plain, of which we have given an account: for as the Gauls received their religious laws and cuſtoms from the Britiſh druids, we make no doubt they exactly agreed in them, in both countries.

thoſe, who affirm it, imagine, that ſouls, thus tranſmigrated, into whatever body it be, could be ſtill the ſame perſons whom thoſe accounts concerned? And would thoſe friends have been ſuch fools, as to chuſe to die with them, for the ſake of living with them hereafter, had they had the leaſt notion of ſuch a tranſmigration? How could they ever expect that happineſs, if they really believed that, upon their going out of this world, their ſouls were to enter into freſh bodies, of either men, women, brutes, or vegetables, the one, perhaps, in one corner of the world, and the other in another? What likelihood is there, that the Gauls, ſo jealous of their liberty as they were, would, by thus ruſhing into immediate death, run the riſque of paſſing into the bodies, I won't ſay of either plants or beaſts, but even into thoſe of ſlaves, or even of women, over whom they had the power of life and death?

SECT. V.

The hiſtory of the antient Gauls, from the Roman invaſion, and their conqueſt by Julius Cæſar, to the irruption of the Franks.

WE ſhall have the leſs room to inlarge upon this ſubject, firſt, becauſe we have little or no account of this nation before they were viſited by the Romans, but what we have given an account of in ſome part or other of this chapter: and, ſecondly, becauſe what happened to them from that time to the irruption of the Franks, has been fully ſpoken of in the Roman hiſtory. However, that we may not leave this part too imperfect and ſhort, for the ſake of avoiding repetitions, and that we may ſave our readers the trouble of collecting the particulars of it out of our former volumes, by having recourſe to every index, we ſhall give them here a ſummary of them in one view, and in as ſuccinct a method as we can, with proper references in the margin, of the places where thoſe facts have been more fully diſcuſſed, and add to it an account of ſuch other tranſactions as have not yet, or have but ſlightly, been touched upon.

All

All which we ſhall endeavour to couch, as well as it can be done, in a chronological order, and as near as we can to its epocha, according to ſuch of our chronologers as may be beſt depended upon [r]. We ſhall only add here, that the Gauls being a ſtrong and hardy people, and multiplying ſofaſt, that their country could not contain them, was one conſtant cauſe of their excurſions into other countries far and near, and in ſuch vaſt multitudes, that they ſpread terror where-ever they came. It often happened, likewiſe, that theſe colonies, thus ſettled in a foreign country, were ſo moleſted by their neighbours, that, to prevent their being diſpoſſeſſed, they ſent into their native country for freſh aſſiſtance, and eaſily obtained it, the Gauls being always ready to pour out their numerous ſwarms, upon all ſuch occaſions, to prevent any of their old colonies being driven back unto them. Hence their vaſt multitudes, their known valour, natural fierceneſs, and cruelty to thoſe who fell into their hands, joined to an unavoidable neceſſity, upon all ſuch expeditions, either to conquer or ſtarve, added not a little to the dread of their name. We ſhall paſs by thoſe which they antiently made out of Europe into ſeveral parts of Aſia, where they ſettled themſelves in ſeveral fine countries, and under different names, and for which we ſhall refer our readers to the Celtic hiſtory in a former volume [a].

THEIR earlieſt and moſt conſiderable ſally, we have recorded, is that which they made into Italy, under their famous leader Belloveſus (A), who, croſſing the Rhoſne and the Alps, ſettled himſelf in that part of Italy called Piedmont and Lombardy, then inhabited by the Hetrurians, about the year of Rome 160 [b]. Year of the flood, 2377. before Chriſt, 622.

THE Cenomani, who dwelt between the rivers Seine and Loire, made the ſecond grand expedition under their general Elitonis, and ſettled in the Breſciano, Cremoneſe, Mantuan, Carniola, and Venetian [c]; the time of this and the next is uncertain.

(A) Ambigatus, then king of Celtogallia, finding his kingdom overſtocked, ſent his two nephews, Belloveſus and Segoveſus, each at the head of a numerous army, to go and ſeek ſome new ſettlements. The firſt croſſed the Alps, and the latter the Rhine and Hercynian foreſt, and ſettled in that part of Germany ſince then called Boiemia, and Bohemia, from the Boii, who accompanied him in that expedition (1), as ſhall be further ſhewn in the next chapter.

(1) See before vol. xi. p. 419.

THE third was made by the Læves and Ananes, the former of whom ſettled in Novara, on one ſide of the Po; and the latter in Piacentia, on the oppoſite ſide.

IN a fourth, the Boii and Lingones, having paſſed the Pennine Alps, ſettled on the ſouth ſide of the Po, between Ravenna and Bologna.

IN the fifth, which happened about two hundred years after that of Bellovefus, the Senones, ſeated between Paris and Meaux, were invited into Italy by an Hetrurian lord, and ſettled themſelves in Umbria. Brennus, who was their king, had laid ſiege to Cluſium, and here it was that he gave that noble anſwer to the three Fabii, who were ſent from Rome to expoſtulate with him, of which we have had occaſion to take notice in a former ſection. We have ſeen, in the volume laſt quoted [a], that the treachery of the Fabii, in entering and defending that city, and of the Romans in countenancing, inſtead of puniſhing, it, did ſo exaſperate the Gauliſh general, that, raiſing the ſiege of the place, he immediately turned all his force againſt the latter, and, having defeated them, marched directly to Rome, whoſe inhabitants were ſtruck with ſuch terror at his approach, that they abandoned it to his mercy. When Brennus entered the place, which appeared to him like a very deſert, he ſecured all the avenues round the capitol, and then gave up that metropolis to be plundered by his men, who preſently after reduced it to aſhes, and all its ſtately temples and palaces into an heap of rubbiſh. Finding the capitol too ſtrong for him, he turned the ſiege of it into a blockade, and marched againſt Ardea, where he was eaſily defeated by Camillus, who had been a refugee there about two years: for the Gauls were, by this time, ſo intoxicated with their ſucceſs at Rome, and with the wine of that country, that they kept neither order nor diſcipline; ſo that Camillus, at the head of the Ardeates, made a terrible ſlaughter of them. His next attempt was, to ſurpriſe the capitol, and would, in all likelihood, have ſucceeded in it, had not the noiſe of ſome geeſe awaked the brave Manlius, who ſounded the alarm, and gave them ſuch a fierce repulſe, that moſt of the Gauls flung themſelves headlong down the ſteep rock, and loſt their lives. However, the beſieged in the capitol were reduced to ſuch ſtraights on the one hand, and the Gauls on the other, who were themſelves beſieged in the city by Camillus, now choſen dictator, that the ſenate thought fit to ſend Sulpitius, a tribune, to treat with Brennus; and between theſe it was agreed, that the Romans ſhould pay him a thouſand pounds weight of gold, and he depart out of the Roman territories. But when the money came to be paid, and Brennus had brought falſe weights with him, Camillus ordered the gold to be carried back, and told the Gaul, that Rome ſhould be ranſomed by the ſword, and not with money. He proved as good as his word; for a dreadful conteſt enſuing upon it between the two armies, the Gauls were ſo diſheartened on the ſudden, that they made a running fight of it; but being purſued by the dictator, were all cut off, it ſeems, to one man, not one of them being left to carry the news into their own country [c]. The Gauls all cut off.

THE next expedition was ſtill more unfortunate; for thoſe Gauls who had ſettled themſelves in thoſe parts of Italy we have lately ſpoken of, led but an uneaſy life there, being continually harraſſed by the Romans; upon which, they ſent into Gaul for freſh reinforcements; but theſe came in ſuch vaſt numbers to their aſſiſtance, that they became more dreadful to them than the Romans: ſo that they made no ſcruple to turn their arms againſt them, and, having killed their two leaders, eaſily put the whole army to flight. The Romans, however, were in no ſmall dread of them, when they found how active they were in Italy, and what vaſt armies they could draw out of Gaul; and it was to diſſipate that fear, that they perpetrated that horrid piece of ſuperſtition at Rome, which we formerly mentioned, of burying a Greek and a Gauliſh man and woman alive in the ox-market. But they did not truſt to this ſo far, as not to make vaſt preparations, when they heard that the Gæſatæ, another brave Gauliſh nation, were invited, by their Italian countrymen, to their aſſiſtance. Theſe were of a fiercer nature than any of the reſt; they ſcorned all kind of defenſive armour as mean and cowardly, and generally choſe to fight naked. Had but their martial ſkill been as great as their courage (B), it is likely they might, at that juncture, have diſabled the

(B) We have purpoſely omitted ſeveral other defeats which they met with in ſome other expeditions, and which the reader will find in the places of the Roman hiſtory quoted in the margin (2); where he will find, that the Romans were by that time ſo well appriſed of their ſuperiority to them in this point, that they generally truſted to it, and with good ſucceſs, ſince it appears, by all theſe inſtances, that it was by that that they gave them ſuch frequent and ſurpriſing defeats.

They fought much after the ſame undiſciplined manner in ſingle combat; witneſs that gigantic Gaul, who, by his golden collar, the Romans from ever conquering any more nations: for their approach had ſpread ſuch a terror all over the Roman territories, that they raiſed one of the vaſteſt armies that had ever been known amongſt them. If we may believe Polybius [f], it conſiſted of no leſs than 800000 men, horſe and foot. The Gauls, however, nothing terrified at it, though they had but 50000 foot, and 2000 horſe, forced their way through them, and entered their territories; but being as inferior to them in military diſcipline, as they were in number, they met with a total defeat: 40000 of them were killed on the ſpot, and 10000 taken priſoners, and amongſt them Concolitanus, one of their kings; whilſt the other, named Aneroeſtus, and by far the moſt experienced warrior, only eſcaped to a neighbouring village, and there killed himſelf, as did moſt of the officers who followed him, according to the Gauliſh maxim, of preferring death to ſlavery.

(2) See before vol. xi. p 458, 470, 480, 556.

The Gæſatæ defeated.

NOTWITHSTANDING all theſe ſucceſſes, the Romans had no ſmall reaſon to fear, that the Gauls would, at length, be made ſenſible, by their frequent defeats, of their own want of martial diſcipline and policy, and by their example, and that of other nations, become, in time, as expert ſoldiers as they (C); in which caſe, they could not but become a very formidable enemy to their nation, conſidering their hatred to it, their hardineſs, intrepidity, and readineſs to join every foe againſt them. The aſſiſtance they gave Hannibal, as he was croſſing their country, and over the Alps, of which we have given an account elſewhere [g]; and, after him, to Mago and the Carthaginians, ſeems to have been one of their generals, and, Goliath like, challenged any of the Romans to fight with him, and was, like him, overcome by a brave ſtripling (3). For the Gaul, truſting to his ſuperior ſtrength, began the fight by diſcharging a great blow on his antagoniſt, whilſt the dextrous youth, ruſhing under his ſhield, ſtabbed him to death with his ſword (4).

(C) We are told (5), that their very weapons, eſpecially their ſwords, were ſo wretchedly tempered, that, upon the very firſt onſet, in which they conſtantly charged with incredible fury, they uſed either to break, bend, or be ſo blunted, againſt the Roman javelins, as to become uſeleſs; ſo that before they could have time to ſharpen or ſtraiten them, the enemy preſently cloſed in upon them, and, throwing by the javelin, and ſhortening their ſwords upon them, ſtabbed them, like ſo many ſheep thaginians, during their war [i]; their being so frequently hired as auxiliaries, by other states and kingdoms, most of them at war with Rome, and among which they were sure to perfect themselves more and more in the martial trade, whilst they themselves could not venture to take them into their pay without manifest danger (D); these considerations obliged them, at last, to retaliate upon them, and invade their country, upon the first favourable opportunity, and before they were become too expert in the art of war for them: but, before we come to speak of this, it will be necessary to say something of their other expeditions and exploits, in Asia, Macedonia, and other countries.

THE first of this kind was in the year after Pyrrhus passed into Italy [k], when the Gauls, finding themselves again overstocked at home, sent out three vast colonies to seek new habitations. Brennus (perhaps a descendant of him who had some two centuries before made that dreadful irruption into Italy we have lately mentioned) was the chief adviser of this expedition, and head of one of the Gallish armies; Cerethrius commanded the second, and marched into Thrace; and the third, under the command of Belgius, marched into Illyricum and Macedonia: as for Brennus, he was entered into Pannonia, or Hungary, a poor country in comparison to those which Belgius had invaded, and wherein he had enriched himself with immense

(D) They gave a dreadful instance of it from the beginning, when Scipio, after the defeat which the Carthaginians had given him, on the banks of the Ticinus, retired to Placentia, to cure his own and his soldiers wounds: for here about 2000 foot, and 200 horse, of those Gauls, which the consul had in his pay, upon some discontent, rose up in the dead of the night, and, whilst the Romans were asleep, entered their camp, slew a great number of them, cut off their heads, and carried them to Hannibal, who gave them a kind reception, and invited them, with vast promises, into his service.

This treachery so disheartened the consul, that, fearing lest the rest of their countrymen, that were left in his army, should follow their example, and make the mischief still greater, he wisely chose to give them the slip, and lead his own troops to a place of more safety. The Carthaginians, finding the Roman camp cleared, plundered and set it on fire, whilst the Gauls flocked, in great numbers, to their general, and listed in his service (6); an action, one would think, sufficient to deter the Romans from ever trusting a Gaul again.

(6) Polyb. l. iii. c. 66, & seq.

plunder; so that envying his success, he resolved to join him, and share it with him. Belgius being soon after defeated, to such a degree that we hear no more of him or his men, he hastened thither, under pretence of revenging and assisting him; and it is not improbable, that the remainder of Belgius's army listed themselves under him. The army with which he entered into those two provinces, consisted of 150000 foot, and 15000 horse; but a revolt happened in it, in which Leonorius and Lutarius, the two chief leaders of it, carried off 20000 men, and marched into Thrace, and joining themselves to Cerethrius, seized on Byzantium, and the western coasts of the Propontis, and there settled, and made the adjacent parts tributary to them.

To retrieve this loss, Brennus sent for fresh supplies from Gallia, inlisted some Illyrians, and, with a new army of 150000 foot, and above 60000 horse, entered Macedonia, defeated Sosthenes, and ravaged the whole country. He next marched towards the straights of Thermopylæ, with an intent to invade Greece, but was stopped by the forces which were sent to defend that pass against him. This obliged him to get him some guides over those mountains, over which Xerxes had passed his forces before; upon which the guards retired, to avoid being surrounded by him. He then ordered Acichorius, the next to him in this expedition, to follow him at a distance with part of the army, and with the bulk of it marched strait towards Delphos, with a design, as is supposed, to plunder that rich city and temple; but met, it seems, with a terrible repulse, from a violent storm of thunder, lightning, and hail, which destroyed a great number of his men; and from a dreadful earthquake, which overwhelmed another part of his army: so that the remainder, being seized with a panic fury, fell upon, and murdered each other, all that night. The next morning they found their mistake, and near one half of their army destroyed, and the Greek forces pouring in upon them from all parts, and in such numbers, that though Acichorius joined him in the nick of time, yet were they not able to make head against the Greeks, but were defeated with a terrible slaughter. Brennus himself was desperately wounded, and so disheartened at his miscarriage, that he assembled all his chiefs, and having advised them, to slay all that were wounded and disabled, and to make as good a retreat as they could, he put an end to his life. Acichorius, immediately after, led the remainder of this shattered army back as well as he could; but their long marches through enemies countries, the oppositions and hardships they met with from them, and the grievous calamities which accompanied them, did, it seems, so thoroughly exhaust them, that not one of them returned returned from that expedition [m]: a juſt judgment, indeed, upon them, if they really went with that ſacrilegious deſign which is charged upon them by the Greek and Roman authors, and in which we make no doubt but they have as much exaggerated their puniſhment in their above-mentioned defeat, as they have their guilt, as the reader may ſee, by what is added in the margin (E).

(E) We promiſed, in a former ſection, to explode the virulent charge which Cicero lays againſt the Gauls and their religion, founded chiefly on this action of their plundering the Delphic temple, and that of their beſieging the capitol, and, as he adds, (to aggravate it the more) the great Jupiter in it; from which he infers, that their religion conſiſted only in a diametrical oppoſition to all others, and in waging war againſt the gods of other nations, &c. and that the Gauls were a moſt irreligious, wicked, and dangerous people, not fit to live; and much more to that purpoſe.

Now if it be true, that the Gauls, before their conqueſt, did worſhip the one Supreme Being, and, like the Perſes, Brachmans, and other antient nations and philoſophers, thought it an indignity to confine him in temples, or repreſent him by idols of any kind, as we have formerly ſhewed they did, then will their deſtroying thoſe temples and idols, or even plundering them of their treaſures, if they had really done ſo by this of Delphos, ſtand juſtified, and rather deſerves commendation, than ſuch a black reproof. The plunder of ſuch ſuperſtitious treaſures, to men of theſe principles, and for the ſupport of a numerous army that ſtands in need of it, will be juſtly deemed applying them to a better uſe.

But it plainly appears, from the majority of thoſe authors quoted above, that they did not plunder the Delphic oracle, but that they were ſcared from it by a ſtorm and earthquake, which threw them into ſuch a panic, as made them be eaſily overcome by thoſe Greek forces, which came, with great fury, to defend their country and oracle againſt them; upon which it is ſuppoſed, that all theſe diſaſters befel them as a juſt judgment for their ſacrilegious deſign againſt that temple and treaſure: but this laſt is at beſt but a ſurmiſe, founded on a wrong, though common, notion, that ſuch diſaſters always argued ſome atrocious crimes in the ſufferers: all which is here dreſſed up, by authors who were profeſſed enemies to the Gauliſh nation, and have, doubtleſs, exaggerated both at their pleaſure, though without any real foundation.

Juſtin, and after him Cicero, indeed, accuſe them of having plundered the Delphic treaſure; and the laſt adds, that they carried it home too; but being grievouſly plagued for their ſacrilege, they were adviſed to throw their ill-got pelf into the lake of Tholouſe.

THIS,

WHILST this expedition was carrying on in Greece, the other colonies under Leonorius, parting from the others who were ſettled in the Propontis, marched into the Helleſpont, and made themſelves maſters of Lyſimachia and the Thracian Cherſoneſus. Here ſome great miſunderſtanding happening between thoſe two chiefs, they parted their forces; the former returned to Byzantium, and the latter ſtayed where he was. They did, however, rejoin their forces ſome time after, and paſſed into Aſia, being invited thither by Nicomedes, whom they aſſiſted againſt his brother, and fixed him in all his father's dominions; in acknowledgment of which, heaſſigned them that part of Leſſer Aſia which we deſcribed at the beginning of this chapter, and which was, from them, called Gallogræcia, and Galatia. Thither came alſo a great number of thoſe other Gauls who had ſettled in Thrace, and who were driven from thence by Antigonus Gonatus, who had ſeized the kingdom of Macedon upon the death of Soſthenes. A greater number of them diſperſed themſelves about in other countries, and either periſhed, or ſo intermingled themſelves, as not to be heard of any more; ſo that of this great and threatening Gauliſh army, none remained but thoſe who ſettled in Galatia [n]. Theſe likewiſe, in time, increaſing in number, and being ſtreightened in their territories, endeavoured, according to cuſtom, to inlarge them where they could, and to ſend their colonies and auxiliary armies abroad (F), which

[n] Idem ibid.

This, though plainly oppoſite to all thoſe authors who have written of that expedition, ſeems to us only an invidious improvement on the account they have given of it, in order to bring a ſcandal on that vaſt treaſure which was conſecrated and repoſited in that lake, and which Strabo and Athenæus, on the authority of Poſidonius, tell us was (ſo far from being fetched from Delphos) dug up out of ſome rich mines in that neighbourhood, as we have already had occaſion to obſerve in the laſt ſection. If any thing, therefore, could be objected, with any ſeeming juſtice, againſt the Gauls, it was their ſending ſuch powerful colonies to invade other nations; but neither Greeks nor Romans could have any pretence to find fault with that which was their own practice, as well as that of all other nations.

(F) Juſtin tells us, that all Aſia ſwarmed with them, and that there was hardly an eaſtern prince at war that did not hire them as mercenaries (7). This was, in particular, the caſe of Antiochus Hierax, in his war againſt Seleucus, whom he defeated at Ancyra (8), by the help of the Gauliſh auxiliaries. But his victory had like to have coſt him dear. for theſe, having heard a rumour, that Seleucus had been ſlain, formed, it ſeems, a project to murder him, and which did not a little annoy and alarm all their neighbours; but they were at length ſuppreſſed by the proconſul of Aſia, Corn. Manlius Vulſo, who gave them ſeveral defeats, and obliged them to live quietly, and keep within their old limits [o]. They are, however, affirmed by ſome authors to have been ſubdued about fifty-three years before, by Attalus, king of Pergamus[p]; and if ſo, they muſt have found out ſome means of recovering their liberty, to have been ſo powerful in Manlius's time, unleſs we ſuppoſe theſe authors to have confounded the Gauls with the Galatians. However that be, theſe laſt were ſtill, above 130 years after, governed by their own tetrarchs, one of whom named Deiotarus, was, for his ſervices done to Pompey the great, created king by him (G), and had the Leſſer Armenia, and ſome other territories, added to his own [q]. Thus much may ſuffice for the Gauliſh expeditions abroad. It is time now to return to thoſe at home, and to give an account of their conqueſt by the Romans.

Year of the flood 2811. before Chriſt 188.

WE hinted a little higher, that the Romans were grown ſo fearful of the Gauls, that they thought it proper, in order to humble them, to lead their armies into their country. After man attempts, not worth mentioning, the perſon that opened the moſt effectual way into Gaul was the great conſul Q. Marcius, ſurnamed Rex, to whoſe lot this province was fallen, as ſeize upon his kingdom; ſo that he found no better way of ſaving himſelf, than by giving them all the treaſure he had (9).

The ſcene of war between the two contending brothers being at length removed to Meſopotamia, it is not improbable, that the battle of Babylonia happened between the Babyloniſh Jews and the Gauls; in which 8000 of the former defeated and killed 120000 of the latter (10); for Babylon was then a province of Meſopotamia, and Antiochus, then in confederacy with the Gauls, who were then very numerous there, and all over Aſia, as we mentioned out of Juſtin, was totally defeated by Seleucus (11). But whether theſe were the Galatians of Aſia minor, or troops ſent out of Gaul, is not eaſy to gueſs, from either Juſtin, or the book of Maccabees, as we hinted at the beginning of this chapter.

(G) This is the ſame Deiotarus that ſoon after diſpoſſeſſed the other three tetrarchs, and ſeized upon all Galatia. For this he was ſummoned before Julius Cæſar, upon which occaſion Cicero made a ſpeech in his behalf, which is ſtill extant, under the name of Oratio pro rege Deiotaro.

well as the ſupreme power, by the death of his collegue in Numidia. Marcius, the better to carry on his deſign, opened a way between the Alps and the Pyrenees, a work of immenſe labour, in which he was ſtoutly oppoſed by the Gauls, eſpecially the Stœni, who lived at the foot of the Alps [r], and who, finding themſelves overpowered by him, ſet fire to their houſes killed their wives and children, and threw them and themſelves into the flames. Marcius, having accompliſhed his work, planted a colony, for the ſecurity of it, in the country of the Volſcæ Tectoſagi, between the Pyrenees and the city of Thouloufe; and built a city in it, and called it Narbo Marcius, ſince Narbonne, which became the capital of that province. The reduction of ſuch a conſiderable part of Gaul, and the opening and ſecuring ſuch a way between the Alps and Pyrenees, as it laid the foundation for the conqueſt of the whole country, was thought ſo conſiderable a ſervice to Rome, that the ſenate ordered him a triumph for it [s]. His ſucceſſor, Scaurus, not only conquered ſome other nations of the Gauls, as the Gentiſci and Carni, (H), but, to facilitate the ſending of troops from Italy thither, he made ſome excellent roads between them, which before were almoſt impaſſable [t], and was likewiſe honoured with a triumph.

In the mean time, the Cimbri and Teutones, taking the alarm at theſe ſucceſſes, took up arms againſt them, and gave them ſeveral conſiderable overthrows, in one of which the Tigurini (I), having ſurpriſed them, made them, and their general Popilius, paſs under the yoke [u]. The Cimbri, in particular, had retaken ſomeparts of Gaul from the Romans, and, in particular, thefamed city of Thouloufe; upon which, Cepio marching his army to retake it, it opened its gates to him; notwithſtanding which, he not only gave it up to be plundered by them, but carried off all that vaſt treaſure that had been conſecrated there by the Gauls, and of which we have lately given an account, to the amount of 100000 pounds weight of gold, and the ſame of ſilver, even according to the moſt moderate accounts of it; and, in ſpite of his treachery, avarice, and ſacrilege, was continued proconſul of the Narbonneſe Gaul. This vile action ſo exaſperated the

Gauls,

Gauls, that they joined with the Cimbri, and, taking the advantage of the ſquabble that was between the general and his collegue Manlius, they fell upon them ſo furiouſly, that they gave them ſuch an overthrow as they had ſcarcely ever met with, killed 80000 men, beſides 40000 ſervants and futlers, in one day; only ten men, of their whole army, eſcaped with the two generals, and among the former the brave Sertorius, who ſaved himſelf by ſwimming over the Rhine. The Gauls, who, according to cuſtom on ſuch occaſions, had devoted all the ſpoil, threw all the ſilver and gold into the Rhoſne, drowned all the horſes, and murdered all the priſoners they had taken. What conſternation this loſs threw the city of Rome into, and what puniſhment was inflicted on the ſacrilegious Cepio, we have elſewhere ſhewn [w]. As to the victorious allies, they held a general council, whether to march immediately into Italy, or reduce thoſe provinces which the Romans held in Gaul: they agreed, however, to conſult the brave Æmilius Scaurus, whom they had taken priſoner in a preceding action, and who, Roman like, ſtrove to deter them from invading the territories of that republic, but was, for his bold ſpeech, ſtabbed to death by Boiorix, king of the Cimbri.

THE Roman ſenate, expecting nothing leſs than a freſh irruption of the Gauls and Cimbri, thought fit to recal Marius from his ſucceſsful expedition againſt Jugurtha; and, having honoured him with a triumph for it, appointed him general againſt the enemy, and Sylla to ſerve under him. They both ſet out accordingly, and Sylla gained ſeveral advantages againſt the Tectoſagi, and took Copillus, one of their kings, priſoner, whilſt Marius reſolved not to engage ſuch a numerous army as appeared againſt him, till he had received ſufficient reinforcements to his own. In the mean time, the Marſi, another people of Germany, had joined the Cimbri, with a deſign to enter Italy witn them, and Sylla was ſent to oppoſe them; but he, inſtead of engaging them, found means to gain the former over to the Roman intereſt. The Cimbri, enraged at this, ceaſed not to infeſt the Roman general till they forced him to remove to Aquæ Sextiæ, now Aix in Provence, and in his way was briſkly attacked by the brave Ambrones, now the canton of Bern, to whoſe valour had been chiefly owing the dreadful blow they gave Cepio and his collegue. They fought with the utmoſt fury and intrepidity, indeed, but wanted diſcipline; ſo that, not being able to ſtand the ſhock of ſuch regular troops as they engaged, ſo dreadful a ſlaughter was made of them, that the next river ran ſtained with their blood. Here the Ambronian women did likewise signalize themselves, ran with their axes against the pursuing Romans, and made a stout opposition. But being at length overpowered, and offering to surrender upon honourable conditions, which were denied them by the enemy (K), they murdered all their children, and themselves; so that not one of them was found alive [x].

Gaulish slaves defeated.

After this defeat, the Gauls seem to have been quiet for some time, whether too much suppressed by the Romans, or that they left it to the Germans to harrass them, as they in fact did, and gave the consul much trouble, tho' to very little effect, they being constantly overcome, as often as they engaged him; but he met, soon after, with a more dreadful enemy in Sylla, and Rome was so rent, and in such consternation, on account of those two factions, as we have seen in the Roman history, that they rather sought the friendship of the Gauls, than their reduction. But Sylla found means, by his address, to draw them to his side [y]. Hence it is likely, that he suffered them to live in peace, during the whole time of his dictatorship; for we hear nothing relating to them during that time, nor for some space after his death, though the scene of war was by this time removed into Spain and Portugal by Sertorius, and where he had very great success against Pompey, who was sent against him [z]. This war was no sooner ended there, than a new one began in the heart of Italy under Spartacus, who was at the head of an army consisting chiefly of Gaulish slaves, and whom he designed, after some notable successes against the two consuls, to have led back over the Alps into their own country. But this they stifly refused, and were soon after totally defeated by Crassus, who was sent against them, and Spartacus himself slain, after having fought with incredible bravery, and sacrificed heaps of Romans round about him: 40000 of the Gauls were killed on the spot, the rest fled into Lusitania, where they were ſoon after cut off by Pompey [a]. Whether the Tranſalpine Gauls had any hand in this rebellion, doth not appear. In that famed conſpiracy of Catiline they were indeed invited into it by ſome of his partiſans, in hopes of drawing ſome conſiderable helps from thence; but the embaſſadors of the Allobroges (L), then at Rome, who had been alſo tampered with, made ſuch a full diſcovery of the whole deſign to their protector Q. Fab. Sanga, and he to the conſuls, that it was happily prevented and diſconcerted [b].

(K) These conditions were, as we hinted in a former section, that their honour should be preserved; that they should not be sold into slavery; and that they should be employed in the service of the vestals These conditions being denied, they would have contented themselves with the first; but that being inhumanly refused, their love of chastity, made them prefer such an honourable death, as could not but cast a more shameful brand on those who styled them barbarians, and yet used such brave matrons in so inhuman a manner (12).

FROM all this it ſeems, as if the Gauls had lived all this long while in quiet and good friendſhip with Rome, whatever feuds there might be among them in the heart of their country: the Helvetii were they which kindled that freſh war which brought Cæſar over the Alps, and ended in the conqueſt of that brave and warlike nation. Orgetorix was the firſt cauſe of it, who, whether through want of room, or a deſire to exchange his inclement country for a better, or for ſome other cauſe not mentioned by any writer, had engaged a vaſt number of his countrymen to burn their towns and villages, and to go in ſearch of new conqueſts. Julius Cæſar, to whoſe lot the whole country of Gaul was fallen, made ſuch haſte to come and ſuppreſs them, that he was got to the Rhoſne in eight days, broke down the bridge of Geneva, and, in a few days more, finiſhed the famed wall between that city and mount Jura, now St. Claude, which extended ſeventeen miles in length, was ſixteen feet high, fortified with towers and caſtles at proper diſtances, and a ditch that ran the whole length of it (M). Whilſt this was doing, and the reinforcements he wanted were coming, he amuſed the Helvetii, who had ſent to demand a paſſage through the country of the Allobroges, till he had got his reinforcements, and then flatly refuſed it to them; whereupon a dreadful battle enſued, in which they loſt 130,000 men, in ſpite of all their valour, beſides a number of priſoners, among whom was the wife and daughter of Orgetorix, the leader of this unfortunate expedition;

dition; the reſt ſubmitted, and begged they might be permitted to go and ſettle among the Ædui, from whom they originally ſprung; and at the requeſt of theſe laſt, were permitted to go (N). This action and victory, joined to the policy and incredible diſpatch with which Cæſar had carried it againſt them, gained him ſuch reputation, and, at the ſame time, ſtruck the Gauls with ſuch a dread, that they ſtrove who ſhould pay him the firſt homage and congratulations, and procure his friendſhip. So that we may look upon it as the baſis of all his glory and conqueſts in this country.

We formerly took notice of the ſad divided ſtate he found them in at his firſt coming amongſt them, their vaſt variety of governments, their jealouſy over each other, the overgrown power of ſome, and the reduction of others into a ſtate of dependence next to ſlavery: Cæſar, who knew beſt how to make the moſt of theſe inteſtine broils, ſoon became the protector of the oppreſſed, a terror to the oppreſſor, and the umpire of all their contentions. Among thoſe who applied to him for help, were his allies the Ædui, againſt whom Arioviſtus, king of the Germans, joined with the Arverni (O), in their late wars, had taken the country of the Sequani from them, and obliged them to ſend hoſtages to him. Cæſar forthwith ſent to demand the reſtitution of both, and, in an interview which he ſoon after obtained of that haughty and treacherous prince, was like to

(N) The Ædui were ſituate between the rivers Seine, Loire, and Saone, and were the only allies Cæſar then had. Theirs being a fruitful country, they had promiſed to ſupply him with corn, but made ſo many delays, that he began to ſuſpect their fidelity, and to find himſelf in great diſtreſs for want of it. Divitiacus, one of the lords of it, was then in his army, with Liſcus, one of their magiſtrates: Cæſar examined them both about it ſeparately, and the latter told him, that Dumnorix, the younger brother of Divitiacus, deſigning to ſeize upon the ſupreme power, had allied with the Helvetii, and ſent that corn to them, which ſhould have been conveyed to him. Divitiacus confirmed what Liſcus had ſaid, but without naming his brother; and when Cæſar would have puniſhed him for his perfidy, generouſly interceded for him, and obtained his pardon (14).

(O) The Arverni were ſeated on the Loire, and were ſo called from their metropolis, Arvernum, now Clermont, the capital of the Guiennois. They were once the moſt powerful people of the Gauls, their territories are ſaid to have reached from the ocean to the Rhine, on one ſide, and the Pyrenees on the other (15).

The Sequani were neighbours to the Ædui, and inhabited that part of Gallia Belgica called Upper Burgundy, now Franche Comté.

have fallen a ſacrifice to his perfidy; upon which, he bent his whole power againſt him, forced him, againſt his will (P), out of his ſtrong intrenchments, and gave him a total overthrow. Arioviſtus eſcaped, with difficulty, over the Rhine; but his two wives and a daughter, with a great number of Germans of diſtinction, fell into the conqueror's hand. Cæſar, after this ſignal victory, put his army into winter-quarters, whilſt he went over the Alps to make the neceſſary preparations for the next campaign [c]. By this time, all the Belgæ in general were ſo terrified at his ſucceſs, that they entered into a confederacy againſt the Romans, as their common enemy, of which Labienus, who had been left in Gaul, ſent him word; upon which, he immediately left Rome, and made ſuch diſpatch, that he arrived upon their confines in about fifteen days. Upon his arrival, the Rhemi ſubmitted to him, but the reſt, appointing Galba, king of the Sueſſones, general of all their forces, which amounted to 150,000 men, marched directly againſt him. Cæſar, who had ſeized on the bridge of the Axona, now Aiſne, led his light horſe and infantry over it, and, whilſt the others were incumbered in croſſing that river, made ſuch a terrible ſlaughter of them, that the river was filled with their dead, inſomuch, that their bodies ſerved for a bridge to thoſe who eſcaped. This new victory ſtruck ſuch terror into the reſt, that they diſperſed themſelves; immediately after which, the Sueſſones, Bellovaci, Ambiones, and ſome others, ſubmitted to him. The Nervii, indeed, joined with the Atrebates and Veromandui againſt him, and, having firſt ſecured their wives and children, made a ſtout reſiſtance for ſome time, but were, at length, defeated, and the greateſt part of them ſlain; the reſt, with their wives and old men, ſurrendered themſelves, and were allowed to live in their own cities and towns, as formerly. The Aduatici were next ſubdued, and, for their treachery to the conqueror (Q), were ſold for ſlaves, to the number of 50000.

(P) Cæſar, who loſt no advantage he could get on an enemy, had intelligence that ſome German propheteſſes, and ſuch were in high eſteem among them, had foretold, that they could not be victorious till after the new moon; or rather, he knew that was a ſuperſtitious notion common among them and all the Gauls; and this it was made him ſo eager, and Arioviſtus ſo averſe, to come to blows before that time.

(Q) Theſe were the remains of thoſe Cimbri whom Marius had defeated in Italy, and had been left on the banks of the Rhine to guard the baggage. They made a ſham ſubmiſſion to Cæſar, and ſurrendered

Young Craſſus, the ſon of the triumvir, ſubdued likewiſe ſeven other nations, and took poſſeſſion of their cities; which not only completed the conqueſt of the Belgæ, but brought ſeveral nations from beyond the Rhine to ſubmit to the conqueror. The Veneti, or antient inhabitants of Vannes in Britany, who had been likewiſe obliged to ſend hoſtages to the conqueror, were, in the mean time, making great preparations, by ſea and land, to recover their liberty. Cæſar, then in Illyricum, was forced to equip a fleet on the Loire, and, having given the command of it to Brutus, he went and defeated them by land, as Brutus did by ſea; and, having put their chief men to death, ſold the reſt for ſlaves. The Unelli, with Veridorix, their chief, together with the Lexovii and Aulerci, were, about the ſame time, ſubdued by Sabinus, and the Aquitani by Craſſus, with the loſs of 30,000 men. There remained nothing but the countries of the Morini and Menapii (R) to be conquered, of all Gaul. Cæſar marched himſelf againſt them, but found them ſo well intrenched in their inacceſſible fortreſſes, that he contented himſelf with burning and ravaging their country; and, having put his troops into winter-quarters, paſſed again over the Alps, to have a more watchful eye over ſome of his rivals there [d], but he was ſoon after obliged to come and defend his Gauliſh conqueſts againſt ſome nations of the Germans, who were coming to ſettle there, to the number of 400,000, and whom he totally defeated, and then reſolved to carry his conquering arms into Germany. As this laid the foundation for that bloody war which he afterwards carried on againſt them, it will be more properly ſeen in the ſubſequent chapters, as well as his ſeveral expeditions into this iſle in that which immediately follows, and to which we ſhall refer our readers.

Upon his return into Gaul, he found it labouring under a great famine, which had cauſed a kind of univerſal revolt. Cotta and Sabinus, who were left in the country of the Eburones, now Liege, were betrayed into an ambuſh by Ambiorix, ſurrendered their arms to him, but had concealed a third part of them, with which they fell foul on the Romans in the night: upon which, he broke down the gates of their city, put many of them to the ſword, and ſold the reſt for ſlaves (16).

(R) Theſe are the territories, now called Ferouennes, Cleves, Gelder, and Juliers. Thoſe of the Aulerci and Lexovii are now the Evreaux and Liſieux. As to the Unelli, their abode is differently gueſſed at, but without any certainty.

one of their chiefs, and had moſt of their men cut off. The Aduatici were fallen upon Q. Cicero, who was left there with one legion, and had reduced him to great ſtraights: at the ſame time Labienus, with his legion, was attacked by Indutiomarus, at the head of the Rhemi and Senones: but had better luck than the reſt, and, by one bold ſally upon them, put them to flight, and killed their general. Cæſar acquired no ſmall credit by quelling all theſe revolts, but each victory loſt the lives of ſo many of his troops, that he was forced to have recourſe to Pompey for a freſh ſupply, who readily granted him two of his own legions to ſecure his Gauliſh conqueſts [c].

Cæſar repaſſes into Gaul.

BUT it was not long before they, ever reſtleſs under a foreign yoke, raiſed up a new revolt, and obliged him to return thither. His fear, leſt Pompey ſhould gain the affections of the Roman people, had obliged him to ſtrip the Gauls of their gold and ſilver, to bribe them over to his intereſt; and this gave no ſmall handle to theſe frequent revolts which happened during his abſence. He did, however, ſoon reduce the Nervii, Aduatici, Menapii, and Treviri, the laſt of which had raiſed the revolt, under the command of Ambiorix; but he ſoon found the flame ſpread much farther, even to the greateſt part of the Gauls, who had choſen the brave Vercingetorix their generaliſſimo. Cæſar was forced to leave Inſubria, whither he had retired to watch the motions of Pompey, and, in the midſt of winter and ſnow, repaſs the Alps, into the province of Narbonne, where he gathered all his ſcattered troops with all poſſible ſpeed, and, in ſpite of the hard weather, beſieged and took Noviodunum, now Noyons; and defeated Vercingetorix, who was come to the relief of that place. He next took the city of Avaricum, now Bourges, one of the ſtrongeſt in Gaul, and which had a gariſon of 40000 men, of whom he made ſuch a dreadful ſlaughter, that hardly 800 eſcaped. Whilſt he was beſieging Gergovia, the capital of the Arverni, he was informed that the Nitiobriges, or Agenois, were in arms, and that the Ædui were ſending to Vercingetorix 10000 men, which they were to have ſent to reinforce him. Upon this news, he left Fabius to carry on the ſiege, and marched againſt the Ædui. Theſe, upon his approach, ſubmitted, in appearance, and were pardoned; but ſoon after that the whole nation roſe up in arms, and murdered all the Italian troops in their capital. Cæſar, at this, was in great ſtraights what meaſures to take, but reſolved, at length, to raiſe the ſiege of Gergovia, and at once attack the enemy's camp, which he did with ſome ſucceſs; but when he thought to have gone to Noviodunum, or Noyons, where his baggage, military cheſt, &c. where left, he heard that the Ædui had carried it off, and burnt the place. Labienus, juſtly thinking that Cæſar would want his aſſiſtance in the condition he now was, went to join him, and in his way defeated a Gauliſh general, named Camulogena, who came to oppoſe his march; but this did not hinder the revolt from ſpreading itſelf all over Celtic Gaul, whither Vircingetorix had ſent for freſh ſupplies, and, in the mean time, attacked Cæſar, but was defeated, and forced to retire to Aleſia, a ſtrong place, now Aliſe in Burgundy, as is ſuppoſed. Hither Cæſar haſtened, and beſieged him, and, having drawn a double circumvallation, with a deſign to ſtarve him in it, as he was likely to have done, upon that account refuſed all offers of a ſurrender from him. At length, the long-expected reinforcement came, conſiſting of 160000 men, under four generals: theſe made ſeveral fruitleſs attacks on Cæſar's trenches, but were defeated in three ſeveral battles, which, at length, obliged Vercingetorix to ſurrender at diſcretion. Cæſar uſed all his priſoners with great ſeverity, except the Ædui and Arverni, by whoſe means he hoped to gain their nations, which were the two moſt potent of Celtic Gaul, as he actually did; for both of them ſubmitted to him, and the former received him into their capital, where he ſpent the winter, after he had put his army into winter-quarters. This campaign, as it proved one of the hardeſt he ever had, ſo he gained more glory by it than any Roman general had done before [f]; yet could not all this procure him from the ſervile ſenate, now wholly dedicated to his rival, a prolongation of his proconſulſhip; upon which, he is reported to have laid his hand upon his ſword, and ſaid, that that ſhould do it [g]. He was as good as his word, and the Gauls, upon their former ill ſucceſs, reſolving to have as many ſeparate armies as provinces, in order to embarraſs him the more, Cæſar and his generals, Labienus and Fabius, were forced to fight them one after another, which they did, however, with ſuch ſucceſs, that, notwithſtanding the hardneſs of the ſeaſon, they ſubdued the Bituriges, Carnuti, Rhemi, and the Bellovaci, with their general Correus, by which he at once quieted all the Belgic provinces bordering on Celtic Gaul. The next who followed were the Treviri, the Eburones, and the Andes, under their general Dunmarus. The laſt place which held out againſt him was Uxellidunum, which was defended by the two laſt acting generals of the Gauls, Drapes the Senonian, and Luterius the Cadurcean. The place being ſtrong, and well gariſoned, Cæſar was obliged to march thither from the furtheſt part of Bel- gic Gaul, and ſoon after reduced it, for want of water. Here, again, he cauſed the right-hands of all that were fit to bear arms to be cut off, to deter the reſt from revolting afreſh. Thus was the conqueſt of Gaul finiſhed from the Alps and Pyrenees to the Rhine, all which vaſt tract was now reduced to a Roman province under the government of a prætor. The ſum of all the provinces, cities, and priſoners, taken, if not exaggerated by that conqueror and Plutarch, the reader may ſee in the Roman hiſtory above quoted [h]. Reduces it into a Roman province.

THUS ended, in a great meaſure, the liberty of that once famed and warlike nation, and with it their ſingular valour, as Tacitus obſerves, in the life of Agricola. Some cities, or commonwealths, however, we are told [i], were permitted to remain free; ſuch as the Nervii, Ulbaneſes, Sueſſones, and Leuci; and others retained the title of confederates to Rome, viz. the Ædui, Lingones, Rhemi, and Carnutes: as to the reſt, who were reduced into the form of a Roman province, we may gueſs at their miſerable condition, by what Critognatus the Arvernian, as quoted by Cæſar [k], tells us of it. "If, ſays he, "you would know after what manner diſtant nations are uſed "by the Romans, you need but look at our neighbouring Gaul, "now reduced into a province, which having its laws and cuſ-"toms changed, and being brought under the power of the "axes, is oppreſſed with perpetual ſlavery." To underſtand rightly the difference of theſe three conditions, or, more properly, degrees of ſlavery; the firſt was, the having a number of ſoldiers quartered upon them, to keep them in awe (S); the next was, when the province was laid under tribute, in which caſe they were compelled to endure a vaſt number of tax-gatherers, which, like ſo many leaches, or harpyes, ſucked out the very vitals of the country (T). The third was, when they were deprived of the

(S) In which caſe, if theſe provinces continued quiet and peaceable, they had, it ſeems, no great armies quartered in them, ſince Joſephus tells us (17), that, in Titus's time, they had no more than 1200 ſoldiers in gariſon in all Gaul, although, adds he, they had fought for their liberty againſt the Romans above 800 years, and had near as many cities as theſe had then ſoldiers there.

(T) We are told, accordingly, that, after Julius Cæſar had finiſhed the conqueſt of Gaul, he laid it under a tax, or tribute of HS. quadringenties (18), that is, about a million of Engliſh crowns. How much heavier they were taxed in ſubſequent reigns, may be the privilege of being governed by their own laws and magiſtrates, but had governors ſet over them, with full power and authority (cum imperio & ſecuribus) over their lives and eſtates, and ſent to them from Rome. It was on account of this threefold tyranny that they ſo often revolted; for, as Tacitus himſelf obſerves, in the reign of Tiberius, the continuance of thoſe taxes, the extortions of uſurers, and inſolence of the ſoldiers, were become ſo intolerable, that it drove the Gauliſh cities into a freſh rebellion. And Suetonius, in the life of Nero, tells us, that the world, having for near thirteen years groaned under his tyranny, did at length ſhake it off, the Gauls ſetting the firſt example to all the reſt.

Gallia divided into 16 provinces.

Gaul was ſoon after divided into ſixteen provinces, the names of which the reader will find in the margin (V), each of which groaned now, more or leſs, under the Roman tyranny, according as they were, more or leſs, favoured by the emperors, or by the prætors ſent thither to rule them. However, neither under Cæſar, whilſt he lived, nor even under his ſucceſſor Auguſtus, do we read of any conſiderable revolt; on the contrary, though the latter did, in a manner, begin his reign with making them undergo a cenſus, which is the firſt we read of made out of Italy, and which could not but be galling to them, they ſeem to have ſubmitted to it patiently. Some years after, indeed, when Druſus was ſent thither to ſtop the incurſions which the Germans were frequently making upon them (W), and eaſily gueſſed, by their frequent revolts, and continual complaints againſt thoſe extortions and oppreſſions, ſome inſtances of which we ſhall have occaſion to mention by-and-by.

(V) Viennenſis, Narbonenſis prima, Narbonenſis ſecunda, Aquitania prima & ſecunda, Novempopulana, Alpes maritimæ, Belgica prima & ſecunda, Germania prima & ſecunda, Lugdunenſis prima, ſecunda, & tertia, Maxima Sequanorum, & Alpes Græcæ; all of which the reader may ſee a further account in the authors hereunder quoted (19).

This diviſion, however, was not made by Julius Cæſar, ſince we find it ſtill under the three diſtinctions in which he left them, when Auguſtus cauſed the firſt cenſus to be made in it (20); but was begun towards the latter end of this laſt's reign, and finiſhed by ſome of his ſucceſſors.

(W) It is hardly to be doubted, but the Gauls, who did ſo grievouſly brook the plundering and inſolences of the Romans, and found themſelves too weak now to make head againſt them, did, by ſome private means, either invite the Germans as friends, or hire and had there begun a ſecond, and perhaps a more ſtrict, one, taking a particular account of each perſon's eſtate, in order to tax them according to it; they then began to expreſs an univerſal diſcontent, and an inclination to take up arms, and regain their liberties. Druſus, however, without ſeeming to ſuſpect any thing like it of them, ſummoned all the Gauliſh chiefs to aſſiſt at the conſecration of the temple, which the Lugdunenſes had built in honour of Julius Cæſar, and, upon their coming, behaved with ſuch addreſs and complaiſance to them, that they not only dropped their intended revolt, but agreed to build an altar to Auguſtus, and to pay him divine honours, even during his life. Sixty Gauliſh nations, it ſeems, contributed to the rearing and adorning of this magnificent altar, which was conſecrated on the firſt of Auguſt, and games were, at the ſame time, inſtituted, in honour of this new kind of deity, not unlike the Iſthmians and Nemeans of Greece [l].

THIS fulſome flattery to that monarch, which might, probably, be owing to the preſence of Druſus, did not, however, divert them long from their favourite view of regaining their li-them as auxiliaries to their aſſiſtance; and this ſeems to have been the firſt beginning of the colonies of the Franks. For thoſe Germans, whether defeated by the Romans, or, which is more likely, bought off by them, began, by little and little, to ſettle on the borders of Gallia. For we are told, that Auguſtus tranſplanted the Suevi and Sicambri, who ſubmitted to him, into Gallia, and aſſigned them lands along the Rhine (21). And of Tiberius we read, that he brought 40000 of thoſe that ſurrendered themſelves in the German war, over into Gallia, and ſettled them on the banks of the Rhine (22).

To this we may add, what another author tells us of the emperor Probus, in whoſe reign above ſixty cities had revolted from the Romans, and made a bold puſh for the recovery of their liberty. This prince, ſays he (23), marched with a vaſt army into Gaul, which, after Poſthumius's death, was all in commotion, and, when Aurelian was killed, was, in a manner, poſſeſſed by the Germans. There he gained ſo many victories, that he recovered from the barbarians ſixty of the moſt noble cities of Gallia; and whereas they had overſpread all Gaul without controul, he ſlew near 400000 of thoſe who had ſeated themſelves within the Roman territories, and tranſplanted the remainder of them beyond the rivers Neckar and Elb: but of this we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more fully in the ſubſequent chapters.

berty, whenever fortune ſhould favour them with a proper opportunity. The druids, on the contrary, ſeem, upon this occaſion, to have exerted themſelves to cheriſh that noble deſign in them, to prevent any further defection from their antient religion; and hence, moſt likely, aroſe thoſe frequent revolts, as well as threatening edicts, that came out againſt them in the ſucceeding reigns, and of which we have had occaſion to ſpeak in a former ſection: however that be, the violent extortions, and horrid butcheries, which they underwent under Caligula [m], were of themſelves ſufficient to have ſpirited up a leſs warlike nation; though that reign was not long enough to ripen their deſign, and under the next they either enjoyed more reſpite, or, which is as likely, were more narrowly obſerved. But in that of Nero, under whom they were more cruelly treated than ever, the brave and noble Julius Vindex (X), at that time governor of Celtic Gaul, declared his reſolution to free his country from ſlavery, and the empire from that bloody tyrant. As ſoon as his deſign was known, the Gauls, harraſſed and reduced to beggary by intolerable impoſts, flocked to him from all parts to aſſiſt him in it; ſo that, though he had no Romans under his command, yet he ſoon ſaw himſelf at the head of 100000 armed men. When Nero heard the news of this revolt, he appeared quite glad at it, as it would afford him occaſion for freſh extortions and cruelties. What he ſeemed moſt affected with was, that Vindex, in ſome of his edicts againſt him, among other contemptuous language he had given him, did call him a bungling harper; ſo that, inſtead of making proper preparations to oppoſe him, he only ſtrove to diſplay his ſkill in muſic, to wipe off the ſcandal, as he thought it, that was thrown upon him. But when meſſengers came to him thick and threefold, and acquainted him with the progreſs Vindex had made in Gaul, and with Galba's revolt in Spain, he left Naples, in a fright, and repaired to Rome: however, a frivolous, but lucky, omen as he imagined it, having diſpelled his fears, he returned again to his muſical amuſement, without taking one ſtep to ſuppreſs

Vindex's revolt in Gaul.

[m] See vol. xiv. p. 46.

(X) He was deſcended from the antient kings of Aquitain, and bore a natural averſion to all tyrants. Upon his firſt reſolution of revolting, he ſent to perſuade Galba, then in Spain, to do the ſame, who neither followed his advice, nor betrayed his deſign, though ſome other governors, to whom he wrote on the ſame ſubject, ſent his letters to Nero: but Galba, upon receiving a ſecond letter from him, actually raiſed a revolt there (24).

either revolt. We ſhall not need repeat here the unworthy behaviour, and dreadful end, of that emperor, of which a full account has been given in a former volume [n]: all that needs be recapitulated here concerning the ill ſucceſs of our Gauliſh general is, that his army, having been ſurpriſed by that of Rufus Virginius, who was marched againſt him, whether by treachery or accident, is not agreed, the Gauls were defeated, with the loſs of 22000, who were killed on the ſpot; upon which, Vindex, in a fit of rage and deſpair, laid violent hands upon himſelf, and the reſt diſperſed themſelves for want of a leader. Galba had much better ſucceſs, and was ſoon after raiſed to the empire [o]; but the Gauls were ſo heavily oppreſſed by him, and ſo loaded with taxes, that they dared not undertake any thing againſt him. In the great ſtruggle between his two ſucceſſors, Otho and Vitellius, though they heartily hated them both, yet they were forced to declare for the latter, by Fabius Valens, who, in his march through their territories towards Italy, whither he was leading a gallant army, committed the greateſt plunders and extortions. This threw the nation into ſuch a terror, that every province and city ſent their embaſſadors to meet him, and bribe him with large preſents, to prevent their towns from being either plundered or burnt (Y).

His ill ſucceſs and death.

THEY did, however, recover themſelves ſo far, notwithſtanding all theſe oppreſſions, as to make ſeveral bold puſhes for their liberty, eſpecially in the reign of Veſpaſian. We have given an account of it in a former volume [p], as well as of the peace that emperor thought fit to clap up with them, rather

(Y) Amongſt thoſe that ſuffered the effects of his fury and avarice, was the city of Vienne, againſt which that of Lyons had inſtigated him, as having aided the late noble Vindex in his revolt. They were therefore forced to buy their pardon from him by an immenſe ſum, beſides a donative of 300 ſeſterces, the ſurrender of all their arms, and furniſhing his army with proviſions.

As he drew nearer the Alps, he ordered the city of Lucus a municipal town of the Vocontii, now Dauphiné, to be ſet on fire, becauſe they expreſſed a backwardneſs to pay him the large ſum he had exacted from them; and thus he went on extorting all the way he paſſed, whilſt Cæcina did the ſame among the Helvetii, who, not having been appriſed of Galba's death, refuſed to acknowledge Vitellius; but, upon their ſubmiſſion, they were at length pardoned by him (25).

than to exasperate them to turn their arms against him at that juncture [q]. In Adrian's time this province was visited by that emperor in his progress through the empire, and as it had been greatly oppressed and impoverished during the former reigns, he left, wherever he passed through it, some tokens of his pity and munificence to that nation, and built some stately edifices there, especially a sumptuous palace, in honour of Plotina, Trajan's widow. He forgot not at the same time, to repair all the Roman towns and fortresses in that country, to keep them in subjection [r], as it actually did, no considerable revolt happening during his and some of the succeeding reigns. All this while they seem to have made no inconsiderable figure, or bore a small sway, since, in that famous contest between Severus and his competitors, the Gauls having first saluted him emperor, their example was followed by almost all the provinces in Europe, and he was every-where acknowledged and received with the loudest acclamations [s]. He proved, however, very ungrateful to them, at least to the christians in this country, having raised a bloody persecution against them, instigated thereto by his favourite Plautianus, who took occasion of a soldier's refusing to wear a crown as a donative, to seize on the estates of all the christians of rank and quality, and to put a great number of them to death, and amongst them Ireneus, the worthy bishop of Lyons [t]. Gaul was again made the scene of war, in the famed contest between Gallienus and Posthumius, the latter of whom had delivered this province from the dominion of the Germans, under which it had groaned for some time, and for which he had been acknowledged emperor both there, and in Spain and Britain, of which we have already given a full account in the Roman history [u]. The latter having been murdered by his soldiers, for debarring them from the plundering of Mentz [w], Lollianus got himself proclaimed emperor of that part of it which borders upon the Rhine; whilst Victorinus, whom Posthumius had taken for his collegue, governed over the rest. Both these being soon after murdered, as we have there related, and the son of the latter, then an infant, being named his successor, the Gauls murdered him likewise, and set up in his room one M. Aurelius Marius, formerly an armourer, but a man of extraordinary courage and strength; but he being likewise run through by a soldier, who had been formerly his journeyman, and with a sword, as himself told him, of his own making, P. Pivesus, or Pesuvius Tetricus, a man of senatorial and consular dignity, was proclaimed in all this province, vince, and soon after acknowledged in Spain and Britain. Tetricus did not long enjoy his dignity, before the constant jars and mutinies which happened in his army, as well as the approach of the emperor Aurelian, who had restored peace in all other parts of the empire, and was marching to reunite Gaul and Britain to it, made him wish to be fairly rid of it. There is even some reason to suspect, that he invited him into Gaul; and though he made a faint opposition against him at the battle of Chalons, yet, upon the first onset, he yielded himself to that emperor; so that the Gallish troops, for want of a leader, were intirely cut off, and this province again reduced to its former obedience [x]. This action quite completed the conquest of Gaul, and Tetricus, whether to cover his treachery in abandoning his troops, or because he did not make his submission soon enough, was led in triumph by that emperor; but was soon after advanced, and loaded with honours and titles by him, as we have formerly seen [y]. In Constantine's time, who is supposed to have been the person who first divided the whole empire into four parts, each containing a number of provinces, or, as they were then called, dioceses, and each of these four parts put under the government of a distinct præfectus prætorio, which was before only under two, Gaul being made one of those dioceses, and had its provinces assigned to it; we have already had occasion to mention them in this chapter, and in a former volume *; and shall not repeat it here, but only add, that the Gallic præfect had Gaul, Spain, and Britain, under him.

We should now come to the latter part of the Gallish history, and give an account of the horrid ravages this country since suffered from the Germans, the Hunns, especially under Attila, under the Vandals, and especially under the Goths, or Visigoths, and Burgundi, who formed themselves into distinct kingdoms here, and held them, through a series of princes, till dispossessed of them by the Franks: but as these have already been spoken of in the course of the Roman history [z], and must be resumed in that of those northern invaders, in the chapters hereafter following, we shall refer our readers to them as they come in course, and proceed now to the history of the antient Germans.

CHAP. XII.

The hiſtory of the antient Germans, to their breaking into the Roman empire, invaſion of Gaul, and expulſion out of it by the Franks.

IT is univerſally acknowledged, that the farther northward we move from antient Gaul, the more we are in the dark about the nations that inhabited the vaſt regions beyond the Rhine and the Danube, which, we have ſeen in the laſt chapter, were, in a great meaſure, the limits between the Gauls and them. Nothing is more uncertain than their origin, the countries they came from, and the territories they ſettled themſelves in: antient authors [a] commonly confound them under the names of Celtes, Scythians, and Celtoſcythians; and, among them, ſuch a great variety of people are comprehended, that it would be dangerous to apply that to the antient Germans which they write of them under thoſe other names, without ſome concurring circumſtances to confirm it. Yet we may venture to affirm, after no ſmall number of modern [b], and ſome of the antient, writers [c], that they were originally one and the ſame nation with the Celtes and Gauls, and both deſcended from the antient Gomerians, or deſcendants of Gomer, the eldeſt ſon of Japhet. Only the Germans were very much intermixed with the old Scythians and Sarmatians, on that ſide which joined with their territories, and particularly, as we hinted in the laſt chapter, between the two great rivers Rhine and Danube [d]: and theſe, no doubt, had adopted a great many of their cuſtoms among them, as well as intermingled ſome of their language with their own; but in all other parts of Germany we find ſuch an exact conformity in their religion, laws, cuſtoms, and (what may appear ſtill more ſurpriſing to the generality of readers, but has been fully proved by ſome of the modern authors laſt quoted) in their very language [e], as leaves ſcarce any room to doubt, but that they were deſcended from the ſame antient ſtock with the Celtes or Gauls, and came, by gradual migrations, from Aſia, as we have already ſhewn theſe did, both in a former volume, and at the entrance of the laſt chapter [f]. The truth is, as Pliny rightly obſerves [g], that the Germans were little known to the Romans, or, indeed, to any but their very neighbours, till a long time after the coming of M. Agrippa into thoſe parts; and many things which even Tacitus has written of them, pretendedly from their own relation, are apparently fabulous; ſo that we muſt fetch our intelligence from another quarter, even from thoſe moderns, who have with indefatigable pains endeavoured to ſtrike light out of darkneſs; among whom, beſides thoſe already mentioned, we may add two celebrated ones, viz. Renet and Maſcou, whoſe curious diſcoveries, in many points, have added no ſmall evidence to thoſe who had written before them on this head. So that, abating the almoſt unavoidable fondneſs, with which they have all of them endeavoured to give the preference to their own nation, in point of antiquity, into the merit of which it is not our buſineſs to enter, unleſs we could do it with greater certainty than the ſubject will poſſibly admit of, we may venture to follow them as ſure guides in other reſpects. If the evidence ſeems to lean on one ſide more than the other, we ſhould conclude it to be on that of the Gauls, not only as their origin can be more clearly traced from the antient Gomerians, as we have formerly ſeen; but as they are found ſeated in the beſt and nobleſt climate of the two, whilſt the Germans, as a younger branch, were, perhaps, forced to ſpread themſelves towards the more northern and inclement parts of Europe, till length of time gave them an opportunity of croſſing the Rhine, and poſſeſſing themſelves of the ſouthern provinces, as we have ſeen they did at the cloſe of the laſt chapter, and ſhall farther ſee at the ſequel of this.

Names. How this country came to be called Germany, and its inhabitants Germans, is not eaſy to gueſs; the reader may ſee the various conjectures about its etymon in the following note (A): but

(A) It is not eaſy to determine whether this word be of Celtic or Roman extract; if the latter, it muſt have been given by the Gauls, either on account of their nearneſs of kindred to them, or of that frequent aſſiſtance they called upon them for, againſt the domineering Romans, of which we have ſpoken in the concluſion of the laſt chapter.

but it is plain, it was not their original name, but is of a more modern date, and ſeems to have had its riſe on the other ſide of the Rhine, when the Condruſi, Eburones, Cæraſi, and Pæmani, croſſed that river, after the example of ſome others of their countrymen, and went to ſettle in Gaul. Theſe, it ſeems, were the firſt to whom the name of Germans was given, and which therefore extended no farther than the Rheniſh ſhore on the Gallic ſide, but ſoon after paſſed over to the other, and became common to other nations of the ſame original language and cuſtoms, till at length it became the general name of the whole nation, and the country called, from them, Germania, or Germany [h]. But whether it was given to them by the Gauls on their coming over to their aſſiſtance againſt the Romans, or by theſe on account of the affinity of their religion and cuſtoms, or, laſtly, whether aſſumed by them on their ſettling themſelves among the Gauls, and claiming by it a kindred to them, we will not venture to determine. One thing is plain, that it is not of Dutch extract; ſo that if they really called themſelves by it, as Tacitus ſays they did, it is ſurpriſing it ſhould not have been rather preſerved by them, and handed to us in their own language. If we may be allowed to offer a conjecture as to their primitive and general name, both from what we have obſerved from their original deſcent from the antient Gomerians or Celtes, and from ſeveral monuments they have left in ſeveral chapter. Tacitus, indeed, thinks they were called ſo by other nations, on account of their ſimilitude of religion, manners, &c. with the Gauls (1): but though this reſemblance was really true, in fact, yet the etymon itſelf ſeems too far fetched and ſtrained.

The other, which makes it of Celtic extract, is, indeed, much more natural, Ger and man, in that antient tongue, ſignifying a warlike or martial man, as, indeed, it is plain, that the Germans, as well as Gauls, did highly value themſelves on that account. They were likewiſe known by another name, viz. that of Alemanni, which, though ſuppoſed to have been given them by the Gauls, or French, becauſe only preſerved by them, who ſtill call them Alemans, and their country Alemanie, and Alemagne, and, as is pretended, on account of their intermixing, after Marobodus's retreat, with ſtrolers of all nations; yet to us that name appears to be rather of German extract, and ſignifies nearly the ſame as Ger-man, that is, altogether warlike: and this name may have been carried thither either by thoſe Germans who went thither to aſſiſt the Gauls againſt the Romans, or by thoſe who at length conquered that country, and are better known by the name of Franks.

parts of Germany, especially towards the north, such as Cimbrica Chersonesus, and such-like; it is not improbable, that they called themselves Cimri or Cymbri, which is but a harsher pronunciation of the original Gomerai: for these Cimbri are allowed to have been an antient, if not the antientest, people of Germany, and inhabited a very considerable part of that country. We have already hinted, that they gave their name to the Cimbrica Chersonesus, which was a kind of peninsula extending from the mouth of the river Elbe into the north sea [i]: and if they really were the same, as they were antiently supposed, with the Cimmerians that inhabited the countries about the Palus Mæotis, and Posidonius seems to confirm it, from the great likeness of their names [k], they must have spread themselves vastly along that northern tract. We are, moreover, told, by Strabo and Livy, that the Cimbri alone penetrated into Noricum and Illyricum, and, about the 640th year of the Roman æra, defeated the consul Papyrius Carbo near Noreia [l]. Some years after, they sent an embassy to Rome, to desire the senate to assign them lands to inhabit in, in consideration of which they would serve them in their future wars. Their suit being denied, gave occasion to a bitter war which they waged against them, in conjunction with the Tigurini, of which we shall have further occasion to speak, and which is only hinted here, to shew how powerful and numerous they were by this time, and how, probably, they were some branch of the old Gomerai, and the antientest inhabitants of Germany. We shall see, in the sequel, their valour, and various fortunes, against the Romans, Gauls, and other nations. As for those who remained in their native country, or returned thither after their defeat, they, in time, joining in their excursions with the Saxons, who likewise inhabited some parts of the forementioned peninsula, it is supposed, that they became so blended with them, that their name was swallowed up in that of Saxon, so that nothing was retained of it but the denomination of Cimbrica, which was still given both to their country, and to the sea that surrounded it. The name of Allemanns and Alemans, still retained by the French, we have spoken of under the last note; that of Teutones, from which their present one of *Teutsch*en, or Dutch, is thought to be derived, is another by which they were antiently known, and is of a much older date than that of Germans, but the etymon of which is not easily guessed at, unless we fetch it from the Celtic Theut, as we shall shew further in the sequel. These, according to Mela [m], an-tiently inhabited the neighbouring coasts and islands of the east, or Baltic, sea; but growing too numerous for those narrow territories, the most daring part went, with their wives and families, to seek new settlements in other countries; but when, and where, is not easy to guess (B). We shall see them, in the sequel of this history, often joined with the Cimbri, Cimbranes, and others, and making excursions into Gaul, Italy, and Spain, till at length a number of them, who were left to guard the heavy baggage along the Rhine, being greatly harrassed on all sides, fought their way quite to Belgic Gaul, where they settled, and became, in time, known by the name of Atuatici [n].

Atuatici in Belgia.

THUS much shall suffice for the most noted common names of the antient Germans. A vast variety of others they had, according to their particular tribes, cantons, kingdoms, and commonwealths, which being in a continual fluctuation, as they were continually either warring and jostling each other out of their habitations, or were jostled out of them by the Gauls, who were frequently throwing in new colonies over the Rhine, sometimes penetrating as far as the Hercynian forest, at others spreading themselves far and wide, along the sides of it, and beyond; insomuch, that, as we observed in the last chapter, there was scarcely a country from that river to the east sea, or the most northern verge, but had some of that nation either intermixed with the Germans, or settled in some territories between them; it were labour lost to endeavour to fix their different abodes, or even to offer any conjectures about them, or of their various governments, laws, and manner of life. They, like the Gauls, never committed any thing to writing concerning either that or their own history, and were still more unknown than they, both to the Romans and Greeks, even in their very names, till the times that, by intercourse with, or by their wars against, the former, they became, by degrees, more and more known unto them, and their names, countries, and history, recorded by their writers. In our settling, therefore, the confines of Germany, [n] L. iii.

(B) According to one author, they joined with the Cimbri, and, having crossed the Rhine, invaded some of the Gallish territories (2), but we have seen, a little higher, out of Livy and Strabo, that the Cimbri had long enough before invaded some of those provinces, then under the Roman yoke, and had settled themselves in them: so that it is not easy to determine whether this Teutonic expedition fell upon Gaul, Italy, or any still more distant regions.

and of thoſe cantons and territories which each different nation of that vaſt tract of ground poſſeſſed, we ſhall go no farther back than the epocha in which they became fully known to them.

The extent and limits of Germany.

WE took notice in the preceding chapter, that the Rhine, according to the Roman authors, divided the antient Gauls from the Germans on the weſt, and the Danube on the ſouth; the Hercynian foreſt, at that time reckoned impenetrable, confined them on the north, and the German and northern ocean on the north-weſt, and Scythia and Sarmatia on the eaſt, where they were as much intermixed with thoſe two nations, as they were on the weſt with the Gauls, and where it is ſtill more difficult to fix their boundaries, by reaſon of their conſtant fluctuation, and change of abode, as they ſo frequently invaded and drove each other out of them.

OF thoſe ſeveral nations which the Romans reckoned of German extract, we ſhall have the leſs to ſay in this chapter, becauſe we have given as full an account of them as could be extracted out of thoſe antient writers in a former volume, to which we ſhall refer, as we go on, in enumerating them, that the reader may readily find all that can be known of them, and the authorities there referred to for what is ſaid of them. We have already ſpoken of the Cimbri, and their neighbours the Saxons, who inhabited the Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, on the other ſide of the Elbe. On this ſide of that river were the Chauci, upper and lower, who were divided from each other by the Viſurges, now the Veſer; their country contained what is now called Bremen and Lunenburgh, Friezland and Groninghen; and the upper had the Cheruſci, and the lower the Chamavi on the ſouth-eaſt, and the German ocean on the north-weſt [o]. The Friſii, upper and lower, were divided from the lower Chauci by the river Amiſia, now Ems; and from each other by an arm of the Rhine [p]. Their country ſtill retains the name of Friezland, and is divided into eaſt and weſt; but the latter of the two is now diſmembered from Germany, and is one of the ſeven united provinces: from them were parted by the Iſcla, now Iſel, the country of the Bructeri, ſince called Broekmorland, and the Marſi, ſituate about the river Luppia, or Luppe, of whom we have alſo formerly given an account [q]. On the other ſide of that river were the Uſipii, or Uſipetes [r], but theſe were famed for often changing their habitation, and are therefore found in other territories; the Tenctteri were next to them, and next to theſe the Jubones, or inhabitants of Juliers, between the Maeſe and the Rhine: the Catti, another antient warlike people, who inhabited part of Heſſe and Thuringia, from the Hartzian mountains to the Rhine and Weſer, and of whom we have formerly ſpoken [s]; among whom were comprehended the Mattiaci, whoſe capital was called from them Mattiacum, by ſome taken to be Marpurgh, and by others Baden, on account of its hot waters [t]. Next to them were the Seduſii, bordering upon Swabia; Nariſci, or antient inhabitants of Northgow, whoſe capital is the famed city of Nurembergh; and the Marcomanni, whoſe country antiently reached from the Rhine to the head of the Danube and to the Neckar: here were the famed Agri decumales, ſo called, among other reaſons, for their being taxed a tenth part of their produce by the Romans. The Marcomanni afterwards went and ſettled in Bohemia and Moravia, under their general Maroboduus, and ſome of them in Gaul, whence they drove the Boii, who had ſeated themſelves there [u].

On this ſide of the Rhine, between that river and the Moſa, or Moeſe, were the Ubii, who were brought over by Agrippa. Their metropolis was Colonia Agrippina, ſo called from the empreſs of that name, who founded it, and now Cologn [w]; and next to them the Tungri, which are ſuppoſed to be the ſame whom Cæſar calls Eburones and Condruſi, and whoſe metropolis, then called Attuatica, is ſince known by the name of Tongres [x]. Higher up from them, and on the other ſide of the Moſel, were the Treviri, whoſe capital was Auguſta Treverorum, now Triers (C); next to them were the Tribocci, Nemetes, and Vangiones; the former dwelt in Alſatia, and their metropolis was called Argentinæ, and Argentoratum, now

(C) As Germany came to be divided into Prima and Secunda, the former being that which was neareſt the Alps, the Treviri have been ſuppoſed to have belonged to it (3), as they boaſted themſelves of German extraction; but this is much queſtioned by others, who rather think, that they, with ſome others who obtained their liberty, and are by Pliny (4) called liberæ civitates, were excluded from that diviſion (5). The other cities mentioned by that author were thoſe of the Nervii, Sueſſones, Sylvanectes, and Leuci; thoſe on the other hand of the Rhemi and Lingones in Gaul, that is, of the provinces of Rheims and Champagne, he there calls civitates fœderatæ.

The Treviri, however, became in time the principal nation of Belgica prima.

Straſburgh.

Straſburgh. The others lived in the cities of Worms, Spire, and Moguntia, now Mentz. Thoſe three, beſides the Treviri, mentioned in the laſt note, made the Germania prima; and thoſe below them the Germania ſecunda, and reached as far as the Maes and lower Rhine, and was divided from Belgia by the Demer and Scheld, which latter has always divided the ſees of Liege and Cambray. The Mediomatrici were ſituate along the Moſel, about the city of Metz in Lorrain; above them, on the ſame river Rhine, were ſeated the Raurici, called alſo Rauraci, and Rauriaci, another antient German nation, who inhabited that part of Helvetia, or Switzerland, about Baſil: their capital was Rauracum, or Auguſta Rauracorum[y].

BETWEEN the heads of the Rhine and of the Danube, were ſeated the antient kingdoms of Vindelicia, whoſe capital was called Auguſta Vindelicorum, now Auſburgh[z]; and below it, along the banks of the ſame river, thoſe of Noricum and Pannonia, the former of which was divided into Noricun Ripenſe, and Mediterraneum, and contained a great part of the provinces of Auſtria, Stiria, Carinthia, Tyrol, Bavaria, and ſome others of leſs note[a]; and the latter the kingdom of Hungary, divided into upper and lower, and extending from Illyricum to the Danube and the mountains Cætii, in the neighbourhood of Vindebona, now Vienna, the metropolis of Auſtria[b]. On the other ſide of the Danube, which was more properly called Germany, and Germania magna, beſides the Marcomanns (D), whom we have mentioned above as more properly ſituate between the Rhine and it, were the Hermunduri, whoſe country ran northwards from it, and extended itſelf along the Hercynian mountains quite up to the river Sala. Theſe poſſeſſed, particularly, the country now called Miſnia, in Upper Saxony, though ſome make their territories to have extended much farther, and to have reached quite to, and even beyond, the kingdom of Bohemia. On the other ſide of thoſe mountains was the above-mentioned kingdom of Boiohemum, now Bohemia[c], once one of the ſeats of the Boii; and beyond Vindelici.

(D) Theſe, the Quadi, and ſome others we ſhall have occaſion to mention, were of that tribe of antient Germans known by the name of Suevi: they antiently poſſeſſed a conſiderable part of Germany, that is, the greateſt part of it from the Rhine to the Elbe; but, in proceſs of time, ſome of them removed more northward, and ſettled along the Danube, whilſt another part went into Spain, and formed a kingdom there, as we ſhall ſhew in a ſubſequent chapter.

them, north of the Danube, was another seat of the Marcomanni along the river Albis, now Elbe; from which they spread themselves into Bohemia, and drove the Boii out of it, as we hinted a little higher: we have spoken of these in a former volume, to which we refer the reader [d]. The Quadi were situate next to Bohemia: their territories extended from the Danube to Moravia, and the northern part of Austria [e]; these are likewise comprehended under the antient name of Suevi, part of whom forced their way into Spain, and settled a kingdom there, as hinted under the last note. The Bastarnæ were situate eastward of the Quadi, and parted from them by the Granna, now Gran, a river that falls into the Danube, aud by the ridge of the Carpatian mountains, called from them Bastarnicæ Alpes: their country made, indeed, part of the European Sarmatia, and so out of the limits of Germania propria; but they antiently lived on this side of the Danube, were concerned with the Marcomanns, Quadi, Hermunduri, Suevi, and a number of other German nations, in the famed war against M. Antoninus [f], and are accounted of German extract by Pliny [g]; and it was not till the reign of Probus that they were transplanted over the Danube thither by that emperor, to repeople those countries which were become desolate by the wars and pestilence. These soon conformed to the Roman laws, and became one nation with the other inhabitants of that country [h]. We have formerly taken notice of that colony of them which was settled in Thrace by Probus [i]; but where the original seat of them was before their removal, is not easy to guess; it has been, for that reason, much questioned whether they were of German or Sarmatian extract: we, however, quoted Pliny in favour of the former opinion, who in another place makes them one of the five principal tribes of the German nation [k]. We may add to his evidence that of Strabo, who plainly distinguishes them from the Sarmatians; and that of Tacitus, who ranks them among the former [l]. We read of their assisting Perseus and Mithridates against the Romans [m], but, after their conquest by the latter, we hear no more of them by that name; probably the remainder of them united with the Goths, and as for those who stayed in their native country, if any such there were, they were, in all likelihood, blended with those Piecinigi, or

Patzinicæ,

Patzinicæ, which we find mentioned in the Byzantine and Poliſh hiſtory, and which Strabo and Tacitus mention in the place above quoted, with the Baſtarnæ and ſome other German tribes [o].

BETWEEN thoſe nations we have ſeen ſeated along the other ſide of the Danube and the Hercynian foreſt, were ſeveral other antient nations, of whom we know little more than their names, and about whoſe exact ſituation we are quite in the dark: ſuch as the Martingi, Burii, Borades, Lygii, or Logiones, and ſome others, who are placed by our geographers along the foreſt above-mentioned, between the Danube and the Viſtula. The Burii are reckoned the ſame with the Borades, and are mentioned as aſſiſtants to the Marcomanni in their war againſt M. Antoninus; and the Lygii, or Logiones, as aſſiſting Vibillius, king of the Hermunduri, againſt the haughty Vannius, king of the Suevi: and their bordering upon one another is collected from a paſſage of Pliny which places the latter between the Danube and the foreſt above-mentioned [p], but with no ſufficient exactneſs to lead us to the right ſituation of either: only the Sileſian hiſtorians affirm, that the Lygii and part of the Quadi remained ſtill in their own original country [q]. The laſt we ſhall mention on this ſide the Hercynian foreſt, were the famed Rætii, now Griſons, who were ſeated on the Alps: their country, which was antiently called Weſtern Illyricum, was divided into Rætia prima, or propria, and ſecunda, and was then of a much larger extent, ſpreading itſelf towards Swabia, Bavaria, and Auſtria. This country, and that of Noricum, and others, became a Roman province, and belonged to the kingdom of the Oſtrogoths in Italy; but upon the declenſion of it they fell under the dominion of the Franks, about which time the name of Bavarians firſt became noted in hiſtory [r].

(E) At leaſt we find them ſo ſtyled by Pliny, and other antient authors: but we muſt here remind our reader of what has been heretofore occaſionally obſerved with reſpect to thoſe authors, that they ſo often confound the Celtæ and Scythians, that it is not eaſy to gueſs whether thoſe antient Suevi or Germans, whom they allow to be of Celtic extract, were really ſo, or of Scythian breed. But from the nearer likeneſs of manners, language, &c to the latter, one would be more apt to think they derived their original from them. However, the truth ſeems to be, that both Celtæ and Scythians

Viſtula to the Elbe, and beyond, though they in time did, at leaſt a great part of them, either penetrate through that foreſt, or wind themſelves about it, and came and ſettled in the more pleaſant ſouthern parts of Europe, ſuch as Belgium, Gaul, and even Spain, as ſhall be ſeen in the ſequel. The moſt famous of theſe were the Longobardi, ſo called, according to ſome, on account of their wearing long beards; but, according to others, on account of their conſiſting of two nations, viz. the Bardi and Lingones; theſe dwelt along the river Elbe, and bordered ſouthward on the Chauci, mentioned a little higher, and both theſe were reduced by Tiberius, as we have ſhewn in a former volume [s]. But the Longobardi, having paſſed the Danube, invaded and defeated the Heruli [t], did afterwards croſs the Alps, and ſettled in Italy, where they founded the kingdom of Lombardy [u], and, in proceſs of time, quite forgot their antient German, and adopted that of Italy [w]. The Burgundi are the next of note. Pliny affirms them likewiſe of German extract, and ranks them with the Vindili, Varini, Carini, Guttones and Ingevones, which laſt he makes to have been a mixed people, partly Cimbric, partly Teutonic, and partly Chauci [x]. It were labour loſt to inquire after their original ſeat (F), but it is plain they were, like their other neighbours, inticed to exchange it for a better; and, having penetrated firſt into Germany, where they aſſiſted Valentinian againſt the Alemanni [y], they afterwards croſſed the Rhine, and ſettled in aul, Gwhere they founded a kingdom in that province, which ſtill retains the name of Burgundia, as we ſhall ſee in ſome of the ſubſequent chapters. The Semnones, likewiſe, left their old habitation, and ſettled about the Lionnois in Gaul: we find them ſeated about the Elbe, in Tiberius's time, and, in conjunction with the Hermunduri and other Germans, bravely ſtriving to obſtruct his croſſing that river [z]; but at what time they paſſed from thence into Gaul, is

were in all theſe parts ſo intermixed and blended together, eſpecially from the Rhine eaſtward and northward, that all thoſe antient Germans bid fair to be the offspring of that mixture, rather than of either Scythic or Celtic original properly ſo called.

(F) Some have imagined the Burgundi and Burgundians to have been two different people, but without any probability, ſince they are mentioned by ſome antient authors at the ſame nation, though under thoſe two different names; and that is, Marcellinus calls them Burgundi, whom St Jerom and Oroſius call Burgundiones.

not eaſy to gueſs: but they fell upon one of the moſt fruitful parts of that kingdom, and there grew ſo rich and conſiderable, that they are thought to have been called Sennones on that very account, it being an old Celtic word, which ſignifies opulent and venerable (G), as we have had occaſion to ſhew in the hiſtory of the Gauls [z]. Theſe three were the moſt noted nations on the other ſide of the Hercynian foreſt, to which we ſhall only add the names of ſome others, though ſcarcely known to us by any thing elſe: ſuch are the Aviones, Reudigni, Eudoles, and Swardones, whom we find placed between the Elbe and the Sucvus, or Viader, on the north of the Longobardi; the Rugii, Lemnovii, Heruli, Gothones, or Gothini, the Sidui Carini, between the laſt mentioned river and the Viſtula: as for the Angli, Saxi, Goths, Hunns, &c. they will be ſpoken of in ſome of the following chapters. But before we paſs farther, we muſt not omit the country of the Æſtii, an antient tribe of the Suevi, who inhabited along the coaſts of the eaſt

(G) Some have, indeed, ſought the etymon of this name from the Greek, and think they were ſo called from the word ξένος, ſtranger, new-comer; on account of their being ſome of the laſt German nations that came over the Rhine into Gaul (8). Accordingly, a Roman hiſtorian tells us (9), that they were the very laſt of all the ſtrangers that came thither. Servius, indeed, thinks they were at firſt called ξένους, and afterwards ξέρωνας becauſe they received Bacchus into their country.

But if we muſt have recourſe to the Greek, would not the word Σεμνὸς afford us a better etymon, as it is more like the name of the antient Semnones than that of Senonas or Xenonas? We read of Semna myſteria, and Semnai theai, in which the word implies ſomething venerable or awful, and might be either taken up by the Semnonic tribe, or given them by their neighbours, either on account of their opulence, or the great ſway they bore above the reſt, all which doth well agree with their hiſtory. But we would rather chuſe to ſtick to the Celtic, which doth ſtill more cloſely ſquare to it than to the Greek, which, how like ſoever to it in moſt things, doth yet ſometimes deviate from the original deſign and meaning, eſpecially as to ſuch appellatives as this we are upon: and if we obſerve, that in ſeveral provinces of Gaul, even to this day, the natives never pronounce an m before an n, but like an nn, we may perhaps find out the moſt probable etymon for the words ſenex, ſenatus, ſenator, ſenior, ſeniorati, ſeneſchal, carta ſenica, and many others of the like import, in which the mn was gradually abſorbed into nn, and this laſt ſoftened into a ſingle one.

sea (H), so famed for the great plenty of amber that was found there, especially along those of Prussia, and for the vast quantity that was fetched from thence both by the Greeks and Romans, of which we find particular mention in most antient authors, such as Herodotus [b], Diodorus Siculus [c], Pytheas Massilienſis, as quoted by Pliny [d], but especially by Tacitus [e], who has given us a very curious description of it, as well as of these Æstii, who gathered and sold it to them. These, he says, worshipped the mother of the gods, and placed such confidence in her safeguard, that they scarcely knew the use of iron weapons, or any other sort but cudgels. They were more industrious than the rest of the Germans in cultivating their corn and other fields, and dived into the seas and rivers for amber, which is a commodity peculiar to them, and which was of little use to them, except to sell it to strangers, rough and unwrought, as they gathered it. He then goes on in describing the nature of that wonderful gum, according to the notion they then had of it, which we need not here dwell upon, but from which, as well as from what other antient authors have writ of it, we may infer, that it was in very high esteem in those days. In Nero's reign, by which time the Romans had wholly set aside the thoughts of conquering Germany, one of that emperor's favourites persuaded him to send thither a kind of embassy to buy it there upon the spot, and at the first hand [f]. The thing was accordingly done, and the Roman knight, who was at the head

(H) So called, in all probability, from their inhabiting those coasts of the east sea, containing part of Prussia, Courland, and Livonia. These, as well as their neighbours the Gothini, were not unknown to Tacitus, who has given us a succinct description of their religion, customs, and language; in all which they differed so little from the Celtes, or old Gauls, that we may take it as a further proof, that the antient Germans and they were but distinct branches of the same nation, as we observed at the beginning of this and the last chapter. What is still more observable is, that our author tells us, that their language differed but little from the old British, that is, from the old Celtic or Cimerian; the Britons, who were a branch of these, or rather the same nation under a different name, that was given them on account of their painting their bodies, the word Brit, in the old Celtic, signifying the same as Pict or painted, and both Britons and Cimmerians retaining the same tongue not only then, but even to this day, as we have had frequent occasion to observe, both in the last chapter, and in the history of the antient Celtes (10).

of this expedition, ſetting out from Carnuntum, a fortreſs on the banks of the Danube (I), arrived at the place, and met with a kind reception from the Æſtii, from whom he bought and brought away, according to Solinus [g], 13,000 pounds weight of that commodity, which was deſigned, it ſeems, by one of their kings, as a preſent to the emperor; and among it there was a piece which muſt have been of very great value, if it be true, what another author affirms, that it weighed alone thirteen pounds [h]. We find in Caſſiodorus, a letter ſent by Theodoric, king of the Goths, to the Æſtii, wherein he thanks them for a noble parcel they had ſent to him of the ſame precious drug [i], and wherein he promiſes them his friendſhip, which, it ſeems, they were endeavouring to obtain by this embaſſy and valuable preſent. By this letter it ſhould ſeem, that the inhabitants were wholly ignorant whence it came, and how it was formed; for ſo their embaſſadors told that monarch; and added, that the ſea threw it upon their coaſts. Theſe Æſtii were ſtill famed among other German nations on the eaſt ſea, in the time of Charles the great [k]. We read of the Scirri, Hirri, Galindi, and Sudeni, in Ptolemy, which ſome have endeavoured to prove were to be reckoned among the Æſtii [l], or antient inhabitants of Pruſſia, but with very little likelihood: as for the name of Pruſſia, it is of much more recent date, as ſhall be ſeen in the modern part of this work. All that needs be added, with reſpect to the Æſtii, is, that they were at length conquered, with ſome other nations, by Ermanaric, king of the Goths [m].

(I) Carnuntum was a fortreſs in Upper Pannonia, on the ſame ſide with Vienna, and was a kind of boundary between the frontiers of the Germans and Pannonians (II). If, therefore, this embaſſy ſet out from thence, as our author affirms, and it be very unlikely they ſhould ſail up the Danube, and down the Rhine, in order to coaſt it round to the Pruſſian coaſts; it may be inferred, that the Hercynian foreſt muſt have had ſome paſſage cut acroſs, for them to go thither by land: and as we are told they paſſed through the country of the Gothiones, or Gothini, in their way thither, we may conclude it probable, that they ſailed down the Viſtula, at the very mouth of which were the Electridæ inſulæ, or Amber iſlands, ſo called from that commodity being either gathered upon thoſe coaſts, or brought thither as to a mart by the Æſtii.

ON

Gepidæ, their extract, and kingdom.

On this side of the Æstii, and, as is supposed, near the mouth of the Vistula, now Weychsel, were the Gepidæ; and farther north, on the coasts of the east sea, between these and the Æstii, were the Chaiboni. It is not easy to determine whether these two were of German, Scythic, or Gothic, extract: the Gepidæ are indeed affirmed to be Germans by some antient authors [n]; but we have had frequent occasion to observe, that they frequently confound those nations, so that we cannot readily depend upon them: were we allowed to offer a conjecture of our own, we should rather think them of Celtic origin. We have already observed, in the Gaulish history, that the Celtes had spread themselves towards the farthermost parts of the north, as the Cimbrians in the Cimbrica Cherjonesus, and the Teutones (K) in the islands adjacent: and, indeed, it seems as if

(K) We have already hinted some conjectures concerning the etymon of that word at the entrance of this chapter, and in a former volume, in speaking of the Titans. The old Celtes boasted themselves sprung from the god Theutat, or Mercury, whom Cæsar calls Dis (12), the name of that deity after his death, or apotheosis, as we shewed in the last chapter, and Tacitus Twiston (13); and upon that account did, in all probability, take the name of Teutates from him, which, by length of time, variety of dialects, and of hands, through which it passed, diversified itself into Teutoni, Teutones, Teutonarii, Teutobodiaci, Tectosagi, Tauriski, Tautantii, Teudesci, and Teutschen, which two last names they still retain in Germany and Italy.

That this name is very antient, and common to all the Celtes, we have shewn in the parts of their history above quoted, and we shall beg leave to add a pregnant testimony of it, which is as follows: Servius observes, that the city of Pisa had received its name from Pisus, a king of the Celtes, who founded it; and presently after, upon the authority of Cato, adds, that the Teutones were settled in that country long before the Hetrusci made themselves masters of it. The city itself, says he, was called Teuta, and the inhabitants Theutas (14).

As to the Tectosagi, we find a tribe of them in the neighbourhood of Thalouse in old Gaul, who were surnamed Volsci, of whom we spoke in the last chapter. Cæsar and Strabo mention another tribe, who were seated about the Hercynian forest, and make the former of them to be descended from the Gaulish (15). We find the

if thoſe antient Gomerians were either elbowed by new comers, farther and farther northwards, as our Welch were here in England; or, if we ſuppoſe them to have been Celtic colonies, ſent afterwards in ſearch of new habitations, as they were often forced to do for want of room, that they found the more temperate parts already ſo well inhabited, that they were forced to take up with ſuch climates as they found ſtill uninhabited by reaſon of their extreme coldneſs. In either caſe the Cimbrians, Teutones, Gepidæ, Chaiboni, and Æſtii, being found all in one line, and under the ſame climate, may, probably enough, have been all of the ſame extract, conſidering the conformity of their manners, language, &c. but we only offer this as a conjecture. Of the Chaiboni, indeed, we know but little, except what we read of their invading Gaul in the time of Dioclesian °, and of their being totally routed by Conſtantine the great ᵖ. The Gepidæ are famed in hiſtory for having reared themſelves into an early kingdom, and extending their territories into Pannonia, and taking the famed city of Sirmium, or Sirmiſh, from the emperor Marcian (L); as likewiſe for their wars with the Teutones and Teutonarii ſpread far and wide about the Baltic, and Scandinavia had ſcarcely any other inhabitants but Teutones, if we may believe Pliny and Mela (16). Among the Gallogreeks, or Galatians, we find two tribes, one of which had the name of Tectosagi, and the other Teutobodiaci, or Tolſtobogi (17). The name of Tauriſci can hardly come from any other than Thaut-rich, the kingdom of Thaut, and that of Thaulantii from Thaut-landt, the land of Thaut. All theſe, put together, ſufficiently ſhew, that they were originally, or boaſted themſelves ſuch, the deſcendants or ſubjects of Theut, or Mercury, once the famed monarch of the greateſt part of Europe (18).

(L) It ſeems that emperor had ſuppreſſed the annual penſion which he had engaged to pay to them; upon which, they, under the conduct of their king Ardaric, who had already conquered Dacia, paſſed the Danube, and added ſome part of Pannonia to their kingdom. As for Sirmium, it was the metropolis of Lower Pannonia; and though it was afterwards deſtroyed by lightning (19), and ſince then reduced to a mere village by the Turks, yet it was celebrated heretofore for two Arian councils held in it under Conſtantius, viz. an. 351. and 357. and for being the birth place of Photinus (20).

Goths,

Goths, Burgundians, and eſpecially the Romans [q], for their invaſion of Germany and Belgia, and for the terrible havock they made in both, in conjunction with the Quadi, Vandals, and other northern nations, of which St. Jerom gives us a particular and dreadful account [r], as may be ſeen by the abſtract in the margin (M). They kept themſelves in poſſeſſion of all Dacia, till the emperor Juſtin's reign, when, being left in the lurch by that prince, and Cunemund, their laſt king, being overthrown and killed by Alboin, king of the Longobards, there was a final end put to their kingdom. The Abares, who were allied with Alboin, took poſſeſſion of Dacia, and the whole Gepidæan nation was ſo thoroughly diſperſed [s], as never to recover itſelf again. Some of them we find accompanying that conqueror's expedition into Italy [t], and the reſt went and refuged themſelves where they could (N), as we ſhall ſee in a ſubſequent chapter.

(M) Theſe barbarians broke down, like an inundation, not only on Upper and Lower Germany, but into Gaul likewiſe, and as far as even Spain. In the former they deſtroyed, among other cities, thoſe of Straſburgh, Spire, Worms, and Mentz; and in Belgia thoſe of Rheims, Amiens, Tournay, Arras, and Terouane; and carried the inhabitants captive into Germany. They likewiſe ravaged, in a woful manner, the provinces of Aquitania, Lugdunenſis, and Narbonenſis, and carried off an immenſe plunder. The reſt the reader may find in the letter above quoted.

(N) It is ſuppoſed, that the poor remains of the Gepidæ took refuge under the emperor Juſtinian, and that he took, upon that account, the title of Gepidicus, which we find afterwards added to the imperial ones, as appears by the preamble of ſome of his ſucceſſors letters, eſpecially that of Maurice, who ſtyles himſelf there, Alemannicus, Gothicus, Anticus, Vandalicus, Herulicus, Gepidicus, Africanus, &c (21).

As for the unfortunate Cunemund, the uſe which Alboin made of his body was, to make a drinking cup of his ſcull, a cuſtom deſcended to them from their barbarous anceſtors, of which we have had occaſion to ſpeak, in the hiſtory of the Celtes and Scythians, and which, it appears by this, was ſtill rife among a vaſt many nations of their deſcendants, ſo many ages after their embracing chriſtianity. As to the Gepidæ, we have nothing to add concerning them, but that they profeſſed Arianiſm in common with the Goths (22), as will be ſeen in ſome of the following chapters.

Thus

THUS much ſhall ſerve for the names and ſituation of the antient Germans, according to their different tribes and nations at the time of the Romans firſt invaſion of them, as far as a ſubject ſo involved in darkneſs and confuſion can be brought into any tolerable light and order. In Auguſtus's reign it was divided into Germania Prima and Secunda, that is, Upper and Lower, as we hinted above, and guarded by eight legions of Roman forces, which were, according to cuſtom, employed in making high roads, new fortifications, and other uſeful works, whenever they were not engaged in the field [u]. This diviſion ſeems to have continued till about the time of the emperor Jovinus, when, though the conſtitution ſtill ſubſiſted with regard to Germania Prima, yet it was then, in all probability, loſt, with reſpect to Germania Secunda, which was by that time become, in a great meaſure, ſubject to the Franks: for in the Notitia Imperii, which is thought to have been written then about, though the ſtate of Belgica Prima and Secunda be there ſtill intire, yet there is no farther mention of Germania Secunda.

Germany, how divided.

As for the country of Germany itſelf, we have ſuch a dreadful account given us of it, both by Cæſar and Tacitus [w], even of thoſe parts of it which lie under a more temperate climate, that one would think it almoſt incredible that ſuch a brave nation as that would have been contented to live in it, when they wanted neither ſtrength nor courage to have broken their way into others, more pleaſant and fruitful. Nor would one be able to know the worſt parts of it, as they are now, by the deſcription they give us of the beſt. According to them, it was barren, uncultivated, and frightful all over; and even its variety of ſoil and climate added to the horror of it, from the dreadful foreſts, ſtinking and unwholſome bogs, the inclemency of its winds, dampneſs of its ſeas, lakes, and rivers, and harſhneſs of its ſoil. But as, on the one hand, we muſt allow for exaggeration in hiſtorians, who plainly ſought in every thing to magnify their own courage and proweſs, by the difficulties and hardſhips they met with in the conqueſts of thoſe countries and nations; ſo we muſt grant, on the other, that the Romans proved the means of cultivating thoſe, till then, barren and inhoſpitable territories, by cutting down great numbers of foreſts, draining wet and marſhy grounds, and other ſuch-like improvements as they were able to admit of. So that we need not now tell our readers, that this pretended barrenneſs and unhealthineſs was rather owing to the ſupineneſs of the inhabitants, than to any defect in its ſoil or climate, ſince we find it now capable of bearing all ſorts of grain, vines, fruit, and even foreign plants, in great abundance and due maturity. And thus far may be owned, that the coming of the Romans into Germany, as well as into Gaul, contributed much to the fertiliſing and enriching of thoſe two countries, which, till then, had been wholly neglected by both nations, who, as we hinted in the laſt chapter, thought this, and every occupation, beſides the martial trade, too much below their fierce and warlike genius.

Vines, when firſt brought thither.

We are told, in particular, that the emperor Probus was the firſt who permitted vines to be brought into Gaul and Germany, and to be planted along the Rhine and Moſel, and other parts [x] (O).

Foreſts.

Among thoſe many woods and foreſts with which this country abounded, perhaps, more than any other on this ſide of the Rhine, was that famed one called the Hercynian, and, by the Greeks, Orcinian foreſt, the longeſt and thickeſt in Europe, and reckoned by Julius Cæſar to have extended ſixty days journey in length, and nine in breadth. We have given an account of it in a former volume, to which we refer [y]: all that we need to add is, that not only this, but all the foreſts, woods, and groves, in Germany, even the trees, boughs, and leaves, of it, were reckoned ſacred; and this is the reaſon why the antient Germans made it a piece of their religion not to cut them down, unleſs it be ſome branches of the oak, and ſome other trees which they carried with them, on particular ſolemnities [z]; but ſince their conqueſt by the Romans, a good many were cut down, partly for conveniency, and partly out of a diſlike of thoſe ſuperſtitious and bloody rites, which were performed in them. Many more were deſtroyed, ſince their embracing of chriſtianity, upon the ſame account, and ſome are yet ſtill remaining; and, amongſt others, one which is known by the name of the black foreſt: the Bacenian is another famed one, which parted the Suevi from the Cheruſci, by ſome ſuppoſed to be that of Thuringia, and by others the black foreſt laſt mentioned. The Cæſian foreſt, or Cæſia Sylva, was likewiſe very famous: ſome ſuppoſe it to have likewiſe been a remnant of the Hercynian, and part of it remains ſtill in the dutchies of Cleves and Weſtphalia. Tacitus tells us of a famous one dedicated to Hercules, and called, from him, the Herculean foreſt [a]; but it doth not appear that they had, as yet, adopted either that, or any other Roman deities: ſo that if there was any ſuch foreſt of that name, it muſt have been called ſo upon ſome other account than a religious one. For, as we have obſerved in the laſt chapter, the Germans made a much longer ſtand againſt the Roman polytheiſm than the Gauls [b].

RIVERS of note they had in abundance, of which we ſhall only mention the moſt conſiderable ones, and what is moſt remarkable in them. At the head of theſe may juſtly be placed the Danube, now Iſter, by far the largeſt in Europe. It has its riſe in Swabia, and flowing through that province, and thoſe of Bavaria, Auſtria, Hungary, Servia, Bulgaria, Moldavia, Beſſarabia, and part of Tartary, and receiving about ſixty other rivers in its courſe, falls into the Euxine or Black Sea, in two arms. It was once the boundary between Sarmatia and Germany, but became afterwards ſubject to the Romans to its very ſource, under the emperor Trajan (P). The Rhine, another famous river, which antiently divided Germany from Gaul, and ſprings from the Rhætian Alps in the weſtern borders of Switzerland, and northern of the Griſons: as it riſes from two ſprings, which unite their waves near Chur, now Coire; ſo it divided itſelf into two ſtreams, one of which falls into the Maeſe, and the other into the German ocean: upon both accounts, perhaps, it is called, by Virgil, Rhenus bicornis, or bicorniger. It has now no paſſage into that ocean, but with the Maeſe above-mentioned, below Bricl, unleſs that branch of the one part of it called the Yſſel, which empties itſelf into the

(P) We are told, that he eſtabliſhed at Zarmiſogethuſa, the capital of Sarmatia, the famed colony called Ulpia Trajana, laid a bridge over the Danube, as appears from ſeveral antient medals, and, particularly, by the column erected in honour of him, and the explanation given us of it by the authors quoted in the margin (25).

Zuyder-Zee, may be ſaid to do it [c]. This mouth, which was antiently known to the Romans by the name of Flavum, and ſtill retains that of Vlie, or Flie, had a ſtrong caſtle built by it, to guard the paſſage out of the Zuyder, or ſouth, into the north, ſea. As for the Rhine, it became afterwards a barrier between the Romans and the Germans, upon the overthrow of Varus by the latter, who unwiſely ſpent their time in deſtroying the fortreſſes of the former along that river, inſtead of purſuing the advantage of that ſignal victory; ſo that they only ſhortened the extent of the Roman territories, which before reached as far as the Weſer, if not beyond [d]. The ſame river did likewiſe part the Batavi from the other Germans, as has been formerly hinted [e]. Julius Cæſar, in one of his German triumphs, cauſed, among other pageantic figures, that of the Rhine to be carried; in imitation of which, it is judiciouſly obſerved, that his ſucceſſors did oftener triumph over, than conquer, it [f]. The Viſtula. Viſtula, now Weichſel, was another conſiderable river, which divided Germany from the European Sarmatia, whence the latter was called Germania Transviſtulana. It had its riſe in the Carpatian mountains in Higher Sileſia, and, croſſing the Hercynian foreſt, diſembogued itſelf, by three ſtreams, into the Baltic ſea, not far from Dantzic. The Drave, or Draw, ſprings from the Alps in the Tyroleſe, and, dividing Upper and Lower Hungary from Sclavonia, falls into the Danube near Eſſeck.
Moraw. The Moraw riſes in the confines of Bohemia, divides Moravia into two parts, and falls into the Danube not far from Vienna.
Nab. The Nab, in Nortgow, hath its ſource near that of the Main, and falls into the Danube a little above Ratiſbon.
Neckar. The Neckar, in Suabia, riſes from the black foreſt, not far from the Danube, but takes a different courſe, and falls into the Regen. Rhine. Regen riſes in Nortgow, on the borders of Bohemia, and empties itſelf into the Danube at Ratiſbon, thence called Veſer. Regenſburgh. The Veſer, antiently Viſurgis, deſcends from Franconia, and, paſſing by Bremen, falls into the German Elb. ocean between the mouths of the Elbe and Ems. The former of theſe, called by the Romans Albus, and by the Germans Elbe, Elle, and now Elb, is a very large and conſiderable one, and hath its ſpring in the mountains called the Giant Mountains, Montes Herœum, in Sileſia, on the confines of Bohemia, and, paſſing through it and Upper and Lower Saxony, falls into tropolis of Eaſt Friezland, and through the bay of Dullert, falls into the ſame ocean a little above the mouth of the Viſurgis, or Veſer. The Luppia, now Lippe, and Iſala, or Yſſel, fall, the one into the Rhine, below Cologn, and divided the Bructeri and Marſi from the Uſipii; and the other into the Foſſa Druſiana. The reſt, being of leſs note, we ſhall paſs by. Lippe.

CITIES of any conſideration the Germans did not begin to build till after the coming in of the Romans, but were divided into cantons and diſtricts, like the Gauls; and lived in villages, like them: even thoſe famous large ones they now have, were either moſt of them built by the Romans, or inlarged, beautified, and infranchiſed, by them (Q). Such were the city of Cologn, of which we have given an account in a former volume [g], and of its being called Agrippinæ. It was formerly called Colonia Ubiorum, and was their metropolis. It is commodiouſly ſituated on the Rhine, and in the circle of the lower Rhine, and is now the metropolis of the archbiſhopric of that name, an imperial city, and a famed univerſity. Colonia Trajana, another antient Roman colony below the former, by ſome thought to be the preſent Keyſerſwaert. Colonia Ulpia, now Cleves, the capital of Cleveland in Lower Germany, ſuppoſed to have been built by Julius Cæſar, as well as that of Bonn, antiently Bonna Julia, ſituate above Cologn, and on the ſame river. This laſt is now the reſidence of the electors of Cologn. Auſburgh, i. e. Auguſtus-burgh, antiently called Auguſta Vindelicorum [h], now the capital of Suabia; this is likewiſe an imperial city, very populous and trading, ſituate on the Lech, not far from the Danube, and famed, among other things, for the Auguſtan confeſſion, or confeſſion of Auſburgh, which is that of the Lutherans. Argentoratum, now Straſburgh in Alzacia, the antient capital of the Trebochi on the Rhine, is reckoned one of the antienteſt cities in Germany (R), and is now famed for Cologn. Auſburgh. Straſburgh

(R) And well it may, if what ſome German antiquaries pretend be true, that it was built 33 years before Abraham. But it will be time enough to believe it when they give us ſome further proofs of it than they have hitherto.

This place, we are told, was chiefly famed, in antient times, for a living well, or ſpring, which was uſed for the waſhing and purifying of the victims which were offered up by their prieſts, and for its magnificent cathedral, and the ſpire and curious clock of it, of which we ſhall ſay ſomething more in the ſequel; but, above all, for a living well, incloſed in that church, which was originally dedicated to ſuperſtitious and heatheniſh uſes, ſuch as we have mentioned in the laſt note. Triers, another antient city of Lower Germany, ſaid to have been built by Trebeſas, the brother of Ninus, 1496 years before Chriſt, and made a Roman colony in the time of Auguſtus. It became afterwards the moſt famed city of Gallia Belgica, and was, for ſome time, the ſeat of the weſtern empire, in the reign of Conſtantius [i]. Here Valentinian triumphed, in a magnificent manner, over the Alemanni [k]. Triers had been formerly the ſeat of the Gallic prefects, or of præfectura Galliarum [l], and obtained the right of coinage from the Romans [m]; at preſent it is only the metropolis of the eccleſiaſtic electorate of that name, though the biſhops of it were formerly ſtyled primate of thoſe of Gaul, on account of its having been once the ſeat of the prefects of it, which was afterwards removed to Arles, on occaſion of the former being deſtroyed by the Franks [n]. Ratiſbon, in the circle of Bavaria, ſaid to have been firſt built by Tiberius, and now famous for the diet of the empire being held there. Mentz, now famous for the invention of printing by John Fuſt, alias Fauſtus, a gentleman of that city [o], and for being the reſidence of one of the eccleſiaſtic electors, in the lower circle of the Rhine, and ſituate on the banks of it; was formerly inlarged and fortified by Druſus, with ſeveral others on that river; ſuch as Bonn, Andernach, and many others on the ſame river, as well as upon was from thence called Blotkeda, and blotabrum, from the antient word blot, which ſignifies a bloody ſacrifice. Hence ſome infer, that human victims were thrown alive into the well; others, that they were firſt daſhed to death againſt the ſtones, and then flung into it (27). This well was, after the converſion of the Germans to chriſtianity, incloſed with a wall, and conſecrated, to ſerve for a baptiſmal font; and the waters of it became ſo famous, for ſome miraculous power attributed to them, that they were fetched or reſorted to from all parts: but ſince the reformation it hath been opened, for common uſe (28).

the Maeſe, Elbe, and Weſer. He built, likewiſe, bridges over them, eſpecially at Mentz and Bonn, and kept a fleet, for the ſecurity of thoſe parts [p]: near the former of theſe was erected a monument, in form of a funeral pile, in memory of him, by thoſe legions which he had there commanded, ſome remains of which are ſtill to be ſeen, and are mentioned by ſeveral antient and modern authors [q], and deſcribed by Hutichius [r]. It is known by the name of Eichelſtein, and ſtands in the now citadel-yard of the city above-named; but that this was the ſame that was erected for that prince, we muſt depend wholly upon tradition, as we muſt for a vaſt number of other ſuch ſtructures, with which this country abounds, but which retain neither inſcriptions nor any other indices, by which they may be fixed to their original deſign. As we mentioned theſe cities only on account of their being either built, fortified, or celebrated, by the Romans, we ſhall not take upon ourſelves to go any farther with the reſt, becauſe we confine our geography to the antient, and not to the modern, Germany, which latter is too well known to our readers, to need our expatiating upon it.

SECT. II.

Of the religion, government, laws, and policy, of the antient Germans.

THIS ſubject hath been already ſo copiouſly handled in the laſt chapter, as it is ſo naturally knit and interwoven with it, that we hope we may ſave ourſelves the pains of a needleſs repetition. The Gauls and Germans, as nearly allied to each other originally, received their religion, laws, and cuſtoms, from the ſame hand, and both retained them, ſome few particulars excepted, during a long ſeries of ages, with an invincible tenaciouſneſs; and we have had occaſion to obſerve, that the latter continued much longer inflexible againſt introducing the Roman ſuperſtition, than the former: ſo that, with regard to their antient religion, they exactly agreed, in worſhiping the ſame ſupreme deity, under the name of Eſus, or Heſus, falſely ſaid, by Roman authors, to have been Mars, or Mercury. They worſhipped him under the emblem of an oak, conſecrated that tree more peculiárly to him, and had a great veneration not only for the tree itſelf, but for its leaves and fruit, eſpecially the miſleto, which they call, to this day, by the old name

of guthyl, or gutheyl, and aſcribe extraordinary virtues to it, eſpecially in epileptic diſeaſes [a] (A). Their method of, and time for, gathering it, was the ſame which was obſerved by the Gauls [b]. They held, like them, all other trees, likewiſe, as ſacred, though not in the ſame degree with the oak; all woods, foreſts, and deſerts, as well as groves, lakes, rivers, fountains, &c. in high veneration. The druids had the ſole care and direction in all religious, and the greateſt ſway and authority in civil, matters; only it may be here obſerved, that though both nations held ſome ſort of women, whom they looked upon as propheteſſes, in great eſteem; ſo the Germans ſeem to have exceeded the Gauls in this kind of ſuperſtition, and to have ſhewn and retained a much greater fondneſs and veneration for their pretended oracles (B). In other things they were, as far as can

(A) This name doth in the old German ſignify good heal, or good healer, as doth that of miſtella, or rather miſtel dha, in the Celtic; though ſome queſtion whether the word miſtel be of Celtic extract Hence, that which we formerly mentioned out of Pliny, that they called it by a name which ſignified all heal. The inhabitants of ſome parts of Upper Germany, who ſtill retain a great number of antient heatheniſh ſuperſtitions, are affirmed to retain the old druidiſh cuſtom of rambling about, at certain ſeaſons, from town to town, and from houſe to houſe, in great troops, rapping at every door and window with hammers, and crying out gutheyl, gutheyl, alluding to that verſe falſely aſcribed to Ovid,

In ſome other parts, eſpecially in Aiſace, they give it the name of marcutaken. or the buſh or ſhrub of ſpectres; probably from thoſe magical virtues which were attributed to it, not only by the Germans and Gauls, but much more by the more northern nations; concerning which, the reader may ſee ſome extravagant inſtances in the authors quoted in the margin (1). Among other virtues they attributed to it, that of driving off all ſhafts and offenſive weapons from the perſon that wore it, or of effectually directing againſt the perſon or beaſt they intended to ſhoot, was ſo rife, that they never went even a hunting without it (2).

(B) It is not eaſy to gueſs whence this high eſteem for thoſe female ſoothſayers had its riſe; but moſt antient authors agree, that the Germans never undertook any thing of importance without con-can be gathered from Cæſar and Tacitus, ſubject to, and obliged to receive their directions, like the Gauls, from that grand druid, who, as we hinted in the laſt chapter, had his reſidence in England, or ſome one of the Britiſh iſles. If there was any difference between the Gauls and Germans in point of religion, it conſiſted only in this, that the latter, being more fierce and ſulting them, and would even forbear fighting an enemy, let the advantage appear ever ſo great on their ſide. if thoſe women diſapproved of it (3). They ſeem to have derived this cuſtom from the Celtes and Cimmerians, their anceſtors, who, as we have formerly obſerved, looked upon them as inſpired (4); and we have likewiſe mentioned ſome of them, who are reported to have foretold ſome very ſtrange events to ſome of the Roman emperors (5), enough to raiſe their reputation, not only among their own people, but likewiſe among the Romans and Greeks.

If we may, however, be permitted to offer a conjecture concerning the origin of this ſuperſtition, it ſeems to have had its riſe from this: The Germans, warlike, fierce, and active, as they were, and conſtantly employed either in the martial or hunting trade, might, probably, have committed the care of their ſick and wounded to their women, who, having more time and leiſure upon their hands, began to ſtudy the virtues of herbs, plants, and other medicinal things. From this ſkill, which they generally intermixed with that of aſtrology, they might, in time, pretend to greater, and to be able to pry into futurity. The old ones, might likewiſe naturally give into dreams, viſions, and other ſuperſtitious obſervations, ſuch as were then practiſed by almoſt all other nations; ſuch as the flight of birds, the running of rivers, and the colour of their waters; the entrails of victims, and ſuch-like kinds of ſortileges; till they, at length, raiſed themſelves to ſuch credit and admiration, that, if Tacitus may be credited, they were looked upon as a kind of goddeſſes: and, in particular, that famed one called Velleda, of whom he ſpeaks as of a perſon deified, and worſhipped by the whole German nation (6). Some others are mentioned of like high repute, viz. Aurinia (7), or Alruna, Ganna (8), Jettha, Siſa, Thrudur, &c. of which we ſhall ſay nothing more, ſeeing we are quite in the dark about them in every reſpect, but that of their being ſpoken of as famed propheteſſes among the Germans. The reader may, however, ſee all the different conjectures of the learned about them, in the authors quoted in the margin (9).

untractable, were not only more full and tenacious of their ſuperſtitious rites, but likewiſe more cruel and inhuman in them. They not only offered the ſame expiatory human victims, and uſed them in their auguries and other parts of their religion, but treated them much more cruelly than they. The Gauls, in ſome caſes, fattened them for one whole year with the fineſt dainties, put them to a quick death, and ſometimes ſtabbed them unexpectedly in the back: the Germans, on the contrary, made theirs undergo many grievous indignities and torments, before they diſpatched them, ſome inſtances of which we have given in the Gauliſh hiſtory [c], that will hardly bear repeating. Other victims they likewiſe offered of domeſtic animals, and of theſe the horſe was reckoned the moſt acceptable. The fleſh of them was, it ſeems, to be boiled, ſtewed, or dreſſed in ſome other way, in the heart of their groves; the fat and the fleſh was ſerved to the votaries, by way of feaſt, and the blood was ſprinkled upon the altar, trees, and by-ſtanders, by way of ablution: but though they did the ſame by that of human victims, it doth not appear, that they eat the fleſh of them. We have formerly obſerved, likewiſe, from Cæſar, Tacitus, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Athenæus, and other antient authors, that the Germans had no temples, but performed their religious rites in groves erected for that purpoſe, or in woods, foreſts, and deſert places; tho' this latter ſeems to have been practiſed after their conqueſt, and to avoid the penalties of thoſe ſevere edicts which the Roman emperors had iſſued out againſt the druids and their inhuman ſacrifices: however that be, temples were not introduced in Germany till long after the Gauls had ſhewed them the way; and it is plain, that after the former had introduced the worſhip of Jupiter, Mars, &c. they dedicated ſtill oaks, groves, woods, and whole foreſts to them, and performed their ſuperſtitious rites in them a conſiderable while, before they could be brought to erect temples to them. This is evident, from what Tacitus tells us of the goddeſs Hertha, one of their antient deities, whoſe idol was preſerved in a wood, or grove, Caſtum Nemus, upon a covered cart, and had but one prieſt to miniſter to her, and the only one who dared come near it. He adds, that whenever the deity had a mind to go out and air herſelf, or to take a view of mankind, that prieſt, who was her only confident, gave notice of it to the whole nation; upon which, nothing was to be ſeen but feaſting and jollity amongſt them, whilſt ſhe was carried about in her covered car, drawn by two heifers, and attended by the prieſt above-mentioned. His chief buſineſs was to obſerve when ſhe appeared ſatiated with rambling, and to convey her into her ſacred grove again [d]. He doth indeed mention a temple which he there calls the temple of Tanfana [e] (C), and which, he ſays, the Romans levelled to the ground: but

The goddeſs Hertha.

[d] Annal. l. v. c. 9. [e] Ibid. l. i. c. 51.

(C) It will be, in a great meaſure, labour loſt, to inquire who this Tanfana was, whether a German goddeſs, or the place where the temple was: if the former, her name is quite foreign, and no footſteps are left of her or her worſhip, unleſs our author, or his copiers, miſtook Tanfana for Onfana, the name of Minerva among the Gauls.

There are ſome inſcriptions, one in particular, dug up in the neighbourhood of Lyons, in which theſe words are engraven on a marble ſtone: Pro ſalute Dom. N. Imp. L. Sept. Sever. Aug. totiuſq; Domus ejus Aufanis Matronis & Matribus Pannoniorum & Delmatarum. Ti. Cl. Pompeianus, &c. from which a modern antiquary (10) would conclude, that it ſhould be Tanfanis, inſtead of Aufanis, as bearing ſome relation to the goddeſs Tanfania whoſe temple Tacitus here ſpeaks of. But ſince there are other inſcriptions which agree with this, and call theſe Matres Aufaniæ, his conjecture will hardly be allowed.

Who theſe Matronæ were, is as hard to gueſs; the author laſt quoted thinks them to have been campeſtrian deities, ſuch as preſided over woods, rivers, lakes, &c. and were, by this time, worſhipped both by the Gauls and Germans, as we have ſeen in the laſt chapter: but why ſuch aereal beings ſhould be called Matres and Matronæ, cannot well be conceived; and to us it ſeems more probable, that they were thoſe famed druideſſes, or propheteſſes, of whom we have ſpoken in the laſt note, and who, being deified after their death, were ſtill invoked by the living, and had altars, and other inſcriptions, reared to them by their votaries, as they were ſuppoſed to preſide ſtill on health, life, pregnancy, &c. whereas thoſe aereal beings, which were thought to live in, or preſide over, fire, water, earth, woods, &c. and have been ſince diſtinguiſhed by the names of ſalamanders, ſylphs, nymphs, and gnomes, were ſuppoſed to have been created from the beginning, and to have had thoſe elements aſſigned them by the Supreme Being.

Hence we may ſee whence the Roſicrucian notion, ſo much in vogue ſtill among the Germans and other northern people, had its riſe; and that it is no other than a relict of the old northern heatheniſm, improved by the enthuſiaſtic help of a warm imagination: for, to this day, the ſame, and even much more prepoſterous, ſuperſtitions are ſtill preſerved, in ſeveral parts of Germany, among the vulgar, and much more ſo as you go farther northwards, eſpecially among the Iſlanders, Samojedes, Laplanders, &c. ſome of which can hardly be read without horror, and might be much better but as in the foregoing instance of Hertha he first calls it a temple, though he says in general, that the Germans had none, and afterwards explains his meaning by calling it a grove and a private lake; might not this of Tanfana be of the same kind? However, suppose it to have been a real temple, there will be no wonder, that such a building should be erected by the Marsi, or, at least, in their country, and, perhaps, by the Romans, who had, by this time, subdued them [f]; for this was in Augustus's reign, about eighty years before the time in which Tacitus wrote. For though this be the only one we read of, yet there might as well have been some others built by this time, either in imitation of, or obedience to, the conquering Romans, who, as we have formerly hinted, were very industrious to propagate their religion amongst those nations they subdued. For if, either through complaisance or fear, they once adopted their deities, why might they not, from the same motives, erect also temples to them?

(10) Reinſ. ſynt. an. 175. Vide Keyzler al. ſupra. c. 30.

Their deities. Jupiter.

WE have already spoken of those inferior ones introduced among the Gauls, such as Jove, or Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, Mercury, Venus, Diana, &c. The same, and very nearly under the same notion, were adopted by the Germans, though some of them under different names: we shall just mention some of those names and attributes as they were peculiarly given by the Germans to each of them. Jupiter was worshipped under the name of Thor, Tharam, or Taran, i. e. the thunderer. This name we have already seen, in the last chapter, was given by the Gauls to Mars also, on account of the clattering noise passed over in silence, were it not, that they plainly shew to us how far unaffisted reason may be depraved and warped by education and custom; since all the pains that have hitherto been taken, especially since the reformation, have not been able to root it out.

Before we dismiss this subject of these Deæ Matres, or Matronæ, we beg leave to mention an inscription found upon an altar-stone at Lauther in Westmorland, with these words: DEABUS MATRIBUS TRAMAI TRAMAI VEX CERMA. P. V. R. D. PRO SALUTE, &c. in which a German antiquary has endeavoured to shew, that the word Tramai should be read Tarami, or Tarani; Taran being one of the Celtic names of Jupiter (11). But we think our learned Gale (12) hath much better corrected the lection, by reading it Bramæ, the name of a place in that country, mentioned in the Itinerarium Antonini, and from which these Matres might, in all likelihood, be denominated.

of the martial trade. The ſame was done by the Germans, who gave it to their Odin, or Woden, which was the ſame deity, as we ſhall ſee under the next article. As for the name of Jupiter, we have formerly ſhewn, that it was never adopted by the Gauls, nor doth it appear to have been ſo by the Germans: if theſe had any other names for him than thoſe we have mentioned, they have been ſince loſt, and are not worth ſeeking further after.

Mars, or Odin.

Mars, called by them Odin, Othin, and Woden (D), has ſometimes been confounded with Mercury by the Roman authors, and no wonder, when they were ſo unacquainted with their language, and could have ſo little information from them concerning their religion or politics. For the Germans, as well as the Gauls, made it a conſtant maxim, not to communicate any thing of either to ſtrangers; and hence may be aſſigned the reaſon why ſome of them have even more abſurdly imagined this Odin to have been the ſame with Heſus, or Eſus [g], the Supreme Deity. The great veneration they obſerved to be paid to the former, their calling upon him at the beginning of a

(D) This deity had ſeveral other names, according to the ſeveral offices they attributed to him; ſuch as Walſader, and Walladur, the father of ſlaughter, and of arms; Sigmundur, the giver of victory, and the like. This of Odin ſeems derived from the antient word Audun, which ſignifies exterminator, as they prayed to him to exterminate their enemies. The Gauls did, moſt likely, give him that of Ollodius, as has been found by an inſcription dug up near Aix in Provence, which runs thus: Vigilia Melia Maſſa filia Martì Oiloudio, which laſt word is thought by ſome to be of Greek extract, as it was found ſo near Marſeilles, where Greek had been ſo long introduced; and may be either from ὀλαύω, or ὄλυμι, to put to death, to deſtroy (13). In the ſame ſenſe he is called, by Homer, οὐλὸς, fatal, or murderer; as his chief buſineſs, according to the heathen theology, was, to ſupply hell continually with newcomers.

Yet after all, it may not improbably be derived from the old Celtic obll, which ſignifies beer. For as neither Germans nor Gauls had vines till long after the Romans invaded them, as we have lately ſhewn, beer was not only their choiceſt liquor, but they believed, that Mars, or Odin, diſpenſed it in large quantities to his votaries in the next world, as we ſhall ſee by-and-by. So that he might be properly enough called Ollodinus, or Ollodius, from thence, that is, the god of ſtrong beer.

fight, and vowing to him all the plunder, and even lives, of their enemies, might eaſily lead thoſe authors to miſtake him for the latter. Mars, when his worſhip came to be adopted, was always, as far as can be gathered from antient monuments, repreſented in armour, though antiently under the type of a naked ſword [h]; whereas Heſus was only worſhipped under the type of an oak, or even the bare ſtump of one. Mars was looked upon not only as the god of war, but as the patron and guardian of thoſe who were ſlain, whoſe ſouls the ſurvivors bequeathed to him, in words to this effect, Odin receive thee; mayeſt thou be with Odin (E)! If you aſk what they ſuppoſed was to be their employment in that place of bliſs which was called by them Valhalla, and of which Odinus was the chief diſpoſer; ſome of their antient poets will tell you, that one of them was, to carouſe with exquiſite beer in human ſculls, whilſt Odinus alone is allowed to drink wine. They were, moreover, to be ſerved by elegant virgins, whoſe buſineſs it was to furniſh them with a conſtant ſupply of whatever could make them happy and merry; and this notion of a Mohammed's paradiſe was no ſmall ſpur to warlike actions, ſince every man's felicity there was to riſe in proportion to the number of enemies they had conquered or killed [i] (F). According to this notion, we need not

(E) It ſeems from ſome ſepulchral inſcriptions and funeral orations ſtill extant, that in ſome of the northern regions they bequeathed the ſouls of the deceaſed to Odin, in words to this effect: Odin preſerve thee, a dear child, faithful friend, an honeſt ſervant, and the like; even after their embracing chriſtianity: and the ſending any one to Odin, was reckoned a very kind and good wiſh, though it is ſince looked upon, eſpecially by the Sueui, as bad as ſending one to the devil (14).

(F) We have properly no antient author to vouch for this their belief of a Turkiſh paradiſe; our authority for it is only taken from ſome of the oldeſt northern poets (15), who quoted it from more antient ſongs and verſes of their druids, who, as we have often obſerved, couched all their religion and hiſtory in ſuch kinds of poems, and conveyed them down from one generation to another. To this we may, however, add this collateral proof, from the general agreement of Greek and Roman authors, that the antient Celtes and Scythians made uſe of the ſculls of their ſlain enemies to carouſe not wonder at their conſecrating ſo great a ſhare, and ſometimes all the plunder of their enemies, making him heir of all their wealth, keeper of all their treaſure, and often vowing their own lives to him; ſince they expected to be ſo amply rewarded by him in the next life, and with ſuch a kind of happineſs as beſt ſuited with their genius [k].

Is made a northern hero by their hiſtorians.

THE German, and other old, hiſtorians have ſince transformed this deity into a northern hero, whom they bring from Aſia into Scandinavia, where, after a long and bloody proweſs, and a reign ſtuffed with the greateſt wonders, during which he gave them a body of laws, ſome of which we ſhall ſpeak of in its proper place, that he might end as he began, and inſpire his people with the ſame contempt of death, he gave himſelf a with, and that they were in general, but none more than the Germans, very fond of drinking to exceſs. So that it is very natural to ſuppoſe, the druids would carry this notion of happineſs beyond the grave, in order to inſpire the people with courage and a contempt of death.

Accordingly, the famous king Lodbrog is introduced ſinging his own requiem, in theſe words, as tranſlated out of Edda, by Bartholine.

ſlight wound with an arrow, becauſe he would not go into the other world without one, and ſoon after died; and, after a magnificent funeral, in which his corps was laid on a large and magnificent pile, that the brighter and higher the flames aſcended, the greater might be his glory among the gods, he was deified as the protector and rewarder of thoſe who die in battle[l]. This may, perhaps, have been trumped up to wipe off the imputation of their having given into the Greek and Roman idolatry, and to ſhew, that they only paid a more than ordinary veneration to their heroes and heroines, ſome of whom they ranked in the ſame number as Hercules among the men, and Hertha and Fria, or Friga, among the women. The mythologiſts, on the other hand, have ſplit this Odin into two; the antienteſt of the two they ſuppoſe ſome to have been Mars, others the ſun, and the youngeſt to have been one of their deified heroes: yet there is no doubt but that one may find a great reſemblance between the antient Germans, Suevi, Æſtii, &c. and other moſt diſtant nations; ſuch, for inſtance, we may reckon the worſhip of the goddeſs Hertha, mentioned a little higher, which agreed with that which the Romans and others paid to the earth, under the name of Magna deorum mater; or, as Tacitus ſays of the latter [m], their worſhip of Fria, or Friga, under that denomination (G). How much of this kind of

[l] Snorron. Yngliga ſaga, c. 8. [m] Germ. c. 9. & 45.

(G) That hiſtorian is, however, contradicted by ſome German authors, who pretend, that Fria, Friga, or Frejun, was the ſun (19). This they pretend to prove by what he adds, that they wore the boar on their ſtandard, and which, theſe pretend, was owing to an acceptable ſacrifice, which Odinus had offered of this creature to that planet. But, if they worſhipped the ſun under the name of Frejun, or Friggon, might they not as well do the ſame by the moon, under the name of Freia, Frin, and Frigga? And might not the wild boar be as fit a ſacrifice to that huntreſs, as to the ſun?

Iſis, who was the ſame with the moon, ſince Cæſar calls the ſame deity Luna which Tacitus calls Iſis, was worſhipped by Germans and Gauls, and is affirmed, by the latter hiſtorian to have been the chief deity of the Suevi. He doth, indeed, there ſay (20), that he could find no footſteps upon what account her worſhip was there introduced; but ſuppoſes, by the figure in which ſhe was repreſented, viz. that of a ſhip, or frigate, that it was brought thither from abroad; and it is ſomewhat ſtrange, ſince ſhe was worſhipped by the Romans under that type, as preſiding over the ſea and navigation (21), and of idolatry they may have had before their becoming acquainted with the Romans, is not eaſy to ſay; and we ſhall gladly refer our readers to what has been already hinted on that head in the hiſtory of the Gauls; but after that time, eſpecially after their being ſubdued by them, there is no doubt but they adopted many of their other deities, as well as a great number of their ceremonies and ſuperſtitions. However, it plainly appears, upon the whole, that their antient theology differed much from the mythology of the Romans and Greeks. The Germans, even according to the teſtimony of Roman writers, neither preſumed to confine their deities within temples, nor to repreſent them under any forms [a], nor admitted into that number any but ſuch as they ſaw, and received aſſiſtance and benefit from; ſuch as the ſun, moon, and Vulcan [b], or the god of fire (H). Their Their worſhip of other deities.

had a ſet feſtival in their faſti, that he ſhould conclude from thence, that the Suevi, who were of Celtic extract, and given to navigation, ſhould receive that deity from abroad, which was peculiar to all the Celtes. However, therefore, Friia and Freius, Iſis and Mithras, Sol and Luna, Apollo and Dicna, may be found confounded in antient hiſtorians, on account of their joint influence on earthly things, and their common courſe in the heavens; yet there is no doubt to be made but they were ſeverally worſhipped by all the northern, as well as ſouthern, nations; and why not more ſo than earth, water, rivers, lakes, woods, foreſts, trees, and plants?

(H) So, at leaſt, that author is underſtood by moſt writers. We are, indeed, told by Plutarch (22), that Viridomarus, a king of the Gauls, who lived above 200 years before our Saviour, having declared war againſt the Romans, made a vow to conſecrate all the arms he took from the enemy to Vulcan: ſo that if that author be right in the name, the worſhip of that deity muſt have been very antient among the Gauls and Germans. But the misfortune is, as a late writer obſerves (23), that the Roman writers either miſtook the names of thoſe heroes or deities, or mentioned them by the names of ſuch of their own gods as they imagined them to reſemble moſt; by which means, that part of German antiquity is become ſo intricate, that it can hardly be relied on.

Some inſcriptions ſhew, that they had a deity called Volian, or Volianus, according to the Roman termination. Hence ſome authors have concluded, that the two branches of the K were worn out, and that the name was originally Volkanus, which ſuppoſition is natural enough. But Volian being a Celtic word, which ſignifies either a furnace, or a fiery forge, the latter may, probably, have been the original name, though hardened ſince into Vulcan.

(22) In vit. Marcel. (23) See Maſcov. Germ. l. ii. c. 35.

veneration for their deified heroes and heroines, and the encomiums they gave them in their poetical performances, extended no farther than to their virtues and heroic exploits, their ſtrength and courage, victories and conqueſts [p]; whereas the Greeks and Romans not only attributed to their deities all their own imperfections, but even ſanctified their moſt monſtrous and unnatural vices [q].

Horrid ſuperſtitions.

THE Germans, as well as Gauls, were early taught, by their druids, two momentous truths, viz. an over-ruling providence and the immortality of the ſoul. The misfortune was, that theſe two noble ſprings of virtue and religion did not run long uncorrupted; for as, on the one hand, a too eager deſire in the people of prying into futurity, and a fatal ambition in their druids and diviners of being thought more intimately acquainted with the ways of that providence, introduced an infinite variety of auguries and ſuperſtitions; and ſome of them, as we have elſewhere hinted, were of the moſt inhuman and diabolical kind; ſo, on the other, the belief of a future life and immortality, proved but too fatal a ſpur to raſhneſs, ambition, and cruelty, eſpecially after they came to imbibe that poiſonous notion, hinted a little higher, that the ſureſt way to that happineſs was, to die in the field of battle; and that their felicity in the next world was to riſe according to the number of the enemies they had deſtroyed in this. For this not only inſpired them with a barbarous courage aud cruelty in their wars, but made them leſs ſolicitous to inquire whether the motives of it were juſt or unjuſt. We have already given ſuch inſtances of theſe bloody ſuperſtitions, in the hiſtory of the antient Celtes and Scythians [r], and lately in that of the Gauls [s], that our readers, we hope, will eaſily ſpare us the trouble of repeating them here, ſeeing they are all of the ſame kind, and of ſuch a nature, that they can ſcarcely be read without horror. Only this we muſt be bound to add, that, whether the Germans received them from their neighbours, or whether they crept in amongſt them by degrees, as they did almoſt every-where elſe, they appear not only to have exceeded other nations in them, but to have retained them much longer than any of thoſe who received the goſpel (I). One piece of ſuperſtition, common to all the Germans

(I) Hence all that ſad trade of witchery and ſorceries ſtill in vogue among the more northern parts; the divining wand, to find out mines, thieves, and murderers, among the ſouthern; their notions of mans and Gauls, was, never to fight, or undertake any material point, before the moon was full ſix days old, nor even then, if their ſoothſayers, who were moſtly women, did not like the auguries. Theſe were always conſulted, upon all emergencies, as the druids and druideſſes were in Gaul. They were always admitted to their councils, bore the greateſt ſway in them, not only as having the chief management of all their augurics, without which they did not do any thing, but as being eſteemed by the whole nation to have been endowed with a prophetic ſpirit [t].

NEXT in authority to theſe pretended propheteſſes, were the druids, or rather prieſts. Cæſar ſays, indeed [u], that they had no druids, as the Celtes; but Tacitus, who was better acquainted with them, ſpeaks frequently of their prieſts, whoſe office and authority, according to him, being much the ſame with the Gauliſh druids, ſhews them to have been the ſame order of men, though they did not, perhaps, bear the ſame name. For theſe prieſts, he tells us [w], were not only admitted to their public councils, but accompanied them in the wars, and bore a great ſway in both. For we are told, that they were the only ones who had power to impoſe ſilence in thoſe meetings, to reprove or puniſh offenders, which exactly agrees with what Cæſar ſays of the Gauliſh druids, whoſe office it was to try, condemn, and even to inflict capital puniſhment [x]. And hence it may be, that the office of hangman is ſtill in ſo much requeſt all over Germany, contrary to what we find it in all other chriſtian nations; where they are either taken from the dregs of the people, or, when that fails, ſome noted delinquent is commonly condemned to it. As, therefore, one main part of the prieſts office among the antient Germans conſiſted chiefly in ſtirring them up to martial deeds, in killing and flaying victims, and very frequently human ones, both in their ſacrifices and auguries, in condemning and executing criminals, in puniſhing leſſer offenders with milder puniſhments, and the like; we need not wonder, if the external part of their religion was ſo void of the Greek of fairies, and other aereal beings, ſome of a benevolent, others of a malevolent, nature; of apparitions, charms, inchantments, faſcination, magical and diabolical contracts, carnal commerce with demons, and a number of other heatheniſh forgeries, which cannot be rooted out from among the vulgar of both; all which plainly appear to be owing to their tenaciouſneſs of, and fondneſs for, the old leaven of the antient Celtic ſuperſtition.

and Roman pomp, and so full of every thing that could strike an awful dread on that fierce and warlike people, whose devotion might perhaps be better kept up under the covert of thick and gloomy groves, as well as by the bloody rites performed in them, than by all the ornaments of Greek and Roman temples, and the pageantry of their ceremonies and dress. It is therefore no small wonder, that such men should chuse a garb so contrary to their butcherly trade, and affect to be clad in white, and not rather in the deepest crimson: and may not this contrast be a kind of proof, that their office at first was of a quite different nature, and that from singing the praises of their Creator, and of their famed heroes, or killing, perhaps, some few harmless creatures, in honour to them; their ambition, and thirst of rule over an untractable people, made them degenerate, by degrees, into this pitch of arbitrary power and cruelty? But we offer this only as a conjecture, which is not, however, without some foundation, if we consider, that they received their religion from the same fountain that the Persæ, Brachmans, and other Indian sects, did, who yet, either from their living, perhaps, in milder climes, or from a more conscientious adhering to their primitive institution, have ever been justly famed for a character the most opposite to theirs.

Their laws and government.

As for their antient laws and government, we can only say, that they discover those evident marks, by which men, by degrees, were forced to form themselves into societies for their general good and preservation; to have magistrates to govern and protect them in times of peace, and generals to command and lead them in war. This, considering the extent of their territories, and their fierce and warlike genius, prevented their being long united into one common state, whatever they might have been originally. But every tribe of them had its own form of government, independent from the rest, except, perhaps, that they had some laws in common, for the better union and preservation of the whole body against foreign enemies, or to keep up a kind of balance amongst themselves, that one nation should not grow too strong for the rest: in other things each canton held their national councils at least once a year, that is, in the spring, and oftener, if need required; and there deliberated about peace or war, the choice of magistrates, and other annual officers, both civil and military; the sending out of colonies or auxiliaries, and other such points, according to their present exigence [y]. And these assemblies were so exactly observed, that, we are told, the last comer to them was sure to loſe his life (K). It is very likely alſo, that all other matters relating to property, crimes, and ſuch-like, were here alſo finally determined by the plurality of votes, rather than by any body of laws they can be ſuppoſed to have had in theſe early days. Liberty, being by them looked upon as the ſummum bonum [z], made them exceeding watchful againſt every thing that looked like an infringement of it; and as they were too impatient to go through the fatigues of long law-ſuits, they rather choſe to have them decided at once by ſuch an aſſembly, and ſometimes by ſingle combat, rather than ſtay for their next meeting. Theſe aſſemblies were commonly accompanied with ſumptuous banquets, as they were judged to promote friendſhip and mutual confidence, to inſpire men with greater freedom of ſpeech, and open a door to wholſome counſels [a]. In thoſe ſtates which were under a kingly government, as a great many of them were, they applied to the prince only in matters of ſmaller moment; but in thoſe which concerned the whole nation, to the grand council of it [b]: neither allowed they any other revenues to thoſe monarchs but a part of the fines, and ſuch free-will offerings as the people thought fit to make to them of cattle and the fruits of the earth; ſo that they had little elſe to keep up their grandeur, except their hereditary eſtates [c]. Their expence was, indeed, inconſiderable, becauſe all their ſubjects, fit to bear arms, were obliged to follow them into the field, and their nobles thought it an honour to make part of their retinue; upon which account theſe had the free uſe of the prince's table, and were ſometimes preſented with a horſe, or ſome of his arms [d]. The ſubjects were diſtinguiſhed into ſeveral ranks, or claſſes, ſuch as nobles, free-born, freedmen, and bondſmen; in each of which claſſes thoſe were ſtill moſt eſteemed, who had ſignalized themſelves beſt, by their courage, conduct, or any laudable exploit [e]. As for their other laws, if any ſuch they had compiled in a body, they were rather preſerved by tradition and cuſtom, than kept upon record, ſince we have often obſerved, they made it a conſtant maxim, not to commit any thing to writing. But that ſome ſuch laws they had, is apparent from this, that they ſtill retained many of them, even after thoſe of the Romans had been introduced amongſt them. Judges they likewiſe had of their own, and their office was held in ſuch eſteem, that men of the higheſt rank were promoted to it, as well as thoſe of the greateſt probity, years, and diſcretion: even their princes ſometimes took it upon them. Every judge had, it ſeems, a number of aſſeſſors, with whom he might conſult upon occaſion; whence, probably, the office of ſcabinus, or ſheriff, had its riſe [f].

Their ſtate of war. Had neither cities, nor fortreſſes.

THESE general aſſemblies were antiently held in the open country; for the Germans deſpiſed cities and fortreſſes, as monuments of ſervitude, rather than places of defence [g]; and were ſome of the lateſt of the Europeans that either built any for themſelves, or would take refuge in them: ſo that, whenever they were obliged to fight an enemy, they always choſe to do it in the open field, and, when worſted, to retire into woods, marſhes, and inacceſſible places, where they could get proviſion for their cattle, and keep their purſuers at a diſtance; rather than to ſhelter themſelves in towns, and fortified places, where they might be caught, as in a trap. It was, moreover, a common ſaying among them, that even wild beaſts would loſe all their ſtrength and courage, if penned up [h]. And we are told, that this cuſtom ſubſiſted in Gaul till the eighth century, and much longer in Germany [i] (L). The whole nation being, moreover,

(L) We have formerly ſeen, that both antient Germans and Gauls lived in a kind of cantons or villages, with their houſes and grounds about them, at a convenient diſtance from each other, that every family might have land enough for themſelves and their cattle (25); and that, as ſoon as they had gathered in their harveſt, they generally removed to new habitations. But when they came to be either conquered by the Romans, or enſlaved, perhaps, by ſome of their ambitious princes; either of theſe were forced to build caſtles, fortreſſes, and fenced cities, to keep them in awe, and deprive them of all poſſible means of regaining their liberty. And hence proceeded their averſion to all ſuch ſtrong places, as tending only to bring and hold them the faſter in ſlavery. But, as neceſſity, in proceſs of time, obliged them to have their cities, caſtles, &c. for their own defence and preſervation, they fell into the ſame ſuperſtition

moreover, naturally of a warlike genius, and eſteeming cowardice as the greateſt reproach and diſgrace that could be thrown upon them, all ſuch fenced cities and fortified places were looked upon by them as ſo many ſhameful aſyla for the weak and puſillanimous to flee to, and they, conſequently, deſpiſed them, as unworthy a brave people, who always ſcorned to take any advantage of their enemy, whether of weapons, intrenchments, diſcipline, ſtratagems, or, indeed, of any other kind but thoſe of ſtrength and bravery, intrepidity, and an invincible love of liberty. It was in theſe that they ſolely trained up their youth, leaving all other arts of gaining a ſuperiority to thoſe of their enemies, to whom the want of theſe martial virtues rendered them more neceſſary. Accordingly, no nation could take more care than they did to enure them to all hardſhips (M), to inſpire them with a contempt of danger, and even of death, and to rear them up to martial deeds. This was their chief and ſureſt road to wealth, honour, and preferment, and, as their prieſts taught them, even to the greateſt happineſs in a future life [k]. It was for this that the ambitious amongſt them neglected agriculture, and deſpiſed all mercantile and mechanic employments [l], with the Greeks and Romans, of dedicating them to certain deities, and even perſonifying and apotheoſing them, and to celebrate a kind of anniverſary of their foundation: which cuſtom laſted till long after their embracing chriſtianity, as appears from many antient inſcriptions, which the reader may find in Grater's collection, and from ſundry prohibitions of chriſtian biſhops againſt all future obſervances of them (26).

(M) We are even told, that thoſe who lived neareſt the Rhine, or any other rivers, uſed to dip their children, as ſoon as born, into them, in order to knit and harden their limbs (27). We have, indeed, formerly obſerved, from Julian the apoſtate (28), that the waters of that river were ſuppoſed to have ſome peculiar virtue above others, inſomuch, that they threw their children into it whenever they had any ſuſpicion of their mothers fidelity. Whether our authors miſtook the deſign, or confounded the one with the other, we cannot affirm; but it is very probable, that if any ſuch cuſtom they had, it was rather introduced on a perſuaſion, that ſuch children who were not proof againſt the ſeverity of ſuch a trial, were not worth the rearing up, and might as well be left to be ſwallowed up by the waves.

how neceſſary and advantageous ſoever, and obliged all who were able to bear arms to go into the field. Hence it was, that they were never at a loſs how to raiſe, in a very ſhort time, ſuch powerful and numerous armies either to repulſe an enemy, or to aſſiſt their friends and allies [m]: for whenever any country was diſengaged from a war, the ableſt ſoldiers were ſent into foreign ſervice, not ſingly, or according to their own option, but in conſiderable bodies, and under the command of ſuch officers as were ſet over them by the ſtate; by which means, the whole nation not only ſhared in the honour of their exploits, but was likewiſe furniſhed with more experienced generals. Another advantage was reaped from it, viz. that when a canton or ſtate became too populous, they could draw out ſuch numbers as could be ſpared, to go and ſeek out new habitations; and theſe, by being trained up to the trade of war, could the better fight their way through, and maintain themſelves in, thoſe countries which they had the good fortune to ſettle in [n].

Their cavalry and foot.

They had but little cavalry in proportion to their foot, in which they placed the main of their ſtrength; but what they had of the former was extremely well diſciplined, though their horſes were, it ſeems, inferior to thoſe of the Romans, either in bigneſs, ſwiftneſs, or dexterity, as well as in thoſe evolutions which were ſo artfully uſed by the latter [n]. As for ſaddles and ſtirrups, they were quite neglected, by both Gauls and Germans, who were accuſtomed to mount and diſmount by their own agility, and could, whenever occaſion required, fight as well on foot as on horſeback (N). In their order of battle, every canton and diſtrict were placed together, that every one of them might reap either the glory or diſgrace of fighting valiantly or cowardly, which was no ſmall ſpur to them to behave in ſuch a manner as might be a credit to their own tribe; and, by this means, they commonly fought in ſeveral diſtinct bodies. We are told, indeed, that ſome of them, eſpecially the Cimbri, formed their whole infantry into one ſquare battalion, and placed their wives, children, and baggage, behind a fence made of their waggons: as ſoon as every thing was ready for the onſet, the ſignal was given, which was anſwered by an univerſal

ſhout, which was redoubled in a moſt dreadful manner, till they came to cloſe engagement. They uſed no art or ſtratagems in fighting, but placed their whole confidence in a joint and furious onſet on the enemy, and continuing it with a deſperate intrepidity, till they had either won or loſt the day; by which means, if they once met with a ſtout repulſe, or were put into diſorder, they ſeldom knew how to rally again, but became ſtupified and deſperate, and either fought till they died, or elſe betook themſelves to flight [o]; for it was reckoned ſo inglorious amongſt them to yield themſelves priſoners, that we read but of few inſtances of their doing ſo, in compariſon to thoſe in which they died with ſword in hand. Time and experience did, indeed, at length teach them to truſt leſs to their own ſtrength and courage, and to ſtudy a little more the Roman diſcipline, and art of fighting. But they began too late: had they done ſo from the beginning, they might, perhaps, have continued unconquered to this day.

THEIR weapons were likewiſe vaſtly inferior to thoſe of the Romans; the cavalry had their ſhields and ſpears in common with the foot, but the latter had, beſides, their darts, bows and ſlings, and ſeldom had recourſe to their pikes and ſwords [p]. Helmets, armour, and coats of mail, were generally deſpiſed amongſt them; ſome of them did even affect to fight naked: ſo that if any ſuch armour was worn amongſt them, it was rather for diſtinction, than defence: upon which account, they adorned them with the horns and heads of ſome wild beaſts. Hence thoſe frightful figures which Plutarch obſerved among the Cimbrian cavalry [q], ſome of which are ſtill to be ſeen upon the ſeals and arms of thoſe antient times. Their ſhields, which they diſtinguiſhed only by different colours, or ſome particular emblem, were reckoned ſo ſacred amongſt them, that they looked upon it as the greateſt diſgrace to loſe them in fight; becauſe none durſt appear either at their religious ceremonies, public aſſemblies, or even funerals, without them (O). (O) Tacitus adds, that they were forced to live in diſgrace all the remainder of their days, and excluded from the company of men; inſomuch that they choſe often to put an end to both by a voluntary death (31). arms were eſteemed their favourite furniture and chiefeſt ornament, they never appeared in public without them, and nothing was ſo earneſtly wiſhed for by their youth, as the day in which they became qualified to bear them [r]. The ſword was ſo ſacred amongſt them, that no oaths were reckoned more binding than thoſe they took upon a naked one [s]; neither did they appear in public, or aſſiſt at any ſolemn rite, without their ſword, ſhield, and ſpear [t]. We are even told, that they wore them at their familiar viſits, banquets, religious dances, and the like. When they ſat down, they had their ſword by their ſide, and a ſervant behind, to hold their ſhield and ſpear; and when they roſe, every one took them up again [u]: in a word, they looked upon themſelves as wedded to their arms; and when they had worn them from their youth to their extremeſt old age, they commonly cauſed them to be burnt or buried with them, when they died [w]. It was on account of this exceſſive regard they paid to their warlike weapons, as well as from their antient cuſtom of rearing a ſword, pike, or ſpear, at the head of their army, round about which they all gathered themſelves to perform their devotions, that they were ſuppoſed to worſhip them [x]; though it is plain, that they only worſhipped the Deity, or, at moſt, the god Mars, ſince adopted their grand patron and protector, under theſe types: but, upon the whole, it appears, that both Celtes and Scythians, and all their deſcendants, were accuſtomed to wear their arms, as well in the time of the profoundeſt peace, as in war; which was alſo practiſed by all the Greeks, Perſians, and other antient nations [y] (P).

Sieges.

IN their ſieges of places they were likewiſe vaſtly inferior to the Greeks and Romans, whether in the offenſive or defenſive, being ſtrangers to thoſe deſtructive inſtruments which were uſed by the latter, ſuch as towers and circumvallations, battering-rams, mining and countermining; and placing the ſtreſs of their confidence in their miſſile weapons, as darts and ſtones, and their vigorous aſſaults and ſcalings, or in a reſolute and intrepid reſiſtance, if theſe failed, as they too often did, eſpecially when they were engaged againſt the well-diſciplined and artful Romans, who, beſides that they uſed all theſe, and many other ſuch warlike engines, in the greateſt perfection, were likewiſe expert in a great variety of ſtratagems, with which the Germans were wholly unacquainted, they fell immediately into confuſion, and became an eaſy prey to them. Hence Valour. the native ſtrength and valour of the latter is the more conſpicuous, as they defended themſelves ſo long, and ſo bravely, againſt ſuch powerful and dexterous enemies, and at length conquered them by their own arts [z].

Puniſhments.

FROM what we have ſeen we may infer, that the Germans in general, though too long unacquainted with the art of war, did yet obſerve a ſtrict diſcipline with their ſoldiery; and that cowardice and neglect of duty were ſeverely puniſhed amongſt them: they were not, indeed, ſo ſtrict in other caſes, but adapted their puniſhments to the different purpoſes of the commonwealth; were ſevere againſt ſome offences, and remiſs towards others; inſomuch, that even murder was not eſteemed capital amongſt them [a], but was puniſhed by ſuch a fine, of great or ſmall cattle, as was deemed a ſufficient compenſation to the family for their loſs. In diſputes and accuſations, whenever the caſe appeared dubious or intricate, they had two expeditious ways of deciding the matter; the one by their pretended divine auguries, and the other by ſingle combat; for in either of theſe they looked upon Providence as the chief director, and therefore ſubmitted to its unerring judgment. When, therefore, Paris endeavoured to introduce the Roman laws among them, we are told, that they refuſed it; alledging, that it was their way to decide all their controverſies by the ſword [b]; and this cuſtom continued amongſt them ſeveral hundred years [c].

Sciences. Sciences they were altogether ſtrangers to, if we except thoſe who lived by the ſea-coaſts, and had made ſome conſiderable progreſs not only in navigation, and building of ſhips, but probably, alſo, in ſome branches of aſtronomy, as well by obſervation, as by their converſe with other more polite nations: the reſt were all rude and ignorant, and it is even doubted whether they knew the uſe of letters (Q). Their greateſt ſkill in phyſic conſiſted in the knowledge and uſe of certain plants and roots found out by obſervation and experience, in which theſe pretenders intermixed a deal of ſuperſtitious traſh; ſuch as the time of the moon for gathering and applying them, charms, and other occult quackeries, which ſerved only to amuſe and raiſe the admiration of the vulgar. Muſic and poetry were much better cultivated amongſt them, though one would be apt to judge their tongue too harſh and inharmonious for the one, and for the other. But beſides that ſuch foreign languages appear more ſo to us than to the natives, we may

Muſic and poetry.

(Q) At leaſt Tacitus, who knew them beſt, and may be ſuppoſed to have been converſant with the politer ſort, tells us, that neither men nor women knew any thing of them (34); unleſs by literarum ſecreta be meant ſomething more than the bare knowledge of letters, which is not unlikely; ſince he tells us in the ſame book, that both they and the Helvetians made uſe of the Greek characters (35); which is alſo confirmed by Cæſar (36), and by ſome antient coins and inſcriptions written in that character (37).

We have already taken notice, that the Gauls probably received that character from the Greek colony that ſettled at Marſilles (38); from whence it might eaſily paſs into Switzerland, and thence into Germany, and have been adopted by theſe for the ſame reaſon that they were by the Gauls; and this is the only way to reconcile Tacitus with himſelf, and with Julius Cæſar.

With reſpect to the Germans being ignorant of the liberal ſciences, we muſt except what a later author ſays of the Goths (39), that a Grecian philoſopher, named Dicæneus, finding in them a fit capacity for philoſophy, aſtronomy, &c. took the pains to inſtruct them in every branch of them: for if that be true, the Germans could not be long without them. But our author, who was a Goth, is too juſtly ſuſpected of partiality for his own nation, in many other particulars as well as this, to be relied on. As for the Germans, it plainly appears, that literature of any kind was not introduced amongſt them till even ſome centuries after him, as we have ſhewn in the laſt chapter (40).

reaſonably ſuppoſe, that both their muſic and poetry being adapted to the genius of the German nation and tongue, their harſhneſs might be looked upon rather as a majeſtic beauty, than a defect: however that be, they had a ſet of men whoſe buſineſs it was to couch the heroic deeds of their warriors in lyric poems, and to ſing them to the people, upon proper occaſions, as the Gauls did of theirs [d]. And as martial deeds were the topic of theſe verſes, and one part of the inſtrumental muſic, which accompanied it, was the clattering their ſwords againſt their ſhields, it is no wonder Julian the apoſtate, whoſe ears were accuſtomed to more gentle and harmonious ſtrains, gives ſuch a frightful account both of the German tongue, muſic, and poetry [e].

THEIR ſports, games, and exerciſes, were all, likewiſe, of the maſculine kind, and fit to inure them to the martial trade. The youth performed them naked, and with incredible agility, ſuch as running, ſhooting, ſwimming, leaping, and the like. Some equeſtrian exerciſes were much in vogue with them, as they were extraordinary horſemen; they were likewiſe fond of gaming, to ſuch a degree, that, when they had loſt all they were worth, they would venture even their liberty upon one caſt more of the dice [f]. Manufactures were not introduced very early amongſt them, that of linen excepted, which was, perhaps, one of the firſt, if not the only one, they cultivated, for a conſiderable time, as it was the favourite dreſs of their women, prieſts, and men of quality [g]. Their original dreſs, when they came firſt to cover themſelves, were the ſkins of beaſts (R); the Germans and Britons ſeem to have been ſome of

(R) Theſe were called by ſeveral names, according to thoſe nations among which they were worn. In ſome parts of Germany, they were called reno, which Cluverius thinks is derived from the rein-deer, whoſe ſkins they made their garments of (41). In others, moſtruga; ſuppoſed to have been called ſo becauſe it made thoſe who wore them appear like monſters (42), or brutes in human ſhape. Tacitus adds, that the only diſtinction between men of quality and the vulgar conſiſted in the richneſs and fineneſs of thoſe furs (43).

And here it will not be amiſs to take notice of a merry jeſt which ſome Greeks, ſettled in Scythia, had endeavoured to impoſe upon Herodotus, as a ſerious truth; viz. that the Neuri, a northern na-of the laſt who exchanged them for cloaths made of flax and wool: theſe they did not wear long and full, as the Sarmatians, but ſhort and ſtrait, and fit to diſplay every limb of their body [h]. As they became more acquainted with the Romans, they not only improved in their dreſs, and the manner of weaving, flowering, and embroidering thoſe ſtuffs of which they were made [i], but adopted a great number of manufactures, in which they have ſince excelled other nations; for it was their contempt of ſuch trades, and not their want of a capacity for them, which made them be ſo long neglected, as beneath a martial genius; but when they came to take them up, they ſoon convinced the world, that their country ſeemed cut out to produce the beſt artificers; and we may add, that, in the number and variety of curious mechanic inventions, they have outdone all the world (S). They did not ſo ſoon give into the liberal arts, or even that tion, were once a year changed into wolves, and, after ſome time, reſumed their own ſhape (44). He doth indeed own, that he could hardly give credit to it; but it is plain they only impoſed on his too great credulity in this point, as they did in ſome others, particularly where they told him that on the other ſide the Danube the air was, at ſome ſeaſons, ſo full of feathers, meaning of ſnow, that a man could ſcarce ſee two yards before him. Wolves, it is certain, were in ſuch quantities, and ſo dangerous, in all theſe northern countries, that the inhabitants were forced to deſtroy them as faſt as they could. Their ſkins they probably dreſſed, and made them into cloſe garments, to wear during the winter, and, when ſpring came on, they exchanged them for ſome lighter habit: and this is all that could be meant by this pretended transformation Unleſs we will ſuppoſe, not without ſome probability, that thoſe Greeks had ſo far corrupted their native language, by their long abode in Scythia, that our author, naturally fond of wonders, underſtood them quite differently from what they meant.

(S) Amongſt theſe, that of clocks, watches, and other ſuch kind of uſeful and curious machinery, they have been long ſince famed for; but for none more than for the noble art of printing, which was found out at Mentz, ſoon after the year 1440, by John Fuſt, or Fauſt, a citizen of that place, and improved by his ſon-in law, Peter Shoeffer, and from thence propagated, by ſome of his countrymen, through all the famous cities of Europe, in leſs than half a century (45).

In ſpeaking of this noble and uſeful invention, we cannot paſs by a pathetic reply which a German made to a Frenchman, who allowed, that of writing: we are told, that Charles the great caused some of their old barbarous poems, which they till then only sung by heart, and contained the actions of their antient kings and heroes, to be committed to writing for their use, and to encourage them to learn to read [k]. The Saxons had such a contempt for letters, that they refused to learn to read the gospels till they were put into verse, and set to such tunes as they could easily sing [l]. Even their laws were not, it seems, reduced to writing till about the 12th or 13th century [m]: which plainly shews that their runæ, or letters (T), are not of so antient date as some moderns have imagined. Writing.

indeed, that the Germans were generally good mechanics, but in other cases, said, that they had but a low and groveling genius, and no wit. To which the German gravely asked the following question: "Pray, Sir, which of the two nations shewed the brighter "genius; ours, which invented the art of printing; or yours, "which condemned the inventor of it to the flames for a conju-"rer? For it plainly appears, that the parliament of Paris had condemned John Faust to be burnt for magic, and that he with great difficulty obtained his pardon at the expence of discovering his new invention to the archbishop of Paris (46).

(T) The runæ, or antient characters, are supposed to have been called so ab incidendo, from cutting out, because they were either cut out of wooden blocks, or cut into the bark of some trees (47), and in a very rude manner. The antientest author who appears to have made mention of those runæ, is Venantius Fortunatus, who lived about the beginning of the sixth century; he speaks of them as being used by the Franks, whose manner of writing, as well as of the Goths, was as yet but coarse and uncouth. He gives us their method of painting, or rather graving them upon wooden planks, which were called runæ. The Germans have retained the same etymon in their language, in calling their letters buchstaben, which implies their being engraven on wood, and in strait lines (48). It has been much disputed whether those letters were Latin or Greek, and much has been urged on both sides; but a sepulchral inscription, dug up at Rome, and the only one, perhaps, that has been preserved of that old character, shews them to have been mostly Greek, with here and there a Roman one (49). Some old coins also confirm it, in some of which the legend is wholly Greek, and,

Genius and character.

Before we finish this section, it will not be amiss to say something concerning the character and genius of the antient Germans, which was pretty near the same through all that large country. They are generally described to us by Greek and Roman authors as resembling one another, and differing from other nations by the largeness of their stature, ruddy complexion, blue eyes, and yellow and bushy hair, haughty and threatening looks, strong constitutions, and proof against hunger, cold, and all kinds of hardship [n]. Nothing could be more conducive to their bodily strength than their coarse diet, their living in huts rather than houses, their constant and strenuous exercises, and inuring themselves betimes to all kinds of fatigue; to which Tacitus joins another thing, which is not, perhaps, quite so authentic, viz. their drinking of strong liquors made of barley or wheat [o], and which they drank in large quantities. Cæsar adds, that their animal spirits not being exhausted in their youth by study, learning, or any troublesome occupations, or enervated by early amours and gallantry, their bodies were more apt to grow large and robust [p]. Pliny attributes much of this to the temperateness of their climate [q]; but though it be true, that the perspiration is not so copious in such cold countries, yet it may be much doubted, whether this doth so much contribute to the growth and strength of their inhabitants: on the contrary, experience shews, that there are very small people in some of the coldest climates, as in Lapland; and very gigantic ones in some of the warmest, as among some of the Ethiopians, as the same author justly observes. What may have further contributed to the strength and stature of the Germans was, their never or rarely intermarrying with other nations, nor adopting any of their soft customs; by which means, they transmitted these qualities to their children pure and uncorrupted [r].

Robustness.

in others, partly that, and partly Latin (50). And this is, in all probability, the character which is, by Venantius above quoted, called the rustic, and was, at that time, common to all the Europeans; only among the northern nations they were very coarse and ill shaped, in comparison of the rest.

Their

THEIR native diſpoſition diſplayed itſelf chiefly in their martial genius, and in their ſingular fidelity. The former of theſe they did indeed carry to ſuch an exceſs, as came little ſhort of downright ferocity; but as to the latter, they not only valued themſelves highly upon it, but were greatly eſteemed by other nations for it; inſomuch, that Auguſtus, and ſeveral of his ſucceſſors, committed the guard of their perſons to them, and almoſt all other nations either courted their friendſhip and alliance, or hired them as auxiliaries: though it muſt be owned, at the ſame time, that their extreme love of liberty, and their hatred of tyranny and oppreſſion, has often hurried them to treachery and murder, eſpecially when they have thought themſelves ill uſed by thoſe who hired them: for, in all ſuch caſes, they were eaſily ſtirred up, and extremely vindictive. In other caſes, Tacitus, tells us, they were noble, magnanimous, and beneficent, without ambition to aggrandize their dominions, or invading thoſe from whom they received no injury; rather chuſing to employ their ſtrength and valour defenſively, than offenſively; to preſerve their own, than to ravage their neighbours [s]. Their friendſhip and intercourſe was rather a compound of honeſt bluntneſs and hoſpitality, than of wit, humour, or gallantry. All ſtrangers were ſure to meet with a kind reception from them, to the utmoſt of their ability; even thoſe who were not in a capacity to entertain them, made it a piece of duty to introduce them to thoſe who could; and nothing was looked upon as more ſcandalous and deteſtable, than to refuſe them either the one, or the other [t]. They do not ſeem, indeed, to have had a taſte for grand and elegant entertainments; they affected in every thing, in their houſes, furniture, diet, &c. rather plainneſs and ſimplicity, than ſumptuouſneſs and luxury. If they learned of the Romans and Gauls the uſe of money, it was rather becauſe they found it more convenient than their antient way of bartering one commodity for another; and then they preferred thoſe antient coins which had been ſtamped during the times of the Roman liberty, eſpecially ſuch as were either milled or cut in the rims, becauſe they could not be ſo eaſily cheated in them as in ſome others, which were frequently nothing but copper, or iron, plated over with ſilver. This laſt metal they likewiſe preferred before gold, not becauſe it made a greater ſhow, but becauſe it was more convenient for buying and ſelling [u]. And as they became, in time, more feared by, or more uſeful to, the Romans, ſo they learned how to draw enough of it from them to ſupply their whole country, beſides what flowed to them from other nations.

As they deſpiſed ſuperfluities in other caſes, ſo they did alſo in the connubial way; every man was contented with one wife (U), and both were ſo faithful to each other, and chaſte, true, and diſintereſted, in their conjugal affections, that Tacitus prefers their manners, in this reſpect, to thoſe of the Romans. The men ſought not dowries from their wives, but beſtowed them upon them [w]. Their youth, in thoſe cold climes, did not begin ſo ſoon to feel the warmth of love, as they do in hotter ones; and it was a common rule with them, not to marry young; and thoſe were moſt eſteemed, who continued longeſt in celibacy; becauſe they looked upon it as an effectual means to make them grow tall and ſtrong: and to marry, or be concerned with a woman, before they were full twenty years old, was accounted ſhameful wantonneſs [x]. They have been, indeed, unjuſtly taxed with permitting a promiſcuous and unnatural commerce of parents with their children, brothers with their ſiſters, and the like; but the only thing that ſeems to have given a colour to this pretended inceſtuous mixture was, their living together in their plain and homely cottages, and the whole family lying promiſcuouſly in the ſtraw, and ſtark-naked; which cuſtom, though ſhocking to more polite nations, yet, being natural to them, was much more likely to reſtrain ſuch unnatural commerce, than to give birth to it. But tho' they did lie thus together in the ſame hut, yet we can ſcarcely doubt, but nature taught them to obſerve ſome decency; and that the huſband and wife lay in ſome corner apart, and the boys and girls at a convenient diſtance from each other. We may add, that ſuch a brutiſh intermixture is quite oppoſite to that care which they took to keep their youth chaſte and unmarried, till after twenty; and to that conjugal fidelity for which they are ſo juſtly admired. The women ſhared with their huſbands not only the care of their family, and the education of their children, but even the hardſhips of war. They attended them in the field, dreſſed their victuals for them, dreſſed their wounds, ſtirred them up to fight manfully againſt their enemies, and ſometimes have, by their courage and bravery, recovered a victory, when it was upon the point of being ſnatched from them. In a word, they looked upon ſuch conſtant attendance on them not as a ſervitude, like the Roman dames, but as a duty, and an honour. We find, in moſt parts of Germany, eſpecially where vaſſalage is ſtill in uſe, ſome notable relics of this antient female ſubmiſſion; we have even lately ſeen ſome remarkable, and, as they appeared to us, ſhocking, inſtances of it here, in thoſe Palatines and Saltſburghers whom perſecution and diſtreſs drove hither for ſhelter; young, hale, and luſty, fellows, ſauntering along, with their pipes in their mouths, and a ſtaff under their arm, whilſt their obſequious wives trudged and ſweated after them, under a load of their cloaths, and other lumber, and a child or two in their arms (W). But what appears to have been ſtill a harder fate upon the antient German dames was, that their great Odinus excluded all thoſe from his valhalla, or paradiſe, who did not by ſome violent death, follow their deceaſed huſbands thither. We ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of it in the next paragraph, and conclude this with an obſervation, that, notwithſtanding their having been antiently in ſuch high repute for their wiſdom, and ſuppoſed ſpirit of prophecy, and their continuing ſuch faithful and tender helpmates to their huſbands, yet they ſunk, in time, ſo low in their eſteem, that, according to the old Saxon law, he that hurt or killed a woman, was to pay but half the fine that he ſhould have done, if he had hurt or killed a man [y].

(U) Our author, however, excepts ſome caſes, which yet were not frequent among them, as when any of their princes or noblemen allowed themſelves a plurality of wives, more, ſays he (50), out of grandeur and oſtentation, than wantonneſs.

THERE is ſcarcely any one thing in which the Germans, tho' ſo nearly allied in moſt of their other cuſtoms to the Gauls, were yet more oppoſite to them than in their funerals. We have ſhewn, in the laſt chapter, with what pomp and profuſion the latter performed theirs: thoſe of the former were done with the ſame plainneſs and ſimplicity which they affected in all other things: the only grandeur they affected in them was, to burn the bodies of their great men with ſome peculiar kinds of wood; but then the funeral pile was neither adorned with the cloaths and other fine furniture of the deceaſed, nor perfumed with fragrant herbs and gums: each man's armour, that is, his ſword, Their funerals.

[y] Specul. Sax. l. i. c. 45.

(W) We have ourſelves taken upon us to reprove their huſbands for it, and told them, in a friendly manner, that our nation was much offended at it; but have been gravely anſwered, by their paſſive dames, that it was the faſhion of their country, and that it would caſt a much greater diſgrace on their good men to help them off with any ſhare of the burden. And what appeared ſtill more ſurpriſing was, when theſe poor women have been offered a draught of ale or beer to refreſh them, they have deſired it might be given to their huſbands, for that themſelves could drink water. ſo great is the force of education and cuſtom.

shield, and spear, were flung into it, and sometimes his riding-horse [z]. The Danes did, indeed, fling into the funeral of a prince, gold, silver, and other precious things, which the chief mourners, who walked, in a gloomy guise, round the fire, exhorted the by-standers to fling liberally into it, in honour of the deceased [a]. They afterwards deposited their ashes in urns, like the Gauls, Romans, and other nations; as it plainly appears from the vast numbers which have been dug up all over the country, as well as from the sundry dissertations which have been written upon them by several learned moderns of that nation, a list and account of which the reader may see in the author last quoted [b]. One thing we may observe in general, that, whatever sacrifices they offered for their dead, whatever presents they made to them at their funerals, and whatever other superstitious rites they might perform at them, all was done in consequence of those excellent notions which their antient religion had taught them, the immortality of the soul, and the bliss or misery of a future life [c].

Notion of the state of souls after death.

It is impossible, indeed, as they did not commit any thing to writing till very lately, and as none of the ancient writers have given us any account of it, to guess how soon this belief of their great Odin, and his paradise, was received among them. It may, for aught we know, have been older than the times of Tacitus, and he have known nothing of it, by reason of their scrupulous care of concealing their religion from strangers: but as they conveyed their doctrines to posterity by songs and poems, and most of the northern poets tell us, that they have drawn their intelligence from those very poems which were still preserved among them; we may, rightly enough, suppose, that whatever doctrines are contained in them, were formerly professed by the generality of the nation, especially since we find their antient practice so exactly conformable to it. Thus, since the surest road to this paradise was, to excel in martial deeds, and to die intrepidly in the field of battle, and since none were excluded from it but base cowards, and betrayers of their country, it is natural to think, that the signal and excessive bravery of the Germans flowed from this antient belief of theirs: and, if their females were so brave and faithful, as not only to share with their husbands all the dangers and fatigues of war, but, at length, to follow them, by a voluntary death, into the other world; it can hardly be attributed to any thing else, but a strong persuaſion of their being admitted to live with them in that place of bliſs. This belief, therefore, whether received originally from the old Celtes, or afterwards taught them by this ſince deified Odin, ſeems, from their general practice, to have been univerſally received by all the Germans, though they might differ one from another in their notions of that future life (X). In general, they ſeem to have had a twofold notion of this future ſtate, the one to precede, and the other to come after, what they called, in their language, ragna rockur, or the crepuſcule of the gods, or heroes; by which they meant the conſummation of all things by a general conflagration [d]. So that, according to them, there was to be a future life of bliſs and miſery, till the deſtruction of the world; and another which was to follow it preſently after, when a new ſun, new heavens, and a new earth, were to be created, and in them a place of endleſs happineſs for the good, and another of endleſs miſery for the bad: which notion one would be apt to imagine they had imbibed from the chriſtians, did it not appear, from Seneca, to have been the doctrine of the Stoics; unleſs we ſhould ſuppoſe that author had it rather from ſome of the apoſtles [e], or their diſciples, than from his own ſect (Y). However that be, ſome of the

(X) What the bliſs of this paradiſe conſiſted in, we have already ſeen; but, beſides this, there are ſome notions attributed to them, by theſe writers lately mentioned, which do not ſeem to ſquare altogether with it (51). ſuch as that of the tranſmigration of ſouls, which, if we may believe ſome antient chriſtian writers (52), Pythagoras received from them. We have ſhewn, in the laſt chapter, that the Gauls were unjuſtly charged with adopting the ſame notion; and the ſame thing may, for aught appears, have been done with reſpect to the Germans. But if theſe had any ſuch belief amongſt them, it can only be reconciled with that of Odin's paradiſe, by ſuppoſing the latter to be reſerved for their brave and enterpriſing heroes; whilſt the reſt, who had no title to it, were left to tranſmigrate from body to body, more or leſs noble and happy, according to their merit or demerit, in a continual rotation, till the conſummation of all things

(Y) It is not to be doubted, that the doctrine of a general conflagration was believed by many antient nations, as we have had occaſion to ſhew at the beginning of this work; but Seneca, in the place

the circumſtances, which theſe old Germans believed would attend this general conflagration, ſeem to us to have been taken from the apocalypſe, now adapted to their own antient notions and taſte: we ſhall give our readers ſome few inſtances of this in the margin (Z), they being ſcarcely worth mentioning anywhere elſe. We ſhall finiſh this ſection with obſerving, that the notion of a future happineſs obtained by martial exploits, eſpecially by dying ſword in hand, made them bewail the fate laſt quoted, ſpeaks of it in ſuch a manner, as makes one believe he had converſed with ſome chriſtians, or, at leaſt, ſome Jewiſh rabbis, from whom he had adopted many particulars, which the ſtoics, till then, knew nothing of.

(Z) They tell you, among other things, the old earth, being thus deſtroyed, a new one is to ſtart up out of the ſea, which will produce all things neceſſary and delightful to its inhabitants; and that the males and females which eſcape the general deſtruction are quickly to replenish it with a more hopeful offspring: that on the ſouth ſide of heaven there is a court vaſtly brighter than the ſun itſelf, and which will be proof againſt the flames which are to deſtroy the reſt of the creation; and there it is that the good will be preſerved for that new and endleſs life. That the general deſtruction is to be preceded by the moſt ſevere ſeaſons, bloody wars, enormous crimes, &c. after which, two monſtrous wolves are to be let looſe, who ſhall devour ſun, moon, and ſtars. That the rainbow, by which the ſouls of the good went up to heaven, will be broken down. That ſome of the aſæ, or deified heroes, ſhall begin an unſucceſsful war, and Odin himſelf be devoured by one of the wolves; after which, the univerſe is to be ſet on fire; that there is another court, as diſmal as the other is glorious, whoſe gates open towards the north; the fences of it are woven with the hinder-parts of venemous ſerpents, whoſe heads are all turned towards the inſide of it, and caſt continual ſtreams of deadly poiſon, which infects all the rivers round it, through which the wicked are forced to wade; and much more to the like purpoſe.

We ſhall not trouble ourſelves further, to inquire whence thoſe northern poets drew all this mythological rhapſody; but only obſerve from the whole, that they plainly appear not to have had ſo high an opinion of their country, as ſome of a moderner date, who have taken a vaſt deal of pains to prove, that the earthly paradiſe was ſituate there, and that they, eſpecially Sueaſland, afforded every thing that is uſeful and delightful to mankind (53); for if thoſe old ones had entertained any ſuch favourable opinion of theſe cold regions, they would hardly have made them the abode of miſerable ſouls, and removed the ſeats of the bleſſed to the ſouthern ſide of the univerſe (54).

of thoſe who lived to an old age, as diſhonourable here, and hopeleſs hereafter: upon which account, they had a barbarous way to ſend them packing into the other world, willing or not willing. And this cuſtom laſted ſeveral ages after their receiving chriſtianity, eſpecially among the Pruſſians and Venedi; the former of whom, it ſeems, diſpatched, by a quick death, not only their ſick children, ſervants, &c. but even their parents, and ſometimes themſelves [f]: and of the latter we have inſtances of this horrid parricide being practiſed even in the beginning of the fourteenth century [g]. All that need be added is, that, if thoſe perſons, thus ſuppoſed to have lived long enough, either deſired to be put to death, or, at leaſt, ſeemed chearfully to ſubmit to what they knew they could not avoid, their exit was commonly preceded with a feaſt, and their funeral with another; but if they endeavoured to ſhun it, as it ſometimes happened, both ceremonies were performed with the deepeſt mourning. In the former they rejoiced at their deliverance, and being admitted into bliſs; in the latter they bewailed their cowardly excluding themſelves from it. Much the ſame thing was done towards thoſe wives who betrayed a backwardneſs to follow their dead huſbands. We need not here obſerve, that, in theſe funerals, as well as in all their other feaſts, they were famed for drinking to exceſs; and one may ſay of them, above all the other deſcendants of the antient Celtes, that their hoſpitality, banquets, &c. conſiſted much more in the quantity of ſtrong liquors, than in the elegance of eating. Beer, and ſtrong mead, which were their natural drink, were looked upon as the chief promoters of health, ſtrength, fertility, and bravery; upon which account, they made no ſcruple to indulge themſelves to the utmoſt in them, not only in their feaſts, and eſpecially before an engagement, but even in their common meals. Tacitus tells us, that they could bear neither heat nor thirſt; and that they thought it no diſgrace to ſpend whole days and nights in quaffing [h]: ſo that though they were in no caſe more invincible than in this, yet, if they plied them with enough of it, you could not fail of overcoming them [i]. As for wine, tho' they at firſt betrayed an exceſſive fondneſs for it, yet they quickly found by experience, that it only tended to enervate and emaſculate the men, and obſtructed the fecundity of the women; for which reaſon ſome of them, eſpecially the Suevi, forbad the importation of it [k]. And it is thought, to this day, that the

The history of the antient Germans.

WE have taken notice, at the beginning of this chapter, that the most antient historians, both Greek and Roman, have so injudiciously confounded the whole German nation under the names of Scythians and Celtes, and that Tacitus himself, who had conversed so much amongst them, is, in some cases, so manifestly fabulous, and, in many others, so obscure and inconsistent, that no tolerable certainty can be expected either with relation to their origin, or antient history, except we can strike out some light from better hands, and from some such concurring circumstances as may add weight to their testimony. This, we hope, we have done, in some measure, with relation to the first of these two points; but it is much more difficult to adjust the latter to any satisfaction, considering what a vast number of nations are comprehended in the general name of Germans, their constant fluctuations, and driving each other from place to place, their various intermixtures with each other, till the name of the one was quite swallowed up in the other; that many of them did, in time, come to differ widely from the rest, in their customs, government, laws, and politics; and others are scarcely known to us by any thing but their names; and especially, considering that none of them wrote any thing of their own affairs, and that both Romans and Greeks had but a very confused, if any, knowledge of them, till the Romans did, by their wars and commerce with them, open a more easy way to it (A). Upon these accounts, we must be contented to set down all kinds of invasion; and could not, but with jealousy and resentment, behold the daily encroachments which the Romans continually made on all their neighbours, or, consequently, without uniting themselves more closely against them, and assisting those of their neighbours, who were likely to fall the next sacrifice to their ambition; as we have seen they did, with respect to the Gauls, Helvetii, and other neighbouring states. Hence arose those wars and conquests which ended in their total conquest; for the politic Romans soon took the advantage of their being divided into so many different republics; and by fomenting jealousies among some of them, bribing and corrupting others, and by using all their force and art against the rest, they found means to subdue them gradually, and by piece-meal: so that one state after the other fell a prey to their conquering arms, till the whole country was reduced into a Roman province. This part, therefore, of their history, is not to be looked upon as a general one of a whole nation, but as a separate one of such a number of different states subdued one after the other, and in a great measure independently one from the other, till we come to that period of time the Franks brought and united all the other Germans, who remained in those countries, together with many other Roman provinces, under their dominion. For this reason, and because a full and particular account has been given of all these conquests in the Roman history, we shall, to avoid all unnecessary repetitions, content ourselves with giving a chronological summary of the reduction of each of these nations, till we come to the grand epocha of the Franks above-mentioned; and refer our readers to the volume and page where each of them is more fully and severally mentioned. For the Roman history being not only the most considerable one in this whole work, in all respects, but being, as it were, the basis, or pivot, on which that of all the nations they subdued doth chiefly turn, we thought it would render it more complete, useful, and instructive, to give them all in one view, or series, in that part of it, than if we had detached them from the main body, and branched them out into so many distinct parts of history; which could hardly have been done without either great confusion, or endless repetitions. From the conquest of Germany by the Romans, our next point in view will be, to shew by what means they regained their liberty, and made such ample reprisals upon their conquerors under the Franks; and as the detection of these gave rise to the German empire, which will make a considerable part in our modern history, which is to follow, we shall, to avoid confusion, give the history of all those several nations, and of those kingdoms which they erected in other countries, in their several transmigrations, each in a distinct

Germany invaded by the Gauls.

BUT before we come to the Roman invasion, it will be necessary to mention some transactions, relating to the antient Germans, which are previous to it, and have yet been but touched upon; the first of which is, the Gallish irruption into their territories, under the conduct of Segovesus, whilst his brother, Bellovesus, made the like over the Alps. These two valiant princes were sons to the sister of Ambigatus, a king of the Celtæ, or Gauls, about the time of Tarquinius Priscus. That monarch, finding his subjects to increase too fast for the extent of his territories, resolved to send two large colonies out of it, to settle somewhere else, under the conduct of his two nephews. These being directed, as the Gallish manner then was, by the flight of birds, the former of these was directed over the Rhine, and settled in the Hercynian forest [b], whilst the other went and penetrated into Italy, as we have seen in a former volume [c] (B). Whether the Germans had any hand in this latter expedition, doth not clearly appear, for the reasons mentioned in the last note. Only if the regions lying at the foot of the Apennine hills were at that time inhabited by Germans, or semi Germans, as Livy calls them [d], there is no question to be made, but they might be hurried, by those Gallish swarms, to follow them in those excursions, and share in those devastations and pillages, which they committed. But hitherto it doth not appear, that the rest of the German nation were at all concerned in them, since Tacitus gives them this peculiar character, that they rather studied how to preserve their own, than

[b] Liv. decad. I. v. c. 34. [c] Vol. xi. p. 419, 420. [d] Decad. I. xxi c. 28.

(B) We find, however, no farther mention of the former colony, and their settlement in Germany, unless we suppose, that it is of them which Julius Cæsar speaks, when he informs us of a Gallish nation, which in his time inhabited the heart of Germany, along the Hercynian forest, and all the most fertile parts of that country between the Rhine and that famed wood, and had intirely conformed themselves to the customs and manners of that country (7). Tacitus, likewise, by placing the Boii and Helvetii much about the very same spot of ground, and making them both to be descended from the Gauls (8), doth in all probability, mean the very same nation and colony with Cæsar and Livy.

how to invade the territories of others [e]; and it is moſt likely, that they did not begin to act offenſively againſt the Romans, at leaſt, till they were alarmed at the greatneſs of their power, and the daily encroachments they made round about them. Swarms of colonies they muſt be ſuppoſed to have ſent abroad, to prevent the want of elbow-room, as they multiplied ſo faſt: but there was ſo much of that to ſpare towards the north parts of Europe, and ſo little on the ſouth parts, where they were, moreover, ſure to meet with a ſtout oppoſition, that they poured moſt of them towards the other way, at leaſt till the Gauls did, in ſome meaſure, oblige them to make repriſals upon them.

THE firſt of theſe we meet with, and which, in all appearance, is of much later date than that of Segoveſus into Germany, is that of the Belgæ, one of the fierceſt, and moſt warlike nations of Germany; who, having paſſed the Rhine, and driven the Gauls out of a canton of it, ſeated themſelves ſo firmly in it, that neither their neighbours, whom they continually annoyed, nor any other nation, could ever drive them out of it. Cæſar adds, that they were not a little proud of this their ſettlement, and that they aſſumed a high hand over all their neighbours [f]; and we have elſewhere obſerved, that they were, probably, called Belgæ, upon that account, that word, in the old Teutonic, ſignifying fierce and quarrelſome [g] (C). They afterwards peopled the coaſts of Britain, and drove the natives into the inland parts, and waged continual wars with the Germans [h]. We have already given an account of theſe Belgæ, of their origin, wars with the Romans, and reduction to their yoke, in a former volume, to which we refer our readers [i]. From this irruption of the Belgæ into Gaul, which is the firſt the German nation made upon them, at leaſt that we read of, theſe two nations continued in a kind of alternate ſtate of hoſtility and friendſhip, as occaſion ſerved; ſometimes invading each other's territories, at other times aſſiſting each other againſt the Romans, as we have had frequent occaſion to hint in the laſt chapter, and ſhall again in this; but it is time that we ſhould ſpeak of thoſe

(C) And which is the character Cæſar gives them, and attributes this roughneſs of theirs to their living at a diſtance from the more civilized provinces of Gaul, and having few or no foreign merchants to trade with them, and bring them ſuch commodities as ſerve to effeminate mankind (9).

wars and defeats which the ſeveral German nations waged againſt the Romans, the defeats they received from them, and by which they were ſubdued by them, in the ſuccinct method and order of time, as we have promiſed.

THE firſt we read of, who ventured to invade the Roman territories, were the Cimbri and Teutones: we have already ſpoken of their antient ſettlement, the former in the Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, and the latter on the coaſts and iſles of the Baltic [k]; but whether for want of room there, or, perhaps, invited by the beauty of a warmer clime, both theſe (D) marched, with their wives and children, through, and ravaged Noricum and Illyricum, penetrated into Italy, defeated the Romans at ſeveral pitched battles [l], and threw all Italy into the greateſt conſternation [m]. In the firſt of theſe actions they vanquiſhed the famous conſul, Papyrius Carbo: in another M. Junius Silanus, another conſul, who was ſoon after called to a ſevere account for it; and, in a third, L. Caſſius; and, in a fourth, the brave M. Aurelius Scaurus, whom they took priſoner, and put to death by their king, Bolos (E), for ſpeaking too boldly in praiſe of the Romans: but, Cimbri invade Italy.

(D) It doth not, indeed, appear, that theſe two nations began their firſt excurſions jointly, or at the ſame time; much leſs, that they all left their territories, for they left a much greater number behind; but only that ſome of the reſoluteſt of each reſolved to exchange them for new ones. It is more likely that, upon the ſight of the vigorous oppoſition they were likely to meet with from the conſular armies, and under ſuch experienced generals, the Cimbri invited the Teutones, who were their neighbours, to come and join them, as they did ſome others, both Germans and Gaul, through whoſe territories they paſſed; particularly the Tigurini and Ambrones, who are mentioned in the ſame invaſion (10). They parted, indeed, from them all, upon what account doth not appear; but inſtead of purſuing their Italic invaſion towards the Pyrenees, being there repulſed by the Celtiberi, they rejoined the Teutones again, and made ſad havock in Gaul, which was then in no condition to withſtand them. They moved, at length, towards Italy, by ſeveral ways, and were forced to fight their way through each of them. It proved, however, a fatal expedition to them all, particularly to the Teutones, who, after having inſulted the Roman army with the moſt biting taunts (11), were cut off by them, to the number of 100,000, by the ſame victorious conſul (12).

(E) This is, in all likelihood, the ſame whom Plutarch calls Boiorix, king of the Gauls (13), but Livy Boios, king of the Cim-

but, after ſeveral other ſucceſſes in Italy, they were totally defeated and deſtroyed by the policy of the conſul Marius [n]. For this general took care to poſt himſelf ſo advantageouſly, on the day of battle, that the Cimbri had not only his army, but the ſun, wind, and duſt, to combat with, and were the more eaſily overthrown, by that ſubtile ſtratagem (F). How greatly the Romans eſteemed this victory, may be ſeen by the triumph, and other ſingular honours which they decreed both to Marius, and to Catulus, as well as by the monuments which theſe cauſed to be reared in memory of it[o] (G). Thoſe Cimbri who eſcaped this dreadful bri (14). We have formerly mentioned the murder of the brave Scaurus, by that young hot-headed prince, and the occaſion of it (15); and there we followed the former of theſe authors, though, moſt likely, the latter is in the right. We lately took notice, how apt the Greeks and Romans were to confound the Gauls and Germans; the Cimbri were, doubtleſs, antient Celtes, as their name imports, with reſpect to their origin; but Gauls they could not be, ſince they inhabited the moſt northern parts of Germany.

(F) This circumſtance we are beholden to Plutarch for (16), and need the leſs queſtion it, ſeeing that author had it out of Sylla's memoirs, who was himſelf in Marius's army, and had wrote a deſcription of this victory, beſides Catulus, who likewiſe left an account of his conſulſhip; and, perhaps, ſome other helps he might have had beſides. The deſcription which he and ſome others (17) give us of the order of battle of the Cimbrians, their accoutrements, weapons, valour, and intrepidity to the laſt, plainly ſhews what brave warriors they were, and that they only wanted ſome parts of the Roman diſcipline and policy to have made them, in all points, ſuperior to the conquerors of the world.

We are told, farther, that their wives behaved, in this action, with incredible bravery; and at length preferred an honourable death for themſelves and their children, to a diſhonourable captivity (18): and Seneca adds, that, after their death, their very dogs fought in defence of the carriages, which theſe heroines had loſt their lives for.

(G) Among theſe was the famed temple of Virtue, built by the former, and the brazen bull, which the latter is ſaid to have taken from them, and cauſed to be preſerved in his own houſe (19). What this bull was, hath puzzled moſt antiquaries, becauſe it is not mentioned by any other author: ſome think, that the Cimbrians

had

dreadful ſlaughter, did, in all likelihood, return into their own country; for they are ſaid to have ſent afterwards a ſubmiſſive embaſſy to Auguſtus [p]; and are likewiſe mentioned, by authors of later date, as the moſt warlike of all the northern Germans [q], down to Claudian's time, who calls the north ſea by their name [r]. But it is likely the Saxons, their neighbours, joining with them in their excurſions, and growing, by degrees, more famous, the Cimbrian name was ſwallowed up in theirs [s].

THE next excurſion we find recorded of the Germans is, that Arioviſtus which happened in Julius Cæſar's time, on occaſion of the jealouſy, which it is juſtly ſuppoſed that politic conqueror fomented between the Ædui and the Arverni, the then two moſt potent nations in Gaul; the former of whom being then in friendſhip with Rome, and the latter allied with the Sequani, theſe thought fit to call in the neighbouring Germans to their aſſiſtance. At firſt, only 15000 came over to them, but they became ſo enamoured with this delightful country, that, to keep their footing in it, they ſent for freſh ſupplies from over the Rhine, inſomuch, that they amounted, at laſt, to 120000. The Sequani, by their aſſiſtance, ſoon ſubdued the Ædui, as we have formerly ſeen [t]; but their victory coſt them dear, for they were forced by Arioviſtus, the German king, to evacuate one third part of their kingdom, to ſettle his troops in. He ſoon after obliged them to yield another third to him, as a ſettlement for 40000 Harudes, who croſſed over to him, and, at the ſame time, did, by his addreſs, induce Julius Cæſar, then conſul, to allow him the title and honour of a king [u]. But it proved a ſhort-lived kingdom, and Cæſar, who only careſſed him for his own ends, ſoon found a ſpecious pretence to diſpoſſeſs him of it. The vaſt numbers of Germans which Arioviſtus had brought into Gaul, and the ſucceſs which their bravery had gained them, could not but raiſe the Roman jealouſy, and alarm not only the Sequani, but the greateſt part of the Gauls, who thereupon applied to the conſul with bitter complaints againſt the German devaſtations, and the danger they were in of being quickly ſwallowed up by them. Cæſar turned all this to his own advantage, and ſent to deſire an interview with the German prince, who found means to excuſe himſelf from it, and to get ſix other nations, or can-tons, to join with him, beſides his own Suevi (H), and a freſh reinforcement of thoſe which were haſtening over to him; upon which, Cæſar made what haſte he could towards him, to prevent their joining. A conference was, at length, agreed upon, in which Cæſar uſed ſome threats to him, and plainly told him, that the Romans would doubly reſent his tyrannic uſe of their old friends the Ædui, after they had ſhewed him ſo much regard, and beſtowed ſuch honours upon him; and therefore inſiſted, that he ſhould reſtore their hoſtages to them, ſend back part of his German troops, and forbear all future hoſtilities. To all this imperious ſtuff, Arioviſtus, in vain, pleaded the right of conqueſt, his being invited into Gaul, and his treaties with the Sequani, and even offered his ſervices and friendſhip to Cæſar himſelf: the conference was broken, and followed with a dreadful engagement, in which the Roman policy got the advantage of the German bravery (I), gave them a total overthrow,

(H) Theſe were the Marcomanni, Harudes, Tribochi, Vangiones, Nemetes, and Seduſii. We have given an account of theſe German nations, at the beginning of this chapter; beſides theſe, the Treviri gave notice to Cæſar, that a freſh ſwarm of Suevi were got as far as the banks of the Rhine, under the command of Naſua and Cimberius, two brothers, who were juſt on the point to croſs over into Gaul, and join the German army (21).

(I) Cæſar played a double ſtratagem againſt them; the firſt, by animating his Romans and Gauliſh allies, with a pretence, that Arioviſtus had been guilty of the blackeſt treachery againſt him (22); which notion, whether true or falſe, would not fail exaſperating them, and diſheartening the Germans: the other, by obliging them to fight before the new moon, which, he had been informed, both Gauls and Germans carefully avoided, as ominous to them: and accordingly, Arioviſtus ſtrove all he could to ſhun it, till the Romans fell ſuddenly upon him, and obliged him to fight, which both he and his men did, with greater fury than diſcretion; and, being once put into diſorder, betook themſelves to a haſty flight, in ſpite of the cries and endeavours of their wives and children to rally them, and ſtopped not till they got ſafe over the Rhine.

The misfortune is, that we have no other account of theſe things but what Cæſar has been pleaſed to give us, who is evidently partial to his own nation, and much more to himſelf. Had they been written by a more impartial hand, it is likely we ſhould find them in a very different light from what he has given them. However, even as we have them from him, it is not difficult to diſcover ſuch inconſiſtencies as ſeem to us to carry their own confutation. Such as is that which he ſays of the Germans at this action, viz. that they throw [w], and forced them over the Rhine, ſome by ſwimming, and others in boats, and, amongſt the reſt, Arioviſtus himſelf, who, by what may be gueſſed by a paſſage in Cæſar, did not long outlive his diſgrace [x]. After this, the nations which fought under him diſperſed themſelves, the Marcomanns into Boiohemum, under the conduct of Maroboduus; the Tribochi, Nemetes, and Vangiones, ſtayed in Gaul, or went over the Rhine, and ſubmitted, with the Ubii, to the Romans; for we find them ſtill ſeated along the banks of that river [y]. As for thoſe Suevi who were aſſembled on the ſame ſide, they retired, upon their receiving the news of this defeat; only a great number of them were cut off, in their flight, by the Ubii, who had been treated in a hoſtile manner by them [z]. And thus ended this ſecond expedition of the Germans into Gaul. On the very next year, the Belgæ, alarmed at the ſucceſs of the Romans, formed a great alliance with the Celtes, Germans and Gauls, in order to drive them farther from their neighbourhood. Cæſar, according to cuſtom, found means to ſow ſuch diviſions amongſt them, that many of thoſe allies ſubmitted to him; only the Nervii, Atrebates, and Veromandui, ſtood firm againſt him, and, though defeated at length, yet yielded him one of the deareſt victories he had ever got: ſo that the whole Belgic nation was forced to ſubmit to the Roman yoke [a]. Comius, a faithful dependent on Cæſar, was by him made king of the Atrebates, and ſoon gained a conſiderable authority over all that country [b]; the Atuati, about the ſame time, hearing of theſe ſwift conformed themſelves into ſuch a thick and impenetrable phalanx, and held their ſhields ſo cloſe over their heads, that the Romans were forced to leap upon them, and tear them aſunder, and, ſinking down between them, kill thoſe who lurked under them, till they had opened a paſſage for their companions to come in upon them (23).

But Cæſar was not the only Roman writer who betrays ſuch fond partiality for the glory of that nation; the account which ſome of them give of the total overthrow of ſuch a vaſt army as that of the brave Cimbrians, and their allies, mentioned a little higher, and with the loſs of only 300 men on Marius's ſide (24), ſeems no leſs ſtretched beyond all probability, eſpecially conſidering how bravely they tell us the enemy behaved on this occaſion, and how much ſuperior they had proved in all former actions.

quests, came in one body to the ſuccour of the Atrebates, and entertained no ſmall contempt of the Romans, when they found them ſo far inferior in ſtature: they were, however, ſoon undeceived, to their coſt, when, being briſkly beſieged by them in their capital, into which they had been forced to retire after the defeat of the Atrebates, and unable to obtain better terms than to ſurrender it at diſcretion, both their city, and all the gariſon of it, to the number of 53000, were ſold by the conqueror [c] (K).

53000 Atuaci ſold for ſlaves.

Cæſar was, not long afterwards, forced into a war with two other German nations, viz. the Tencteri, and Uſipetes (L): theſe, having been forced out of their own territories by the Suevi, the fierceſt and moſt warlike of all the northern Germans, of whom we ſhall ſpeak in the ſequel of this volume, had paſſed into Gaul, and ſettled themſelves in the neighbourhood of the Eburones and Condruſi. Cæſar was then at Rome, to obſtruct the cabals of Lucius Domitius againſt him, but was obliged to haſten into Gaul, to prevent their joining with that nation againſt the Romans. Upon his arrival, they ſent an embaſſy to acquaint him with the reaſons of their coming into that country, and to beg, that he would allow them ſettlements there, promiſing him, if he did, to ſerve him upon all occaſions; otherwiſe, that they would maintain their ground by force of arms. Cæſar not only refuſed to grant them their requeſt, but fell ſuddenly and furiouſly upon them, and made a terrible ſlaughter of them, together with their wives and children; and

(K) Cæſar, in his account of this action, ſeems to intimate, that he had extirpated the whole nation by it (24): for he ſays, that they had all abandoned their cities and towns, and had ſheltered themſelves in this capital, where thoſe who eſcaped being killed in the ſiege, were all ſold for ſlaves. But they are found, in proceſs of time, to have made ſuch powerful head againſt the Romans, as ſhews plainly enough how apt that conqueror was to exaggerate every advantage he got againſt thoſe who fell under his hand.

What this capital was, he doth not tell us: Cluverius thinks it to have been Namur; if ſo, it is ſtrange, that Cæſar, when he deſcribes the ſtrength of the place (25), ſhould ſay nothing of the Marſa, on which that place is ſituate, and which could not but add conſiderable ſtrength to it.

(L) We have given an account of theſe two nations, and their country, in a former volume (26).

of thoſe who eſcaped, the greateſt part periſhed, with endeavouring to croſs the Maeſe [d]; only their cavalry, who happened not to be in the battle, croſſed the Rhine, and fled to the Sicambri, whoſe territories were ſited between thoſe two rivers. This, and the aſſiſtance which the Ubii about Cologn ſent to beg of him againſt the threatening Suevi, afforded him a pretence for building a bridge over the Rhine, to the great ſurpriſe of all the Germans (M), but eſpecially of the Sicambri, whoſe country he ravaged at an unmerciful rate, ſet fire to their houſes, cut down their corn, and returned to the Ubii; whilſt they, at his approach, ran with all their effects into their forcſts, and exhorted the Tenctteri and Uſipetes to do the ſame [e]. This was the firſt time, in all likelihood, that the Romans ſet foot on the German territories, which became afterwards the ſcene of ſo much bloodſhed on both ſides, both under that conqueror, and his ſucceſſors, and which ended in the almoſt total conqueſt of this brave nation. The Treviri were the firſt who gave an occaſion to that general to invade their country, who doth not appear to have had any intention, upon his firſt entering Germany, to carry on a war againſt them, but only to keep them in awe, by convincing them, that he was not afraid to come and attack them in their own territories (N). However that be, the Treviri, grown jealous of the Romans, and of their own liberty (O), had, by their credit and valour, well nigh

(M) The Ubii, indeed, offered to waſt him over in their boats; but the politic general told them, that it would be more for the honour of the Romans to build a bridge over that river; which, it ſeems, was the firſt attempt of that kind, they being uſed before to croſs it in floats, and other ſlight and flat veſſels. What increaſed their ſurpriſe, if his account can be credited, was, that he finiſhed it in ten days, and ſet a ſtrong guard on each ſide of it. The reader may ſee this famed fabric deſcribed by himſelf (27).

(N) Cæſar had two other views, the one to ſhew the Germans, by the example of the Sicambri, how dangerous it was to exaſperate the Romans; and the other, by the timely aſſiſtance he gave the Ubii againſt the Suevi, though for his own ends, to induce them to ſet a high value upon Roman friendſhip.

(O) They had been formerly reckoned a very powerful nation among the Germans (28), and, having ſince paſſed the Rhine, had extended their dominions from that river quite to the country of the Rhæti. They had, a little before, ſhook off the Roman yoke, and were even reported to have invited other Germans to come, and nigh ſtirred up a general revolt in Gaul, which had groaned ſome time under the Roman yoke: this obliged Cæſar to ſend Labienus againſt them, whilſt he went to the aſſiſtance of Cicero, who was, in ſome meaſure, beſieged by the Nervii. We have given already a full account of all theſe tranſactions, in a former volume; for which reaſon, we ſhall refer our readers to them, as they are quoted in the margin, to avoid needleſs repetitions [f].

For the ſame reaſon we ſhall content ourſelves with juſt recapitulating the principal and brave efforts which they made, upon all favourable conjunctures, for the recovery of their liberty, and the deſperate wars which they renewed, and carried on, upon all proper occaſions, againſt ſeveral Roman emperors, and during ſeveral centuries, till they had accompliſhed their end, and ſubdued their conquerors; and refer our readers to thoſe parts of the Roman hiſtory, where they have been as fully treated of as could be done in a work of this extenſive nature. It is not, indeed, to be ſuppoſed, that their inſuperable love of liberty could ſuffer them to be longer patient under the Roman yoke, than till an opportunity offered itſelf for ſhaking it off; and this, in ſpite of the Roman careſſes, policy, and vigilance, could not but often happen, conſidering the continual diſtractions of that unwieldy empire: neither could the ill ſucceſs, which too often attended theſe attempts, diſcourage them from freſh ones: ſo that it would unavoidably draw us too far, to particularize them all here again; eſpecially conſidering that they were, in proceſs of time, divided into many diſtinct nations, and appear, in hiſtory, under ſeveral names; ſuch as thoſe of Franks, Alemans, Gepidæ, Burgundians, &c. of each of whom, as well as of the other conſiderable northern nations, ſuch as the Hunns, Goths, Sueves, Dacians, Lombards, &c. we ſhall give a full hiſtory, in the ſubſequent chapters (P).

aſſiſt them, and the Gauls, in defence of their liberty (29); which occaſioned their being defeated by Labienus, as has been elſewhere hinted (30).

(P) It will not, however, be amiſs to advertiſe our readers here, that, as thoſe nations branched out into a vaſt multitude of tribes, governments, and names, it will be impoſſible, in a work of this extent, to take notice of them all under ſeparate articles, eſpecially as many of them are known to us by little more than their names,

or,

WITH relation to the Germans in general, the moſt conſiderable tranſactions which remain to be taken notice of, are thoſe which follow, and which having been already ſpoken of in ſome former volumes, we ſhall here only recapitulate and refer our reader to the places quoted in the margin. In Auguſtus's reign, who, as we formerly took notice, had iſſued out ſome edicts againſt the inhuman ſuperſtitions of the druids [g], which, in all likelihood, affected both nations, the Germans took that opportunity to paſs the Rhine, and to ravage thoſe countries which were ſubject to him. Againſt them Agrippa was ſent, whoſe arrival ſo intimidated them, that they quickly repaſſed that river [h]. But, whilſt he was gone into Spain, they repaſſed it, and defeated a body of Roman horſe, and afterwards the Gallic proconſul M. Lollius, from whom they carried off a ſtandard: but he ſoon recovered his honour, and drove them back again [i], with conſiderable loſs. All this while the Gauls were in great ferment, and meditating a general revolt; upon which he ſent Druſus thither to quell them, which he had no ſooner done [k], but he paſſed the Rhine, drove all before him, and penetrated almoſt to the German ocean [l].

THE famed revolt which happened among the Roman legions left in Pannonia, and which was happily quelled, in part, by Druſus, and afterwards wholly by Germanicus [m], gave occaſion for a freſh invaſion, which the laſt mentioned general carried on with great ſucceſs, and much greater havock and ſlaughter of the Germans for fifty miles about; and, if we may believe Tacitus, without the loſs, or even the wounding, of one ſingle Roman [n]. This action, which may be more properly called a maſſacre than a conqueſt (Q), alarmed ſome other German nations againſt them; but theſe, likewiſe, had the misfortune to be defeated, as we have ſeen in the Roman hiſtory [o]. The Roman general had ſoon after a fairer field offered to him, on occaſion of the rupture between the two German chiefs, Arminius and Segeſtes, the former a ſworn enemy to the Romans, the latter a ſtaunch friend to them. What advantage Germanicus made of this rupture, we need not repeat here, but only that the Germans received ſeveral defeats, and Arminius himſelf, after ſome advantages gained over them, was totally routed [p]. All that we ſhall add concerning this war is, that though it coſt the Roman general very dear [q], yet he had received ſuch reinforcements of men and arms from Gaul and other parts, that he hoped in one campaign to have reduced all Germany; but his ſucceſs raiſed the jealouſy of Tiberius, and occaſioned his being recalled [r].

Of ſuch, we hope, it will be ſufficient to ſpeak occaſionally, as we find them mentioned by antient authors, and to give the beſt account which can be found of them, in as few words as poſſible.

THEIR other moſt conſiderable wars with the Romans the reader will find in the places quoted in the margin [s]; in the reign of M. Aurelius [t], and afterwards under the following emperors, which we ſhall but juſt mention here, and refer to the places where they are ſpoken of in the Roman hiſtory, viz. againſt Alexander and Maximin [u], againſt Valerian [w] and Aurelian [x], Probus [y], Conſtantius [z], Julian [a], Valentinian, and ſome of his ſucceſſors [b]: but theſe, and the ſequel of their hiſtory, will be beſt ſeen in ſome of the ſubſequent chapters,

(Q) That general was, it ſeems, informed, that the Germans were then celebrating ſome great feſtival; and as he knew it was their cuſtom to drink very hard, and to carouſe it all night, he did not doubt but to find them either dead-drunk, or faſt aſleep, as he actually did. For having, with a numerous army, croſſed the Caſian foreſt all night, he fell upon them, before they either knew any thing of his coming, or were recovered from their debauch. The confuſion that reigned amongſt them upon ſuch a ſurpriſe, made them become an eaſy prey to him, and he failed not to make the beſt advantage of it; permitting his troops to put all to fire and ſword, ſparing neither age or ſex, or even their moſt ſacred groves; witneſs that famed one of Tanfana, of which we have had occaſion to ſpeak at the beginning of this chapter, and which they burnt, and levelled to the ground [31].

SECT. I.

Deſcription of Britain. The firſt inhabitants. The cuſtoms, religion, government, &c. of the antient Britons. The ſtate of Britain under the Romans.

Britain called, in more antient times, Albion.

THE iſland, which is now called Great Britain, and comprehends the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, with the principality of Wales, was, in more antient times, by way of diſtinction, ſtyled Albion, the name of Britain being then common to all the iſlands, that lie round it. Hence, Agathemerus, ſpeaking of the Britiſh iſlands, They are many in number, ſays he; but the moſt conſiderable among them are Hibernia and Albion [a]. And Ptolemy, to the chapter, wherein he deſcribes the iſland now called Great Britain, prefixes the following title; The ſituation of Albion, a Britiſh iſland [b]. But, as this far excelled the other Britiſh iſlands, the name of Albion, in proceſs of time, was quite laid aſide, and that of Britain, by way of excellency, uſed in its room. By this name it was known in Pliny's time, and even in Cæſar's. The iſland of Britain, ſays Pliny, ſo much celebrated by the Greek and Latin writers, was formerly called Albion, the name of Britain being then common to all the iſlands round it [c]. And Cæſar, The other angle of Britain, ſhooting out to the weſt, lies over-againſt Spain; on which ſide is Hibernia, an iſland thought to be half as big as Britain, and about the ſame diſtance from Britain, as Britain is from Gaul [d]. Hence it is manifeſt, that the name of Britain, once common to all the iſlands in our ocean, was, in Cæſar's time and Pliny's, become peculiar to the iſland, which is ſtill known by that name. Whence it had the name of Albion, is uncertain, ſome deriving it from the Greek word alphon, which, according to Festus, signifies white, the chalky cliffs, that, in several places, rise on our coasts, being of that colour; while others pretend this name to have been borrowed from a giant, feigned to have been the son of Neptune, and mentioned by several antient writers. Some of our etymologists have recourse to the Hebrew tongue, and some to the Phœnician; alben, in the former, signifying white; and alp, in the latter, high. The derivation from the Greek word alphon, or from the Hebrew alben, seems to be countenanced by the British poets, who style Britain Inis Wen, that is, the White Island[c]. The origin of the name Britain is no less uncertain, than that of Albion. Nennius and some other British writers derive it from Brutus, whom they likewise call Brito, the fifth in descent from the celebrated Æneas. Others bring it from the British words Pryd Cain, that is, a white form, softened, by degrees, into Britannia. The learned Camden derives it from the words Brith, which, in the antient language of the island, signifies painted, and Tania, importing in Greek, a region or country; so that the name Brithtania, changed in process of time into Britannia, expresses what the Britons really were, that is, painted. Somner, disliking Camden's etymology, proposes another, viz. that the name Britain comes from Brydio, signifying, in the British tongue, rage, and pointing out the violent motion of the sea, that surrounds the island. Of these four etymologies, the first is founded on a fable; and against the other three lies one common, and, in our opinion, unanswerable objection; which is, that the name of Britain was given to the island by foreigners, who could not borrow it from the British tongue, with which they were, in all likelihood, unacquainted. That the island received the name of Britain from foreigners, is evident, since the natives never styled themselves Britons, nor their country Britain, their true name being Cumri, or Cumbri; whence Cambria the name of Wales to this day among the Welsh. Besides, the second of the above-mentioned etymologies, deriving Britain from Pryd Cain, seems too far fetched. As to Camden's etymology, Somner observes, that Cæsar, in telling us, the Britons painted their bodies with woad, speaks only of the inhabitants of Albion; whereas all the isles in our ocean were called by one general name insulæ Britannicæ, British islands. Is it probable, that a name, common to all the islands in our ocean, should owe its origin to a custom peculiar to one, though the most considerable, among them? As for the rage and fury of the sea, whence Somner derives the name of Britannia, it is not true, that the sea rages more on the coaſt of Great Britain than elſewhere. The learned Bochart, ſpeaking of the colonies and language of the Phœnicians, offers a conjecture, which moſt of our modern writers have adopted as the moſt natural. The Phœnicians, according to that writer [f], called this iſland, and ſome others near it, Barat Anac, that is, the land or country of tin or lead, and more contractedly Bratanac; which name, paſſing from the Phœnicians to the Greeks, and from theſe to the Romans, might have been ſoftened into that of Britannicæ and Britannia. That the Phœnicians firſt diſcovered thoſe iſles, which were afterwards by the Greeks called Caſſiterides, and are proved by Camden to be our Scilly iſlands, appears both from Strabo and Pliny, of whom the former tells us, that the Phœnicians firſt brought tin from the Caſſiterides, which they ſold to the Greeks; but kept the trade to themſelves, and the place private [g]: and the latter writes, that Mediocritus was the firſt, who brought lead from the Caſſiterides [h]; where Bochart ſhews, that we ought to read Melichartus, who is the Phœnician Hercules of Sanchoniathon, to whom the Phœnicians aſcribed their firſt weſtern diſcoveries [i]. But, notwithſtanding the care of the Phœnicians to conceal theſe iſlands, the Greeks at laſt diſcovered them, and gave them the name of Caſſiterides, which, in the Greek tongue, anſwers that of Barat Anac in the Phœnician. This name was at firſt given to the above-mentioned iſlands, but, by degrees, communicated to all the others lying in the ſame ſea. Thus Bochart. But, after all, his opinion, however plauſible in appearance, may be as foreign to the purpoſe, as any of the reſt, the late inſtances to names given to new-diſcovered countries teaching us, that the origin of ſuch names is not always owing to reaſon, but often to chance and caprice. As therefore the origin of the names given to this iſland is of too antient a date to be traced with any certainty, we ſhall diſmiſs this ſubject, and proceed to ſome more material account of the country.

Deſcription of the country.

Britain lies over-againſt France and Germany, as Cæſar obſerved, in a triangular form, having three promontories ſhooting out three different ways, viz. Belerium, the Land's-end towards the weſt, Cantium, the Kentiſh or North Foreland towards the eaſt, and Traviſium or Orcas, Cathneſs, towards the north. It is divided from Ireland, to the weſt, by the Vergivian or Iriſh ſea; waſhed on the north by the northern ocean; on the eaſt, where it faces Germany, by the German ocean; and on the ſouth, towards France, by the Britiſh channel, called by the Romans Fretum Britannicum. Some writers have thought, that, where the channel is moſt contracted, the iſland was antiently joined by an iſthmus to the continent [k]. It lies between the 50th and 59th degrees of north latitude, extending from north to ſouth about 560 miles. Its breadth is various; and in compaſs its three ſides are found to contain, allowing for the windings of the coaſt, about eighteen hundred miles. The ſouth ſide, extending from the North Foreland in Kent to the Land's-end in Cornwall, contains about three hundred miles; the weſt ſide from the Land's-end to the moſt northern point of Scotland, about eight hundred; and the eaſt ſide about ſeven hundred. Were Great Britain to be conſidered as a perfect triangle, formed by three right lines, the length of its three ſides, put together, would amount to about fifteen hundred miles. The fertility and pleaſantneſs of Britain gave occaſion to Iſaacius Tzetzes to imagine, that theſe were the fortunate iſlands, deſcribed by the poets, where the face of nature ſmiled with a perpetual ſpring. It was, in former times, the granary of the weſtern empire; for hence was every year tranſported an immenſe quantity of corn for the ſupply of the army on the frontiers of Germany. But the convenience of its ſituation, the fertility of its ſoil, and the innumerable bleſſings, with which it has been enriched by nature, are, with high encomiums, deſcribed by two antient panegyriſts, one of whom pronounced his ſpeech before Conſtantine, and the other before Conſtantius. To theſe we refer the reader, and paſs to the firſt inhabitants of this iſland.

THE ſouthern parts of Britain were peopled, according to Cæſar [l], by the Gauls. Tacitus is of the ſame opinion: If we conſider all circumſtances, ſays he, it is probable, that Gaul firſt peopled Britain, which lies ſo near it [m]. This opinion, which is followed by moſt of the antient, as well as the modern, writers, is chiefly founded on the agreement obſerved by the Roman writers between the two nations in their cuſtoms, manners, language, religion, form of government, way of fighting, &c. Beſides, as the Gauls ſent colonies into Italy, Spain, Germany, Thrace, aud Aſia, it is but reaſonable to conclude, that they did the ſame with reſpect to Britain, which lay ſo near them, that they could diſcern it from the continent, and was no leſs plentiful than the other countries, where they ſettled. As for the more northern inhabitants of Britain, Tacitus infers, Its firſt inhabitants.

from the make of their limbs, and other circumſtances, that they came from Germany [n]; and Cæſar telling us, that they were Aborigines, ſeems to imply, that he diſcovered no affinity in their language, manners, cuſtoms, &c. with thoſe of Gaul and the ſouthern parts of Britain.

The origin of the Picts.

As for the Picts, who held the eaſtern parts of Britain, which lay north of the Tine, the venerable Bede tells us, that they came out of Scythia in long ſhips, and landed firſt in the north of Ireland; but not being ſuffered to ſettle there by the Scots, who then poſſeſſed that iſland, they were adviſed to plant themſelves in the north part of Britain; which they did accordingly, with the aſſiſtance of the Scots, who moreover ſupplied them with wives to perpetuate their colony; but upon this condition, that, in all diſputes concerning the ſucceſſion to the crown, the Picts ſhould prefer the female to the male line of their former kings; which is obſerved among them, ſays Bede, to this day [o]. By Scythia, Bede perhaps meant the northern parts of Germany; for that Scandinavia, now comprehending the kingdoms of Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, was, by the beſt writers of the middle ages, ſtyled Scythia, is ſhewn by the learned Uſher [p] and Stillingfleet [q], of whom the latter admits, as not improbable, the conjecture of Hector Boetius, deriving the Picts from the Agathyrſi, who, from Sarmatia, came into Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, and from thence into Scotland [r].

Whether the Picts and Britons one and the ſame people.

As no Roman author makes mention of the Picts before Ammianus Marcellinus, who lived about the end of the fourth century, ſome writers are of opinion, that the Picts were not a diſtinct people from the Britons, but ſuch of that nation as, to avoid the tyranny of the Romans, had retired into the northern parts of the iſland, where, continuing to paint their bodies, they were, by the Romans, called Picti, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe, who, ſubmitting to Rome, had laid aſide that cuſtom, and adopted the Roman manners. To confirm this opinion, they alledge the authority of Camden, who, in his introduction, endeavours to ſhew, that the names of places, formerly held by the Picts in the ſouth and weſt parts of Scotland, are Britiſh, and conſequently, that one and the ſame was the language of the Britons and Picts. But that theſe two nations ſpoke different languages, is manifeſt beyond diſpute from Bede, who tells us, that, in his time, God was ſerved in five ſeveral languages in Britain, viz. of the Angles, of the Britons, of the Scots, of the Picts, and of the Latins; which latter was commonly uſed in divine worſhip [s]. Now this difference of language, which Bede, who lived ſo near a neighbour to the Picts, could not be ignorant of, weighs down, with us, all the arguments, that are alledged to prove, that the Britons and Picts were one and the ſame people. Beſides, it is certain, that the Picts were, for ſeveral ages, a ſeparate and diſtinct nation, differing both from the Scots and Britons, not only in their language, but in their laws and cuſtoms. The contrary opinion is intirely built on the conformity of the name Picts with the Latin word Picti; which is but a weak foundation, ſince ſome writers, and among the reſt Verſtegan, derive the name of the Picts from a word in their own language ſignifying warrior. The Scots called them Pebiti, which name, in the opinion of ſome antiquaries, anſwers that of Picts, from the Latin word Picti; but others think it highly improbable, that the Scots, who were late ſubdued by the Romans, and continued but a ſhort time under their dominion, ſhould give their neighbours a Roman name. Buchanan takes the name of Picts to be Roman; but, at the ſame time, pretends, they came from certain Gauliſh colonies ſettled in Thrace, where they painted their bodies, as well as in Britain. The ſame author adds, that the Picts ſpoke the ſame language as the Britons and Scots. But herein he is contradicted, not only by Bede, whom we have quoted above, but by John Major, one of the moſt antient Scots hiſtorians, who tells us, that as yet, that is, in his time, almoſt half Scotland ſpoke the Iriſh tongue, which they had brought over with them from Ireland.

The origin of the Scots.

As for the origin of the Scots, Bede tells us, that they came into this iſland out of Ireland: In proceſs of time, ſays that writer [t], Britain received a third nation, viz. the Scots, beſides the Britons and Picts, who, coming out of Ireland, under the conduct of one Reuda, poſſeſſed themſelves of thoſe territories, which they ſtill hold among the Picts. From this Reuda, adds our hiſtorian, they are called, to this day, Dalreudini, the word Dal, in their language, ſignifying ſhare or portion. But of this colony, and the time, in which it is ſuppoſed to have ſettled in the north part of Britain, called afterwards Scotland, we ſhall ſpeak more at length in the hiſtory of that kingdom.

The cuſtoms and manners of the antient Britons.

To return to the Britons: their manners, cuſtoms, religion, form of government, &c. are deſcribed, not only by Cæſar in his commentaries, but by others, and perhaps more fully, who wrote after the Romans were become maſters of the iſland. The country was, according to Cæſar, well peopled, and ſtocked with cattle. Their houſes were not unlike thoſe of the Gauls. They uſed copper or iron plates, weighed by a certain

ſtandard, inſtead of money. If they bred domeſtic fowls, hens, or geeſe, it was for their diverſion, being ſtrictly forbidden by their religion to eat them. Of all the Britons, thoſe, who inhabited Cantium or Kent, were the moſt civilized, not differing much in their manners from the Gauls. The more inland people, for the moſt part, ſowed no corn, their uſual food being milk and game, with which their woods and plains were well ſtored. The uſe of cloaths was ſcarce known in the iſland. Only the inhabitants of the ſouthern coaſt covered their nakedneſs with ſkins of wild beaſts careleſsly thrown over them, not ſo much to defend themſelves againſt the cold, as to avoid giving offence to the ſtrangers, who came to trade with them. All the Britons painted their bodies, with the juice of woad, of a ſky-colour, and wore long hair; but ſhaved the reſt of their bodies, except their upper lip. One cuſtom prevailed among them, which ſeemed deteſtable to other nations; which was for ten or twelve men, brothers or friends, to have wives in common [u]. This cuſtom continued among them ſome time after the Romans were maſters of the iſland; for Diodorus Siculus tells us, that a Britiſh lady, being upbraided with this uſage by Julia, wife to the emperor Severus, returned her this ſmart anſwer: Surely the Roman ladies ought not to reproach us on this account, ſince we do publicly with the beſt of men no more, than what they do privately with the worſt of their freemen and ſlaves [x]. They abſtained from all manner of fiſh, though the ſeas, that ſurrounded their iſland, and their rivers, were plentifully ſtored with them [y]. Their towns, or rather villages, were a confuſed parcel of huts, placed at a ſmall diſtance from each other, and, generally ſpeaking, in the middle of a wood, whereof the avenues were defended with ſlight ramparts of earth, or with the trees, that were cut down to clear the ground [z]. Strabo tells us, that they exceeded the Gauls in ſtature, but their bodies were not ſo well-ſet; that he ſaw, at Rome, ſome of their youth taller by half a foot than other men; that they had many princes and diſtinct governments among them; that their woods ſerved them inſtead of cities; for having cut down trees, and incloſed with them a large, round, ſpot of ground, there they built huts for themſelves, and folds for their cattle [a]. Diodorus Siculus, ſpeaking of the manners and cuſtoms of the antient Britons, Their houſes, ſays he, are made of reeds or wood; they lay up their corn in the ear in granaries, taking from thence no more than what they conſume in one day; they are ſimple and upright in their dealings, and ſtrangers to the craft craft and ſubtlety of our countrymen; their manner of living is remote from the luxury of other nations; they are ſatisfied with a very mean and frugal diet; their iſland abounds with men, who are ſubject to divers kings and princes. Thus Diodorus [b]. And Pomponius Mela: Britain is well peopled, and obeys ſeveral kings; but they are all rough and unpoliſhed, and the farther they live from the continent, the leſs they are acquainted with foreign riches, abounding chiefly in cattle. They dye their bodies with woad, but whether by way of ornament, or for ſome other cauſe, is uncertain. Ambition of empire, and deſire of inlarging their dominions, prompt them to diſturb each other with frequent wars [c]. Tacitus writes, that the Britons, in their manners, reſembled the Gauls, which was owing either to the ſame original, or the like climate: that the Britons, however, not yet ſoftened by a long peace, ſhewed greater intrepidity in war; that they were formerly governed by kings, but were then, that is, in Agricola's time, divided by petty princes into parties and factions. Tacitus adds, that nothing was of greater advantage to the Romans againſt the moſt powerful among them, than their not conſulting one common intereſt, nor their joining to repel common dangers. Thus, while they fight ſeparately, ſays that author, they are all alike overcome [d]. Dion Caſſius, as epitomized by Xiphilin, ſpeaking of the more northern Britons, ſays, that they tilled no ground, their food being game and fruits; that they lived in their huts naked; that they had wives in common; that the chief authority reſided in the people; that, in war, their arms were a ſhield, and a ſhort ſpear, to the lower end of which was faſtened a ball of braſs, in order to terrify the enemy with the noiſe, when they ſhook it. They are inured to hunger, cold, and all manner of hardſhips, continues the ſame writer, and, when in the woods, can live upon the bark and roots of trees. He adds, that, on all occaſions, they had ready a certain kind of food, of which if they took but the quantity of a bean, they were not troubled with hunger or thirſt for a conſiderable time after [e]. Herodian and Solinus, in deſcribing the more northern nations of Britain, tell us, that they knew not the uſe of garments, but girt their waiſts and necks with iron, by way of ornament, that metal being no leſs in requeſt among them, than gold was among other nations; that they made deep inciſions in their bodies in the ſhape of flowers, trees, and animals, which, with the juice of woad, they painted of a ſky-colour, that never wore out [f].

They

They are a warlike nation, adds Herodian, and moſt greedy of ſlaughter. In war they uſe a narrow ſhield, a lance, and a ſword. As for breaſt-plates and helmets, they look upon them as an incumbrance[g]. Pliny obſerves, among their other cuſtoms, that they wore rings on their middle fingers, and manured their land with marl; which muſt be underſtood of the more civilized Britons dwelling near the coaſt; for the others, as we have related above, did not apply themſelves to agriculture.

Their manner of fighting.

As to their manner of fighting, Cæſar, who extols their valour, and the undaunted bravery, with which they went to battle, tells us, that they made uſe of chariots, driving furiouſly among the enemy's ranks, and diſcharging their darts, by which means they often put the Romans in diſorder. When they engaged the horſe, they left their chariots to fight on foot, their charioteers in the mean time retiring, and placing themſelves ſo, that their maſters, if overpowered with numbers, might readily find them, and have an eaſy retreat. By this manner of fighting, they had, ſays Cæſar, both the ſpeed of the horſe, and the ſteadineſs of the foot, and were, by daily practice, ſo expert, that they could ſtop their horſes on a ſteep deſcent, though in full career, turn them in a narrow compaſs, run along the pole, ſit upon the yoke, and from thence, with incredible quickneſs, return to their chariots. Thus Cæſar [h]. But why they choſe to engage the horſe rather on foot than in their chariots, is not eaſily conceived.

Their trade.

Their trade was very inconſiderable, notwithſtanding the convenient ſituation of their iſland for carrying on an extenſive commerce. Their veſſels were very ſmall, with their keels and ribs made of ſlight timber, interwoven with wicker, and covered with hides; which ſhews, that they undertook no long voyages; nay, in all likelihood, they never ventured to ſea beyond the coaſts of Gaul. Their chief traffick was with the Phœnician merchants, who, after the diſcovery of the iſland, which happened, according to Sammes, before the Trojan war [i], yearly exported great quantities of tin, which they ſold to the Greeks, and other diſtant nations. As this trade proved very profitable, the Phœnicians, with great care, concealed, for many ages, the fountain-head; but the Greeks diſcovered it at length, about an hundred and ſixty years before Julius Cæſar, as Sammes will have it [k], and traded to the ſame place, giving the iſlands, from whence chiefly they brought the tin, the name of Caſſiterides, anſwering, as we have obſerved above, the Phœnician name Barat-Anac. But this trade was only carried on in the Scilly iſlands, iſlands, where Camden tells us that ſome veins of lead were found even in his time.

THE religion of the antient Britons was, as Cæſar informs us [l], much the ſame with that of their neighbours the Gauls. They worſhipped Jupiter under the name of Taramis, or Taran, ſignifying in the antient Britiſh language, as it does ſtill in the Welſh, thunder. Maximus Tyrius writes, that they paid divine worſhip to the higheſt oak they could find, as the figure or repreſentation of this god. Their other deities were Tutates, called by the Britons Duw Taith, the god of journeys, and ſuppoſed to be the ſame with Mercury; Heſus, called alſo Camulus, according to Camden, the god of war, other Mars of the Britons; Belens or Belinus, that is, as appears from a paſſage of Julius Capitolinus [m], Apollo, who is alſo ſuppoſed to have been called Belatucardus, this inſcription, Deo Belatucardo, being found in ſeveral monuments of antiquity. As for their goddeſſes, they worſhipped Diana under the name of Camma, and paid a very particular veneration to Andate, their goddeſs of victory, who had a temple at Camalodunum, now Maldon in Eſſex. To her they are ſaid, by Dion Caſſius, who calls her Andraſte, to have ſacrificed their priſoners of war [n]. The care and direction of all religious matters was, by the Britons as well as the Gauls, committed to the Druids, whoſe authority was great, not only in religious, but civil, affairs. Their name ſeems to come from the Britiſh word Dreu, or the Greek work Drus, both ſignifying an oak, not only becauſe they eſteemed nothing more ſacred than the miſleto that grows on the oak, but likewiſe becauſe their uſual reſidence was in groves among oaks; nor did they perform any of their ceremonies without ſome branches or leaves of that tree [o]. They were held both by the Britons and Gauls, in ſuch veneration, that their authority was almoſt abſolute. To them belonged the care of private and public ſacrifices, the interpretation of religion, the beſtowing of rewards, or inflicting of puniſhments, the deciding of controverſies, let the difference be of what nature ſoever; and whoever refuſed to obey their decree, whether lord or vaſſal, was excluded from the ſacrifices, which was accounted the greateſt puniſhment that could be inflicted; for ſuch as were thus, we may ſay, excommunicated, were reckoned in the number of the wicked, and, as ſuch, avoided by all, not allowed to commence a ſuit, to diſcharge any public office, or to have the leaſt regard paid them. Theſe Druids had a ſuperintendant or pontiff, to whom they were all ſubject. Upon his deceaſe, the moſt worthy ſucceeded him; but if there happened to be ſeveral candidates of equal merit, the election was decided by a majority of votes, and ſometimes, as Cæſar tells us, by the ſword. Once a year, the Druids of Gaul had a general aſſembly in the midſt of the country, to which reſorted perſons from all quarters, who had any controverſies to decide, every one ſubmitting readily to their decrees [p]. The diſcipline of the Druids was thought, as Cæſar writes [q], to have been firſt inſtituted in Britain, and from thence transferred to Gaul; for, even in his time, thoſe who were deſirous to have a thorough knowledge of it, came over to this iſland to learn it. The Druids were exempted from all military duties, taxes, and impoſts, and met with ſuch encouragement, that many embraced that profeſſion. The youth, eſpecially the nobility, were educated by them. Thoſe who embraced the ſame profeſſion, were, firſt of all obliged to learn by heart a great number of verſes; which employed ſome, ſays Cæſar, for the ſpace of twenty years; for the Druids never committed any thing to writing, not that they were ignorant of letters, for, on all other occaſions, they made uſe of Greek characters, but in order to lock up, by that means, their myſterious learning from the vulgar, or to exerciſe the memory of their diſciples. Thus Cæſar. But from hence we muſt not conclude, that they had any knowledge of the Greek tongue, ſince Cæſar himſelf, when he wrote to Q. Cicero, beſieged among the Nervii, penned his letter in Greek, to prevent its giving, if intercepted, any intelligence to the enemy; which plainly ſhews, they were ſtrangers to that language. Selden thinks the word Græcis has crept into the text, the meaning of Cæſar being, that the Druids never committed their learning to writing, but, on all other occaſions, made uſe of letters; which opinion does not appear to us ill-grounded. One of the chief tenets they taught, was the immortality of the ſoul, and its tranſmigration from one body to another; which doctrine they looked upon as proper to inſpire them with courage, and a contempt of death. They inſtructed their youth in ſeveral other traditions concerning the ſtars, and their motions, the extent of the world, the nature of things, and the power of the immortal gods [r]. There were women as well as men Druids; for a female Druid of Tungria, now the biſhoprick of Liege, foretold to Diocleſian, as we read in Vopiſcus, when yet a private ſoldier, that he ſhould one day be emperor. The ſect and religion of the Druids ſpread as far as Italy; for Auguſtus publiſhed an edict, forbidding the Romans to celebrate their myſteries. Beſides the Druids, there were, among the Britons and

Gauls,

Gauls, prieſts of an inferior rank, called Bards, whoſe province it was to celebrate the exploits of their heroes in verſes, which they ſung to the harp. The Bards were ſtill in Britain, after the Romans had intirely abandoned it.

The civil government of Britain.

THE ſame form of government prevailed in Britain, as in Gaul; that is, the whole country was divided into ſeveral ſmall ſtates, with a head over each, dignified by authors with the name of king. Of theſe heads or kings, Cæſar mentions four in the ſmall compaſs of Kent. Whether theſe ſtates were hereditary, or elective, we find no-where recorded. On great and imminent dangers, one of theſe heads or kings was, in a general aſſembly, and by common conſent, choſen commander in chief of all their forces. Thus, when Cæſar invaded the iſland, the chief command of all the Britiſh forces was conferred upon Caſſibelanus; and when the Britons revolted in the time of Claudius, Caractacus, king of the Silures, was choſen general. As, in other caſes, the ſeveral ſtates, into which Britain was divided, had no dependence upon each other, they had, no doubt, quarrels and conteſts among themſelves. But of their affairs before Cæſar's invaſion we have no account, but ſuch as may be deemed fabulous; and therefore at that period, and, no higher, ought the Engliſh hiſtorian, as Camden well obſerves, to begin his hiſtory.

Diviſion of the country.

THAT part of Britain, which comprehends the preſent kingdom of England and the principality of Wales, was in antient times divided into ſeventeen petty ſtates, whereof the inhabitants were diſtinguiſhed by the following names, viz. the Danmonii, the Durotriges, the Belgæ, the Attrebatii, the Regni, the Cantii, the Dobuni, the Cattieuchlani, the Trinobantes, the Iceni, the Coritani, the Cornavii, the Silures, the Dimetæ, the Ordovices, the Brigantes, the Ottadini. That part of Britain, which extends a great way to the weſt, and is bounded on the north by the Severn ſea, on the ſouth by the Britiſh ocean, and on the weſt by St. George's chanel, was antiently inhabited by thoſe Britons, who are called by Solinus, Dunmonii, by Ptolemy, Domnonii, and, in the more correct copies, Danmonii. In this tract, or, as we may call it, peninſula, now comprehending the counties of Cornwall and Devon, the following places are mentioned by Ptolemy [a], viz. the eſtuary Vexalla, formed by the confluence of the two rivers Petredus and Ivellus, now the Parret and the Ill; the promontory of Hercules, about half-way between that eſtuary and another promontory, called by Ptolemy, Bolerium, and by Diodorus Siculus [b]; Pelerium. The promontory Belerium, which is by Ptolemy called also Antivestæum, is the most western point of Britain, now known by the name of the Land's-end. Not far from this shoots out to the south the promontory Dannonium, or Ocrinum, now the Lizard. On the south coast the following places are taken notice of by our geographer, viz. Voliba, now Falmouth; the mouth of the Tamara, now the Tamar or Tamer, on which stands the town of Plymouth; the mouth of the Isca, now the Ex. The inland places mentioned by Ptolemy are, Isca Dannoniorum, Exeter; Tamara, Tavistock; Uxella, according to Camden, Lestwithiel.

Durotriges. NEXT to the Dannonii, eastward, were the Durotriges, inhabiting that tract, which is now called Dorsetshire. In this county Ptolemy takes notice of one place only, which he calls Dunium, and Antoninus, in his itinerary, Durnovaria. All critics agree, that, instead of Dunium, we ought to read in Ptolemy, Durnium; and that this was the antient name of Dorchester, the chief town of the county of Dorset. To the north and east of the country of the Durotriges, were situated Belgæ. the Belgæ, who possessed Somersetshire, Wiltshire, and Hampshire. In this country Ptolemy and Antoninus mention on the coast Magnus Portus, Portsmouth; and Trisantonis Portus, Southampton, so called from the river Trisanto, now Hampton, on which it stands. Either Portus Trisantonis, or another place very near it, is called by Antoninus, Clausentum. In the inland country stood Venta Belgarum, Winchester, a place of great note in antient times, as we read both in Ptolemy and Antoninus; Aquæcalidæ, or, as Antoninus styles it, Aquæsolis, so called from its hot waters, now Bath; Iscalis or Ischalis, Ilchester.

Attrebatii. On the Belgæ bordered the Attribatii, the inhabitants of Berkshire. The Attrebatii, as well as the Belgæ, came originally from Belgic Gaul, as we read in Cæsar [u], and, settling in Britain, retained their antient names. The chief city of the Attrebatii was Calcua, as Ptolemy calls it, or Caleva, as it is named by Antoninus, now Wallingford. Antoninus mentions another place, viz. Spinæ, which, according to Camden, still retains its antient name, being called Spene; but is now only Regni. a village near Newbury, which rose out of its ruins. On the country of the Attrebatii, bordered that of the Regni, comprehending Surry, Sussex, and part of the sea-coast of Hampshire. In this country Ptolemy mentions but one city, viz. Noviomagus, which is also taken notice of by Marinus Tyrius, as appears from Ptolemy [x]. Some antiquaries take this to be the present town of Guilford; but Noviomagus was only ten miles distant from London, as we read in Antoninus's itinerary; whereas Guilford is thirty. Camden tells us, that, in his time, were ſtill to be ſeen the ruins of a city, anſwering exactly the diſtance ſet down in the itinerary. Beſides Noviomagus, Antoninus mentions ſeveral other places in the country of the Regni, viz. Othona, where was, according to the Notitia, the ſtation of the Roman ſoldiers called Fortenſes. Camden takes Othona to have ſtood where Haſtings now ſtands. Portus Adurni, now the ſmall village of Ederington, and Regnum, now Ringwood, that is, the wood or foreſt of the Regni, into which they fled for protection. In the country of the Regni, namely at Ockham in Surry, where the Wey falls into the Thames, at a place to this day called Coway-ſtakes, from the ſtakes, with which the Britons had fenced the bank, Cæſar paſſed the Thames, and entered the territories of Caſſivelan. Cæſar croſſed the Thames eighty miles from the ſea; and this is the only place, at that diſtance, where the river is fordable. To the eaſt of the Belgæ and Attrebatii, lay the country of the Cantii, called, by Ptolemy and Cæſar [y], Cantium, by Bede Cantia [z], now Kent. The Cantii were, according to Cæſar, the moſt civilized of all the Britons, not differing much, in their cuſtoms and manners, from their neighbours the Gauls [a]. The places in Cantium, mentioned by the antients, are, Durovernum, Durobrivis, Durolenum, Portus Rutupiæ, Portus Dubris, Regulbium or Regulvium, and Portus Lemanis, now Canterbury, Rocheſter, Lenham, Dover, Reculver, and Lime. Whether Rutupiæ and Portus Rutupenſis, called by Tacitus Portus Trutulenſis, were one and the ſame place, is queſtioned by our antiquaries. Somner thinks they were two places [b], contrary to the opinion of Leland, Lambard, and others. Perhaps he may be in the right; but it is not probable, ſays Camden, that Sandwich was the Portus Rutupenſis, it being evident, that Stonar was the road, where the ſhips lay, that came to Rutupiæ; and Somner himſelf allows Stonar to have been an antient port [c]. In the opinion of Camden therefore, Portus Rutupenſis was Stonar, and Rutupiæ the preſent village of Richborough, at ſome diſtance from the ſea. Be that as it will, it is certain, that, in the Roman times, Geſſoriacum, now Bologne, and Rutupiæ or Portus Rutupenſis, were, for thoſe who from Gaul came into Britain, or from Britain croſſed over into Gaul, what in our times are Dover and Calais. Hence, frequent mention is made of Rutupiæ by the Latin writers [d]; nay the word Rutupinus was, by some of the poets, used instead of Britannus [e], so famous was Rutipiæ in the Roman times. Portus Dubris, now Dover, is first mentioned by Antoninus; but, before the Romans abandoned the island, it became no less famous than Rutupiæ itself. At Rutupiæ was quartered the second legio Augusta; at Portus Dubris the Tungricani; at Portus Lemanis, or Novus Portus, as Ptolemy calls it, the Turnacenses; and at Regulbium or Regulbium, the first cohort of the Betasii, as we read in the Notitia. Ptolemy reckons Londinium, London, among the cities of the Cantii; but he was therein certainly mistaken. When the Roman government was established in Britain, the sea-coast of Kent, which they termed littus Saxonicum, or the Saxon shore, had, from the time of Diocletian, a particular governor, called by Marcellinus, count of the sea-coast, and by the Notitia, count of the Saxon shore, whose province it was to prevent the barbarians, especially the Saxons, who began then to infest Britain, from plundering the country. In imitation of the Romans, our ancestors set over this coast a governor or portreve, commonly called the warden of the cinque ports, from his presiding over five ports. Cæsar landed, when he invaded Britain, in the country of the Cantii, and, as is commonly believed, at Deal, on the twenty-sixth of August, in the afternoon, fifty-four years before the birth of Christ [f]. Cantium is parted from the continent by a narrow sea, called by Solinus, Fretum Gallicum; by Tacitus and Ammianus Marcellinus, Fretum Oceani, and Oceanus Fretalis. Thus far of that part of Britain, which is bounded by the ocean, the Severn sea, and the river Thames.

Dobuni. On the north side of the Thames, near its head, are placed by Ptolemy the Dobuni, the antient inhabitants of Glostershire and Oxfordshire. In their country that writer mentions but one city, namely Corinium, called by Antoninus, so far as we can conjecture from the distances set down in his itinerary, Durocornovium, which stood in or near the place, where the present town of Cirencester stands. Two other places are taken notice of by Antoninus, viz. Altone, or Avone, and Clevum, or Glevum, built by the Romans, as a curb upon the Silures, now Alvington and Gloucester. To the east of the Dobuni lay the country of the Cattieuchlani, Calycuchlani, Cattidudani, Cathicludani, as they are styled in different copies of Ptolemy's works. Dion calls them Cattuellani, and also Cassii. In their country, which comprehended Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, and Hertfordshire, the following places are named by Antoninus; Lactodo- rum, Bedford; Magiovinium, Aſhwell; Durocobrivis, or Durocobrivæ, Hertford; Pontes, placed in the itinerary twenty-two miles from London; and Verulamium, mentioned not only by Antoninus, but by Ptolemy and all the Roman writers, who ſpeak of Britain. Camden conjectures Verulamium to have been the town of Caſſivelan, which was taken by Cæſar [g]. In Nero's time it was a municipium, as we read in Tacitus [h]; but being afterwards deſtroyed, as is ſuppoſed, in the Saxon war, the town of St. Albans roſe out of its ruins, which are ſtill called Verulam. In the country of the Cattieuchlani, Ptolemy mentions only Verulamium, which he calls Urolamium, and Salenæ, of which no footſteps are remaining. Before the arrival of Cæſar, the Cattieuchlani had reduced great part of the country belonging to the Dobuni, and were conſtantly at war with their neighbours. Trinobantes.

NEXT to the Cattieuchlani were the Trinobantes, as Cæſar calls them, or Trinonnantes, as they are ſtyled by Tacitus and Ptolemy. They inhabited the preſent counties of Middleſex and Eſſex. To them belonged the city of London, called by Tacitus, Ptolemy, and Antoninus Londinium; but Ammianus, Lundinum; by Stephanus Lindonion; and by Bede, Lundonia and civitas Lundonia [i]. There ſeems to have been no ſuch place as London in Cæſar's time; and yet it was a town of great note and trade in Nero's, as appears from Tacitus [k]. It muſt therefore have been founded between the times of theſe two emperors, and, in all likelihood, as the learned biſhop of Worceſter thinks, about the time of Claudius. Tacitus calls it a place famous for trade, and the concourſe of merchants, tho' not diſtinguiſhed with the title of colony [l]. Whether in proceſs of time it attained this honour, may be queſtioned; for though Ammianus Marcellinus ſtyles it Auguſta, yet we cannot from thence conclude, that it was a Roman colony, ſince antiquaries, of no mean character, are of opinion, that the emperors allowed ſome towns, that were not colonies, to aſſume that title [m]. Perhaps it took the name of Auguſta from Conſtantine the Great, who is ſaid to have ſurrounded it with a wall. Ptolemy, as we have obſerved above, and alſo Ravennas, place London in Cantium, on the ſouth ſide of the Thames. The other towns of the Trinobantes were, Durolitum, Cæſaromagus, Cononium, Camalodunum, and Colonia, now Leiton, Burghſtead, Cannonden, Maldon, and Colcheſter. Camalodunum, called by Ptolemy Camudolanum, was the firſt Roman colony in Britain, granted by the emperor Claudius to the veterans, who, driving out the natives, ſettled there; but they were afterwards themſelves, in a general inſurrection, either driven out, or put to the ſword, the theatre, the temple of Claudius, and the ſeveral villas in the neighbourhood, belonging to the Roman commanders, being utterly demoliſhed by the incenſed Britons, who looked upon the colony as the ſeat of ſlavery [n]. The country bordering on that of the Trinobantes, and comprehending the counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdon,

Iceni. was inhabited by the Iceni, called by Ptolemy, Simeni, and by others, Tigeni. Gamden is of opinion, that the Iceni were the people, whom Cæſar calls Cenomagni [o]. To them belonged the following places, mentioned both by Ptolemy and Antoninus, Villa Fauſtini, Cambretonium, Sitomagas, Venta Icenorum, Garienis Oſtium, Iciani, Brannodium, and Durobrivæ, now St. Edmundſbury, Bretenham, Thetford Caſtle, Yarmouth, Icburrough, Brancaſter, Dornford. In the Roman times, the commander of the horſe under the count of the Saxon ſhore was ſtationed at Oſtium Garienis, called alſo Oppidum Garianorum: and the Dalmatian horſe, as appears from the Notitia, at Brannodunum. To theſe we may add Camboritum, mentioned by Antoninus, though not by Ptolemy, and in the itinerary placed on the Cam, where the preſent city of Cambridge ſtands; which Camden ſuppoſes to have been built out of the ruins of Camboritum.

Coritani. On the Iceni bordered the Coritani, whoſe country comprehended Northamptonſhire, Leiceſterſhire, Rutlandſhire, Lincolnſhire, Nottinghamſhire, and Derbyſhire. Their chief places were, Lindum, Lincoln; Tripontium, Towceſter; Bennavenna or Beneventa, thought to be Northampton; Ratæ, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Rage, according to Camden, Leiceſter; Verometum, Burrowhill; Margidunum, Margedoverton; Pontes, Panton; Crococolanum, and Agelocum, or, as Camden will have it, Adelocum, Idleton. Lindum, called by Bede, Lindocolina civitas, was, according to Ptolemy, the metropolis of the Coritani. In this country, between the ſprings of the Nen, and the Avon, are ſtill to be ſeen the ruins of antient fortifications and military fences, erected, as Camden believes, by Oſtorius governor of Britain, after he had fortified the banks of the Severn, the Avon, and the Nen, in order to prevent the irruptions of thoſe who inhabited Wales, and the north parts of Britain. When the banks of the two latter rivers, the one running eaſtward, and the other weſtward, were well defended, the only paſſage from the north into the hither part of Britain was between the ſprings of theſe two rivers; and this paſs was defended with ſtrong works, whereof the ruins are ſtill to be ſeen at Gildſborough and Dantrey. Oſtorius, ſays Tacitus [p], after having diſarmed ſuch as were ſuſpected, by fortifying the banks of the Antona and Sabrina, reſtrained them from breaking into the province; where, inſtead of Antona, mentioned by no other writer, Camden reads Auſona, or Avona, which name was, according to him, common to the Nen and Avon [q]. To the weſt of the Coritani, were ſituated the Cornavii, who, Cornavii. according to Ptolemy's deſcription of their country, ſeem to have poſſeſſed Warwickſhire, Worceſterſhire, Staffordſhire, Shropſhire, and Cheſhire. Their chief towns were, Branonium, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Branogenium, Worceſter; Præſidium on the Auſona or Avona, Warwick, where the prefect or commander of the Dalmatian horſe was poſted by the appointment of the governor of Britain, as we read in the Notitia; Pennocrucium, Penkridge; Viroconinum or Uricomium, as Ptolemy calls it, the metropolis of the Cornavii, probably built by the Romans, when they fortified the banks of the Severn, which is here fordable, and no-where lower. It is now a ſmall village, called Wrockceſter. Out of its ruins roſe the preſent town of Shrewſbury. Deva, or Deuna, as Ptolemy calls it, on the river Deva, from whence the town borrowed its name, now Cheſter. It was antiently a Roman colony, and the ſtation of the twentieth legion, ſurnamed Victrix, Condate, Congleton; and Rutunium, now Routon.

THE principality of Wales, formerly comprehending the whole country beyond the Severn, was, in the Roman times, inhabited by the Silures, the Demetæ, and the Ordovices. To theſe belonged not only the twelve counties of Wales, but likewiſe the two others lying beyond the Severn, viz. Herefordſhire and Monmouthſhire, now reckoned among the Engliſh counties. The Silures and Demetæ, according to the deſcription Ptolemy gives us of them, inhabited that part, which is now known by the name of South Wales, and comprizes the following counties, Radnorſhire, Brecknockſhire, Glamorganſhire, with Herefordſhire and Monmouthſhire. As to the origin of the people Tacitus is of opinion, that they came originally from Spain, on account of their ruddy complexion, their curled hair, and their ſituation over-againſt that country. They were a warlike people, of great intrepidity and reſolution, utterly averſe to ſervitude, and great ſticklers for their liberties, as will appear from their wars with the Romans under Oſtorius, Veranius, and Julius Frontinus, who in the end ſubdued them. In Herefordſhire ſtood Bletium, now the Old Town on the Mu- Silures.

out the natives, ſettled there; but they were afterwards themſelves, in a general inſurrection, either driven out, or put to the ſword, the theatre, the temple of Claudius, and the ſeveral villas in the neighbourhood, belonging to the Roman commanders, being utterly demoliſhed by the incenſed Britons, who looked upon the colony as the ſeat of ſlavery [n]. The country bordering on that of the Trinobantes, and comprehending the counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdon,

Iceni. was inhabited by the Iceni, called by Ptolemy, Simeni, and by others, Tigeni. Gamden is of opinion, that the Iceni were the people, whom Cæſar calls Cenomagni [o]. To them belonged the following places, mentioned both by Ptolemy and Antoninus, Villa Fauſtini, Cambretonium, Sitomagas, Venta Icenorum, Garienis Oſtium, Iciani, Brannodium, and Durobrivæ, now St. Edmundſbury, Bretenham, Thetford Caſtle, Yarmouth, Icburrough, Brancaſter, Dornford. In the Roman times, the commander of the horſe under the count of the Saxon ſhore was ſtationed at Oſtium Garienis, called alſo Oppidum Garianorum: and the Dalmatian horſe, as appears from the Notitia, at Brannodunum. To theſe we may add Camboritum, mentioned by Antoninus, though not by Ptolemy, and in the itinerary placed on the Cam, where the preſent city of Cambridge ſtands; which Camden ſuppoſes to have been built out of the ruins of Camboritum.

Coritani. On the Iceni bordered the Coritani, whoſe country comprehended Northamptonſhire, Leiceſterſhire, Rutlandſhire, Lincolnſhire, Nottinghamſhire, and Derbyſhire. Their chief places were, Lindum, Lincoln; Tripontium, Towceſter; Bennavenna or Beneventa, thought to be Northampton; Ratæ, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Rage, according to Camden, Leiceſter; Verometum, Burrowhill; Margidunum, Margedoverton; Pontes, Panton; Crococolanum, and Agelocum, or, as Camden will have it, Adelocum, Idleton. Lindum, called by Bede, Lindocolina civitas, was, according to Ptolemy, the metropolis of the Coritani. In this country, between the ſprings of the Nen, and the Avon, are ſtill to be ſeen the ruins of antient fortifications and military fences, erected, as Camden believes, by Oſtorius governor of Britain, after he had fortified the banks of the Severn, the Avon, and the Nen, in order to prevent the irruptions of thoſe who inhabited Wales, and the north parts of Britain. When the banks of the two latter rivers, the one running eaſtward, and the other weſtward, were well defended, the only paſſage from the north into the hither part of Britain was between the ſprings of theſe two rivers; and this paſs was defended with ſtrong works, whereof the ruins are ſtill to be ſeen at Gildſborough and Dantrey. Oſtorius, ſays Tacitus [p], after having diſarmed ſuch as were ſuſpected, by fortifying the banks of the Antona and Sabrina, reſtrained them from breaking into the province; where, inſtead of Antona, mentioned by no other writer, Camden reads Aufona, or Avona, which name was, according to him, common to the Nen and Avon [q]. To the weſt of the Coritani, were ſituated the Cornavii, who, according to Ptolemy's deſcription of their country, ſeem to have poſſeſſed Warwickſhire, Worceſterſhire, Staffordſhire, Shropſhire, and Cheſhire. Their chief towns were, Branonium, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Branogenium, Worceſter; Præſidium on the Aufona or Avona, Warwick, where the prefect or commander of the Dalmatian horſe was poſted by the appointment of the governor of Britain, as we read in the Notitia; Pennocrucium, Penkridge; Viroconinum or Uricomium, as Ptolemy calls it, the metropolis of the Cornavii, probably built by the Romans, when they fortified the banks of the Severn, which is here fordable, and no-where lower. It is now a ſmall village, called Wrockeſter. Out of its ruins roſe the preſent town of Shrewſbury. Deva, or Deuna, as Ptolemy calls it, on the river Deva, from whence the town borrowed its name, now Cheſter. now; and about three ſhort miles weſt of the preſent city of Hereford, near the village of Kenchester, Ariconium, mentioned by Antoninus. In this country are to be ſeen the veſtiges of ſeveral Roman camps. In Brecknockſhire, towards the north, where it is divided from Radnorſhire by the Wye, ſome place Bellæum Silurum; but others think it ſtood in Glamorganſhire. Brecknock, the chief town of the county, was inhabited, in the Roman times, as appears from ſeveral Roman coins, found there, from a Roman brick diſcovered with this inſcription, Leg. II. Aug. and from a ſquare camp near this place, called by the natives Gaer, that is, fortification. In Monmouthſhire, about three miles from Chepſtow, which ſtands near the fall of the Wye into the Severn, is placed by all our antiquaries Venta Silurum, called to this day Kaer-went, that is, the city Venta; but now only ſome ruins of it are to be ſeen. On the north-weſt border of the county ſtood Gobannium, mentioned by Antoninus, at the confluence of the Iſca, now Wyſk or Uſk, and the Govenni; whence it took the name of Gobannium, which with a ſmall alteration, it retains to this day, being called Aber-Gavenni, that is, the confluence of the Gavenni or Gobannium. About twelve miles from Gobannium, Antoninus places Burrium, where the Birdhin or Birthin falls into the Uſk. This place is now known to the Welſh by the name of Brynbiga, and to the Engliſh by that of Uſk. On the other ſide of the Uſk, twelve miles from Burrium, ſtood Iſca Silurum, where the ſecond legion was ſtationed; whence it is ſtyled by Antoninus, Legio Secunda, and by the Britons to this day Kaer-Lheion, or Kaer-Wyſk, that is, the city of the legion, or of the river Uſk. The Legio Secunda, called alſo Britannica Secunda, was raiſed by Auguſtus, and removed out of Germany into Britain by Claudius, under the conduct of Veſpaſian, to whom, upon his aſpiring to the empire, it ſecured the Britiſh legions. It was placed in gariſon at Iſca by Julius Frontinus againſt the Silures, and long after that, that is, in the reign of Valentinian, tranſlated from thence by count Theodoſius, the father of Theodoſius the Great, to Rutupiæ, as we read in the Notitia and in Marcellinus [r]. At Iſca Silurum, many monuments of antiquity have been diſcovered, as the reader will find in Camden [s]. The moſt ſouthern county formerly belonging to the Silures, is Glamorganſhire, where, at a ſmall diſtance from the Remney, which divides it on the eaſt from Monmouthſhire, is to be ſeen Kaer-phily-caſtle, in the opinion of Camden, the moſt noble and antient piece of architecture remaining in Britain. That this caſtle was built by the Romans, ſeems highly probable, though we have no other reaſon to conclude it Roman, but the ſtatelineſs of its ſtructure, no Roman inſcriptions, ſtatues, coins, or other monuments of antiquity, having ever been diſcovered there. Camden thinks it was the Bullæum Silurum, of which we have ſpoken above.

THE remaining part of South Wales, comprehending Caer-Mardhinſhire, Pembrokeſhire, and Cardiganſhire, was likewiſe inhabited, according to Pliny, by the Silures; but Ptolemy, to whom Britain was better known, placed another nation here, called by him Demetæ and Dimetæ. Beſides, both Gildas and Nennius ſtyle this country Demetia; and the Britons to this day call it Dyved, changing M. into V, according to the dialect of that language. Perhaps the Latin name Demetia owes its origin to the Britiſh Dyved; for it was the cuſtom of the Romans, as Camden obſerves, to retain ſuch names of the places they conquered, as had been given them by the natives, adding only to them a Latin termination. In the country of the Demetæ, Ptolemy takes notice only of two places, Loventium or Luentium, at the mouth of the Tuerobis, now the Towy, and Maridunum, or, as Antoninus calls it, Muridunum, now Caer-Mardhin. The country now known by the name of North Wales, and comprehending Montgomeryſhire, Merionethſhire, Caernarvanſhire, Denbighſhire, and Flintſhire, was inhabited by the Ordovices, a brave and powerful nation, who held out firſt againſt the Romans, and afterwards againſt the Engliſh, after the other Britons were ſubdued; for by the Romans they were not reduced till the time of Domitian, nor by the Engliſh till the reign of Henry I. In their country, namely in Montgomeryſhire, where the village of Meivod ſtands at preſent, ſtood formerly, according to the conjectures of the beſt antiquaries, the city of Mediolanum, celebrated both by Ptolemy and Antoninus. Beſides Mediolanum, Antoninus mentions other places in the country of the Ordovices; viz. Segontium, on the river Sejont, whence, without all doubt, it took its name; Conovium, now Conway; and Varis, of which the ruins were to be ſeen in Camden's time, near the village of Bodwar. In this country are the ruins of ſeveral antient forts raiſed by the Romans, to awe and keep in ſubjection the natives. Over-againſt Caernarvanſhire lies the iſland of Mona, now Angleſey, the antient ſeat of the Druids, firſt attempted by Paulinus Suetonius, and afterwards reduced by Agricola. It was called in the Britiſh tongue Môn, and, when conquered by the Engliſh, Angleſey, that is, the Engliſh iſland.

writers, poſſeſſed the following countries, viz. Yorkſhire and the biſhopric of Durham towards the eaſt and the German ocean, and to the weſt Lancaſhire, Weſtmorland, and Cumberland. In Yorkſhire, and in the weſt-riding, on the Dan, now the Don, ſtood the city of Danum, mentioned by Antoninus, and in the Notitia, called the ſtation of the Criſpinian horſe. Nennius ſtyles it Caer-Dann; but it is now known by the name of Doncaſter. Olicana, mentioned by Ptolemy, is, from its ſituation with reſpect to Eboracum or York, thought by Camden to have ſtood where Ilkly, on the Wharf, now ſtands. It was rebuilt in the reign of Severus by Virius Lupus, legate and propretor of Britain, as appears from an antient inſcription dug up there [t]. The ſecond cohort of the Lingones was quartered here. Near the confluence of the Calder and the Are ſtands the ſmall village of Caſtleford, formerly, according to Camden, Lagcolium, or, as Antoninus ſtyles it, Lagetium. This our learned antiquary conjectures from its ſituation, by a Roman way, from ſeveral monuments of antiquity diſcovered there, and its diſtance from Danum and Eboracum. Colcaria, according to ſome Tadcaſter, according to others Aberford, is mentioned by Antoninus, but not by Ptolemy. Iſurium Brigantum is placed by both on the Ure; and by Camden thought to have ſtood where the preſent village of Aldborrow ſtands, at a ſmall diſtance from Borrowbridge. Eboracum, or Eburacum, now York, on the Ouſe, for the Ure takes that name at Aldburrow, where the Ouſeburn, a ſmall brook, falls into it, was the metropolis of the Brigantes. It owed, no doubt, its origin and grandeur to the Romans; for it was both a Roman colony and a municipium, as appears from ſeveral antient inſcriptions [u]. The ſixth legion, called Victrix, ſent out of Germany into Britain, was quartered here in the time of the Antonines, and likewiſe the ninth in Galba's reign [x]. In this city the emperors had a palace, in which died Septimius Severus and Conſtantius Chlorus. Upon the death of the latter, his ſon Conſtantine, who afterwards acquired the ſurname of Great, was here firſt declared emperor. The reſcript of the emperors Severus and Antoninus, de rei vindicatione, is dated from this place. Upon the death of Severus, juſtice was, for ſome time, adminiſtered here by the great oracle of the law Æmilius Paulus. When the Romans abandoned Britain, Eboracum was, by the Scots and Picts, reduced to the ſhadow of what it had been. In the eaſt riding, about ſeven miles from York, ſtood Derventio, now Auldby, a ſmall village on the Derwent, formerly Derventio. At the ſame diſtance from the Abus, now the Humber, where the ſmall town of Wigton ſtands, ſtood, in the Roman times, Delgovitia; and on the promontory called by Ptolemy Ocellum, now Holderneſs, the city of Prætorium, now Patrington. The only places in Lancaſhire mentioned by Antoninus, are, Mancunium, now Mancheſter, and Alone, called in the Notitia, Alione, now Lancaſter, the chief town of the county to which it gives name. In Weſtmorland, two ſhort miles from the Ituna or Eden, ſtood Veteræ, now a village called Burgh. It is mentioned by Antoninus; and from the Notitia we learn, that upon the decline of the Roman empire, was quartered there a prefect, with a band of Directores. Not far from hence ſtood Aballaba, on the Ituna, the ſtation, as we read in the Notitia, of the Mauri Aureliani. It retains its antient name, being now called by contraction Apelby. At Whallop-caſtle appear vaſt ruins of an antient town, where Roman coins and urns have been frequently dug up. Here ſtood, according to Camden, Gallagum, mentioned by Ptolemy, and called by Antoninus, Gallatum; which conjecture agrees with the diſtances in the itinerary. From this place, an old cauſeway runs almoſt in a ſtrait line, for the ſpace of about twenty miles to Caer-Varran, near the Picts wall. Upon this cauſeway, now commonly called the Maiden-way, Camden thinks, that the ſtations and manſions, mentioned by Antoninus in his ninth iter, were ſettled. At Brougham, according to Camden, the antient Brocovum and Brevoniacum of Antoninus, called in the Notitia, Brocaniacum, where a cohort of the Defenſores was quartered, ſeveral coins, and other monuments of antiquity, have been dug up. In Cumberland, the ſea-coaſt was fortified by the Romans in ſuch places as were convenient for landing; whence the Scots, when from Ireland they invaded the iſland, met here with the greateſt oppoſition. Many remains of antiquity are ſtill to be ſeen at Moreſby, perhaps, as the preſent name ſeems to imply, the Morbium of the antients, where, according to the Notitia, the equites cataphracti were quartered. At the head of the Wiſe, a ſmall river, that falls into the Waver, are the ruins of an antient town, called, by the neighbouring inhabitants, Old Carliſle, perhaps the Caſtra Exploratorum, placed ſomewhere hereabouts by Antoninus; for it is ſeated on a high hill, and therefore, as it commands a free proſpect round the country, was very convenient for ſpying an enemy. From ſeveral inſcriptions it appears, that the ala, named Augusta, and Augusta Gordiana, was quartered here in the time of the emperor Gordian. A little higher j ts out a ſmall promontory, below which is a large arm of the ſea, at preſent the boundary of England and Scotland, and formerly of the Roman province and the country of the Picts. On this promontory ſtood Blatobulgium, now Bulneſs, from which, as the moſt remote limit of the province of Britain, Antoninus begins his itinerary. At Blatobulgium are frequently found Roman coins and inſcriptions. A mile beyond it, at low-water, are to be ſeen the foundations of the famous wall called the Picts wall, built by the Romans to reſtrain the barbarians from breaking into the province. Though a vaſt arm of the ſea comes up here about eight miles, called by Ptolemy Itunæ æſtuarium, now Solway-frith, yet at low-water, the Scots and Picts found means to ford it. Upon the ſame frith ſtands Drumburgh-caſtle, formerly a Roman ſtation, and thought by Gale[y], to be the antient Blatobulgium. This frith is called by Ptolemy Itunæ æſtuarium, from the river Ituna, now Eden, which here falls into the bay. It is now called Solway-frith from the town of Solway in Scotland ſtanding upon it. At the preſent Burgh-upon-ſands was another Roman ſtation. At a ſmall diſtance from the confluence of the Eimot and the Loder ſtands Penreth, according to Gale, the Voreda of Antoninus. The city of Carliſle, having the Eden to the north, the Petervill to the eaſt, and the Caude to the weſt, was by the Romans called Luguvallum, Luguballum, and Lugubalia. The word vallum was, no doubt, derived from that famous vallum of the Romans, which ran cloſe to the city. As to the word Lugus, or Lucus, it ſignified among the Celtæ, who ſpoke the ſame language as the Britons, a tower; for what Antoninus calls Lugo-Auguſti, Pomponius Mela ſtyles turris Auguſti; ſo that Lugovallum ſignifies a tower on the vallum. This city was a place of great note in the Roman times, as appears from ſeveral monuments of antiquity found in that neighbourhood, and from the frequent mention made of it by the antient writers.

Ottadini. Next to the Brigantes, Ptolemy places the Ottadini, Ottadeni, or Ottalini, according to the various readings of the ſeveral copies. Camden reads Ottatinos, becauſe they dwelt ultra Tinam, beyond the Tine. Their country extended from the wall at leaſt to the Tweed, and was afterwards part of the province Valentia; for ſo count Theodoſius named it, after he had recovered it, by driving out the barbarians, who had ſeized it. It is now called Northumberland, as lying north of the Humber. In this country, near Caer-vorran, part of the wall was ſtill ſtanding in Camden's time, fifteen foot in height and nine in breadth. Bede writes, that it was only twelve foot high, and his account is, generally ſpeaking, exact; for, where there has not been any extraordinary fortification, what was ſtill ſtanding in Camden's time came near that height, and no part exceeded it. The breadth which Bede allows it, viz. eight foot, is pretty exact; for every-where it ſtill exceeds ſeven. In this country have been diſcovered many monuments of antiquity, of which the reader will find an account in Camden [z]. Beyond the wall, and at the mouth of the Tina or Tine, ſtood Segedunum, now Seton, where reſided, according to the Notitia, the tribune of the ſixth cohort of the Lergi. At a ſmall diſtance from Segedunum, Antoninus places Corſtorpitum, or, as Camden reads it, Morſtorpitum, according to him, Morpeth. On the north ſide of the Alaunus, now the Aln, and not far from that river, ſtood antiently Bremenium, from which Antoninus begins his firſt journey in Britain. Some take Bremenium to be Rocheſter, near the head of the Rhead, others to be Brampton. At Babroſentum, according to ſome, Newcaſtle, was quartered the ſecond cohort of the Thracians. The country of the Ottadini reached, according to ſome, to Edinburgh-frith; but the only place taken notice of by the antients between Bremenium and that frith, called by the Roman writers Bodotriæ æſtuarium, are Tæi or Tavi oſtium, the mouth of the Tweed, and Caſtra Alata, thought by all our antiquaries to be Edinburgh. On the weſt coaſt, between Solway and Dumbriton friths, are placed by Ptolemy the Selgovæ, and the towns Trimontium and Oxellum belonging to them. To the north of the Selgovæ were the Damnii, in whoſe country, extending to Dumbriton-frith, antiently Glotæ æſtuarium, ſtood the following towns mentioned by Ptolemy; Colania, Coria, Alauna, and Victoria. The Horeſti, mentioned by Tacitus, are placed by Camden between the Selgovæ and the Ottadini. Agricola entered their country, as we read in Tacitus; and, having received hoſtages, commanded his admiral to ſail round Britain. Hence Camden infers, that their country bordered on Solway-frith, and that the Roman fleet was then riding there. In this voyage were diſcovered the Orcades, unknown to the world till that time. That narrow neck of land, by which Glotæ and Bodotriæ æſtuaria, that is, Dumbriton and Edinburgh friths, arms of different ſeas, are kept from joining, was fortified by Agricola with gariſons and caſtles; by which means all Briton, on this ſide, being poſſeſſed by the Romans, the barbarians were removed, as it were, into another iſland. Thoſe who dwelt beyond the two friths, are by Dion Caſſius comprehended under the two denominations of Mæatæ and Caledonii. The ſouth part of Britannia Barbara, as the Romans ſtyled it, was poſſeſſed by the former; and the north part by the latter. From the Caledonii, Calidones, Deucalidonii, or Dicalidones, as they are ſtyled by different authors, the north part of Britain was called Caledonia; nay, Florus calls the woods adjoining to the Thames, Caledonian woods; for ſpeaking of Cæſar ſoon after he had paſſed that river, Having followed the Britons, ſays he, into the Caledonian woods, he took one of their kings priſoner [a]. But herein he ſhews himſelf little acquainted with the country. Of the Picts no mention is made either by Tacitus or Ptolemy; but under that denomination the Caledonians were comprehended in Conſtantine's time, I do not mention, ſays Eumenius in his panegyric upon that prince, the woods and marſhes of the Caledonians and other Picts [b]. And Ammianus Marcellinus, writing of the time of Valentinian and Valens; The Picts, ſays he, under which denomination are comprehended the Dicalidones and the Vectu-riones, the Attacotti likewiſe, a warlike nation, and the Scotti, roaming about, committing great devaſtations [c]. Hence it is manifeſt, that, in the reigns of thoſe two princes, the Attacotti, and the Scotti or Scots, were two different nations from the Caledonii and the Picts. But of Scotland, and its antient inhabitants, we ſhall ſpeak more at length hereafter. Thus far of the inhabitants of Britain, of their towns and territories, while the Romans were maſters of the iſland, in the deſcription of which we have followed Ptolemy, Antoninus, and our beſt modern antiquaries. But, after all, we cannot pretend exactly to aſcertain the bounds of ſo many different nations ſubject to ſo many kings, who were continually making encroachments upon each other. Moſt of the towns we have mentioned were, in all likelihood, built after the Romans had made themſelves maſters of the iſland; but that the Britons had no towns at all before their arrival, as Strabo ſeems to inſinuate [d], is what we can hardly believe. What that geographer wrote of Gaul and Britain, he copied from Cæſar, who tells us indeed, that the Britons gave the name of towns to woods, after they had fortified them with a ditch and rampart, to reſtrain the incurſions of thoſe with whom they were at war [e]. But, from their giving the name of towns to the woods, which they choſe for places of ſhelter, and fortified in time of war, we cannot conclude, that they had no other places, deſerving that name, to dwell in, when under no apprehenſion of an enemy. Who can believe, that the twenty towns, which Veſpaſian reduced under the emperor Claudius, as we read in Suetonius [f], were only woods thus fortified and fenced in?

WE cannot dismiss this subject, without taking notice of the walls or ramparts raised by the Roman emperors in this island, to secure the countries belonging to Rome against the incursions of the northern barbarians. That three walls were erected for that purpose by three different emperors, is manifest from history. Of these the first and hithermost was, without all doubt, the work of Adrian; for Spartian tells us in express terms, that he was the first, who, by a wall or rampart eighty miles in length, parted the Romans and barbarians [g]. This wall is, by our best antiquaries, placed between Solway-frith and Tinmouth; and truly, considering its extent, it can be placed no-where else. This wall or rampart, (for some writers style it murus, and others vallum) was made, says Spartian, in modum muralis sepis, or septi, that is, after the manner of a mural hedge, with large stakes fixed deep in the ground, and fastened together. Upon it stood Pons Ælia, perhaps Pont-Eland in Northumberland, Classis Ælia, Cohors Ælia, and Ala Sabiniana, which took their names from Ælius Adrianus and his wife Sabina. In the reign of Antoninus Pius, the successor of Adrian, the Brigantes revolted; but Lolius Urbicus, then governor of Britain, having overcome them, and driven back the barbarians, built another wall of turf, or earth says Capitolinus in the life of Antoninus Pius [h]. As no antient writer mentions the place where this second wall was built, it is impossible to determine it with any certainty. Some learned antiquaries, whom we have followed in our Roman history [i], place it between the friths of Forth and Clyde. But Camden and Brietius, upon the authority of a very antient chrorographical table, are of opinion, that it began at the mouth of the Taus or Tweed, and was carried southward to the head of the Esk in Eskdale, so as to secure the east coast, and inclose part of the country of the Ottadini. Upon second thoughts this opinion does not seem to us improbable, since Antoninus begins his itinerary from the mouth of the Tweed, as the most northern boundary, at that time, of the Roman empire. The first wall was built, according to our best chronologers, in the year of the christian æra 123, the fourth of Adrian's reign, Glabrio and Torquatus being then consuls; and the other in 142, the third of Antoninus Pius, then consul with Marcus Aurelius Antoninus [k]. That a third wall was built by the emperor Severus, is plain from Spartian, who, in the life of that prince, tells us, that he ſecured Britain with a wall carried on croſs the iſland from ſea to ſea [l]. There is a great diſagreement among antiquaries about the place where this wall was built. Camden maintains, that Severus's wall was raiſed in the ſame place, where Adrian had erected his about eighty years before. But we cannot help diſagreeing herein with that learned antiquary, ſince Eutropius, in the life of Severus writes, that he built a wall thirty-two miles in length, reaching from ſea to ſea; whereas Adrian's wall extended eighty, viz. from Solway-frith to Tinmouth. Beſides, we cannot perſuade ourſelves, that Severus, after having overcome in ſeveral battles the barbarians, after having marched from one end of the iſland to the other, and been at an immenſe trouble and charge, not to mention the loſs of fifty thouſand men, in draining marſhes, cutting down woods, and making highways, ſhould have abandoned ſo extenſive a country, which Agricola had formerly reduced, and Antoninus incloſed with a wall, and this at a time when the enemies of Rome were quite diſpirited, and ſuing for peace. It muſt therefore be placed on the iſthmus between the friths of Forth and Clyde; and indeed, if it was but thirty-two miles in length, it could ſtand in no other part of the whole iſland, that was ever poſſeſſed by the Romans. But the hithermoſt wall, ſays Camden, is ſtill called Gual Seuer, that is, Severus's wall. May not thoſe, who call it ſo, be miſtaken? Is it not well known, that many appellations, or, as we may ſtyle them, traditions, of this nature, when narrowly examined, prove quite groundleſs? Such is this, if we believe the Scots writers, who, as Camden himſelf obſerves, have always called the hithermoſt wall Adrian's wall. The neck of land between the two friths of Forth and Clyde is not above ſixteen miles over. This tract Agricola ſecured with caſtles and forts placed at convenient diſtances, that the forces might eaſily draw together upon the firſt apprehenſion of danger. In building afterwards the wall, thoſe who were employed in the work, took the moſt direct line; which muſt be the cauſe why ſome of the forts are at a diſtance from it. They began it where the rivers are narrow, and carried it along the neck of land between the friths. It begins between the Queen's-ferry and Abercorn, and, for the ſpace of thirty-ſix Scots Miles, runs weſtward to Dunbriton, with a great ditch on the north ſide of the wall, and many ſquare fortifications in the form of a Roman camp. It is called by the inhabitants of the neighbouring country Graham's dyke. But of Severus's wall, we have ſpoken at length in our Roman hiſtory [m], to which we refer the reader. The hithermoſt was, as we have obſerved already, built by Adrian, not with ſtone, but turf or earth, and defended by a rampart, and ſharp ſtakes driven deep into the ground. However, it is certain, that afterwards a ſtone wall was built in the ſame place; but when, or by what emperor, we cannot determine. The remains of this wall were ſtill to be ſeen in Camden's time. That learned antiquary traced it with great care, and, according to the account he gives us of it, it began at Blatobulgium, or Bulneſs, on the Iriſh ſea, kept along the ſide of Solway-frith by Burgh-upon-ſands to Lugovallum, now Carliſle, where it paſſed the Ituna or Eden. Thence it was carried on croſs the little river of Cambeck, where the ruins of a great caſtle were to be ſeen. Afterwards paſſing the rivers Irthing and Poltroſe, it entered Northumberland, and, through thoſe mountains along the river South Tine, was continued by a bridge over North Tine, and ended at the German ocean. On the north ſide of the wall was a ditch twelve yards broad. In ſome places it is ſix yards deep, hewn out of the ſolid rock. The wall itſelf was about eight foot thick, and in very few places built upon that of Adrian. Camden takes this to be the wall, that was built by the Romans about the middle of the fifth century, upon their abandoning the iſland. But one legion only was then ſent over, and that was ſoon after recalled: and could one legion, in a very ſhort time, and in great haſte to return, build even with the aſſiſtance of the Britons, a ſtone wall eight foot in breadth, twelve in height, and eighty miles in length? This to us ſeems incredible, and therefore we are inclined to think, that this laſt wall was built upon that of Severus between Bodotria and Glota, where, in Buchanan's time were diſcovered the remains of a ſtone wall [n]. This is the opinion of the learned Uſher, who maintains, that Bede was miſtaken in placing the laſt wall between the Eden and the Tine [o]. The laſt legion, ſent to the aſſiſtance of the Britons, drove out the barbarians with great ſlaughter, and recovered the country they had ſeized. Is it therefore probable, that, abandoning ſuch a vaſt tract to the enemy, they would have choſen to build a wall eighty miles in length, though in great haſte to return to the continent, when they might have incloſed a much larger country with a wall not half ſo long?

THESE three walls were, in different times, the boundaries of the Roman empire, dividing Britannia Romana from Britannia Barbara, which laſt appellation they gave to that part of Britain, which was not ſubject to Rome. Britannia Romana was divided into Britannia Superior and Britannia Inferior, Britannia Superior and Inferior.

rior, or Upper and Lower Britain. The former reached from the Chanel at leaſt as far as Cheſter, comprehending both England and Wales, as they are now ſtyled; for, on one hand, we read in Dion Caſſius, that the legio ſecunda Auguſta was quartered in Upper Britain [p]; and on the other, in Ptolemy, that it had its ſtation at Iſca Silurum, now Caer Lheon, about four miles from the Severn in Monmouthſhire [q]. The ſame Dion Caſſius tells us, that the Legio vigeſima, called likewiſe Valeriana and Victrix, was quartered in Upper Britain; and both Ptolemy and Antoninus determine the place, viz. Deva, now Cheſter, on the Deva, now the Dee. The Legio ſexta Victrix is placed by Dion Caſſius in Lower Britain; and by Antoninus, as well as by Ptolemy, at Eboracum or York, which, as it is plain from hence, ſtood in Lower Britain. Under this diviſion was compriſed only that part of Britain, which was ſubject to the Romans, the other more northern part being by them diſtinguiſhed with the name of Britannia Barbara. This diviſion owed, without all doubt, its origin to the emperor Severus, who, having ſettled the affairs of Britain, divided it, as we read in Herodian [r], into two prefectures. Before that prince's reign, no mention is made of any diviſion of Britain; and Ptolemy, who divides Germany, Pannonia, and Mœſia into Upper and Lower, takes no notice of any ſuch diviſion in his deſcription of Britain; a convincing proof, that, when he wrote, that is, in the reign of Marcus Antoninus, this diviſion was not yet introduced. If Severus was, as he ſeems to have been, the author of this diviſion, Britannia Inferior extended to the iſthmus between Glota and Bodotria, where he built a wall, parting Britannia Romana from Britannia Barbara.

Britain divided into five governments.

Britannia Romana, comprehending the Upper and Lower Britain, was firſt divided, probably by Conſtantine the Great, into four governments; viz. Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, Flavia Cæſarienſis, and Maxima Cæſarienſis. Britannia Prima lay between the Chanel on one ſide, and the Thames and the Severn on the other; Britannia Secunda reached from the Severn to the Iriſh ſea; Flavia Cæſarienſis was incloſed by the Thames, the Severn, and the Humber; and Maxima Cæſarienſis extended from the Humber to Adrian's wall. To theſe was added afterwards the province of Valentia, probably ſo called by the emperor Valentinian from his brother Valens; for, in the reign of Valentinian, this country, extending from Adrian's wall to the friths of Bodotria and Glota, was recovered by Theodoſius, father to the emperor of that name.

This diviſion we have copied from the breviary, which Sextus Rufus wrote, and dedicated to the emperor Valentinian. Of this work, ſome imperfect copies leave out Flavia Cæſarienſis; and one of theſe Camden has followed. Each of theſe provinces had its particular magiſtrate, ſome a conſular, others only a præſes or preſident. They were all, according to the Notitia, ſubject to the vicarius of Britain, as he was to the præfectus prætorio of Gaul, one of the four præfecti prætorio inſtituted by Conſtantine. The vicar of Britain had ſeveral officers under him for the better and more expeditious adminiſtration of civil affairs, viz. his princeps or lieutenant; a cornicularius, who publiſhed the ſentences and decrees of the vicar and other magiſtrates, and was ſo called from cornu a horn, with the ſounding of which he commanded ſilence in the court; two numerarii or accountants, whoſe province it was to ſet down the ſums of the public revenues; a commentarienſis or jailor, ſo called from the commentaria or kalendars of the priſoners, which he kept, and delivered to the judges; officers called ab actis, that is, public notaries, who wrote teſtaments, contracts, and other inſtruments; ſecretaries called de cura, and de cura epiſtolarum, whoſe office it was to write and ſend letters and diſpatches from the governors of the provinces to the emperor, or to each other. Beſides a great number of petty officers, viz. informers, purſuivants, apparitors, &c. the vicar had under him the governors of the five above-mentioned provinces, who were three preſidents, and two conſulars; for by preſidents were governed Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, and Flavia Cæſarienſis; and the other two, Maxima Cæſarienſis and Valentia, by conſulars, as appears from the Notitia, and was agreeable to the cuſtom of the Romans, who, on the decline of the empire, committed to conſulars the care of thoſe provinces only, that, lying next to the enemy, were moſt expoſed to their attempts. The vicar had the power of reverſing the judgments and decrees of the other governors; and with the ſame power was the præfectus prætorio of Gaul veſted, with reſpect to the judgments and decrees of the vicar. The enſigns of the vicar's office were a book of mandates in a green cover, and five caſtles placed in the triangular form of the iſland, with the names of the five above-mentioned provinces, which they repreſented [1].

The form of the Roman government in Britain.

Their civil government.

By the vicar, and the governors of the five provinces under him, was the civil government adminiſtered. As to the military, it was executed by three chief officers under the magiſter militum of the weſt; viz. the comes Britanniarum, the comes litoris Saxonici, and the dux Britanniarum. No mention is made in the Notitia of the troops under the command of the count of Britain, nor of the places under his jurisdiction; but as the other two commanded on the coasts, and in the northern parts of Britain, as appears from the places where their forces were quartered, we conclude from thence, that the inland and south part of the island was subject to his command. The comes litoris Saxonici, or count of the Saxon shore, whose province it was to cover the eastern coast, lying over-against Germany, and prevent the Saxon pirates from ravaging the country, had no fewer than eight præpositi under his command, and one tribune; viz. the præpositus or commander of the numerus or cohort of the Fortenses, quartered at Othona, thought to be Hastings; the præpositus of the Tungricani at Dubris or Dover; the præpositus of the Turnacenses at Lemanis or Lime; the præpositus of the Branodunenses, who were Dalmatian horse, at Brandunum or Brancaster, in Norfolk; the præpositus of the Stablesian horse at Garriannonum or Castor, near Yarmouth; the præpositus of the second legion, called Augusta, quartered at Rutupiæ or Richborough; the præpositus of the Abulci at Anderida or Newenden; and the præpositus of the Exploratores, whose office it was to discover the state and motions of the enemy at Portus Adurni, or Ederington in Sussex. The tribune commanded under the præpositus of the legion. The dux Britanniarum had under him fourteen præpositi; viz. the præpositus of the sixth legion quartered at York or Eboracum; the præpositus of the Dalmatian horse at Præsidium, or Patrington in Holderness; the præpositus of the Crispinian horse at Danum or Doncaster; the præpositus of the Catafractarian horse at Morbium, perhaps Morsby in Cumberland; the præpositus of the Nervii Dictenses at Dictis or Diganwy in Caernarvanshire; the præpositus of the Vigiles or scouts at Concangii or Kendal in Westmorland; the præpositus of the Exploratores at Lavatres or Bowes in Yorkshire; the præpositus of the Directi at Veteræ or Burgh-upon-Stanmore in Westmorland; the præpositus of the Defensores at Broconiocum or Bougham in the same county; the præpositus of the Solenses at Magona, thought by Camden to be Machleneth in Montgomeryshire; the præpositus of the Pacenses at Magi or Old Radnor; the præpositus of the Longonicarii at Longonicus or Lanchester, in the bishopric of Durham; and lastly, the præpositus of the Derventionenses, so called from Derventio, where they were quartered, a town upon the Derwent, seven miles from York, thought to be Auldby. All these præpositi are named in the Notitia, with the places where they were quartered.

Besides

BESIDES the above-mentioned forces, a ſtrong guard or watch was kept on the wall, or, as the Notitia expreſſes it, along the line of the wall, per lineam valli. Here was poſted the tribune of the fourth cohort of the Lergi, at a place called Segodunum, now Seaton, on the ſea-coaſt of Northumberland. The tribune of the cohort of the Comonii had his ſtation at Pons Ælii or Pontland in Northumberland. This bridge was probably made by order of the emperor Ælius Adrianus. The tribune of the ala of the Aſtores was quartered at Condercum or Cheſter-upon-the-ſtreet, in the biſhoprick of Durham, next to him was ſtationed the tribune of the firſt cohort of the Frixagi at Vindobala, as we read in the Notitia, or Vindomora, as it is ſtyled in the itinerary, the former name importing, in the Britiſh language, finis muri, and the latter finis valli, and hence the place is now called the Wall's-end, in Northumberland, the river Tine ſerving perhaps inſtead of a rampart from this place to the ſea. The prefect of the ala Saviniana was poſted at Hunnum, which Camden conjectures to be Sevenſhale in the ſame county. The prefect of the ſecond ala of the Aſtores lay at Cilurnum, which ſome take for Cillerford, and ſome for Scilicheſter-on-the-wall, likewiſe in Northumberland. The tribune of the firſt cohort of the Batavi was ſtationed at Procolitia, according to ſome, Colcheſter upon the Tine. The tribune of the firſt cohort of the Tungri was quartered at Borcovicus or Borwic in Northumberland. The tribune of the fourth cohort of the Gauls at Vindolana or Winchheſter-on-the-wall. The tribune of the firſt cohort of the Aſtores at Æſica, thought to be Netherly on the Eſk in Cumberland. The tribune of the ſecond cohort of the Dalmatæ at Magni, a place without all doubt near the wall, and not Radnor, called by the ſame name. The tribune of the firſt cohort Ælia at Amboglanna, according to ſome Willoford in Cumberland, according to Camden, Ambleſide in Weſtmorland. The prefect of the ala Petriana at Perith in Cumberland. The prefect of the Mauri Aureliani at Aballaba, or Apleby in Weſtmorland. The tribune of the ſecond cohort of the Largi at Congavata, or Roſe-caſtle near Carliſle in Cumberland. The tribune of the cohort of the Hiſpani at Axelodunum, now Hexam in Northumberland. The tribune of the ſecond cohort of Thracians at Gabroſentum, Gateſhead, cloſe to Newcaſtle. The tribune of the firſt cohort, called Ælia Claſſica, at Tunnocellum or Tinmouth. This cohort, Camden thinks, was employed in naval affairs, induced thereunto by the ſurname of Claſſica given it in the Notitia. That the Romans kept ſome veſſels on the Tine, to hinder the Caledonians from making deſcents on their territories, is not improbable; for that they maintained a fleet in the ports of this iſland, is manifeſt

from a law still extant in the pandects, wherein mention is made by Javolenus of one Seius Saturninus, archigubernus or admiral of the British fleet [t]. The tribune of the first cohort of the Morini was stationed at Glannobanta, thought by Camden to have stood on the Wentsbeek in Cumberland. The tribune of the third cohort of the Nervii at Alione, now Whitley-castle in Westmorland. The cuneus of the Armaturæ is placed by the Notitia at Brementuracum, a station near the wall, and not in the neighbourhood of Preston in Lancashire, sixty miles distant from the wall, as Camden would have it. The prefect of the first ala Herculea had his station at Olenacum or Ellenborough in Cumberland, where many monuments of antiquity have been discovered. The tribune of the sixth cohort of the Nervii is mentioned the last of all in the Notitia, and placed at Verosidium, thought to be Wercwich upon the Eden near Carlisle. All these forces were appointed to defend the limit, that is, to secure the wall, under the command of the dux Britanniarum. These three officers, viz. the comes Britanniarum, the comes litoris Saxonici, and the dux Britanniarum, were equal in power, but subordinate to the vicar. The forces maintained in Britain under the two latter officers, amounted, according to Pancirolus, to nineteen thousand two hundred foot, and seventeen hundred horse. Of the troops under the comes Britanniarum, we find no account in the Notitia; Pancirolus thinks, because the greater part of the island was then in the power of the barbarians. But this reason might have served against enumerating the forces under the two other commanders; for, at the very time the Notitia was compiled, the Britons were, by frequent embassies, soliciting the emperor, and his officers in Gaul, for aid; which they could not have wanted, had the fourth part of the troops, set down in the Notitia, been quartered towards the wall. In the times before the Notitia, no mention is made of the comes Britanniarum, but only of the dux, and the comes tractus maritimi, called comes litoris Saxonici, when the Saxon pirates began to infest the coasts. The first vicar of Britain we find mentioned in history, and probably the first who, with that title, governed here, is Pacatianus, to whom we find an edict directed in 319, enacting, that one decurio should not be bound to pay the taxes that were due from another [u]. The authority of the count of the Saxon shore was thought to have been confined within Britain, till it was by the learned Selden extended to the opposite coast of Cimbria, Bata-

via, Belgica, and Armorica [x]; for to them he finds the name of litus Saxonicum given by the writers of thoſe times, no doubt from their being infeſted by the Saxon pirates. The count of Britain had for his enſigns a book of mandates, and the iſland repreſented in a triangular form; the count of the Saxon ſhore a purple book, with nine caſtles, repreſenting the nine places where the præpoſiti and tribune, under his command, were quartered; and the dux likewiſe a purple book, with the fourteen places, where the prefects under him were ſtationed. Of theſe munitions or forts, fourteen have over them the names we have mentioned; but the firſt has only the word ſextæ, ſignifying, we ſuppoſe, the ſtation of the ſixth legion, which was quartered at York; whence that city is ſtyled by Antoninus, in his itinerary, Eboracum legio ſexta; and in a coin of Severus, Col. Eboracum Legio VI. Victrix. If the power and juriſdiction of the count of the Saxon ſhore had extended to the oppoſite coaſts of Gaul and Germany, as Selden maintains, mention would have been made in the Notitia of the forces under his command in thoſe places; but as the Notitia is quite ſilent upon that head, and, in the enſigns of that officer, we find only the names of nine Britiſh towns or gariſons, we conclude from thence, that his authority was confined to this iſland. His troops were quartered in ſeveral towns or ſtations along the coaſt from Kent to the moſt northern part of Norfolk. The more northern coaſts, and that facing Ireland; with the inland countries in thoſe parts, were under the juriſdiction of the dux Britanniarum; for Danum, now Doncaſter, ſeems to have been the moſt ſouthern ſtation of his troops. Theſe ſtations, deſigned at firſt for camps, called in Latin caſtra, grew, by degrees, into cities; and this is the origin of almoſt all our great cities and towns, built either in the ſame places where the Roman camps were, or at a ſmall diſtance from them. This obſervation holds, eſpecially in thoſe, the names of which end in cheſter or ceſter, derived from the Latin word caſtra; for, to this day, the ſtations or forts near the Picts wall, the remains of which are to be ſeen in ſeveral places, are, by the common people, called Cheſters [y].

The Roman highways.

To maintain a communciation between one ſtation and another, and for the convenience of the armies, when they marched, or of the governors, when they viſited the provinces, the troops, in peaceable times, were employed in making roads or cauſeways, called viæ militares, conſulares, prætoriæ, ſtratæ, publicæ, &c. As no fewer than an hundred and fourteen manſions through fifteen different roads are mentioned in the Itine- rary, and in the Notitia forty-ſix gariſons, viz. nine on the ſea-coaſt, under the command of the comes litoris Saxonici, fourteen more inland, and twenty-three per lineam valli, or along the wall, under the juriſdiction of the dux Britanniarum, many highways muſt have been made for paſſing, according to the Roman cuſtom, from one place, however diſtant, to another. Our hiſtorians, indeed, mention only four of note; but, in a province ſo abounding with ſtations, camps, fortreſſes, and cities, there muſt, without all doubt, have been a great many more. Had the Notitia given us an account of the forces and places under the command of the dux Britanniarum, as well as of the other two great officers, we ſhould have had knowledge of more cities and places of note in this iſland; for Bede tells us out of Gildas, who flouriſhed about the time the Notitia was compoſed, that, in thoſe days, there were twenty-eight moſt ſtately cities, beſides innumerable caſtles, fortified with ſtrong walls, towers, and gates [z]. The four ways, or, as we call them, ſtreets, mentioned by our hiſtorians, are, Watling-ſtreet, ſo called, as is conjectured, either from Vitellianus, a Roman, perhaps employed in making it, or from a Saxon word ſignifying a beggar, it being much frequented by beggars. This way is thought by ſome to have reached from Dover to Cardigan in Wales; by others to have extended from Dover to the coaſt over-againſt Angleſey, paſſing through London, Dunſtable, Towceſter, Allerſton, and croſſing the Severn near the Wrekin in Shropſhire. The Foſſ-way, ſo called, perhaps, becauſe in ſome places it was never perfected, but left like a ditch. This way is thought to have reached from Totneſs in Devonſhire to Lincoln, and from Lincoln to Cathneſs, the moſt northern point in Scotland. Ikenild-ſtreet, ſo called, perhaps, from Iceni. It led from Southampton to York, and from thence to Tinmouth. Ermine or Erminage-ſtreet, reaching from St. David's to Southampton [a]. Beſides theſe, we find two others mentioned in hiſtory, viz. Julia Strata in Monmouthſhire, made, as Camden conjectures, by Julius Frontinus, who ſubdued the Silures; and Strata Marcella, mentioned by Giraldus Cambrenſis, as lying at a ſmall diſtance from Julia Strata. The former is thought to have been the work of Ulpius Marcellus, propretor of Britain in the reign of Commodus.

Several corps of Britons in the Roman armies.

The forces, employed in the defence of Britain, were all foreigners, as the reader muſt have obſerved, the Romans not thinking it ſafe to truſt the natives, who perhaps would have defended their country with more vigour and reſolution againſt

the barbarians, but might, when maſters of all the ſtrong places, have turned their arms againſt their maſters, and ſhaken off the yoke. To prevent this, the Romans tranſplanted into other countries the numerous levies raiſed here. It appears from the Notitia, and ſeveral antient inſcriptions, that bodies of Britiſh troops were diſperſed almoſt over the whole empire; for we find the following corps mentioned; viz. Ala Britannica milliaria, Ala quarta Britonum in Ægypto, Cohors prima Ælia Britonum, Cohors tertia Britonum, Cohors ſeptima Britonum, Cohors viceſima ſexta Britonum in Armorica, Britanniciani ſub magiſtro peditum, Invicti juniores Britanniciani, Excubitores juniores Britanniciani, Britones cum magiſtro equitum Galliarum, Invicti juniores Britones intra Hiſpaniam, Britones ſeniores in Illyrico. Theſe different corps were ſupplied from time to time out of this iſland. No wonder therefore, that Britain, exhauſted and deprived of its youth by ſo numerous levies, became, upon the withdrawing of the foreign troops quartered here, a prey to the northern barbarians. Having thus deſcribed the ſtate of Britain before and after the arrival of the Romans, we ſhall now proceed to the hiſtory of that part of it, which was ſubject to Rome, from the time of its being firſt invaded by Julius Cæſar, to its deſertion by the Romans in the reign of Valentinian III. containing the ſpace of about five hundred years.

SECT. II.

The hiſtory of Britain, from the firſt coming of Julius Cæſar, to its deſertion by the Romans.

BRITAIN was but little known to the Romans till the time of Julius Cæſar (A), who, having carried his victorious arms to the oppoſite coaſt of Gaul, parted from Britain by Britain.

Cæſar's firſt expedition into

(A) We muſt ingenuouſly confeſs, that we have no accounts, but ſuch as are evidently fabulous, of what paſſed in this iſland before the Romans were acquainted with it. Gildas, who flouriſhed in the latter end of the ſixth century, freely owns, that, as for the antient monuments of his country, they were no-where to be found in his time, being either deſtroyed by the enemy, or carried into foreign countries by the baniſhed Britons. However, Annius of Viterbo, in his Beroſus, gives us a long ſucceſſion of Celtic kings, whom he derives from Samothes, one of the ſons of Japhet, ſuppoſing him to have planted colonies firſt on the continent of Celtica or Gaul, and afterwards in this iſland, from him named Samothea. But Annius has been long ſince unmaſked, and the fables he vends in his counterfeit by a narrow chanel, there formed the design of bringing the Britons, as he had already done the most warlike nations of Gaul, terfeit Berosus universally exploded. What Geoffrey of Monmouth writes of Brutus, and the kings descended from him, supposed to have reigned in this island, deserves no more credit, than the fables of Annius, whether Geoffrey was the author, or only the translator, of that pretended history; for, in the preface prefixed to it, he tells us, that he received an antient British history from Walter archdeacon of Oxon, which he faithfully translated out of the British tongue into Latin. This history, or rather romance, he inscribed to Robert earl of Gloucester, natural son to Henry I. But though it was at first received with uncommon applause by the Welsh, who, to this day, are unwilling to give it up as fabulous, yet it began very early to be cried down, as appears from what we read in William Niobrigensis, who flourished not long after Geoffrey, and writes of him thus: "In these our days a certain writer is risen, who has devised "many foolish fictions of the Britons. His name is Geoffrey." And a little after: "With how little shame, with what great con-"fidence, does he frame lies!" However, as it would be unpardonable in us to pass over in silence what all our historians have thought fit to take notice of, we shall here relate, in a few words, what we read in Geoffrey's fabulous history of Brutus, and his successors, said to have reigned in this island many ages before the arrival of the Romans. According to that writer, Brutus, the great-grandson of Æneas by his son Ascanius, having accidentally killed with an arrow his father Sylvius, king of Alba, was forced to leave Italy; and flying into Greece, joined there the Trojans, who had settled in that country after the destruction of their city. With these he put to sea, being supplied with a fleet by Pandrasus, king of the country, whose daughter he had married; and entering the Atlantic sea, performed wonders in several places, particularly in Gaul, where he overcame Goffarius king of Aquitain, and drove him from his kingdom. But the banished king having prevailed upon the other princes of Gaul to lend him powerful succours, Brutus, not finding himself in a condition to withstand so great a force, put to sea again, and, after a few days sail, arrived on the coast of Albion, and landed at the place in Devonshire, where Totness now stands. He immediately marched up into the country, which he found peopled by giants, whose chief or king was Gogmagog. These he overcame, and having rooted them out, and divided the lands among his people, he called the island, from his own name, Britain. Having got possession of the whole country, he built a city in a proper place, which he made the seat of his kingdom, calling it Troja Nova, a name afterwards changed into Troynovantum or Trinobantum. Before his death, he divided his kingdom among his three sons. Locrinus, the eldest, had for his share Leogria, so called from him, now England. Cambar, Brutus's second son, had Cambria, now Wales; and Albanactus, Albania, now Scotland. Having

Gaul, under the dominion of Rome. Whatever was the real motive that prompted him to this undertaking, whether his unbounded ambition and thirſt of glory, as to us ſeems moſt likely, or the hopes of enriching himſelf with the Britiſh pearls, as we read in Suetonius [b], the pretence he alledged was, that, in all the wars of Gaul, the Britons had aſſiſted with conſiderable ſupplies the enemies of the republic. Upon this either real or pretended provocation, he attempted to paſs over into Britain, and, by the conqueſt of this iſland, enhance the reputation, which he had already acquired in Gaul. As the ſummer was already far ſpent, and winter came on very early in theſe northern climates, he was ſenſible, that the time of the year would not allow him to finiſh the war. However, he thought it would be no ſmall advantage to view the iſland, to learn the temper, cuſtoms, and manners, of the inhabitants, and to get ſome knowledge of their ports and havens, then viſited by none but merchants, who were acquainted with the coaſt lying over-againſt Gaul, but ſeemed utter ſtrangers to the reſt of the country; for, being called together by Cæſar from all parts, they could not inform him of what extent the iſland was; by what nations, and how powerful, it was peopled; how they underſtood the art of war; by what cuſtoms they were governed; or what ports were capable of receiving a fleet of great ſhips (B). In order therefore to diſcover what he could not learn ing laid this foundation the author purſues his hiſtory, giving us an account of the various revolutions, that happened in the iſland in the reigns of the kings, who ſucceeded each other, from Brutus to Caſſibelan, who, being appointed guardian to Androgius and Tenuantius, his two nephews, the ſons of king Lud, prevailed upon the people to transfer the kingdom upon himſelf. Lud is ſaid by Geoffrey to have ſurrounded the city of London with new walls and towers, and to have built a gate, which, from him, is ſtill called Ludgate. In the reign of Caſſibelan, Cæſar landed in Britain; and here it is, as Camden well obſerves, that the Engliſh hiſtorian ought to begin his hiſtory, whatever Geoffrey or others have written of the Britiſh affairs before this period being altogether groundleſs. As for Geoffrey's hiſtory in particular, it ſufficiently confutes itſelf, bringing with it ſuch marks of forgery, as muſt evidently convince every reader, that the whole is a fiction either of Geoffrey himſelf, or of the author, whom he pretends to have copied.

(B) Cæſar tells us elſewhere (1), that Divitiacus, one of the moſt powerful men in Gaul, was not only maſter of a conſiderable part of that country, but had ſome footing likewiſe in Britain; that learn of the merchants, he ſent out C. Voluſenus with a galley, injoining him to return as ſoon as poſſible with what intelligence he could get. Suetonius tells us, that Cæſar went in perſon to view the coaſt; but Cæſar's own account ſhews that writer was miſtaken [c]. In the mean time, Cæſar marched all his forces into the country of the Morini, now the province of Picardy, whence was the ſhorteſt paſſage into Britain, ordering, at the ſame time, all the veſſels, that lay in the neighbouring ports, and the fleet, which he had built the year before for his expedition againſt the Morini, to attend him.

The Britons ſend embaſſadors to Cæſar.

The Britons, alarmed at theſe preparations, diſpatched embaſſadors to Cæſar, offering to ſubmit to Rome, and deliver hoſtages for their fidelity. Cæſar received them with great kindneſs; and having encouraged them, with fair promiſes, to perſiſt in their reſolution, he ſent them back to their own country, ordering Comius, whom, for his extraordinary wiſdom, virtue, and fidelity, he had made king of the Atrebates, to attend them into Britain, with inſtructions to viſit as many ſtates as he could, to perſuade them to accept of an alliance with Rome, and to acquaint them with his deſign of landing in a ſhort time in their country. In the mean time, Voluſenus, having made what diſcoveries he could from his ſhip, for he did not think it adviſeable to venture aſhore, returned after five days to Cæſar, and acquainted him with what he had obſerved.

Cæſar embarques with two legions.

Hereupon Cæſar, having embarqued two legions on board eighty tranſports, and appointed eighteen more, which were wind-bound at a port about eight miles off, to convey over the cavalry, weighed anchor about the third watch, commanding the cavalry to embarque at the port, where the veſſels lay ready to receive them, and follow him; which orders were too ſlowly executed. Cæſar himſelf arrived in a few hours on the Britiſh coaſt; but finding the hills and cliffs hanging over the ſea covered with armed men, who from thence might, with their darts, eaſily prevent his landing, he lay by till three in the afternoon, waiting for ſome of his ſhips that ſeveral provinces of Britain were peopled by colonies from Gaul; that the Britons had aſſiſted the Gauls in moſt of their wars; and, laſtly, that ſuch of the Gauls as were deſirous to be perfect maſters of the learning of the Druids, uſed to paſs over into Britain to ſtudy it there. How could Britain, therefore, at that time, be ſo utterly unknown in Gaul, or only known to merchants, nay, and to them ſo little, that being called together by Cæſar from all parts, they could not give him any tolerable account of the people, of their cuſtoms, manners, laws, method of fighting, &c. nay, not even of their ports and harbours?

were not yet come up, in order to look out for ſome other place, where he might land his troops, with leſs danger. Upon their joining the fleet, he ſummoned the chief officers to a council of war; and having acquainted them with the intelligence he had received from Voluſenus, and given them ſuch orders as he thought proper for the occaſion, he ſet ſail, and arriving at a plain and open ſhore about eight miles farther, he there came to an anchor. The Britons, appriſed of Cæſar's deſign, ſent their cavalry and chariots before, the reſt of the army haſtening after them, in order to oppoſe his landing. The main difficulty in getting to land proceeded from the largeneſs of the ſhips, which required a conſiderable depth of water; ſo that the Roman ſoldiers were obliged, loaded as they were with heavy armour, to leap into the ſea, and at the ſame time to ſtruggle with the waves, and encounter the enemy, who, having their hands diſengaged, as they either ſtood on dry land, or waded but a little way into the water, could boldly caſt their darts, and drive back an enemy thus incumbered. This diſadvantage ſo diſcouraged the Romans, as Cæſar himſelf owns, that they did not appear ſo chearful, nor ſo eager to engage the enemy, as in their former conflicts on dry land; which being perceived by the general, he ordered his long ſhips or galleys to advance with their broad ſides towards the ſhore, in order to force the Britons, with their ſlings, arrows, and engines, to retire from the water-ſide. This had, in ſome degree, the deſired effect; for the Britons, ſurpriſed at the make of the galleys, a ſort of ſhipping they had never ſeen, and overwhelmed with ſhowers of darts and arrows thence diſcharged upon them, began to give ground. But the Romans ſtill betraying great backwardneſs to throw themſelves into the water, the ſtandard-bearer of the tenth legion, having firſt invoked the gods, cried out aloud, Fellow ſoldiers, unleſs you will forſake your colours, and ſuffer the Roman eagle to fall into the hands of the enemy, follow me; for I am reſolved to diſcharge my duty to the commonwealth and my general. Having thus ſpoken, he leaped into the ſea, and advanced with the eagle towards the enemy. Hereupon the ſoldiers in the ſame ſhip, encouraging each other not to ſuffer ſo great a diſgrace as the loſs of their enſign, followed his example; which thoſe in the other ſhips perceiving, they too caſt themſelves boldly into the ſea, and, preſſing forward, began the fight, which proved very ſharp, on both ſides, and, for ſome time, no-ways favourable to the Romans; for not being able either to keep their ranks, get firm footing, or, leaping out of ſeveral ſhips, follow their particular ſtandards, they were put into great confuſion by the Britons; who, being acquainted with the ſhallows, when they ſaw them coming in ſmall numbers

bers out of their ships, spurred their horses into the water, and attacked them incumbered and unprepared; which Cæsar observing, he caused several boats to be manned, and sent them to the assistance of those, whom he saw most distressed. By this means, the Romans, having at length gained firm footing, charged the enemy so briskly, that they put them to flight; but could not pursue them for want of horse, the cavalry not being yet arrived; which, Cæsar says, was the only thing wanting to complete his wonted success [d].

The Romans land with great difficulty. Year before Christ 54.

The Britons sue for peace.

Upon this defeat, the Britons immediately sent embassadors, and with them Comius, whom they had committed to prison, to sue for peace. This treatment they endeavoured to excuse, by laying the blame on the multitude. Cæsar, having upbraided them with their breach of faith, in making war upon him, after they had sent embassadors to him into Gaul, desiring peace, promised to forgive them, on condition they delivered a certain number of hostages. Part of these they brought immediately, promising to return in a few days with the rest, who lived at some distance. Peace being thus concluded four days after Cæsar's landing in Britain, the British princes, having disbanded their men, and sent them back into their several countries, came to submit themselves and their states to Cæsar. In the mean time, the eighteen transports, that were conveying over the Roman cavalry, being overtaken by a violent storm, were driven back to the ports of Gaul. By the same storm, Cæsar's fleet, which lay in the road, was greatly damaged, several of them being dashed to pieces, and others, by the loss of their anchors, cables, and rigging, rendered wholly useless; which caused a great consternation in the army, for they wanted materials wherewithal to refit them, in order to return to the continent, and provisions to support them any considerable time in the island, Cæsar having all along intended to pass the winter in Gaul. What added to the misfortune, the same night, it being then full moon, the tide rose so high, that the galleys, which had been drawn ashore, were filled with water. This caused a new panic, the Roman mariners being quite unacquainted with the tides. The British chiefs, who were assembled to perform their agreement with Cæsar, perceiving his want of horse, ships, and provisions, and judging of the number of his men from the smallness of his camp, which was narrower than usual, because the legions had left their heavy baggage behind them, resolved to take arms again, in order to protract the war till winter, persuading themselves, that, if they could cut off the few Romans that were come over, or prevent their return, they would thereby deter others from invading Britain for the future. The plot being thus laid, they began to ſteal out of the camp by degrees, and privately to liſt again their diſbanded troops. Cæſar knew nothing of their deſign; but nevertheleſs, ſuſpecting an alteration from their delay in delivering their hoſtages after the loſs of his ſhipping, reſolved to prepare againſt all events. Accordingly he cauſed all the proviſions, that could be found in the neighbouring country, to be brought into his camp, and gave orders, that thoſe ſhips, which had been the leaſt damaged by the ſtorm, ſhould be refitted with the materials of thoſe, that had been ſhattered to pieces. He ſent likewiſe to Gaul for what things were farther neceſſary; which were ſo well applied by the ſoldiers, who, on this occaſion, laboured with uncommon diligence, that only twelve ſhips being loſt, the reſt were ſoon in a condition to put to ſea again. In the mean time, the ſeventh legion being ſent out to forage, while part of the ſoldiers, having quitted their arms as under no apprehenſion of danger, were employed in reaping the corn, and the reſt in gathering it, and conveying it to the camp, the Britons, who had lain all night concealed in the neighbouring woods, not queſtioning but the Romans would come and forage in that place, the harveſt being brought in every-where elſe, fell upon them unexpectedly; and having killed ſome of them, drove the reſt into a ſmall compaſs, and ſurrounded them with their horſe and chariots in ſuch manner, that not a ſingle man would have eſcaped, had not the advanced guards, obſerving a greater duſt than uſual riſing from that quarter, acquainted Cæſar therewith; who, ſuſpecting the Britons had begun hoſtilities anew, haſtened to the aſſiſtance of the legion with the two cohorts, that were upon guard, ordering two others to ſupply their room, and all the reſt to repair to their arms, and follow him with all expedition. Upon his arrival, the Britons gave over the attack, and the Romans reſumed their courage. However, Cæſar not thinking it adviſeable to engage the enemy, ſtood ſome time with his troops drawn up in battle-array, and then retreated to his camp. After this, the heavy rains, which continued ſeveral days ſucceſſively, kept the Romans in their camp, and hindered the Britons from attempting any thing againſt them. The latter, however, were not idle in the mean time, but having diſpatched meſſengers into all parts of the iſland, to inform their countrymen how ſmall an army the Romans had, how great a booty they might get, and what a favourable opportunity offered of freeing themſelves for ever, by forcing the Roman camp, they drew together a great body of horſe and foot, and boldly advanced to the Roman entrenchments. Upon their approach, Cæſar drew up his legions in order of battle before the camp, and gave the Britons so warm a reception, that they immediately turned their backs, and fled. Cæsar pursued them with great slaughter, till his men were out of breath, burnt several towns and villages in the neighbourhood, and then returned to his camp. The Britons, disheartened at the loss they had sustained, sent the same day embassadors to sue for peace; which Cæsar readily granted, upon their promising to send him over into Gaul double the number of hostages he had required before. His want of horse, and the fear of exposing his fleet to another storm, if he staid till the equinox, made him hasten his departure. The same night therefore, the wind proving favourable, he weighed anchor, and arrived safe in Gaul, whence he immediately wrote to the senate, acquainting them with his exploits in Britain; for which a supplication, or general thanksgiving, was decreed for twenty days [c].

Cæsar returns to Gaul.

The Britons, it seems, were not much awed by Cæsar's arms; for of all the states, into which the island was then divided, two only sent him hostages. Provoked at this neglect or contempt, he resolved to make a new descent the following spring with a far more powerful fleet and army. With this view, before he left Gaul to return to Italy, where he used to pass part of the winter, he ordered his lieutenants to refit the old ships, and build as many new ones as they could. His orders were executed with such diligence, that, upon his return, he found six hundred ships, and twenty-eight galleys, ready to launch in a few days. Having therefore commended the application and diligence of his soldiers and the supervisors, he commanded them to repair with the fleet to Portus Itius (C), while he marched with four legions, and eight hundred horse, into the country of Treves, to prevent a rebellion there; which he had no sooner done, than he hastened to the above-mentioned port, and leaving Labienus there with three legions, and two thousand horse, to secure it, to provide corn, and to send him intelligence from time to time of what might happen on the continent, he embarqued with five legions, and two thousand horse, and weighing anchor about sun-set, arrived

(C) Camden and Somner in his dissertation de Portu Iccio, will have Boulogne to be the Portus Itius mentioned by Cæsar; others look for the Portus Itius at Calais, or in that neighbourhood. Horsley observes, that Cæsar calls the passage from Portus Itius to Britain the shortest and easiest, being about thirty miles. Now, by an accurate survey, the distance at Calais from land to land is twenty-six English miles, or twenty eight and a half Roman with his whole fleet the next day by noon on the Britiſh coaſt, where he landed, without oppoſition, in the ſame place, which he had found ſo convenient the year before. The Britons had aſſembled in vaſt multitudes to oppoſe his landing, as he afterwards underſtood from the priſoners; but being terrified at the ſight of ſo numerous a fleet, amounting, with the veſſels which ſeveral perſons had provided for their own uſe, to eight hundred and upwards, they had left the ſhore, and retired to the hills. Cæſar, being informed, after landing his troops, where the Britons were lodged, left ten cohorts and three hundred horſe to ſecure the fleet, and with the reſt marched in queſt of the enemy, whom he found poſted on the other ſide of a river, about twelve miles from the place where he had landed (D). Their deſign was to oppoſe his paſſage; but, notwithſtanding the advantage of the ground, they were obliged, by the Roman cavalry, to quit their poſt, and retire to a wood, whereof all the avenues were blocked up with huge trees cut down for that purpoſe. Out of this place, which ſeemed to have been fortified in ſome former war, they never ventured but in ſmall parties. But, notwithſtanding their utmoſt efforts to prevent the Romans from entering it, the ſoldiers of the ſeventh legion, having caſt themſelves into a teſtudo, and thrown up a mount againſt their works, obliged them to abandon their aſylum, and ſave themſelves by flight; but the day being far ſpent, Cæſar, who was quite unacquainted with the country, thought it more adviſeable to return, and fortify his camp, than to purſue the fugitives [f].

He lands without oppoſition.

Is forced by the Britons to retire.

EARLY next morning, Cæſar diſpatched both his horſe and foot, divided into three bodies, in purſuit of the enemy; but when he was already come in ſight of their rear, he was acquainted by ſome horſemen from Q. Atrius, that, by a dreadful ſtorm, which had happened the night before, moſt of his ſhips were daſhed to pieces, or driven aſhore. Upon this intelligence, he haſtened back to the ſea-ſide, where he was an eye-witneſs of the misfortune, which he had heard from the meſſengers; for forty ſhips were intirely loſt, and the reſt ſo damaged, that they could not be refitted without great trouble and labour. However, without loſs of time, he ſet all the carpenters in the fleet and army to work, and ſent over to Gaul for others, ordering at the ſame time Labienus to build as many ſhips as he could with the legions that were there. To prevent the like misfortune for the future, he reſolved upon a very difficult undertaking, which was, to draw all his ſhips aſhore, and incloſe them within the fortifications of his camp. This ſtupendous work being completed in ten days, the ſoldiers labouring the whole time night and day without intermiſſion, and the camp being ſtrongly fortified, Cæſar, leaving the ſame guard as before to defend it, marched with the reſt of his forces to the place, whence he had returned from purſuing the enemy. Upon his arrival, he found their numbers greatly increaſed, under the conduct of Caſſibelan, king of the Trinobantes, whoſe territories lay about eighty miles from the ſea. He had formerly made war on his neighbours; but, upon the arrival of the Romans, they had all unanimouſly committed the whole management of the war to him, as the moſt proper perſon to head them at ſo important a conjuncture. While the Romans were on their march, they were attacked by the Britiſh horſe and chariots, whom they repulſed with great ſlaughter, and drove into the woods; but purſuing them too eagerly, they loſt ſome of their own men. Not long after, the Britons made a ſudden ſally out of the woods, and fell upon the advanced guard, while the Romans were buſied in fortifying their camp. Cæſar immediately detached two cohorts to their aſſiſtance; but the enemy, while the Romans ſtood amazed at their new way of fighting, boldly broke through the two cohorts, and returned again without the loſs of a man. Quintus Laberius Durus, a tribune, was ſlain in this action; but ſome freſh cohorts coming to the relief of the Romans, the Britons were, in the end put to flight. The next day they kept on the hills, at a conſiderable diſtance from the Roman camp, till about noon; when three legions being detached by Cæſar, with all the cavalry, under the command of C. Trebonius, to forage, they fell upon the foragers with great fury; but meeting with a vigorous reſiſtance, they betook themſelves to flight; and being purſued by the Roman cavalry ſo cloſe, that they had not time to rally, to make a ſtand, or to get down from their chariots, according to their cuſtom, great numbers of them were cut in pieces. Upon this overthrow, the auxiliary troops, that had come from all parts, abandoning Caſſibelan, returned to their reſpective countries; nor did the Britons ever after engage Cæſar with their united forces[g].

After

AFTER this victory, Cæsar marched toward the Thames, with a design to cross that river, and enter the territories of Cassibelan; but when he came to the only place where the river could, though not without great difficulty, be forded, he saw the enemy's forces drawn up in a considerable body on the opposite bank, which was fortified with sharp stakes. They had likewise driven many stakes of the same kind so deep into the bottom of the river, that their tops were covered with the water. Though Cæsar had intelligence of this from the prisoners and deserters, yet he ordered the cavalry to ride in, and the legions to follow; which they did with such resolution and intrepidity, that, though the foot were up to the chin in water, the enemy, not able to sustain their assault, abandoned the bank, and fled (E). Cassibelan, now despairing of success by a battle, disbanded the greatest part of his forces, retaining only about four thousand chariots, to observe the motions of the Romans. With these he kept at some distance in the woods, or in such places as were scarce accessible to the Romans, carrying off the cattle and corn from those countries through which the Romans were to march. As he was well acquainted with the roads and by-ways, if the Roman cavalry ventured a little too far to lay the country waste, he detached part of his chariots to attack them; which they could not engage without great disadvantage. This prevented the Romans from making excursions, as they would have otherwise done, and obliged Cæsar not to suffer his horse to go farther to burn and plunder the country, than the legions were able to follow them. In the mean time the Trinobantes sent embassadors to Cæsar, promising to submit to him, and at the same time intreating him to protect Mandubratius against the oppression of Cassibelan, and send him to them for their king and governor. Mandubratius, called by Eutropius and Bede, Androgeus, was the son of Imanuentius, king of the Trinobantes; but, upon the death of his father, who was ſlain by Caſſibelan, to avoid the like fate, he had fled to Cæſar, who had granted him his protection. Cæſar readily complied with the requeſt of the Trinobantes, injoining them to ſend him forty hoſtages, and corn for his army; which they did accordingly. The example of the Trinobantes, whoſe ſubmiſſion ſecured them from being plundered by the Roman ſoldiers, was ſoon followed by other ſtates; viz. the Cenomagni, Segontiaci, Anaclites, Bibroci, and Caſſi (F), who, by their embaſſadors, ſubmitted to Cæſar. From theſe he had intelligence, that the town of Caſſibelan, ſuppoſed to be Verulamium, now St. Albans, well fortified with woods and marſhes, whither the country people had retired with their cattle, was but a little way from his camp. Thither therefore he marched with his legions; and though he found the place ſtrongly fortified both by nature and art, he ordered it to be ſtormed at two different places; which was done with ſuch reſolution, that the Britons, not able to ſuſtain the fury of the aſſault, fled out at one of the avenues of the wood; for this town was only a thick wood, ſurrounded with a ditch, and fortified with a rampart. Many of the Britons were overtaken, a- they attempted to make their

The Trinobantes submit to Cæsar.

(E) Polyænus tells us, that Cæsar, on this occasion, made use of the following stratagem: he caused an elephant, covered with iron, having a wooden tower on his back full of men, to be driven into the river; which unusual sight struck such terror into the Britons, that they abandoned the opposite shore (3). The stakes are just above Walton in Surrey; and the meadow facing them is called Coway. They are even now to be seen at low water; and one of them was lately pulled out of the Thames, but with great difficulty. They are of oak, and, though they have been so long in the water, are as hard as brazil, and as black as jet. At Shepperton, they have several knife handles made of them (4).

Who takes Caſſibelan's chief city.

(F) Lipſius, inſtead of Cenomagni, reads Iceni, Cangi (5), the names of two nations mentioned elſewhere by Cæſar. The Iceni inhabited Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeſhire, and Huntingdonſhire; and the Cangi the country lying on the Iriſh ſea; for when Oſtorius led his army againſt them, he approached the ſea, ſays Tacitus (6), that faces the iſland of Ireland. Camden agrees with Lipſius in changing the firſt part of Cenomagni into Iceni; but as for the latter, he reads Regni, who were the inhabitants of Suſſex and Surry, and conſequently more likely to follow the example of the Trinobantes, who inhabited Hertfordſhire, Eſſex, and Middleſex, than the Cangi, who lived at a great diſtance. The Segontiaci are placed by ſome in Berkſhire, by others in Hampſhire (7). The city of Segontium, mentioned by Antoninus, ſtood on the coaſt of North Wales, overagainſt the iſland of Anglſey, as appears from the itinerary; but we cannot think the inhabitants of that city to be the Segontiaci mentioned in this place, it being altogether improbable, that they ſhould have ſubmitted by their embaſſadors to Cæſar, while he was ſtill at ſo great a diſtance from their country. The Anaclites and Bibroci are placed by moſt of our antiquaries in Berkſhire, the former about Henley, and the latter about Bray. The Caſſi are ſuppoſed to have inhabited ſome part of Hertfordſhire, perhaps the hundred of Caiſhow.

To repair, in ſome degree, this loſs, and divert Cæſar from purſuing his conqueſts, Caſſibelan, by his meſſengers, perſuaded four petty princes of Kent, Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, whom Cæſar ſtyles kings, to raiſe what forces they could, and attack the camp, where the ſhips were laid up; but the Romans, having made a ſally, repulſed them with great ſlaughter, took Cingetorix priſoner, and returned, without any loſs, to their trenches. Upon the news of this defeat, Caſſibelan, conſidering the many loſſes he had ſuſtained, how his country was laid waſte, and, above all, that ſeveral ſtates had already ſubmitted to the conqueror, reſolved to follow their example; and accordingly ſent embaſſadors to treat of a ſurrender, who were introduced by Comius of Attrebatum or Arras. As the ſummer was already far ſpent, Cæſar, who was determined to winter in Gaul, to prevent ſudden inſurrections there, readily hearkened to their propoſals; ſo that a treaty was ſoon concluded upon the following conditions, viz. that the Britons ſhould pay an annual tribute to the people of Rome; that Caſſibelan ſhould leave Mandubratius in the quiet poſſeſſion of his dominions, and not moleſt the Trinobantes; and that he ſhould deliver a certain number of hoſtages. Theſe Cæſar no ſooner received, than he marched back to the ſea-ſide, where he cauſed his fleet, which he found refitted, to be launched. As he had a great number of captives, and ſome of his ſhips had been loſt in the ſtorm, he reſolved to tranſport his army at two voyages. But moſt of thoſe veſſels, which were ſent back from Gaul, after they had landed the ſoldiers, that were firſt carried over, and of the ſixty, that Labienus had taken care to build, being driven back by contrary winds, Cæſar, after having long expected them in vain, leſt the winter ſhould prevent his voyage, the equinox being near at hand, crouded his ſoldiers cloſer than he deſigned, and putting to ſea about the ſecond watch of the night, reached the continent with his whole fleet by break of day [i].

Cæſar returns to Gaul.

SUCH is the account Cæſar himſelf gives us of his two famous expeditions into Britain; but other authors have ſpoken more doubtfully of his victories here. Dion Caſſius writes, that the Britons uttterly routed the Roman infantry; but were afterwards put in diſorder by the cavalry. Horace and Tibullus, in ſeveral places of their works, ſpeak of the Britons as a nation not yet conquered [k]. Tacitus tells us, that Cæſar rather ſhewed the Romans the way to Britain, than put them in poſſeſſion of it [l]; and Lucan more plainly, that he turned his back to the Britons, and fled. Be that as it will, upon his return to Rome, he offered to Venus, as Pliny tells us, a breaſt-plate enriched with Britiſh pearls, as a trophy of his conqueſts in this iſland.

After the departure of Julius Cæſar, the Romans were diverted, for the ſpace of twenty years, by their domeſtic broils, and civil wars, from attempting any thing againſt Britain. During this time, the tribute was not paid, nor perhaps demanded; ſo that the Britons continued no leſs free from the Roman yoke, than they had been before the arrival of Cæſar.

Auguſtus. State of Britain during his reign.

But Auguſtus, having at length put an end to the civil wars, and firmly eſtabliſhed himſelf in the poſſeſſion of the empire, reſolved to force the Britons, that is, thoſe who inhabited the moſt ſouthern part of the iſland, to perform the agreement they had made with his uncle Julius. With this view he advanced as far as Gaul; but was, by a revolt in Pannonia, diverted from putting his deſign in execution. About ſeven years after, he entered Gaul with the ſame reſolution; but the unſettled ſtate of that province made him readily hearken to the propoſals of the embaſſadors ſent by the Britons to ſue for peace; which was granted them, no doubt, upon their promiſing to ſtand to their agreement with his predeceſſor Julius. But they neglected, it ſeems, to perform their promiſe; for the year enſuing Auguſtus reſumed the reſolution of paſſing over into Britain; but was anew prevented, by the revolt of the Cantabrians in Spain. However, ſome of the Britiſh princes took care to cultivate his friendſhip with preſents; which were laid up in the capitol [m].

Cunobeline maintains a correſpondence with Rome.

Cunobeline, who is ſaid to have ſucceeded Tenuantius, the ſucceſſor of Caſſibelan, maintained a correſpondence with Rome, and even cauſed coins to be ſtamped, after the manner of the Romans, ſome of which are ſtill to be ſeen, and among the reſt one with the word Taſc on the reverſe, ſignifying, according to our antiquaries, tribute; whence they conclude, that this money was deſigned for the payment of the tribute; for though braſs and iron rings of a certain weight ſerved, as Cæſar informs us, for their current coin, yet the Romans exacted the tribute in gold or ſilver; and of the latter metal is the coin we are here ſpeaking of (G). Thus Britain, by degrees, became well known known to the Romans, even in Auguſtus's time. That prince, however, ſatisfied with the ſmall tribute that was yearly ſent him from Britain, forbore any further attempts upon the iſland, either thinking the friendſhip or enmity of the Britons of no moment to the Romans, as Strabo inſinuates [n], or being, out of a ſtate maxim, reſolved to ſet bounds to the empire, leſt it ſhould grow too great and unwi ldy [o].

Tiberius, who ſucceeded Auguſtus, being more inclined to contract than inlarge the bounds of the empire, followed the example of Auguſtus, and never entertained the leaſt thought of conquering Britain; but, ſatisfied with the reſpect the Britiſh princes ſhewed him in ſending back ſome of Germanicus's ſoldiers, who had been ſhipwrecked on their coaſt [p], and with their paying the uſual cuſtoms for ſuch commodities as they brought into Gaul, ſuffered them to enjoy their liberties, and live according to their own laws: Theſe cuſtoms the Roman officers collected in a precarious manner, fearing to provoke the Britons, as Strabo tells us [q]. Caligula, the ſucceſſor of Tiberius, having paſſed the Alps with a deſign to plunder Gaul, as he had already done Italy, received there under his protection Adminius, called by our writers Guiderius, the ſon of Cunobeline, who had been baniſhed by his father. Hereupon he wrote boaſting letters to Rome, ordering the meſſengers to drive their chariots into the forum, and to the very curia, and ſtrictly injoining them not to deliver their letters but in the temple of Mars, and in a full ſenate, as if the whole iſland had ſubmitted to him. Soon after, no doubt at the inſtigation of Adminius, he marched his forces to the ſea-ſide; but being informed there, that the Britons were ready to receive him, his courage cooled, and, inſtead of purſuing his deſign, he ordered his ſoldiers to fill their helmets and laps with cockle-ſhells, which he called the ſpoils of the conquered ocean. Having, by ſuch marks of folly and madneſs, expoſed himſelf to the deriſion both of the Gauls and Britons, he wrote to the ſenate, deſiring them to de-

Claudius.

THE Britons may be ſaid to have continued hitherto free from the Roman yoke; but in the reign of Claudius, the ſucceſſor of Caligula, great part of the iſland was brought under ſubjection to Rome, and the reſt by degrees under the ſucceeding emperors. Dion Caſſius gives us a diſtinct account of the invaſion by Claudius, the occaſion of which he thus relates:

What induced him to make war on the Britons.

Cunobeline being dead, his two ſons Togodumnus and Caractacus, reigned; but whether jointly or ſeparately, whether with equal or ſubordinate power, we are no-where told. In their reign, one Bericus (who he was, is not known), being driven out of the iſland for attempting to raiſe a ſeddition, fled, with thoſe of his party, to Claudius; and, being highly provoked againſt his countrymen, perſuaded the emperor to invade Britain. On the other hand, the Britons, reſenting the emperor's receiving the fugitives, and his refuſing to deliver them up when demanded, forbad all commerce with the Romans. A war being therefore reſolved on, Claudius ordered Plautius, then prætor in Gaul, to tranſport thoſe legions he had with him into Britain, and begin the expedition. The ſoldiers, unwilling to make war, as they ſaid, out of the compaſs of the world, refuſed to follow their general, or obey his commands; but being at length brought back to a ſenſe of their duty, in the manner we have related elſewhere [s], they embarqued chearfully, and put to ſea from three ports, in order to land in three different places. They were driven back by contrary winds, which greatly diſheartened them; but reſuming their courage upon the appearing of a meteor ſhooting from the eaſt, and directing, as they imagined, their courſe, they put to ſea again, and landed in Britain without oppoſition, the inhabitants, who had been informed of the mutiny in the Roman army, and did not expect ſo ſudden an alteration, having delayed to draw together, in order to oppoſe them. Hearing therefore they were landed, they kept in ſmall bodies behind their marſhes, and in their woods, in order to ſpin out the time till winter; which they imagined Plautius, after the example of Julius Cæſar, would paſs in Gaul. But the Roman general, having with great difficulty, firſt found out Caractacus, and afterwards Togodumnus, to keep them in awe, he marched to a river, where the Britons lay carelesly encamped, imagining the Romans could not pass it without a bridge. But the German soldiers, accustomed to swim the strongest currents in their armour, having passed the river, and, pursuant to their orders, fallen only upon the horses that drew their chariots, in which the main strength of the Britons consisted, Vespasian and his brother Sabinus, sent over with a body of troops to support them, easily put the enemy to flight, their chariots being rendered unserviceable, and cut great numbers of them in pieces. The Britons, however, not disheartened, engaged the Romans the next day so vigorously, that the victory, for a considerable time, inclined to neither side; but at length the Romans, encouraged by the example of Caius Sidius Geta, charged the Britons so briskly, that they were forced, after a most obstinate resistance, to betake themselves to flight. The conduct of Geta in this action was so remarkable, that triumphal honours were decreed him, though he had never been consul[t]. This battle is supposed to have been fought on the banks of the Severn. From hence the Britons retired to the mouth of the Thames, and, being acquainted with the flats and shallows, drew the Romans, who followed them, into great danger. But the Germans having crossed the river by swimming, and the others on a bridge somewhat higher, the Britons were surrounded on all sides, and great numbers of them put to the sword. Many of the Romans, pursuing the fugitives with too much eagerness, fell into the marshes, and were lost. In one of these battles, Togodumnus was killed, whose death was so far from disheartening the Britons, that they betrayed greater eagerness than ever to oppose the Romans, and revenge it. Hereupon Plautius, not thinking it advisable to penetrate farther into the country, put garisons into the places he had taken, and wrote to the emperor, who had ordered him so to do, if any thing extraordinary should happen, acquainting him with the progress he had already made, and the dangers he apprehended from a further pursuit of his conquests. Claudius, who aspired at the honour of a triumph, not being satisfied with the triumphal ornaments decreed him by the senate, no sooner received this letter, than he set out from Rome; and embarking at Ostia, sailed to Marseilles, whence he pursued his journey by land to Gessoriacum, now Bologne, where he again embarked, and, landing safe in Britain, joined his lieutenant Plautius, who lay encamped on the banks of the Thames. Upon his arrival, the whole army passed the river, and falling upon the Britons, gave them a total overthrow. After this victory, he advanced to Camalodunum, the royal ſeat of Cunobeline, which he took, and, without any conſiderable oppoſition, reduced ſome of the neighbouring ſtates. For theſe exploits, he was ſeveral times by his ſoldiers ſaluted imperator, contrary to the received cuſtom of the Romans, which allowed no general to aſſume that title more than once in the ſame war [u]. Part of Britain being thus ſubdued, Claudius diſarmed the inhabitants, and appointed Plautius to govern them, ordering him at the ſame time, to ſubdue thoſe who remained yet unconquered. To ſuch as had ſubmitted, he generouſly forgave the confiſcation of their eſtates; which obliged them to ſuch a degree, that they erected a temple to him, and paid him divine honours. The emperor, after having ſtaid in Britain but ſixteen days, ſet out from thence on his return to Rome, having ſent thither his two ſons-in-law, Pompeius and Silanus, before him with the news of his victories. Upon his arrival in the city, he was honoured with a triumph, and the ſurname of Britannicus; which was given both to him and his ſon: the officers, who had attended him in this expedition, were diſtinguiſhed with triumphal ornaments (H): annual ſports were decreed by the ſenate; and two triumphal arches, one to be erected at Rome, and the other at Geſſoriacum, whence he had paſſed over into Britain. On the top of the imperial palace was fixed a naval crown, implying the conqueſt of the Britiſh ocean. In ſhort, the ſame honours were decreed to Claudius, who had conquered but a very ſmall part of the iſland, as had been decreed to other conquerors, after they had reduced whole kingdoms [x] (I).

Plautius, appointed by Claudius governor of Britain, purſued his conqueſts, after the emperor's departure, with ſuch ſucceſs, that, upon his return to Rome, he was honoured with an ovation, and met, without the gates, by the emperor himſelf, who, at his ſolemn entry, gave him the right-hand. In this war, Veſpaſian likewiſe, afterwards emperor, and his ſon Titus, diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a very eminent manner. The former fought thirty battles with the Britons, ſubdued two powerful nations, and reduced above twenty towns, with the iſle of Wight; for which exploits he received the triumphal ornaments, two ſacerdotal dignities, and the conſulſhip [y]. As for Titus, he no leſs ſignalized his piety, than his courage and valour; for ſeeing his father in a battle ſurrounded on all ſides, and in imminent danger of his life, he broke through the enemy's ranks, and having reſcued him, put the Britons to flight, and purſued them with great ſlaughter [z]. Some years after, that is, in the ninth year of Claudius's reign, as we gather from Tacitus [a], P. Oſtorius Scapula, being ſent into Britain, fell unexpectedly upon the Britons, who had broken into the Roman conqueſts; and having put great numbers of them to the ſword, and diſperſed the reſt, to reſtrain them from making inroads for the future into the territories of the Romans, or their allies, he built ſeveral forts on the Severn, the Avon, and the Nen, reduced that part of the iſland, which lies ſouth of theſe rivers, to a Roman province, and, for a further ſecurity, made Camalodunum a military colony. This the Iceni could not brook, and therefore, being joined by the neighbouring nations, they raiſed a conſider-able army, and encamped in an advantageous poſt, in order to prevent the Romans from penetrating farther into the iſland. However, Oſtorius, advancing againſt them, after a moſt obſtinate conflict, put them to flight, and purſued them with great ſlaughter. After this victory, he led his army into the country of the Cangi, probably the preſent counties of Shropſhire and Cheſhire; but being informed, as he approached the Iriſh ſea, that the Brigantes were in arms, he marched with all ſpeed againſt them; and having cauſed the chief authors of the diſturbance to be put to death, and pardoned the reſt, he ſoon reſtored that country to its former tranquillity. After this, Oſtorius made war upon the Silures, the inhabitants of South Wales, headed by Caractacus, a commander of great renown, whom nevertheleſs he defeated in a pitched battle, the particulars whereof we have related at length in our Roman hiſtory, to which we refer our reader [b]. Caractacus, upon his defeat, fled for protection to Cratiſmandua, queen of the Brigantes, who, dreading the Roman arms, delivered him in bonds to the conqueror, by whom he was ſent to Rome, with his wife, daughter, and brothers, and received there by the emperor in a kind of triumph. Claudius, moved with the ſpeech which the captive prince made when brought before his tribunal, and admiring the conſtancy with which he bore his misfortunes, granted to him, to his wife, to his daughter, and brothers, both their lives and liberty. The Silures, notwithſtanding the loſs of their general, purſued the war with great vigour, and gained very conſiderable advantages over the Romans, related by us elſewhere [c]; which ſo affected Oſtorius, that he died with grief. He was ſucceeded by A. Didius, who reſtrained the Silures making frequent and wide incurſions into the Roman territories within more narrow bounds; but was not able to reſtore Cratiſmandua, queen of the Brigantes and an ally of Rome, to her kingdom [d]. He defeated the Brigantes in a pitched battle, but afterwards, as he was ſtricken in years, he contented himſelf with acting only defenſively, and reſtraining the enemy by his lieutenants. Veranius, who ſucceeded him in the reign of Nero, died in leſs than a year after his arrival in Britain, without performing any thing worthy of notice. After him, Suetonius Paulinus governed Britain, who reduced the iſland of Angleſey, and defeated with great ſlaughter the Britons, who, under the conduct of queen Boudicea, had taken arms, and put incredible numbers of the Romans, and their allies, to the ſword, as we have related at length in our Roman hiſtory, to which we refer the reader [c]. Suetonius Paulinus was ſucceeded in the government of Britain by Petronius Turpilianus, and he by Trebellius Maximus. During their government, nothing remarkable happened; for, as they were both men of an indolent temper and no ambition, they took care not to provoke the Britons by any acts of hoſtility, giving to this cowardly inaction the ſpecious name of peace. In the mean time, Nero dying, the Roman army in Britain was commanded, during the ſhort reigns of Galba and Otho, only by tribunes, among whom Cælius bore the chief ſway, who, by carefully avoiding to give the Britons any juſt cauſe of complaint, kept all things quiet in the iſland. Vitellius, upon his acceſſion to the empire, appointed Vectius Bolanus governor of Britain, who ruled with great gentleneſs, without either provoking the Britons, or being by them provoked. In the reign of Veſpaſian, who ſucceeded Vitellius, Petilius Cerealis was ſent into Britain, to take upon him the command of the army there. Petilius, upon his arrival, attacked the Brigantes, the moſt numerous and powerful of all the Britiſh nations; and having defeated them in ſeveral encounters, ſome of which proved very bloody, he reduced great part of their country, and continued to ravage the reſt [f]. He was ſucceeded by Julius Frontinus, who not only maintained the conqueſts made by his predeceſſor, but fought himſelf with great ſucceſs againſt the warlike nation of the Silures, whom he entirely reduced. Julius Frontinus being recalled, the celebrated Cneius Julius Agricola was ſent to command in his room. But of the exploits of that renowned commander, we have ſpoken at length in our Roman hiſtory [g]; and therefore, to avoid tedious repetitions, ſhall only add here, that having, in ſeven campaigns, reduced the whole iſland, he abandoned the more northern parts, and by raiſing forts, and planting gariſons, on the iſthmus between the friths of Glota and Bodotria, now of Dumbriton and Edinburgh, he removed the Caledonians, as it were, into a ſeparate iſland. Thus Agricola gave the finiſhing blow to the liberty of Britain, and reduced that part of the iſland, which lies ſouth of the friths of Glota and Bodotria, to a Roman province. The loſs of their liberty was, in ſome meaſure, counterbalanced by the politeneſs, that was introduced among them by the conquerors; for, by degrees, they aſſumed the cuſtoms and manners of the Romans, and, forgetting their ſavage ways, applied themſelves to the ſtudy of the liberal arts and ſciences, which were no leſs eſteemed and cultivated in Britain, than in any other province of the empire. return to Agricola: Domitian, who had ſucceeded his brother Titus in the empire, envying his general the great reputation he had gained by his conqueſts, recalled him, on pretence of preferring him to the government of Syria. After his departure, we have but ſhort and broken accounts of what paſſed in this iſland, till the reign of the emperor Adrian. We do not even know who was Agricola's ſucceſſor in the government of Britain. We only read in Suetonius [h], that Salluſtius Lucullus was legate of Britain in the reign of Domitian; and that he was put to death by that prince, for ſuffering his name to be given to a ſort of ſpears, which he had invented. In the reigns of the emperors Nerva, who ſucceeded Domitian, and Trajan, who ſucceeded Nerva, ſome commotions happened in the iſland; but all we know of them is, that they were ſoon appeaſed, and the country reſtored to its former tranquillity, by the Roman troops quartered there; which, according to Joſephus, amounted to four legions [i]. In the reign of Adrian, the ſucceſſor of Trajan, the Caledonians, having demoliſhed ſome of the forts built by Agricola between the above-mentioned friths, made an irruption into the Roman province. Againſt them was diſpatched by Adrian, in the firſt year of his reign, Julius Severus, a commander of great renown; but he being ſuddenly recalled, and employed againſt the Jews, then in rebellion, Priſcus Licinius was ſent over in his room (K), and followed ſoon after by the emperor in perſon; whoſe arrival ſtruck the Caledonians with ſuch terror, that, abandoning the countries they had ſeized, they retired to the more northern parts of the iſland. Adrian, not thinking it worth his while to make war upon them, in order to keep them quiet, relin-

(K) It appears from an antient inſcription found near Adrian's wall, that Licinius Priſcus had been proprætor of Cappadocia before he was ſent into Britain, had commanded the fourth legion, and had been honoured with a military banner by the emperor Adrian in his Jewiſh expedition. The inſcription is as follows:

quiſhed to them all the country between the Tine and the two friths; but at the ſame time, to reſtrain them from making incurſions into the Roman province, he cauſed a wall to be built, extending from the Eden in Cumberland to the Tine in Northumberland, eighty miles in length [k]. Having thus ſettled affairs in Britain, and reformed many abuſes there, he returned to Rome, where he was honoured with the title of Reſtorer of Britain; which was ſtamped on his coins (L). His wall.

To Adrian ſucceeded Antoninus Pius, in whoſe reign the Brigantes revolted; and the Caledonians, having, in ſeveral places, broken down Adrian's rampart, began anew to ravage the Roman territories. Againſt them was ſent Lollius Urbicus, Licinius Priſcus, whom Adrian had appointed governor of Britain, being, in all likelihood, dead; for Antoninus, as Julius Capitolinus informs us [l], removed none of the governors whom Adrian had preferred. Lollius obliged the Brigantes to ſubmit anew to the Roman yoke; and having driven back the northern barbarians, he confined them within narrower bounds than before, by a new wall, extending, as Camden and Brietius conjecture, from Bremenium, now Brampton in Cumberland, to the river Eſk. For theſe atchievements, Antoninus received the ſurname of Britannicus, though he had never ſeen Britain himſelf [m] (M). In the reign of Marcus Aurelius, the ſucceſſor Lollius Urbicus builds a new wall. Year after Chriſt 138.

(L) Some of theſe have reached our times, and, among the reſt, one with the figure of Adrian, and three ſoldiers on the reverſe, repreſenting, as Camden conjectures, the three legions, of which the Roman army in Britain then conſiſted, viz. the Legio ſecunda Auguſta, the quarta decima Victrix, and vicęſima Victrix, called alſo Britannica. Under them is this inſcription, Exer. Britannicus. Other coins of the ſame prince bear this inſcription, Reſtitutor Britanniæ

(M) Lollius Urbicus was ſent into Britain, according to Alford, in the third year of Antoninus's reign, of the chriſtian æra 142; and the ſame year he reduced the rebellious Brigantes, and built the wall, which we have mentioned in the text. This Alford proves from two of Antoninus's medals, coined, by a decree of the ſenate, in that prince's third conſulſhip, that is, as Alford ſhews, in the third year of his reign. On theſe medals he is ſtyled Pater patriæ; and on the reverſe is repreſented Britain, on one ſitting on a globe, and on the other holding a ſpear, and reſting on a ſhield. As Antoninus is not, on either of theſe medals, ſtyled Britannicus, but on ſuch only as were coined five years after, Alford conjectures from thence, that ſome ſignal victory was gained, about that time, over ſucceſſor of Antoninus Pius, new commotions were raiſed in Britain; which obliged the emperor to ſend thither Calpurnius Agricola, who, it ſeems, appeaſed them; for Fronto, the famous orator, as quoted by Eumenius, in a panegyric on the emperor Marcus Aurelius, ſays, among other things, that though, ſitting in his palace at Rome, he had committed the management of the war to one of his generals, yet, like a pilot ſitting at the ſtern, and guiding the helm, he deſerved the honour of the whole expedition [n]. To Marcus Aurelius ſucceeded Commodus, in whoſe reign the Caledonians, having paſſed the wall, which parted them from the Romans, and cut in pieces the Roman general and moſt of his army, committed every-where dreadful devaſtations without reſtraint, till Ulpius Marcellus was ſent againſt them, who, as he was a commander of great experience, and a ſtrict obſerver of the military diſcipline, drove back the Caledonians with great ſlaughter, and reſtored the iſland to its former tranquillity. The reputation he gained in this expedition was ſo great, that the emperor, thinking his own glory eclipſed by that of his general, reſolved to put him to death; but, in the end, only removed him from his government. For the great advantages gained by Ulpius in Britain, Commodus aſſumed the title of imperator the ſixth time [o]. That brave commander had no ſooner left Britain, than the army there began to mutiny, complaining chiefly of Perennis, the emperor's favourite, who, governing with an abſolute ſway, ſent only perſons of the equeſtrian order to command the Britiſh army, whom the ſoldiers therefore refuſed to obey. The mutiny was carried ſo far, that the army ſent deputies to Rome, fifteen hundred, ſays Dion Caſſius, of their own body, to complain of Perennis. Theſe the emperor met without the city; and being by them informed, that Perennis aſpired at the empire, and had, with that view, caſhiered the braveſt officers, and put his own creatures in their room, he delivered the traitor to the fury of the prætorian bands, which he then commanded, and muſt have no leſs diſobliged than he had done the Britiſh army; for he was by them, after a thouſand outrages, torn in pieces, with his wife, his ſiſter, and his two ſons [p]. The downfal and death of this favourite are related by Herodian in a quite different manner, as we have obſerved in our Roman hiſtory [q]. In the mean time, Helvius Pertinax, afterwards emperor, was ſent into Britain, to bring back the mutinous army there to a ſenſe of their duty. Upon his arrival, the ſoldiery, not able to brook the tyrannical government of Commodus, offered him the ſovereignty; but he, by rejecting their offer with indignation, and proceeding with too much ſeverity againſt the mutineers, provoked them to ſuch a degree, that one of the legions openly revolting, much blood was ſhed, and Pertinax himſelf left for dead among the ſlain. However, in ſpite of all obſtacles, he brought the army at laſt to ſubmit, and reſtored tranquillity to the province; but, as his ſeverity had drawn upon him the ill-will and hatred of the ſoldiery, he was, ſome time after, recalled at his own requeſt, Clodius Albinus being appointed governor of Britain in his room [r]. Albinus, having, in a ſpeech to the ſoldiery, upon a falſe report of the emperor's death, declared for the power of the ſenate againſt that of the emperor, was commanded by Commodus to reſign the government of Britain to Junius Severus. But Commodus being ſoon after murdered, Pertinax, his ſucceſſor, ſent Albinus again into Britain, where he continued during the ſhort reigns of Pertinax and Didius Julianus. As he had, by his generoſity and largeſſes, gained the affections of the Britiſh army, he was, upon the death of Julianus, by them proclaimed emperor. To maintain his title againſt Severus, who had received the ſame honour from the army in Pannonia, he paſſed over into Gaul with his Britiſh troops; but being met by his rival in the neighbourhood of Lyons, his army was defeated, and he himſelf ſlain, as we have related at length in our Roman hiſtory [s]. Severus, now maſter of the whole Roman empire, divided Britain into two governments, not thinking it perhaps adviſeable to truſt one man with ſo great a command. The hither, or ſouthern part of the iſland, was given to Heraclitus, and the northern to Virius Lupus (N), who was ſo harraſſed by the continual inroads of the Caledonians, that he was in the end obliged to purchaſe a peace with money; money; which they maintained till the fifteenth year of Severus's reign, when breaking anew into the Roman province, they committed every-where dreadful devaſtations. Virius Lupus, not thinking himſelf in a condition to withſtand them, retired as they advanced, and in the mean time acquainted the emperor with the ſtate of affairs, and the dangers that threatened the province, unleſs powerful and timely ſupplies were ſent to make head againſt the barbarians. Hereupon Severus, reſolved to put an end to the daily incurſions of the enemy, by the intire conqueſt of the north, ſet out for Britain, at the head of a numerous army, accompanied by his two ſons Caracalla and Geta. The Caledonians no ſooner heard of his arrival, than they ſent embaſſadors to him, offering to conclude a peace upon honourable terms. Theſe the emperor detained, till he was ready to take the field, and then diſmiſſed them, without granting them their requeſt. As ſoon as the ſeaſon was fit for action, he marched into their country, and putting all to fire and ſword, advanced to the moſt diſtant and northern coaſts of the iſland. Though no battle was fought in this expedition, yet what by the enemy's continual ambuſcades, what by the hardſhips and toils the ſoldiers underwent in cutting down woods, building bridges, draining marſhes, &c. fifty thouſand of them are ſaid to have periſhed. The Caledonians however were, in the end, obliged to purchaſe a peace, by yielding to the Romans part of their country, and delivering up their arms. Having thus concluded a peace with the Caledonians, he returned to York, leaving to his ſon Caracalla the command of the army, and the finiſhing of the wall, which he had begun, according to the opinion which to us ſeems moſt probable, on the iſthmus between the friths of Forth and Clyde. Of this wall we have ſpoken above, and more at length in our Roman hiſtory [t]. For this expedition, Severus was honoured by the ſenate with the title of Britannicus Maximus, and his two ſons with that of Britannicus [u]. The emperor being taken ill at York, the Caledonians were no ſooner informed of his indiſpoſition, than they took up arms with one accord; which provoked Severus to ſuch a degree, that he ordered his ſon Caracalla to enter their country anew with the whole army, and put all he met to the ſword, ing from Gallienus declared for Postbumus, who had usurped the sovereignty in Gaul; that of the thirty usurpers, or, as they are styled, tyrants, besides Postbumus, the following were acknowledged in Britain, viz. Lollianus, Victorianus, and Tetricus, of whom the last being overcome by the emperor Aurelian, Britain submitted to the conqueror, who sent hither Constantius, the father of Constantine the Great, to establish his authority in the island [y]. Aurelian was succeeded by Tacitus, and he, after a short reign of about six months, by Probus, in whose time Bonosus, descended of a Spanish family, but born in Britain, usurped the sovereignty, and was acknowledged here, as well as in Gaul and Spain; but being, after several battles, reduced by Probus to great straights, he chose rather to strangle himself, than fall into the hands of the conqueror, as we have related at length elsewhere [z]. Zosimus [a] and Zonaras [b], tell us, that a governor, sent hither by Probus, assumed the imperial purple; but was soon after killed by Victorinus, upon whose recommendation he had been preferred to the government of this island [c]. Probus was, according to Vopiscus [d], the first that allowed the Britons, Spaniards, and Gauls, to plant vines. The same emperor having, in an engagement on the banks of the Rhine with the Burgundians and Vandals, taken their king Igillus prisoner, with many others of these two nations, he transplanted them into Britain [e]. In the beginning of Diocletian's reign, Carausius, a native of Gaul, passing over into Britain, took upon him the title of emperor, and was acknowledged by all the troops quartered here; nay, by a treaty concluded between him and Maximian, whom Diocletian had taken for his partner in the empire, Britain was given up to Carausius, who governed it with the title of emperor for the space of six or seven years; but was in the end killed by Allectus, as was Allectus, who had caused himself to be proclaimed emperor in Britain, in a pitched battle with Asclepiodotus, one of Constantius's officers. after it had been held about ſeven years by Carauſius, and three by Allectus. Of theſe tranſactions the reader will find a particular and diſtinct account in our Roman hiſtory [f]. The two emperors Dioclesian and Maximian having reſigned the empire to Galerius and Conſtantius, the latter, to whoſe ſhare fell the weſtern provinces, ſoon after his acceſſion to the empire, paſſed over into Britain, to make war, ſays Eumenius [g], on the Caledonians and Picts, whom he overcame; but, not long after, died at York [h], where he had the ſatisfaction to ſee his ſon Conſtantine before he expired, and to appoint him his ſucceſſor; ſo that Conſtantine began his reign in Britain, and, ſome time after, returned to this iſland, as we read in Euſebius [i], probably to put a ſtop to the daily incurſions of the Caledonians. Of the new form of government, both civil and military, which he introduced here, we have ſpoken above. He likewiſe altered the diviſion of Britain, which, by Severus, had been divided into two provinces only; but was by him divided into three, viz. Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, and Maxima Cæſarienſis, which laſt was afterwards ſubdivided into two parts, viz. Maxima Cæſarienſis, and Flavia Cæſarienſis. The removal of the imperial ſeat from Rome to Conſtantinople, which happened in the reign of Conſtantine, gave the northern nations an opportunity of making frequent irruptions into the Roman province, the emperor having carried with him, firſt into Gaul, and afterwards into the eaſt, not only moſt of the Roman troops quartered in Britain, but likewiſe the flower of the Britiſh youth; whence he is cenſured by Zoſimus, for neglecting the the boundary of the empire on this ſide [k]. Conſtantine divided the empire among his three ſons, Conſtantine, Conſtans, and Conſtantius, of whom the latter, being in a ſhort time poſſeſſed of the whole, ſent into Britain the famous notary and informer Paulus, ſurnamed Catena, to bring from thence the tribunes, and other officers, who had ſided with Magnentius. But of the enormous oppreſſions, extortions, and cruelties, practiſed on this occaſion by that mercileſs man, we have ſpoken at length elſewhere [l]. Conſtantius, about the latter end of his reign, committed the government of the weſtern provinces to Julian, afterwards called the Apoſtate, who, being informed, while he was in his winter-quarters at Paris, that the Picts and Scots, about this time first distinguished in history by that name (Q), had broken into the Roman province, and committed everywhere dreadful ravages, dispatched his lieutenant Lupicinus, with some troops, against them. Lupicinus, embarquing at Bologne in the depth of winter, reached London in a few days; but he had scarce landed his troops, when he was recalled [m], the northern nations having perhaps appeased Julian by their submission. During the short reigns of Julian and Jovian, we find nothing in history concerning the affairs of Britain.

(N) The Caledonians, according to Herodian, had promiſed to reſtrain the Mæatæ from making incurſions into the Roman territories; but they neglecting to perform this article of their agreement, Virius Lupus was obliged to apply to the Mæatæ themſelves, and buy a peace of them at a great rate. From an antient inſcription found at Ilkly in Yorkſhire, by Ptolemy called Olinaca, it appears, that Virius Lupus reſtored that place. The inſcription is as follows:

The Roman province ravaged by the Scots and Picts.

But, under Valentinian I. the Picts, Scots, Attacots, Saxons, and other northern nations, invaded the Roman province at one and the same time; and having killed Nectaridus, count of the maritime tract, and Fullofaudes, who is distinguished with the title of dux or duke, and probably commanded the land-forces, ravaged the country far and wide, and reduced the inhabitants to a most deplorable condition. News of this invasion being brought to Valentinian, while he was on his journey from Amiens to Treves, he immediately dispatched into Britain Severus, his comes domesticorum; but soon after recalled him, and sent Jovinus in his room; who having acquainted the emperor with the miserable condition to which the island was reduced, and the still greater evils with which it was threatened, Theodosius, father to the emperor of that name, was thereupon chosen for this province, and trusted with the whole management of so troublesome a war, Theodosius, upon his arrival in Britain, divided his forces into several parties;

(Q) Ammianus Marcellinus, who wrote towards the latter end of the fourth century, is the first historian that mentions the Scots. But St. Jerom, in his epistle against Ctesiphon the Pelagian, has given us a much more antient passage which he translated out of Porphyry the Greek philosopher, who wrote an age before Ammianus. The passage is as follows: Neither Britain, a province fertile in tyrants, nor the Scotish nations, nor the barbarous nations round about to the very ocean, did ever acknowledge Moses and the prophets. Scaliger, in his notes upon Propertius, and his animadversions on Eusebius, corrects the common editions of Seneca's satire upon Claudius, by reading, instead of the words Scuta Brigantes, Scoti Brigantes; but that correction is not countenanced by any manuscript copies; and besides, it is certain, that Claudius never made war upon the Scots, but kept in the southern parts of Britain. As for Dempster's reading Scoticas prunas, instead of Scythicas, in the verses of the poet Florus to the emperor Adrian, that correction is generally looked upon as altogether groundless [10].

which, advancing againſt the enemy, who were roving up and down the country, cut great numbers of them in pieces, recovered the booty and priſoners they had taken, and obliged them to abandon the province. The barbarians being thus repulſed, Theodoſius entered Lundonium, or London, in a kind of triumph, and reſtored that, as well as ſeveral other cities, which had ſuffered greatly by the late invaſions, to their former ſplendor. As the barbarians had retired beyond the friths of Glota and Bodotria, he built ſeveral caſtles on the iſthmus between the two ſeas, in order to reſtrain them from breaking anew into the province. By this means, all the country between Adrian's wall and the two friths, which had been, for ſome time, held by the Picts, was recovered. Of this tract Theodoſius made a fifth province, to which the emperor gave the name of Valentia, perhaps from his brother Valens. Theodoſius, before he left the iſland, cruſhed, in its very beginning, the revolt of one Valentine, or Valentinian, who, being baniſhed into Britain, had prevailed upon ſome of the inhabitants to proclaim him emperor; but Theodoſius, having got the uſurper into his power, delivered him up to the civil magiſtrates [n]. And now Britain being reſtored to its former tranquillity, Theodoſius returned to the emperor, by whom he was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of kindneſs and eſteem. In the joint reign of the ſucceeding princes Valentinian II. and Gratian, Maximus, who commanded in Britain, hearing that Gratian had taken Theodoſius the younger for his collegue in the empire, and highly affronted at the preference given to a perſon, in his opinion, ſo much beneath him in merit, reſolved to aſſume the imperial purple, and put himſelf upon an equality with his rival. Accordingly, having gained over to his party the Roman legions quartered in Britain, he carried them with the flower of the Britiſh youth, into Gaul. As theſe never returned to their native country, being either cut off with their leader, or ſettling elſewhere, the nation, thus bereft of its ſtrength, became afterwards an eaſy prey to the Picts and Scots. Over theſe two nations Maximus is ſaid to have gained great advantages before his uſurpation, nay, and to have driven the latter quite out of the iſland; but this is not agreeable to what we read in the more antient writers, as we have obſerved elſewhere [o]. In the reign of Theodoſius, the Scots and Picts were, it ſeems, kept in awe by Chryſantius, the ſon of Marcian, biſhop of Conſtantinople, who, being appointed governor of Britain, acquitted himſelf in that office with great reputation [p]. Theodoſius was ſucceeded by his two ſons Arcadius and Honorius, the former ruling in the eaſt, and the latter in the weſt. As Honorius was very young, the famous Stilicho, who had been appointed by Theodoſius regent of the weſtern empire, during the minority of his ſon, is ſuppoſed to have ſent over a legion into Britain, to defend it againſt the Scots, the Picts, and the Saxons [q]. Be that as it will, it is certain, that he ſecured Britain againſt the incurſions of its antient enemies; for Claudian, in enumerating the great things performed by Stilicho before his firſt conſulſhip, tells us, that he ſuccoured Britain attacked by the neighbouring nations, namely by the Scots; that he put it in a condition not to fear their arrows, nor the efforts of the Picts; and that he ſecured the Britiſh coaſts againſt the deſcents of the Saxons [r]. He adds elſewhere, that the Saxons being overcome, the ſea was quiet; that the Picts having loſt their ſtrength, Britain was delivered from her fears [s]. About this time a proper officer was appointed to guard the coaſt againſt the attempts of the Saxons, with the title of comes limitis Saxonici (R). But, not long after, the empire being over-run by the Alans, the Vandals, and the Suevians, moſt of the Roman troops quartered in Britain were recalled, and the iſland left almoſt quite open to the attacks of the Scots and Picts. Hereupon the natives, expecting no aſſiſtance from Honorius, reſolved to ſet up an emperor of their own; and accordingly inveſted with that dignity one Mark, whom, though an officer of great credit among them, after a few days, they murdered, and placed Gratian, a native of

(R) The learned Uſher aſcribes to Stilicho the eſtabliſhing of a legion in Britain, to defend it againſt the Picts, the Scots, and the Saxons (t t). This Claudian ſeems to inſinuate, where he introduces Britain thus ſpeaking in praiſe of that great general and miniſter:

Me quoque vicinis pereuntem gentibus, inquit,

Movit, & infeſto ſpumavit remige Tethys.
Illius effectum curis, ne bella timerem

Proſpicerem dubiis venientem Saxona velis.

As Stilicho is ſuppoſed to have appointed troops to guard the coaſts of Britain, and prevent the Saxons from making deſcents, ſo he may be likewiſe ſaid to have appointed a proper officer to command them, with the title of the count of the Saxon ſhore.

Britain, in his room [t]. Gratian, after a ſhort reign of four mounths, underwent the ſame fate, and was ſucceeded by Conſtantine, a common ſoldier, who was choſen merely for the ſake of his name, common to him with Conſtantine the Great. The new prince obliged the Scots and Picts to quit the Roman province, and retire beyond the two friths; which ſucceſs inſpiring him with a mighty opinion of his own merit and fortune, he formed a deſign of making himſelf maſter of the whole empire. With this view he paſſed over into Gaul, taking with him the few Roman forces that had been left here, and ſuch of the Britons as were able to bear arms. Of the ſucceſs that attended him at firſt in Gaul and Spain, and of his unhappy end, we have ſpoken at length in our Roman hiſtory, to which we refer the reader [u]. The unhappy Britons, thus leſt to themſelves after the departure of the Romans, and the flower of their youth, were more harraſſed than ever by the Scots, the Picts, and other northern nations, who, meeting with little or no oppoſition, broke into their country, and, putting all to fire and ſword, ſoon reduced them to a moſt miſerable condition. In this ſtate they continued from the year 407, when the uſurper Conſtantine paſſed over into Gaul, to 410, when, after having often implored in vain the emperor's aſſiſtance, they withdrew their obedience to Rome, ſays Zoſimus [x], and, being reſolved to defend themſelves with their own ſtrength, would no longer obey the laws of the empire. The emperor Honorius ſeemed to approve their conduct; for, by his letters, he permitted, and even adviſed, them to provide for their own ſafety [y]; which was an implicit act of reſigning the ſovereignty of the iſland, and releaſing of the inhabitants from their allegiance to the empire. This renunciation was made, according to Bede, a little after the taking of Rome by Alaric, in the year of the city 1164 [z], or rather 1163, for it is certain, that Rome was taken 410. The Britons, now again a free people, ſeem to have at firſt fought with ſucceſs againſt their antient and irreconcileable enemies the Scots and the Picts; for Zoſimus writes, that they delivered their cities from the inſults of a haughty enemy [a]. But being in the end overpowered, they had recourſe to the emperor, imploring his protection, and promiſing an intire and perpetual obedience to Rome, provided they were delivered from the tyranny and oppreſſion of their mercileſs enemies. Honorius, touched with compaſſion, ſent a legion to their relief; which, landing unexpectedly in Britain, cut in pieces great numbers of the Scots and Picts; and having obliged them to retire beyond the friths of Edinburgh and Dunbriton, they advised the natives to build a wall on the isthmus from sea to sea, and then returned to the continent, where their assistance was wanted to repulse the barbarians, breaking from all quarters into the empire. The Britons, without loss of time, applied themselves to the building of the wall; but as it was done only with turf, the barbarians broke it down in several places, and pouring in upon the territories of the Britons, like a torrent, committed more dreadful ravages than ever, destroying every thing with fire and sword [b]. This happened, according to the learned Usher [c], in 422, but, according to Alford [d], in 421 (S). The unhappy Britons, after many miseries and calamities, sent deputies anew to the emperor; who, appearing before him with their garments rent, and dust on their heads, prevailed upon him to send new forces to their relief. These, hastening into Britain, fell upon the barbarians, not in the least apprised of their arrival, and made a dreadful havock of them, while they were roving up and down the island in quest of booty [e]. This slaughter of the northern nations is placed by Usher in 426 [f], wherein he disagrees with Bede, who supposes it to have happened before the year 423, in which Honorius died [g]. The Scots and Picts being thus driven beyond the above-mentioned friths, the Romans, who had no ambitious view in assisting the distressed Britons, but were come over merely out of compassion and good nature, told them plainly, that they were to expect no further assistance from the emperor; that the troops he had now sent were ordered back to the continent, to make head against the barbarians, who extended their ravages to all parts of the empire; and that they were therefore obliged to take their last farewel of Britain, and intirely abandon the island. (S) Alford produces a medal of the emperor Honorius, with this legend on the reverse, Victoria Auggg. and thence concludes, that the slaughter of the Scots and Picts by the legion, which Honorius sent over, happened in the year of the christian æra, 421, the twenty seventh of Honorius's reign. The word Auggg. denotes, as he rightly observes, three emperors reigning at the same time. These were Honorius, Theodosius, and Constantius. Now, as Constantius was made emperor and died in the same year 421, the victory ascribed to the three emperors must necessarily have been gained in that year (12).

this declaration, Gallio of Ravenna, commander of the Roman troops, exhorted the Britons to defend themſelves for the future, by fighting manfully for their country, their wives, their children, and, what ought to be dearer than life itſelf, their liberty, againſt an enemy no ſtronger than themſelves, provided they would but lay aſide their fears, and exert their antient courage and reſolution. Not ſatisfied with encouraging them, that they might be the better able to withſtand the attacks of the enemy, he adviſed them to build a wall, not of turf, but of ſtone, offering them the aſſiſtance of his ſoldiers, and his own direction in the work. Hereupon the Britons, jointly with the Romans, fell to work, and carried on their new wall with ſuch diligence, that, though eight foot in breadth and twelve in height, it was ſoon finiſhed. This wall ſtood, ſays Bede [h], in the ſame place where Severus had built his, that is, according to the moſt probable opinion, as we have obſerved above, on the iſthmus between the two friths of Glota and Bodotria. They likewiſe built towers at convenient diſtances on the eaſt coaſt againſt the Saxons, and other barbarians, who, coming from Germany, made frequent deſcents on that ſide. The Roman commander, having thus ſecured the nation, employed the reſt of the time he continued in the iſland, in inſtructing the natives in the art of war; which when he had done, leaving among them patterns of the weapons he had taught them to make, after many encouraging exhortations, he with his Romans, took his laſt farewel of Britain, and telling the Britons, that they muſt expect their return no more, he croſſed over to the continent [i]. From this laſt departure of the Romans we may date the total deſertion of Britain by them, and the final period of the Roman empire in this iſland. As to the year, in which Britain was thus finally abandoned, there is a great diſagreement among chronologers, ſome placing the retreat of the Romans in 426, ſome in 435, or 437. According to Alford, Gallio returned to Gaul in 422, the twenty-eighth of Honorius's reign [k]. Bede, in his hiſtory, ſpeaks of the departure of the Romans as happening in 431 [l], but, in his chronicle, he ſeems to ſuppoſe it to have happened even before the year 423, and hence Alford places it in 422. The Britons, fought, as we have ſeen, for many years againſt the Romans, in defence of their liberty; and it was not without a great deal of bloodſhed that they ſubmitted to the yoke. But being in the end pleaſed with their ſervitude, and become, as it were, one nation with their conquerors, who had continued among them for the ſpace of four hundred years and upwards, they were no leſs unwilling to part with them, than they had been at firſt to receive them. This appears from the laſt meſſage they ſent to Aetius; but ſince it happened after the Romans had intirely abandoned the iſland, we ſhall refer the further relation of it to the following ſection.

SECT. III.

The hiſtory of Britain, from its deſertion by the Romans, to the invaſion of the Angles and Saxons.

The Scots and Picts break into the Britiſh territories.

THE Romans having abandoned Britain, with an intention to return no more, as we have related in the foregoing ſection, the Scots and Picts no ſooner heard of their departure, than landing in ſwarms from their leather veſſels on the lands of the Britons, they committed greater ravages than ever, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. Theſe two nations, differing ſomewhat in manners, but equally greedy of ſpoil and booty, ſeeing the cowardly Britons fly like ſheep before them, reſolved to attack the wall, which had been lately repaired, not doubting but they ſhould become maſters of it without great loſs, ſince it was defended by ſuch a faint-hearted enemy. At their approach, the Britons, inſtead of preparing for a vigorous defence, ſtood trembling on the battlements, till the enemy, more bold and active, pulling ſome of them down with long iron hooks, and driving the reſt, with ſhowers of darts and arrows from their ſtations, made themſelves maſters of the wall. The Britons betook themſelves to flight, which, however, could not ſave them; for the Scots and Picts, purſuing them cloſe, made a dreadful havock of the fugitives, and took poſſeſſion of the frontier towns, which they found deſerted by the inhabitants. As the enemy met with no oppoſition, they over-ran the whole country, putting all to fire and ſword without controul. This general havock and devaſtation bred a dreadful famine, which occaſioned new miſchiefs, and a kind of civil war among the Britons themſelves, obliged, for their ſupport, to plunder each other, and take from their friends the little the common enemy had left them. The whole country being thus ruined, the famine became general, and raged to ſuch a degree, that the Britons, who remained, were obliged to betake themſelves to the woods, and there live upon what they could get by hunting [a]. In this deplorable condition they continued ſome years. The

Britons

Britons had already kings of their own; for Gildas, in his uſual melancholy ſtrain, finds fault with his countrymen for raiſing to the throne ſuch only as were remarkable for their cruelty [b]. Perhaps they judged them beſt qualified to redreſs the diſorders, and put a ſtop to the robberies, that prevailed all over the iſland. The ſame author adds, that thoſe, who had raiſed them to the throne, cauſed them ſoon after to be murdered, not becauſe they had found them guilty of any crime, but that they might chuſe worſe men in their room. If any of their princes proved more mild and humane than the reſt, he was abhorred by all as a coward, and perſecuted as a public enemy [c]. The unhappy Britons, thus at variance among themſelves, and at the ſame time preſſed with famine, and purſued by a mercileſs enemy, had recourſe once more to the Romans for aſſiſtance, writing to Aetius, who was then conſul the third time, and governed the weſtern empire almoſt with an abſolute ſway. To move him to compaſſion, they directed the letter thus: The groans of the Britons to the conſul Aetius. And in the letter; The barbarians, ſaid they, drive us to the ſea, and the ſea forces us back to the barbarians, between which we have only the choice of two deaths, either to be ſwallowed up by the waves, or to be cruelly maſſacred by the enemy. What anſwer they received is uncertain; all we know is, that they could not prevail upon Aetius, who was then in Gaul, to lend them the leaſt aſſiſtance, the emperor Valentinian III. being then, as Uſher thinks, under apprehenſion of a war with Attila [d], who had not yet broken into the weſtern empire. The Britons, now deſpairing of any relief from the Romans, and, on the other hand, reduced to the utmoſt extremity by the famine, which increaſed daily, knew not what meaſures to take to free themſelves from their unfortunate circumſtances. Great numbers of them fled over to Armorica, where thoſe Britons, who attended Maximus into Gaul, are ſuppoſed to have ſettled [e]; others ſubmitted to the Scots and Picts, purchaſing a miſerable ſuſtenance with everlaſting ſlavery. Some, however, more reſolute, placing their confidence in God, ſays Gildas, ſince they found themſelves abandoned by men, betook themſelves to their arms; and ſallying out in parties from their woods and caves, fell upon the enemy, while they were roving up and down the country, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to retire. The Picts withdrew, in all likelihood, to the country about the wall, either abandoned by the Britons, or inhabited by ſuch of them as had ſubmitted to their new maſters.

sters. The Scots, as Usher conjectures [f], returned to Ireland, whence they originally came; but Gildas and Bede only tell us, that they returned home [g]. And now the Britons, having some respite, began anew to cultivate their lands; which, after having for some time lain fallow, produced all sorts of provisions in such plenty, as in no age had been remembered. This plenty was attended with luxury, wantonness, and all manner of vices incident to human nature; but what above all contributed to the immorality and irreligion, that prevailed all over the land, was, according to Gildas, the hatred of truth, and love of lies, evil being miscalled good, and good evil, and every thing transacted directly contrary to the common welfare and public safety. The clergy, who should have reclaimed the laity with their example, proved the ringleaders to every vice, being, for the most part, addicted to drunkenness, envy, contention, &c. and incapable of discerning between good and evil [h]. In the mean time, the Britons were alarmed anew with a report, that the Scots and Picts were returning with a greater force than ever, being determined utterly to extirpate the natives, and plant themselves in their room from one end of the island to the other. This report occasioned a general consternation, which, however, was not sufficient to reclaim them from their wicked ways, says Gildas; and therefore they were visited with a dreadful plague, which raging with uncommon fury, swept away most of those, whom the sword and famine had spared; insomuch, that the living were scarce sufficient to bury the dead. But this calamity likewise proving ineffectual, the contagion no sooner ceased, than the enemy, returning with incredible fury, and putting all to fire and sword, soon reduced the unhappy Britons to the utmost extremity. Vortigern was then the chief, if not the only, king of Britain, a proud, covetous, and debauched, tyrant, quite regardless of the public welfare, and no less incapable of promoting it in the field, than in the cabinet. However, being awaked by the clamours of the people, and finding it was absolutely necessary for his own preservation to repulse the enemy, he summoned a council, to deliberate with the chief men of the nation about the proper means to deliver the country from the calamities it then groaned under, and prevent the like misfortunes for the future. In this council, they all agreed, being, in a manner, infatuated, on the most pernicious expedient, that could be imagined, and what, in the end, proved the utter destruction of the nation, which was, to invite the Saxons into the island, a people at that time famous

(T) The firſt Saxon troops are ſaid, by moſt hiſtorians, to have landed in the year 449, though, by ſome, this event is placed a few years ſooner; by others, a few years later. Tyro Proſper ſuppoſes the Saxons to have been maſters of the iſland in 444, and conſequently to have landed many years before. But that writer was therein groſly miſtaken, as is manifeſt from Gildas, Bede, and all the hiſtorians, who ſpeak of this event. Bede places the arrival of the Saxons and Angles in the reign of Marcian, before the death of Valentinian III. that is, between the year 450 and 455, and ſeems to ſuppoſe the reſolution of the Britons to call them in to have been taken before the reign of Marcian; ſo that, according to Bede, their arrival may be well placed in 450, and in that year it is accordingly, by the learned Uſher, ſuppoſed to have happened (13).

(U) Witichind, a Saxon hiſtorian, who lived in the ninth century, in his hiſtory de geſtis Saxonum, introduces the Britiſh embaſſadors making the following ſpeech before an aſſembly of the Saxons: "Illuſtrious Saxons, the fame of your victories having reached our "ears, the diſtreſſed Britons, harraſſed by the continual inroads of "a neighbouring enemy, ſend us to implore your aſſiſtance. We "We have a fertile and ſpacious country, which we are commanded "to ſubmit to you. We have hitherto lived under the protection "of the Roman empire; but our antient maſters having abandoned "us, we know no nation more powerful than you, and better able "to protect us. We therefore recur to your valour. Forſake us "not in our diſtreſs, and we ſhall readily ſubmit to what terms you "yourſelves ſhall think fit to preſcribe to us." If the Britons made ſuch a frank ſurrender, and promiſed ſuch an abſolute ſubjection, as is inſinuated in this ſpeech, it is ſtrange, that neither Bede nor Ethelwerd, both Saxons, ſhould take any notice of it; nay, the latter writer tells us, that the Britons promiſed to live in perpetual friendſhip and amity with the Saxons; and friendſhip and amity are inconſiſtent with abſolute ſubjection. Beſides, when the Saxons, deſigning to make themſelves maſters of the iſland, wanted a pretence to quarrel with the natives, they did not urge the promiſe of the Britiſh embaſſadors, which they would certainly have done, had any ſuch promiſe been made, but alledged, for a pretence, their ſhort diet and bad pay, as Gildas tells us in expreſs terms; which plainly ſhews, that they came over only as mercenary ſoldiers.

more as they were foretold by their soothsayers, that they should plunder the country, to which they were called, for the space of an hundred and fifty years, and quietly possess it twice that time [k]. Having therefore fitted out three long ships, called in their language chiules, they put to sea, under the conduct of Hengist and Horsa, the sons of Witigisil, great-grandson to the celebrated Woden, from whom all the royal families of the Saxons pretended to derive their pedigree [l]. These, arriving at Ebbesfleet in the isle of Thanet, were received there both by the prince and people with the greatest demonstrations of joy. The isle itself was allotted them for their habitation, and a league was immediately concluded with them, in virtue of which the Saxons were to defend the Britons against all foreign enemies; and the Britons, on the other hand, to allow the Saxons, besides their place of abode, pay and maintenance. Historians have not told us, what the number was of these Saxon auxiliaries; but they could not be above fifteen hundred, since they all came over in three ships; and we cannot well suppose any of those ships to have carried above five hundred men. But, before we proceed farther in this history, it will be necessary to give some account of the origin, manners, government, and religion, of the people, who, being called in by the Britons to their assistance, made themselves masters of the island, and hold it to this day.

The arrival of the Saxons.

The Saxons were, according to the most probable opinion, a colony of the Cimbrians, that is, of the inhabitants of the Cimbrian Chersonesus, now Jutland; who, finding their country overstocked with people, sent out, much about the same time, three numerous bands to seek for new settlements. To one of these bands was afterwards given the name of Suevians, to another that of Franks, and to the third the name of Saxons. The Suevians took their route towards Italy, the Franks advanced to Belgic Gaul, and the Saxons possessed themselves of the whole country between the Rhine and the Elb; nay, by degrees, extending their conquests along the coast of the German ocean, when the Britons sent to implore their assistance, they were masters not only of the present Westphalia, Saxony, East and West Friseland, but likewise of Holland and Zealand. The first place they settled in, upon their leaving the Chersonesus, was the present dutchy of Holstein; which is thence called the antient seat of the Saxons. Between this country and the Chersonesus, or Jutland, dwelt a people, known, even in Tacitus's time, by the name of Angles *. According to this account, which we have copied from Bede [m], the Angles inhabited that ſmall province in the kingdom of Denmark and dutchy of Sleſwick, which is called at this day Angel, and of which the city of Flenſburgh is the metropolis. Lindebergius, in his epiſtles, ſtyles this country Little-England; and Ethelwerd, who wrote about the year 950, ſpeaking of the antient habitation of the Angles; Old Anglia, ſays he, lies between the Saxons and Giots. The metropolis of this country is by the Saxons called Sleſwick; but by the Danes Haithby. Britain took the name of thoſe, by whom it was conquered, and is therefore now called Anglia. The ſame writer adds, that Hengiſt and Horſa came from the country of the Angles into Britain [n]. When the Saxons came firſt out of the Cherſoneſus, going in queſt of new ſettlements, the Angles joined them, and, in proceſs of time, became one nation with them. Hence they are, by moſt authors, compriſed under the general name of Saxons, though ſome diſtinguiſh them by the compound name of Anglo-Saxons [o]. Some time after the Saxons, Franks, and Suevians, had left the Cherſoneſus, the Goths, having driven out the Cimbrians that were remaining, made themſelves maſters of that peninſula, which was thenceforth called Gothland or Jutland, from its new inhabitants the Goths or Jutes. Theſe, in the old printed copies of Bede, are ſtyled Vitæ; but the learned Uſher aſſures us, that all the manuſcript copies of that author, which he conſulted, read Jutæ, and not Vitæ [p]. Fabius Ethelwerd, whom we have mentioned above, a writer of the Saxon blood royal, and the fourth in deſcent from king Adulph or Ethelwolf, calls the country Giota, and the people Giotæ. Great numbers of theſe Giotæ or Jutæ, mixing with the Saxons and Angles, came over with them into Britain, to ſhare in their conqueſts. This is the moſt probable account of theſe people, after their ſettling in Jutland and Germany, that we have been able to gather from the ſeveral authors, who have ſtudied this ſubject. Of their origin, which Cluverius and Verſtegan derive from the Germans, but Gratius and Sherringham, with more probability, from the antient Getæ or Goths; of their various migrations before they ſettled in the Cimbrian Cherſoneſus, and their conqueſts under their ſeveral kings, eſpecially under the celebrated Woden, we ſhall ſpeak at length in the hiſtories of Sweden and Denmark. As the Saxons were, by their piracies on the coaſts of Gaul and Britain, better known at the time of their ſettling in this iſland, the conqueſt of Britain is, by the antient writers, aſcribed to them, and not to the Angles or Jutes; nay, Britain was, for ſome time, from them, called Saxony; but, in the end, the name of Anglia, from the Angles, prevailed. The Jutes were leſs known, at leaſt under that name, than the other two nations or tribes. Bede, however, tells us, that the province of Kent, the iſle of Wight, and the country lying over-againſt it, now Hampſhire, were peopled by the Jutes. As to the name of Saxons, it has occaſioned a great diſagreement among authors. Becanus and Camden ſuppoſe them to have been firſt called Sacaſons, that is, the ſons or deſcendants of the Sacæ, to whom, according to theſe writers, they owed their origin. But they are by no antient writer ſtyled Sacaſons, as Sherringham well obſerves, but Sacen or Saxons. Beſides, none of the antients ſpeak of colonies ſent by the Sacæ out of Aſia, where they dwelt, in the neighbourhood of the Caſpian ſea; but Strabo, on the contrary, tells us, that the whole nation of the Sacæ were to a man deſtroyed by the Perſians [q]. Iſidore derives their name from the Latin word ſaxum, a ſtone, becauſe they were a ſtrong and hardy nation. But they were ſo called many ages before the Romans had any knowledge of them, or they of the Romans. The opinion of Lipſius, which Verſtegan has followed, ſeems to us the moſt probable, viz. that the name of Saxons was given them by their neighbours, from their wearing a ſhort ſword, called in their tongue ſaex; and hence the arms of Saxony, as Pontanus obſerves [r], are to this day two daggers placed acroſs. As to the name of Angles, Saxo Grammaticus derives it from Angulus, ſon to Humblus, king of the Danes. But how the Angles came to borrow their name from a ſon of the king of Denmark, he has not thought fit to acquaint us. Widiſcind, a Saxon writer, will have the Angles to be ſo called from a certain iſland in the corner or angle of the ſea, which they ſubdued. But this, as well as all other etymologies deriving their name from the Latin tongue, ſeems to us altogether improbable, and foreign to the purpoſe, when we conſider, that the names of other German nations are not Latin, but German or Gothic. Goropius therefore derives the name of Angles from the Saxon word angel or engel, ſignifying a fiſhing-hook, the Angles, who lived on the ſea-coaſt, being, like the other Saxons, greatly addicted to piracy, and, on that account, ſtyled Angles by the neighbouring nations, as if, like hooks, they caught all that was in the ſea. Other derivations are brought by Aventinus and other etymologiſts. But as we have perhaps already dwelt too long upon conjectures, we ſhall now give a ſuccinct account of the manners, government, and religion, of the antient Saxons, our forefathers. The Saxons were, as is agreed on all hands, and appears from their conquests, one of the most warlike nations inhabiting Germany. They were not known to the Romans, by the name of Saxons, till the fourth century, Ammianus Marcellinus, and the poet Claudian, being the first Roman writers, who make mention of them. The former, speaking of them, says, they were formidable above all other enemies. And Zosimus, The Saxons are inured to the toils of war, and, for their courage and strength, reckoned the most warlike of all the German nations [s]. As they were a barbarous and uncivilized people, they treated their enemies with great cruelty, especially the prisoners they took in war, sacrificing them to their gods. As to their government, the countries subject to them were, according to Verstegan, divided into twelve provinces, each of which was governed by a chief or head, accountable to the general assembly of the nation. By this assembly a general was chosen in time of war, who commanded with almost a sovereign power; but his authority ceased as soon as the war was ended. Their religion was the same with that of the other northern nations. Their chief gods, the Sun, the Moon, the celebrated Woden, his son Thor, his wife Frigga or Fræa, Tuisto, Theutates, Hesus, Taranis, &c. The three last are mentioned by Lucan (W), as is Tuisto by Tacitus [t]. Woden was the god of war; Thor presided over the air, and was thought to have storms, winds, showers, and fair weather, at his disposal; Frigga was the goddess of pleasure. The two first days of the week were consecrated to the Sun and Moon; the third, according to some, to Tuisto or Tuisco, according to others, to Thysa or Dysa, the goddess of justice, and wife to Ther [u]; the fourth to Woden; the fifth to Thor; the sixth to Fregga or Fræa; and the seventh, as Verstegan supposes, to Crodo, named also Saeter; but the latter name, as Sheringham observes, is to be found in no writer before Verstegan [w]. The Saxons had, besides these, several other deities, to whom they paid great veneration, namely, the goddess Eostre, to whom they sacrificed in the month of April, which was thence by them styled Eostur monath, or the month of Eostre;

and thence the word Easter, which the Saxons retained even after their conversion to the christian religion, giving it to the solemn festival, which we celebrate in commemoration of our Saviour's resurrection [x]. Nocca was the same among the Saxons, as Neptune among the Romans. Mara was a frightful spectre, that terrified and oppressed people in their sleep; whence the word night-mare [y]. Tanfana, mentioned by Tacitus [z], was worshipped by the Saxons as the god of lots [a]. The Elvæ or Elfs, named also Fairies, were honoured by them with a kind of sacrifice called Alf-blot [b]. The Dysæ were inferior goddesses, the messengers of the great Woden, whose province it was to convey the souls of such as died in battle to his abode, called Valhall, that is, the hall of slaughter, where they were to drink with him and their other gods, cerevisia a kind of malt liquor, in the sculls of their slaughtered enemies (X). On the contrary, those who died a natural death, were, by the same Dysæ, conveyed to Hela, the goddess of hell, where they were tormented with hunger, thirst, and all kinds of evils [c].

Cicero writes that the Cimbrians envied those who fell in battle; but pitied the condition of such as died a natural death (16). Hence they went joyful to battle; but bemoaned their misfortune, when seized with any distemper, looking upon that kind of death as mean and inglorious (17). Lucan takes notice of this, as he styles it, philosophy of the northern nations, and calls it a happy error:

Certe populi, quos despicit Arctos,
Felices errore suo, quos ille timorum
Maximus, haud urget lethi metus; inde ruendi
In ferrum mens prona virís, animæque capaces
Mortis, & ignavum redituræ parcere vitæ (18).

The Angles worshipped, as we read in Tacitus the goddess Herthus, that is, the earth, as the mother of all things [d]. As to the worship the Saxons paid to their gods, and the sacrifices they offered to them, we refer our readers to Wormius, Verstegan, Isaacius Pontanus, and other German and Danish writers, it being now time to resume the thread of our history.

THE Saxons being arrived in Britain, under the conduct of Hengist and Horsa, as we have related above, and put in possession of the isle of Thanet, king Vortigern did not suffer them to continue long there without employment, but led them, soon after their arrival, against the Scots and Picts, who had made an irruption, and were advanced as far as Stanford in the province now called Lincolnshire. There a battle was fought, in which the Scots and Picts were utterly routed, and forced to save themselves by a precipitous flight, leaving the Saxons in possession of the spoil and booty they had taken [e]. Vortigern, highly pleased with the conduct of the two Saxon brothers, rewarded them with ample possessions in Lincolnshire [f], We are told, that Hengist desired here only as much land as an ox-hide could encompass, and that, upon Vortigern's granting him it, he cut the hide into small thongs, and inclosed with them a space large enough to hold a castle, which to this day is from thence called Thong-caster, that is, the castle of thongs [g]. Be that as it will, Hengist, taken with the fruitfulness and wealth of the island, and at the same time observing the inhabitants to be enervated with luxury and addicted to ease and idleness, began to entertain hopes of procuring a settlement in Britain. Having therefore first obtained Vortigern's consent, he sent home to acquaint his countrymen with the fruitfulness of the country and the effeminacy of the inhabitants, inviting them to share with him in his good success, of which he had not the least occasion to doubt. The Saxons, glad of the opportunity, readily complied with the invitation; and, arriving in seventeen large ships, made up, with those they found in the island, a considerable army. With this supply came over, if Nennius is to be credited, Rowena, the daughter of Hengist, with whose charms the king was so taken, that, divorcing his lawful wife, he married her, after having obtained the consent of her father, who pretended to be averse to the match, by investing him with the sovereignty of Kent [h]. Thus Nennius, and those who have copied from him. But no mention is made of Rowena in the Saxon annals, which rather seem to insinuate, that the Saxons made themselves masters of Kent by force of arms; for we are told there, that Hengist defeated the Britons in two pitched battles, and obliged them to abandon Kent, and retire to London. But this did not happen till the arrival of the third body of Saxon troops; for Hengist, by laying before the king, and exaggerating the dangers that threatened him, not only from the Scots and Picts, but from his discontented subjects, obtained leave to send for a new reinforcement of Saxons, who, coming over in forty ships, under the conduct of Octa and Ebusa, the son and nephew, or, as others will have it, the brother and nephew of Hengist, arrived at the Orcades; and having ravaged there, and all along the northern coast, the countries of the Scots and Picts, they made themselves masters of several places beyond the friths, and, in the end, obtained leave of the king to settle in Northumberland, under the specious pretence of securing the northern parts, as Hengist did the southern. Hengist, encroaching still on the king's favour, sent by degrees for more men and ships, till the countries from whence they came were almost left without inhabitants. And now their numbers being greatly increased, they began to quarrel with the natives, demanding larger allowances of corn and other provisions, and threatening, if their demands were not complied with, to break the league, and lay waste the whole country. The Britons, refusing them what they demanded, desired them to return home, since their numbers exceeded what they were able to maintain. This answer, however just and reasonable, provoked the Saxons to such a degree, that, having secretly concluded a peace with the Scots and Picts, they turned their arms against those whom they were come to defend, and, overrunning, without opposition, the whole island, destroyed all with fire and sword from the eastern to the western sea. The public, as well as the private, buildings were laid level with the ground; the cities pillaged and burnt; the priests slain at the altars; the bishops cruelly massacred, without the least respect to their dignity; and the people, without distinction of sex, age, or condition, butchered in such multitudes, that the living were scarce sufficient to bury the dead. Some of the unhappy Britons, who escaped the general slaughter, took refuge among the inaccessible rocks and mountains; but great numbers of them either perished with hunger, or were forced, by the extremity of famine, to abandon their asylum, and, delivering themselves up to their merciless enemies, preserve their lives at the expence of their liberty. Some, crossing the sea, took shelter among foreign nations, settling either in Holland, where the ruins of Brittenburgh, an old castle, built, as is supposed, by them on this occasion, are still to be seen, or among their countrymen in in Armorica (Y). But thoſe, who remained at home, ſuffered inexpreſſible calamities, living among the woods, rocks, and mountains, in perpetual apprehenſions and want of neceſſaries [i]. Nennius, tells us, that Vortigern was ſo far from being reclaimed by theſe calamities, that, on the contrary, adding to his other crimes that of inceſt, he married his own daughter, and had by her a ſon named Fauſtus, who led a ſolitary and religious life near the river Rennis in Glamorganſhire. The ſame writer adds, and after him Matthew of Weſtminſter, that the Britons, highly provoked at the king's wickedneſs, and the partiality he ſhewed to the Saxons, depoſed him, and raiſed to the throne his ſon Vortimer, who, as he was a brave and valiant youth, undertook the defence of his diſtreſſed country; and falling upon the Saxons with what troops he could aſſemble, drove them into the iſle of Thanet, and there kept them cloſely beſieged, till being reinforced with freſh ſupplies from Saxony, they opened themſelves a way through the Britiſh forces. But Vortimer, not yet diſheartened, fought with them four battles; the firſt on the banks of the Derwent in Kent, where he obtained a ſignal victory, and cut in pieces great numbers of the enemy; the ſecond at a place called in the Saxon tongue Epiſford, and in the Britiſh, Sagathenbail, now Aylesford in Kent. In this battle fell Horſa, and likewiſe Catigern, the brother of Vortigern. Some writers will have the Britons to have won the day [k], and others the Saxons [l]; nay, Ethelwerd ſeems to aſcribe to this victory the founding of the kingdom of Kent [m]. Horſa is ſuppoſed to have been buried at a place, called from him to this day Horſted; and Catigern near Aylesford, where a monument is to be ſeen ſomewhat like Stonehenge, called by the country people Kith's Coty-houſe, that is, Catigern's houſe [n]. The place where the third battle was fought is not mentioned; but we are told, that Vortimer engaged the Saxons the fourth time at a place called Lapis tituli, which Camden and Uſher take to be Stonar in the iſle of Thanet; but Somner [o] and Stillingfleet [p], inſtead of Lapis tituli, read Lapis populi, that is, Folkſtone, where, according to them, the battle was fought. In this battle the Saxons were routed with great ſlaughter, and forced back to their ſhips, on which they embarqued, being no longer able to withſtand the valour of Vortimer, and, abandoning the iſland, returned home, where they continued till the death of Vortimer, that is, for the ſpace of five years, without making any attempt upon Britain. Thus Nennius, and the hiſtorians who have copied from him. But of theſe battles no mention is made either by Gildas or Bede. The former writer only tells us, that the Saxons retired, which moſt of our hiſtorians underſtand of their returning home, though Gildas perhaps meant no more, than that, after having laid waſte the iſland, they withdrew to the territories, that had been granted them by Vortigern, that is, to Kent and Northumberland: and truly it ſeems to us altogether incredible, that, had the Britons gained ſo many ſignal victories, Gildas would have paſſed them all over in ſilence. Our hiſtorians tell us, that Vortimer died about this time, after a ſhort reign of ſix years; and add, that, upon his death-bed, he deſired his ſervants to bury him near the place where the Saxons uſed to land, being perſuaded, that the ſecret virtue of his bones would deter them from making any attempts there for the future; but they, neglecting his commands, buried him at Lincoln [q], or, as others will have it [r], at London. Some will have him to have been poiſoned by his mother-in-law Rowena [s]; others write, that he died a natural death [t]. Be that as it will, Hengiſt was no ſooner informed of his death, than he returned with a numerous body of Saxons to Britain; and, landing in ſpite of all oppoſition, fought ſeveral battles with the Britons, under the conduct of Vortigern, who, upon the death of his ſon Vortimer, was reſtored to the throne. In one of theſe battles, fought at a place called Crecanford, the Britons were overthrown, with the loſs of four thouſand men; which obliged them to abandon Kent and retire to London [u]. From this victory, moſt authors date the beginning of the kindom of Kent under Hengiſt, who took his ſon Eſk for his collegue. But Vortigern ſtill maintaining the war againſt the Saxons, Hengiſt had recourſe to treachery, and pretending a great deſire to conclude a peace, and renew the former amity between him and the Britiſh king, ſent embaſſadors to require an interview with him. To this propoſal Vortigern, after adviſing with his nobles, readily conſented, and it was agreed, that they ſhould meet at an entertainment without arms. But the treacherous Saxon having ſecretly ordered thoſe who attended him to take their daggers, and keep them in readineſs concealed under their garments, when they met, pursuant to the agreement, and the Britons, suspecting no treachery, began to be heated with wine, the Saxons, starting up at a signal given, and drawing their daggers, dispatched each of them his next man, to the number of three hundred, the flower of the British nobility. Vortigern alone was spared; but being taken prisoner, and put in fetters, he was forced, for his ransom, to surrender to the Saxons those provinces, that were afterwards called Essex, Sussex, and Middlesex. By this means the Saxons got such footing in the island, that they could never afterwards be driven out. Thus Nennius [w] and William of Malmesbury [x]. But of these transactions no mention is made either by Gildas or Bede. Vortigern, being set at liberty, retired, as we are told, to a vast wilderness near the fall of the Wye in Radnorshire, where he was, some time after, consumed by lightning, with the city Kaer Guortigern, which he had built there for his refuge [y]. Upon the retreat of Vortigern, Aurelius Ambrosius, or, as Gildas calls him, Ambrosius Aurelianus, took upon him the command of the British forces. He was a wise and modest man, says Gildas, and perhaps the only Roman that remained in the island, having, in the calamitous times of Britain, lost his parents who had worn the purple. Thus Gildas [z], without explaining himself farther. He adds, that the offspring of Aurelius continued still in the island in his time; but had greatly degenerated from the good qualities of their ancestors [a]. Bede writes, that his parents had borne the royal name and ensigns; but had been slain [b]. Neither Gildas nor Bede name his parents; which has given room to many conjectures, some maintaining him to have been the son of Constantine, who was chosen emperor by the Romans in Britain about the year 407 [c]. Of him and his son Constans, who was declared Cæsar in 408, we have spoken at length in our Roman history [d]. Others think he was descended from some of the British kings, who reigned in the island after the departure of the Romans; for it is manifest from Gildas, that the Britons had several kings at the same time. Matthew of Westminster tells us, that Ambrosius had fled, with his brother, Uterpendragus, whom others call Uther, into Armorica, to avoid falling into the hands of Vortigern, who, it seems, had usurped his right [e]; nay, some writers tell us, that the fear of Ambrosius induced Vortigern to call in the Saxons. Matthew of Westminster adds, that the Britons, no longer able to bear Vortigern, sent for Am- brosius and his brother; who, complying with their invitation, landed with a considerable body of men in the island; upon which Vortigern retired to the mountains of that part of Britain, which is now called Wales; and Ambrosius was declared king. But the great disagreement we find among the writers after Gildas and Bede, convinces us, that we cannot depend upon any thing they have related. All we can gather from the best authors is, that the Britons, under the conduct of Ambrosius, took courage, and falling upon the Saxons when most of their forces were returned home, routed them with great slaughter [f]. It was perhaps in this battle that Horsa was slain; for of the other battles mentioned above, no notice is taken either by Gildas or Bede. From this time, the war was carried on, says Bede [g], sometimes favourable to the Britons, and sometimes to the Saxons, till the latter made themselves masters of the whole island. Those, who have written several ages after Bede, give us a more particular account of the transactions of those dark times; but we will not take upon us to vouch the truth of what they relate. According to them, Ambrosius, after the above-mentioned victory, assembled the nobility at York; and having ordered the churches to be rebuilt or repaired throughout the kingdom, which had been destroyed by the Saxons, he marched from York to London, from London to Winchester, and from thence to Salisbury (Z), endeavouring every-where to restore the declining state of the church and kingdom [h]. In the mean time, Pascentius, Vortigern's third son, aspiring to the crown, raised a rebellion in the north; but was overcome and put to flight by Ambrosius, who nevertheless bestowed upon him Bualth in Brecknockshire, and Kaer-Guortigern in Radnorshire. After this, the Britons enjoyed some respite; but were, in the eighth year of Ambrosius's reign [i], worsted in a pitched battle by Hengist and his son Esk, who took a great booty.

(Y) Moſt of our hiſtorians ſuppoſe the Britons to have been ſettled in Armorica long before the arrival of the Saxons; but this ſuppoſition, as we ſhall ſhew anon, is not countenanced by the authority of any antient writer.

(Z) Geoffrey of Monmouth tells us, that, on this occasion, Ambrosius erected the famous monument known by the name of Stonehenge, in honour of the British nobles treacherously slain there, as he supposes, by Hengist. It is surprising, that any of our historians should have followed him, and yet Matthew of Westminster copies the main of his account; and Walter of Coventry sets it down as a thing not to be questioned, adding two circumstances to render it the more probable, viz. that Ambrosius was crowned, and not long after, buried there. Polydore Virgil supposes it to be the monument of Ambrosius; and John of Tinmouth calls it Mons Ambrosii.

booty [k]. No mention is made of any other battle fought, till four years after, when other Saxons coming over, under the conduct of Ella and his three ſons, Cymen, Wlencing, and Ciſſa, the Britons fell upon them as they were landing at a place called Cymenſhore, that is, Cymen's ſhore. The Saxons, ſays Huntington, who were tall, ſtrong, and vigorous, gave the Britons a warm reception; and having put them to flight as they advanced in ſtraggling parties, they purſued them to the foreſt of Andredeſleige, ſuppoſed to be the weald of Kent, and the woody parts of Suſſex [l]. After this victory, the Saxons poſſeſſed themſelves of all the ſea-coaſt of Suſſex, and continued to extend their dominions more and more till the ninth year after the arrival of Ella, when all the kings and princes of Britain, ſays Huntington, having united their forces, engaged Ella and his ſons at a place called Mercredeſburne. The victory, according to Henry of Huntington, remained doubtful, and both armies retired with great loſs [m]: but others will have the Saxons to have won the day. Ella, being greatly weakened by the loſs he had ſuſtained, ſent for freſh ſupplies, ſays the above-mentioned writer, out of his own country. In the mean time, Hengiſt, having raiſed and gariſoned ſeveral forts in Kent, marched with great expedition into the north, and, having joined there the Scots and Picts, took and fortified ſeveral towns. But Ambroſius, drawing together his forces, marched in queſt of the enemy, and coming up with them, gave them a total overthrow [n]. The following year 488, died Hengiſt king of Kent, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Eſk, called alſo Oiſc and Oſric, who reigned twenty-four years, without attempting to inlarge his dominions [o]. Some writers tell us, that Hengiſt was taken priſoner in the above-mentioned battle by Eldol duke of Claudioceſtria, and beheaded by him, purſuant to the ſentence which had been pronounced againſt him in a great council, at the inſtigation of Eldadus, brother to Eldol, and biſhop of Claudioceſtria, who declared, that, if the relt ſpared him, he would, with his own hands, cut him in pieces [p]. But this account is generally looked upon as an arrant fable (A).

On the other hand, the Britons, having raiſed a great army, advanced to the relief of the place, and, with frequent attacks, harraſſed the Saxons to ſuch a degree, that they were obliged to abandon the ſiege. Hereupon the Britons withdrew to the woods, nor caring to venture a battle; but the Saxons were no ſooner returned to the ſiege, than the Britons, ſallying out upon them anew, forced them to quit it. Thus the Saxons loſt great numbers of their men, and made but a ſmall progreſs in the ſiege. But Ella having at laſt divided his army into two bodies, one of which purſued without intermiſſion the ſiege, while the other obſerved the enemy's motions, the citizens, quite ſpent with hunger and fatigue, could no longer withſtand the efforts of the aggreſſors. The town was therefore taken, and by the mercileſs conquerors levelled with the ground, after they had put to the ſword all the inhabitants, without diſtinction of ſex or age. Such is the account Henry of Huntington gives us of this ſiege [q]. Thus in the year 491, three years after the death of Hengiſt, and thirty-four after the beginning of the kingdom of Kent, began the ſecond kingdom in the iſland, called the kingdom of the South Saxons, which compriſed at firſt only Suſſex, but was extended by Ella before his death, for he reigned twenty-four years, to all the provinces lying ſouth of the Humber [r]. News being carried into Germany of the good ſucceſs that attended the Saxons in Britain, new adventurers flocked over daily to ſhare with them their good fortune. Among the reſt came Cerdick, the tenth in deſcent from Woden, with his ſon Cenrick, and as many men as he could tranſport in five ſhips. Theſe landing at a place, which, from their leader, was called Cerdick's-ſhore, now, according to Brompton, Yarmouth in Norfolk, were vigorouſly attacked by the Britons, whom, after a ſhort engagement, they put to flight. Several other battles were fought; but fortune proving ever favourable to the Saxons, the natives were forced to retire, and leave them in poſſeſſion of the ſea-coaſts [s]. About ſix years after, Porta, another Saxon, with his two ſons Bleda and Magla, arrived at Portſmouth, ſo called, as ſome imagine, from him; and having defeated with great ſlaughter the Britons who attempted to oppoſe his landing, and killed a young Britiſh prince, who commanded them, he poſſeſſed himſelf of the neighbouring country [t]. But the progreſs made by Cerdick

moſt of all alarmed the Britons, and therefore, ſeven years after the arrival of Porta, and ſixty after the firſt coming of the Saxons, Nazaleod, whom Henry of Huntington ſtyles the greateſt of the Britiſh kings, aſſembled the whole ſtrength of Britain to put a ſtop to his conqueſts. On the other hand, Cerdick, aware of the danger that threatened him, had recourſe to Eſk king of Kent, to Ella king of the South Saxons, and to Porta and his ſons, who all ſent him powerful ſupplies. With theſe he advanced againſt the Britons, leading the right wing himſelf, and his ſon Cenrick the left. As the two armies drew near each other, Nazaleod, perceiving the enemy's right wing to be by far the ſtronger of the two, charged it with the flower of his army, and obliged Cerdick, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, to ſave himſelf by flight; but, as he was purſuing the fugitives with more heat than caution, Cenrick, falling upon his rear, renewed the battle with ſuch vigour, that the Britiſh army was utterly defeated, and Nazaleod himſelf ſlain, with five thouſand of his men [u]. Who this Nazaleod was, is much controverted: ſome think it may be the Britiſh name of Ambroſius, who, as Gildas informs us, fought, about this time, ſeveral battles with the Saxons; others will have it to be the name of his brother Uther Pendragon. But the ſtory of Uther Pendragon is now deemed a fable by all the Britiſh antiquaries. Matthew of Weſtminſter ſpeaks of Nazaleod, whom he calls Nathanlioth, not as a king, but only the general of Uther Pendragon, by whom he was ſent againſt the Saxons, who ſlew him, and fifteen thouſand of his men. But the Saxon annals, Ethelwerd, Florence of Worceſter, and Henry of Huntington, agree in diſtinguiſhing him with the title of king; nay, the latter writer ſtyles him the greateſt of the Britiſh kings. Uſher conjectures Uther and Nazaleod to be one and the ſame perſon, the ſurname of Uther, ſignifying in the Britiſh tongue terrible, having been given him on account of the great things atchieved by him [w]. But as this is the darkeſt period of the whole Britiſh hiſtory, our beſt antiquaries can alledge nothing but mere conjectures to clear it. It is even uncertain who ſucceeded Nazaleod. The Welſh annals leave an inter-regnum of about ſix years, and place the beginning of Arthur's reign in 514, or 515. The learned Uſher conjectures him to have been the ſon of Nazaleod, called alſo Uther. Some have doubted whether there ever was ſuch a perſon (B); but the generality of our hiſtorians

(B) The hiſtory of king Arthur has been ſo diſfigured, and interwoven with ſo many abſurd, ridiculous, and romantic, ſtories, that ſome hiſtorians not only agree, that there was ſuch a prince, but that he made a powerful reſiſtance againſt the Saxons. Some will have

ſome have doubted, whether there ever was ſuch a perſon as Arthur in the world. Among theſe, Milton alledges the following objections againſt Arthur: 1. That he is not ſo much as mentioned by Gildas, or any antient Britiſh hiſtorian, except Nennius, who lived three hundred years after him, and is allowed by all to have been a very credulous and trifling writer, and to have vented a great many fables. 2. Though William of Malmeſbury, and Henry of Huntington have both related his exploits, and his many victories over the Saxons, yet the latter took all he wrote concerning him from Nennius; and the former either from the ſame fabulous author, or from ſome monkiſh legends in the abbey of Glaſſenbury; for both theſe writers flouriſhed ſeveral centuries after Arthur, and conſequently knew no more of him, than we do at this day. 3. In the pretended hiſtory of Geoffrey of Monmouth, ſuch contradictions occur concerning this prince's victories, not only in Britain, but in France, Scotland, Ireland, Norway, Italy, and other countries, as are ſufficient to make us look upon him as a hero altogether fabulous and romantic. But theſe objections, however plauſible in appearance, are not of weight enough to convince us, that whatever has been written of king Arthur is quite fabulous; for, in the firſt place, his not being mentioned by Gildas does not at all ſeem ſtrange to us, ſince that author's deſign was not to write an exact hiſtory of his country, but only to give us a ſhort account of the cauſes of its ruin by the Scots, Picts, and Saxons, of which the chief was, according to him, the great wickedneſs of the Britons, and the general corruption of manners, that prevailed among them. On this he chiefly dwells, and from this ſubject no exploits of the princes, who then reigned, were capable of diverting him. Beſides, he only mentions thoſe princes, whoſe notorious wickedneſs ſeemed to draw down upon the unhappy Britons divine vengeance, expatiating upon the vices to which they were addicted, without taking the leaſt notice of their good qualities, or of the exploits, that were performed by them, or by others, tho' it is evident even from him, that the Saxons met with a vigorous oppoſition, and were often defeated by the Britiſh kings or commanders. As for Nennius, who lived about three hundred years after Arthur's time, allowing what is objected againſt him to be true, yet we cannot perſuade ourſelves, that the whole ſtory of Arthur, and the battles he fought, were a mere invention of his. We are rather inclined to believe, that he copied, at leaſt part of what he wrote, from other more antient authors, or perhaps from the general tradition of his countrymen at that time. It is true, the Saxon annals make no mention of this king, perhaps becauſe they could not do it, without tranſmitting to poſterity the many overthrows he gave the Saxon nation. But Radulphus de Dicto, one of our beſt and moſt antient Engliſh hiſtorians, ſpeaking of king Cerdick, mentions his fighting ſeveral battles with king have him to have been king of all Britain; while others confine his kingdom to Cornwall. Nennius, who lived about three hundred king Arthur. As for William of Malmesbury and Henry of Huntington, though neither of them perhaps knew any thing of Arthur, but what they learnt from Nennius, or the antient registers of Glassenbury, yet, in our opinion, they deserve some credit, since we cannot persuade ourselves, that those registers consisted merely of fables. William of Malmesbury himself owns, that the Britons had vented a great many fables concerning this prince; but adds, that he was a hero more worthy to be celebrated in true history, than in romance. The many stories, feigned and related of his exploits by the Britons or Welsh, encouraged Geoffrey of Monmouth to write many incredible fables of his conquests; but it does not thence follow, that whatever has been related of him must be fabulous; for a genuine history may be corrupted, and yet the substance of it remain true. If we therefore distinguish truth from falshood, and reject what savours too much of romance, we shall meet with nothing in the life of this hero unbecoming the character of a great prince. He was buried at Glassenbury in Somersetshire, and his coffin was dug up in the reign of Henry II. with this inscription on it in Gothic characters, Hic jacet sepultus inclytus rex Arturius in insula Avalonia. We are told that the following account of this discovery was hung up in the monastery of Glassenbury, and was to be seen there till the dissolution of the said monastery: In this island, which is called the island of Avalonia, nay, in this burying-place of saints at Glastenbury, rest the renowned king Arthur, the flower of the British kings, and Guenhumara his queen, who, departing this life, were honourably interred near the old church, between two stone pyramids, where they lay many years till the time of Henry de Soili, who was abbot of the place after the burning of the said church. This abbot, being importuned by many persons, ordered some to dig between the pyramids for the bodies of the above-mentioned king and queen. Having dug very deep, they at length discovered a great wooden coffin close shut, which they opened, and found in it the king's body, with a leaden cross, on which was the following inscription, Here lies buried the renowned king Arthur in the island Avalonia. Then they opened the queen's grave, and found her lying with her hair dishevelled, as if she had been but just buried; which, however, fell to ashes as soon as touched. The abbot and convent, with great joy, took thence their remains, and placed them in the greater church in a tomb, which was cut in a rock, and divided into two parts, the king's body being by itself at the head of the tomb, and the queen's in the eastern part of it. On the tomb were engraved their several epitaphs (19). The abbot, by whom these bodies were discovered, was not, as Leland supposes, Henricus Blaisensis, nephew to Henry I. but Henricus Soliacensis, or Henry de Soily, or Sully, who hundred years after him, tells us, that he overthrew the Saxons in no fewer than twelve battles. The firſt of theſe was fought near the mouth of a certain river, called Glein, or Gleni, placed by ſome in Devonſhire; by others in Lincolnſhire: the ſecond, third, fourth, and fifth, near the river Duglas, in the country of Linvis or Linnis. This river ſome ſuppoſe to be the Dug or Duc in Lincolnſhire; others the Dugles near Wigan in Lancaſhire. The ſixth battle was fought on the banks of a river called Baſſas, ſuppoſed by ſome to run by the town of Boſton in Lincolnſhire; the ſeventh in the wood of Chelidon, called in the Britiſh language Cattoit Celidon. Matthew of Weſtminſter gives us a very particular account of this battle; but, in our opinion, ſo fabulous, that it does not deſerve a place in hiſtory [y]. The eighth battle was near the caſtle of Suinnion; the ninth near the city of Lergis or Leogis, called in the Britiſh tongue Kaer-leon; the tenth in the neighbourhood of the was made abbot after the burning of the church of Glaſſenbury in 1184, was afterwards raiſed to the biſhoprick of Worceſter, and died in 1195. The epitaphs, which he cauſed to be engraved on the monuments of king Arthur and his queen, were as follows:

Hic jacet Arthurus, flos regum, gloria regni, Quem mores, probitas, commendant laude perenni.

Arthuri jacet hic conjux tumulata ſecunda,
Quæ meruit cælos virtutum prole ſecunda.

We are told, that, in the king's body, were plainly ſeen the marks of ten wounds, whereof one only ſeemed mortal. What Giraldus Cambrenſis writes of his ſtature, and the dimenſions of his body, is unqueſtionably fabulous. The leaden croſs was preſerved in the treaſury of the church of Glaſſenbury, till the diſſolution of that monaſtery and there ſeen and carefully viewed by Leland (20). His tomb was diſcovered in the reign of Henry II. about the year 1189, that is, ſix hundred years after his death. So great was the love and eſteem of the Britons for this hero, that, for ſeveral ages, he was thought by many to be ſtill alive: nay, this notion, as our hiſtorians aſſure us, was not intirely rooted out, till his tomb was diſcovered. It was this perhaps that gave occaſion to the many fables, that have been invented concerning Arthur's travels, and his numberleſs victories in foreign countries. To conclude, had this renowned hero of the Britiſh nation been leſs celebrated by romantic writers, no one perhaps would have queſtioned the truth of what has been related concerning his noble deeds by more grave hiſtorians.

river Ribrot or Arderic; the eleventh on the hill Brenion, supposed to be somewhere in Somersetshire; and the twelfth on the hill of Badon. Gale thinks these battles were fought in the space of forty years, under Vortigern, Ambrosius, and others, though they have been all ascribed to Arthur. Cerdick, having sustained great losses in the many battles that were fought with the Britons, sent over to Germany for new supplies; which arriving in three ships, under the conduct of Stuf and Witgar, his two nephews, landed at Cerdickshore, where they were attacked by the Britons, whom they put to flight, Henry of Huntington, who describes this battle at length, tells us, that the British forces were drawn up on the side of a hill, and likewise in a valley, which at first frightened the new-comers; but recovering themselves from their consternation, they fell with great resolution upon the Britons, and put them to flight [z]. In this year 514, died Esk, the son of Hengist, and second king of Kent, and was succeeded by his son Otta, who reigned twenty-two years; but performed nothing worthy of notice [a]. The same year died, as we are told by Henry of Huntington, Ella, the first king of the South Saxons, having reigned twenty-four years. Cissa, his youngest son, succeeded him, the other two, who came over with him, being, in all likelihood, dead before him. Cissa is supposed to have built Chichester, called in the Saxon language the city of Cissa. About this time Cerdick, after he had been twenty-four years in the island, and made himself master of a very large territory, took upon him the title of king, and founded the third kingdom in the nation, called the kingdom of the West Saxons, comprehending the counties of Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Wiltshire, Hampshire, and Berkshire, to which was afterwards added Cornwall. In subduing these countries, Cerdick, though reinforced with continual supplies from Germany, spent twenty-four years; which shews, that the Britons did not tamely part with their territories, but, being overpowered with numbers, were forced, after a long and vigorous resistance, to quit them. The same year that Cerdic assumed the regal title, he fought a battle with the Britons at a place called Cerdick's-ford, supposed to be Charford in Hampshire. The account Henry of Huntington gives us of this battle is very advantageous to the Saxons; but upon what grounds he gives it, we know not, since the Saxon annals only tell us, that from this time forward, the royal offspring, meaning the off-spring of Cerdick, reigned over the West Saxons; which seems indeed to imply, that Cerdick won the day, and, by this victory, secured the crown to his posterity. No mention is made of Cerdick till seven years after this battle, when we find him again engaged with the Britons at a place called Cerdick's-lea, or Cerdick's-league, supposed to be Cherdley in Buckinghamshire[b]; but whether the Saxons conquered, or the Britons, we are no-where told. All we know from the annals is, that, after this battle, Cerdick reduced the isle of Wight; a convincing proof, that the battle had proved favourable to him. He is said to have granted the isle of Wight to Stuf and Witgar, his two nephews, who put to the sword an incredible number of the inhabitants at a place, called from the latter, Witgaraburg, and now, by contraction, Caresbroke. Of these battles Henry of Huntington gives us very particular accounts; but as we are convinced he did not copy them from any authentic or credible authors, we forbear descending with him to particulars. But that we may not rely altogether on the Saxon annals, nor those authors, who have written long after the things they relate had happened, Gildas, a writer of unquestionable authority, who lived in those times, tells us, that a great battle was fought on Badon-hill, supposed to be Bansdown near Bath, in which the Saxons were utterly routed by the Britons[c]. This battle is said by Nennius, and after him by most of our historians, to be the last of the twelve fought by king Arthur. There are not, however, wanting some, who maintain, that this battle was fought in the reign of Ambrosius; but, at the same time, they ascribe the victory to the valour and conduct of Arthur, who commanded the Britons as general to Ambrosius. In this battle the Saxons received such an overthrow, that, for many years, they forbore molesting the Britons. It was fought, according to the best British manuscripts, in the year 520, though some place it in 493, and others even before the year 491. Be that as it will, the Britons, it seems, still enjoyed the peace and tranquillity which so signal a victory produced, when Gildas wrote his account of the destruction of Britain, that is, forty-four years after the battle was fought. This seems the most natural sense of the obscure words of Gildas[d], tho' Bede understood him as if he had meant, that the battle was fought forty-four years after the first coming of the Saxons[e]; whence, in his chronicle, he places it in the reign of the emperor Zeno, who died in 491[f]. But, notwithstanding the peace which the Britons enjoyed, the Saxons, who were continually flocking over, and making new encroachments, founded, according to the Saxon annals, in the year 527, a fourth kingdom, called the kingdom of the East Saxons, compriſing Eſſex, Middleſex, and part of Hertfordſhire. This kingdom was begun by Erchenwin, deſcended from one Saxnat. To Erchenwin ſucceeded, according to Henry of Huntington, his ſon Sleda, whom William of Malmeſbury makes the firſt of the East Saxon kings, and the tenth from Woden. About fifteen years after the founding of the East Saxon kingdom, that is, near the year 542, the great king Arthur is ſuppoſed to have died, and to have been ſucceeded by his kinſman Conſtantine; but the moſt antient Britiſh chronicles leave an inter-regnum of near eleven years, without ſo much as mentioning Conſtantine. In the year 547, Ida, the tenth by deſcent from Woden, founded the fifth kingdom in this iſland, called the kingdom of Northumberland, as it compriſed that part of the Britiſh provinces, that lies north of the Humber. Otta and Ebuſa had, at the requeſt of Hengiſt, as we have related above, been allowed by Vortigern to ſettle in thoſe parts, under pretence of making war on the Scots and Picts, and ſecuring the northern provinces againſt their incurſions. This they effected; but having at the ſame time driven out the antient inhabitants, they ſeized on thoſe countries for themſelves, and held them as inferior governors and vaſſals to the kings of Kent. This moderation, ſays our hiſtorian [g], deſcended to their poſterity; ſo that, for the ſpace of an hundred years, the princes of Northumberland continued ſubject to the kings of Kent. But this year 547, the principality was changed into a kingdom, Ida, a perſon no leſs famous for his virtues than for his birth, aſſuming the title of king of Northumberland. This proved a powerful kingdom; for it comprehended all Yorkſhire, Lancaſhire, Durham, Cumberland, Weſtmorland, and Northumberland, with part of Scotland, as far as Edinburgh frith. Ida was not, according to Matthew of Weſtminſter, ſon to any of thoſe princes, who governed Northumberland before it became a kingdom, but an adventurer come lately out of Germany, and raiſed to the throne, in regard of his extraordinary merit. He reigned about twelve years with great applauſe, and built a town, which he called, as Bede ſeems to inſinuate [h], Bebanburgh, now Bamborough in Northumberland, from his wife Bebba. Upon his death, the kingdom of the Northumbrians was divided into two, whereof the one, lying ſouth of the Tine, was called Deira, and the other, extending from that river to Edinburgh frith, Bernicia.

Saxons

Saxons themſelves, claiming, as king of the moſt antient Saxon kingdom, a kind of right over the reſt. This claim he attempted to ſupport by dint of arms; but, being twice defeated, he, who at firſt was formidable, became in a ſhort time time, in a manner contemptible; for Keaulin, king of the Weſt Saxons, and his ſon Cutha, having purſued him into his own dominions, ſlew at Wibbandun, Oſlac and Cnebba, two of his chief commanders. By means of theſe civil conteſts, among the Saxons, but chiefly by the late victory gained on Badon-hill, the Britons lived, at leaſt for the ſpace of forty-four years, unmoleſted by their common enemy. But the peace they enjoyed proved more deſtructive to them than any war; for though thoſe who had felt the calamities that had befallen their nation, acknowledged themſelves, by their chriſtian and regular lives, indebted to Heaven for their deliverance; yet the next generation, unacquainted with paſt evils, and only ſenſible of their preſent eaſe, abandoned themſelves to all manner of vice and debauchery to ſuch a degree, that the principles of truth and juſtice being totally ſubverted, ſcarce any footſteps of them remained either in the clergy or laity, in the people or their princes; ſo that they became odious, as Gildas informs us, to all the neighbouring nations. But how far injuſtice, irreligion, and immorality, prevailed amongſt all ranks of men, will better appear from that writer's own words. And to begin with the kings, who then reigned in Britain, he thus reproves them in the epiſtle, which he wrote while living in Armorica out of their reach. Britain, ſays he, has kings, but tyrants; judges, but ſuch as prey upon the innocent; the kings have wives, but abandon themſelves to harlots; they ſwear oft, but perjure themſelves; they wage war, but an unjuſt and civil war; they puniſh thieves, yet have the greateſt near them, even at their own tables; they ſit in the ſeat of judgment, but ſeldom obſerve the rules of right judgment; they proudly overlook the modeſt and harmleſs, but countenance the audacious, though guilty of moſt abominable crimes; they fill their priſons, but with men whom they have committed rather out of malice, than for any crime. He then proceeds to each king in particular, beginning with Conſtantine then reigning in Cornwall and Devonſhire, whom he calls the tyrannical whelp of an impure Damonian lioneſs, and charges with the murder of two innocent youths of the blood royal, whom he aſſaſſinated in their mother's arms at the very altar, and under the cope of the holy abbot. He likewiſe inveighs againſt this prince, as one that was polluted with many adulteries, and had put away his lawful wife. In the next place, he reproaches Aurelius Conanus with adulteries, with parricide, and greater cruelties than the former was guilty of. He adds, that this prince, hating the peace of his country, had, for the ſake ſake of booty and prey, fomented civil wars. Where Aurelius Conanus reigned, is not expreſſed; but his condition was not, it ſeems, very proſperous; for Gildas wiſhes, that, being now left alone, like a tree withering in the midſt of a barren foreſt, he may call to mind the pride and arrogance of his father and elder brothers, who came all to untimely deaths. In the third place, he applies himſelf to Vortipore, whom he calls the wicked ſon of a good father, and the tyrant of Demetia or South Wales. He upbraids him, though ſtricken in years, with adulteries, with falſhood, and cruelty in governing. In his latter days he put away his wife, and, if we miſtake not the meaning of Gildas, was guilty of inceſt with his daughter. In the next place, our author comes to Cuneglaſus, ſuppoſed by ſome antiquaries to have reigned in North Wales: him he reproves for raiſing civil wars, for divorcing his wife, and marrying her couſin, who had vowed perpetual chaſtity; he was a great enemy to the clergy, high-minded, and truſting to his riches. Gildas concludes with a ſharp reproof Maglocunus, the greateſt, and likewiſe the moſt wicked, of all the Britiſh princes. He had driven out or ſlain many other kings or tyrants, and is called by our author the iſland dragon. He was tall in ſtature, a great warrior, and profuſe in his gifts. While he was yet young, he overthrew his uncle in battle, and drove him from the throne; then, touched with remorſe, he betook himſelf to a monaſtic life, which he ſoon forſook, as he did afterwards his wife, taking the wife of his brother's ſon in her room, who, to prevent her marriage being deemed null or unlawful, found means to diſpatch her own huſband, and Maglocunus's former wife. This is the ſubſtance of Gildas's reproof to the Britiſh kings, from which, all we can gather is, that there were, at this time, at leaſt five kings in Britain, and all guilty of moſt enormous crimes; but by what means they came to the crown, what great actions they performed during their reigns, who ſucceeded each of them in their reſpective territories, &c. we are not told by any authentic writer. From the kings our author paſſes to the clergy, whom he ſharply reproves as paſtors in name, but in reality wolves, intent, on all occaſions, not to feed the flock, but to pamper themſelves; not called to the miniſtry, but ſeizing it as a trade; teaching the people, not by ſound doctrine, but by evil example; haters of truth, broachers of lies; looking on the poor with an eye of contempt, but fawning on the rich, however wicked; great promoters of other people's alms, but themſelves ever contributing leaſt; ſeldom officiating at the altar, and ſcarce ever with pure hearts; ſlightly touching the reigning vices of the age, but highly aggravating their own injuries, as done to Chriſt himſelf; ſeeking preferments in the church, church, more than Heaven; ignorant of the doctrines contained in the holy ſcriptures, but cunning and practiſed in worldly matters; bearing their heads high, but having their thoughts and affections abject and low. He likewiſe taxes them as gluttons, drunkards, and, above all, as guilty of the enormous ſin of ſimony; and then addreſſes the laity thus: What can you expect, unhappy people, from theſe beaſts, all belly? Shall they reclaim you, who weary themſelves in committing iniquity? Shall you ſee with their eyes, which are open only to gain? Leave them rather, leſt you fall both blindfold into perdition. But are all thus? Perhaps not all, or not ſo groſly; but what did it avail Eli to be himſelf blameleſs, while he connived at the wickedneſs of his ſons, &c. Our author at the end of his hiſtory, gives a further account of the ſad ſtate of affairs, and general corruption of manners, in thoſe times; and complains, that the cities and towns were not inhabited as formerly, but lay in a ſtate of ruin and deſolation; for foreign wars being ceaſed, civil wars broke out, which brought all things to a moſt deplorable condition. Such was the ſtate of the government and religion among the Britons during the peace, which was produced by the victory on Badon-hill, and laſted till the time Gildas wrote, that is, for the ſpace of about forty-four years.

And of the clergy.

The ſixth Saxon kingdom. The Eaſt Angles.

Not long after, that this, about the year 575, began, as is ſuppoſed, for the year is not ſet down in the Saxon annals, or any other hiſtory, the kingdom of the Eaſt Angles, compriſing the countries we now call Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridgeſhire, and the iſle of Ely. It was founded by Uffa, the eighth from Woden, though there were, it ſeems, before him, ſeveral petty princes, who had ſettled in Norfolk and Suffolk; but Uffa, more powerful than they, drove them all out, and reigned alone with ſuch reputation, that, from him, the ſucceeding kings were called Uffingæ[i]. William of Malmeſbury, diſagreeing with all other writers, ſuppoſes this kingdom to have begun before that of the Weſt Saxons. And now the Saxons, who had been, ever ſince the battle on Badon-hill, either inactive, or engaged in civil wars and quarrels among themſelves, began afreſh to harraſs the Britons, and, in a few years, drove them out of all the countries they held in that part of the iſland, which is now known by the name of England; for Cuthwulf, the brother of Ceaulin, king of the Weſt Saxons, having defeated the Britons at Bedanford, now Bedford, the head of the adjacent province, ſays Henry of Huntington, he took from them four towns, viz. Liganburgh, now Loughborough in Leiceſterſhire, or, as others will have it, Leighton in Bedfordſhire; Egleſburg, now Aileſbury in Buckinghamſhire, with Bennington and Igneſham, now Benſon and Eveſham in Oxfordſhire. Cuthwulf died the ſame year he obtained this victory. For the ſpace of ſix years after, we hear of no action, as if Ceaulin had had no commander to place in his brother's room. But, after that time, he renewed the war, and having, with his ſon Cuthwin, engaged the Britons at a place in Glouceſterſhire, called Deorham, he ſlew three of their kings, Comail, Condidan, and Farinmaile, and took three of their chief cities, viz. Glewanceſter, or Glouceſter, Cirenceſter, and Bathanceſter, now Bath. Who theſe kings were, we are no-where told; but ſome conjecture the firſt to be Cuniglaſus, and the ſecond Aurelius Conanus, both mentioned by Gildas. We read of no other battle between the Saxons and Britons, though in all likelihood, ſeveral ſkirmiſhes happened, till ſeven years after the battle of Deorham, when Ceaulin and his ſon Cutha fought againſt the Britons at a place called Frethanleag. In this battle Cutha was ſlain, and the Saxons obliged, according to Henry of Huntingdon, to retire; but freſh ſuccours ſeaſonably arriving, they returned to the charge, routed the Britons, and took ſeveral towns [k]. About this time, that is, about the year 585, according to Henry of Huntingdon and Matthew of Weſtminſter, was founded by Crida, the ſeventh kingdom in this iſland, called the kingdom of Mercia. Whence it took that name, is uncertain, ſome deriving it from the river Merſe, which, running between Cheſhire and Lancaſhire, was the north-weſt boundary of the Mercian kingdom [l]. Others will have it to have been ſo called from the Saxon word meark, ſignifying a limit; becauſe moſt of the other kingdoms bordered upon it [m]. Be that as it will, this kingdom, though the laſt erected, was one of the largeſt of the Engliſh Saxon kingdoms, and one of the laſt, that was conquered by the Weſt Saxons. It comprehended ſeventeen counties, viz. Glouceſterſhire, Herefordſhire, Worceſterſhire, Warwickſhire, Leiceſterſhire, Rutlandſhire, Northamptonſhire, Lincolnſhire, Huntingtonſhire, Bedfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Oxfordſhire, Staffordſhire, Shropſhire, Nottinghamſhire, Derbyſhire, Cheſhire, and part of Hertfordſhire. The Britons were now confined within very narrow bounds. However, before they abandoned all on this ſide of the mountains, they once more engaged the Saxons at a place called Woden's Bearth near the ditch in Wiltſhire, which, by the neighbouring people, is called Wanſdike, and in the Saxon tongue Wodinſdic, or the dyke of Woden, and, running through the middle of the country, divides it from eaſt to weſt.

This battle proved very bloody; but who were the generals on either side, we are no-where told. Henry of Huntington only writes, that the Britons having drawn up their army after the Roman manner, the Saxons charged them with their usual boldness. Hereupon a sharp engagement ensued, adds that writer, in which God gave the victory to the Britons; for the Saxons were routed, and almost their whole army cut off[n].

The Britons gain a complete victory over the Saxons.

In this battle, the Britons were assisted, according to William of Malmesbury, by the Angles, jealous of the overgrown power of Ceaulin, king of the West Saxons, whose military genius and great exploits had struck terror into the Angles, as well as the Britons. But, after the loss of this battle, he was driven out of his dominions, and forced to take refuge in some other kingdom; but whether in this island, or elsewhere, is not recorded in history. From this victory the Britons reaped but little advantage; for being daily more confined, and harrassed on one side by the Scots and Picts, and on the other by the Saxons, they were, in the end, obliged to abandon their antient seats, and take shelter among the craggy and mountainous places in the west of the island; whither their cruel enemies could not easily pursue them. There they long continued a warlike nation, defending their liberty, and, though separated from the Saxons by a deep ditch, the work of Offa king of the Mercians, making frequent inroads into the Saxon, or, as we may now style them, the English, territories, where they put all to fire and sword. They had been attended with far better success, had they not been continually quarrelling among themselves; which was chiefly owing to the ambitious and restless humours of the petty princes, or rather tyrants, by whom they were governed. Some of the unhappy Britons took refuge, as we have said just now, in that part of the island, which the Latins called Cambria, and the English, after the German custom, Wales; for the Germans, as the learned antiquary Humphry Lhuyd well observes, calling the strangers that lived near them on one side Gauls or Walls, gave afterwards the same appellation to all strangers; and hence, according to that writer, the Walloons in the Low Countries, and the Wallachians on the Danube, received their denominations. The Britons, upon their retiring into Cambria or Wales, divided that country, as we read in the same author, into six regions, Guynedh, Powys, Dehenbarth, Reynuc, Esyluc or Sylluc, and Morganuc or Morgan. Each of these regions or districts was governed by its own king till the year 843, when Roderic the Great became sole monarch of Cambria or Wales, which, at his death, he divided among his three ſons, as we ſhall relate at length in a more proper place. Some of the Britons were driven into Cornwall; others, according to the learned antiquary, whom we have quoted above, ſettled in the moſt ſouthern parts of Scotland, and in the neighbourhood of Carliſle, and continued there till the year 871, when they were driven out by the Scots and Engliſh, and forced to take ſhelter among their countrymen in that part of Cambria or Wales, which by the Latin writers is ſtyled Venedotia, and by us North Wales. The Britons at firſt poſſeſſed all the countries beyond the Dee and the Severn, which two rivers, in antient times, divided Cambria or Wales from England, the towns, which ſtand on the eaſtern banks of theſe two rivers, having been moſt of them built to reſtrain the Cambrians or Welſh from breaking into England. But the Engliſh, having paſſed the Severn, by degrees ſeized on the country lying between that river and the Wye; ſo that all Herefordſhire, and that tract, which was antiently called the Daniſh-wood, with Glouceſterſhire, and ſuch parts of Worceſterſhire and Shropſhire, as lie beyond the Severn, are ſtill inhabited by the Engliſh; nay, in former times, ſome parts of Flintſhire and Denbighſhire were ſubject to the kings of Mercia; for Uffa, the moſt powerful king of that country, cauſed a deep ditch, with a high wall, to be carried on as a barrier between his dominions and the territories of the Cambrians, from the mouth of the Dee, a little above Flint-caſtle, over ſteep mountains, croſs deep valleys, fens, and rivers, to the mouth of the Wye. This ditch, called by the Welſh to this day Claudh Uffa, or the ditch of Uffa, is ſtill to be ſeen in ſeveral parts; and all the towns, ſituated on the eaſt ſide of it, have names ending in ton or ham, an evident proof, that they were inhabited by Saxons; nay, the inhabitants of them are by the Welſh ſtill called Guyr y Mers, that is, the men of Mercia. Thus far of the places, into which the diſtreſſed Britons were driven within the iſland. But Gildas tells us, that ſome of them, committing themſelves to the mercy of the waves, ſought for ſhelter beyond the ſea; and it is the general opinion, that they fled to their countrymen in Armorica. That ſome Britons had ſettled in Armorica, now Bretagne, before this time, is paſt diſpute, though there is a great diſagreement among authors as to the preciſe time of their firſt ſettling there. The firſt mention we find of the Britons in Armorica is in the year 461, when Manſuetus, biſhop of the Britons, ſubſcribed, among the other prelates of Gaul and Armorica, to the articles eſtabliſhed in the firſt council of Tours [a]. It is manifeſt from Sidonius Apollina-

ris, that, in 469, they were already ſettled on the banks of the Loire [p]. About the year 470, the Britons in Armorica had a king of their own, named Riothamus, who, at the requeſt of the emperor Anthemius, marched at the head of twelve thouſand men againſt Euric, king of the Viſigoths, but was defeated by that prince in the province of Berri [q]. Sidonius Apollinaris highly commends the moderation of Riothamus; but ſpeaks of his men in ſuch terms, as ſhew, that they were not at all mended by the calamities they had ſuffered at home. Sidonius, after he was made biſhop, had often occaſion to complain of them to their prince [r]. An anonymous writer, who was a native of Armorica, and wrote the life of St. Wingalof, not long after the Saxons had made themſelves maſters of Britain, tells us, that the Britons, embarking on floats, arrived in Armorica, being driven out of their native ſoil by the Saxons, a fierce and barbarous nation. He adds, that the Britons, being worn out with misfortunes and fatigues, continued quiet for a while, without engaging in any wars [s]. The Britons are ſaid to have paſſed over to, and ſettled in, Armorica at three different times, viz. in the reign of Conſtantius Chlorus, the father of Conſtantine the Great, during the uſurpation of Maximus, and when the Saxons made themſelves maſters of the iſland. No antient hiſtorian makes any mention of their ſettling in that country, either in the reign of Conſtantius or of Maximus; which gives us room to queſtion the truth of what the moderns have written on that head. All we know for certain is, that the Britons were ſettled in that part of Gaul, which, from them, was called Britanny, before the Saxons and Angles made themſelves maſters of the whole country now called England. William of Malmeſbury writes, that the Britons, who went over with the tyrant Maximus, were, for their faithful ſervices, rewarded with lands in Gaul on the ſhore of the ocean; but others maintain, that, before the Saxon invaſion, no Britons had ſettled in Gaul; which opinion ſeems to us by far the moſt probable, ſince, by the antient and moſt credible hiſtorians, frequent mention is made of the Britons in Gaul after, and none before, the coming of the Saxons. The Britons, who ſettled in Armorica, having, by degrees, got the better of the natives, treated them much in the ſame manner, as their countrymen, whom they had left behind in the iſland, were treated by the Saxons; for, not to allege other teſtimonies, Gildas, biſhop of Vannes, ſpeaking of the unhappy condition of the Armoricans; We live, says he, in captivity under the Britons, and bear a most grievous and heavy yoke. The Armoricans, thus overpowered by the Britons, were blended with them under the common appellation of Britons, their country being called Britannia Armorica, and Britannia Cismarina, in the same manner as the Gauls, in other parts of Gaul, were blended under the common name of Franks, and their country called Francia. The Armorican Britons defended themselves with great bravery against the Franks, first under petty kings, and afterwards under counts and dukes, as we shall relate in a more proper place. But to return to our distressed Britons at home: those who had taken refuge among the mountains beyond the Severn, attempted, from time to time, to recover the countries they had lost; but their efforts proved ineffectual, as did the endeavours of the Anglo-Saxons to extend their conquests beyond the mountains. Such of the Britons as submitted to, and lived among the Saxons, were treated by them as slaves, and employed in the most servile offices.

THUS, omitting such accounts as are generally deemed fabulous, we have related the most remarkable events, that happened in Britain, from the arrival of the Saxons, to the retreat of the Britons into Cambria or Wales. The venerable Bede takes no notice of what was transacted here from the battle on Badon-hill to the conversion of the Saxons in the time of pope Gregory the Great; which does not a little incline us to question the truth of what we read in the writers, who came after him. These had not better records or memoirs than that venerable author, but less discernment, and more credulity; which perhaps may have prompted them to relate, and even believe, such things, as did not appear to that judicious author so well attested, as to deserve a place in his history. With these, however, we have been forced to take up, for want of better guides, when abandoned by Gildas and Bede; but as we do not ourselves give intire credit to what they relate, we are far from exacting it of our readers. The unfortunate Britons being, in the manner we have related, driven into Cambria, the Saxons, Angles, and Jutes, remained masters of the whole country now called England, where they had already founded seven kingdoms, known by the name of the heptarchy. But of these kingdoms we shall speak at length in a more proper place, the method, which we have proposed to ourselves, obliging us to leave them at present, and hasten to the history of other more antient nations.

SECT. I.

The antient ſtate, &c. of the Hunns, till their ſettling in Hungary.

The antient ſeats of the Hunns.

THE Hunns, a fierce and ſavage nation, inhabited that part of Aſiatic Sarmatia, which bordered on the Palus Mæotis and the Tanais, the antient boundary between Europe and Aſia [a]. Their country, as deſcribed by Procopius [b], lay north of mount Caucaſus, which, extending from the Euxine to the Caſpian ſea, parts Aſiatic Sarmatia from Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, lying on the iſthmus between the two above-mentioned ſeas. In this mountain, or rather ridge of mountains, were two narrow paſſes leading out of Aſiatic Sarmatia into Iberia, one of which was antiently called Porta Caucaſia, but in Procopius's time Tzur, and the other Porta Caſpia, which, however, we muſt diſtinguiſh from the famous Portæ Caſpiæ, or the narow paſſes in mount Caſpius, which, at a great diſtance to the ſouth of mount Caucaſus, divided Media from Parthia. The two paſſes in mount Caucaſus let the neighbouring Hunns, ſays Procopius [c], into the territories of the Romans and Parthians; whence it is manifeſt, that, according to Procopius, the antient ſeats of the Hunns lay north of mount Caucaſus, and at a ſmall diſtance from it. In thoſe ſeats, called by Procopius the Eulyſian region, dwelt the Hunns, divided into ſeveral tribes, but all compriſed under the general name of Ugri, changed afterwards into that of Hunni or Unni. In the authors, who wrote after the year of the chriſtian æra 376,

when the Hunns firſt broke into Europe, mention is made of the Uturgurian, Cuturgurian, Onugurian, Vultinzurian, Burugunian, Sabirian or Gabrian, and Nephthalite or Ephthalite, Hunns [d]. Procopius tells us, that one of their kings had two ſons, Uturgur and Cuturgur, who, upon their father's death, divided his territories between them; and that ſuch of the Hunns as were ſubject to Uturgur, were called Uturgurian Hunns; and thoſe, who fell to the lot of Cuturgur, Curturgurian. Of the other denominations no notice is taken by the hiſtorians. On the ſouth ſide of the Palus Mæotis, where it diſcharges itſelf into the Euxine ſea by a narrow chanel, called the Boſporus Cimmerius, dwelt the Uturgurian Hunns; and north of them, towards the Tanais, the Cuturgurian [e]. The Ephthalite, as Procopius tems them, or Nephthalite Hunns, as they are ſtyled by Agathias, inhabited a rich country, bordering to the north on Perſia, and at a great diſtance from the Sarmatian or Scythian Hunns, with whom they had no intercourſe, nor the leaſt reſemblance either in their perſons or manners. They were a powerful nation, and often ſerved againſt the Romans in the Perſian armies; but, in the reign of the emperor Zeno, being provoked by Perozes king of Perſia laying claim to part of their country, they defeated the Perſians in two pitched battles, ſlew their king, over-ran all Perſia, and held it in ſubjection for the ſpace of two years, obliging Cabades, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Perozes, to pay them a yearly tribute. The Ephthalite or Nephthalite Hunns.

These Hunns, commonly called by the writers of thoſe times the White Hunns, did not wander, like the others, from place to place, but, contented with their own country, which ſupplied them with all neceſſaries, they lived under a regular government, ſubject to one prince, and ſeldom made inroads, unleſs provoked, either into the Perſian or Roman territories. They lived according to their own laws, and dealt uprightly with one another, as well as with the neighbouring people. Each of their great men uſed to chuſe twenty or more companions, to enjoy with him his wealth, and partake of all his diverſions; but, upon his deceaſe, they were all buried with him in the ſame grave [f]. This cuſtom ſavours of barbarity; but, in every other reſpect, the Nephthalite were a far more civilized nation, than the Scythian Hunns, who, breaking into the empire, filled moſt of the provinces of Europe with blood and ſlaughter. The latter were, according to Ammianus Marcel- linns [g], a savage people, exceeding in cruelty the most barbarous nations. They begin to practise their cruelty, says Jornandes, upon their own children the very first day they come into the world, cutting and mangling the cheeks of their males, to prevent the growth of hair, which they must have looked upon, contrary to the sentiments of other nations, as unbecoming and unmanly. They had perhaps in this practice another view, which Jornandes seems to insinuate elsewhere, viz. to strike terror into the enemy, with their countenances thus deformed, and covered with scars [h]. They had no other food but roots and raw meat, being quite unacquainted with the use of fire, and no houses at all, not even huts, but lived constantly exposed to the air in the woods, and on the mountains, where, from their infancy, they were inured to hunger, thirst, and all manner of hardships; nay, they had such an aversion to houses, which they called the sepulchres of the living, that, when they went into other countries, they could hardly be prevailed upon to come within the walls of any house, not thinking themselves safe when shut up and covered. They used even to eat and sleep on horseback, scarce ever dismounting; which, in all likelihood, induced Zosimus to write, that the Hunns could not walk [i]. They covered their nakedness with goats skins, or the skins of a sort of mice sowed together. Day and night was indifferent to them as to buying, selling, eating, and drinking. They had no law, nor any kind of religion; but complied with their inclinations, whatever they prompted them to, without the least restraint, or distinction between good and evil [k]. St. Ambrose writes, that they were greatly addicted to gaming; which occasioned frequent murders among them [l]. But this vice, as well as that of lewdness, with which he charges them, seems quite foreign to the manners of a warlike nation, inured to all sorts of hardships. In war they began the battle with great fury, and a hideous noise; but, if they met with a vigorous opposition, their fury began to abate after the first onset, and, when once put in disorder, they never rallied, but fled in the utmost confusion. They were quite unacquainted with the art of besieging towns; and authors observe, that they never attacked the enemy's camp. They were a faithless nation, and thought themselves no longer bound by the most solemn treaties, than they found their advantage in observing them. Hence we often find them, upon the leaſt proſpect of obtaining more advantageous conditions, breaking into the Roman empire, in defiance of the moſt ſolemn oaths and engagements. Several corps of Hunns, after their coming into Europe, ſerved in the Roman armies againſt the Goths and other barbarous nations; nay, they were ready, for hire, to fight againſt one another, being blind to every other regard and conſideration [m]. Of this the emperor Juſtinian was appriſed, and, by promiſing a large ſum to the Uturgurian Hunns, prevailed upon them to fall upon the Cuturgurians, and drive them quite out of the empire [n]. The form of government that prevailed among them was not, according to Ammianus Marcellinus, properly ſpeaking, monarchical; for that author, ſpeaking of the Scythian Hunns, tells us, that they had never learnt to ſubmit to the authority of a king, but that they were headed and conducted by ſome of their chief men [o]. Theſe, by ſome hiſtorians, are honoured with the title of kings, but by others ſtyled only generals or leaders. Jornandes calls them conſtantly kings; and truly in war they ſeem to have been inveſted with the ſupreme command. The ſame author writes [p], that Balamir, whom elſewhere he calls Balamber [q], was king of the Hunns, when they firſt paſſed the Palus Mæotis, and ſubdued the Goths, that is, about the year 376. The name of Uldin, king or general of the Hunns, is famous in the hiſtory of the reign of Arcadius [r]. Olympiodorus mentions one Caraton, whom he calls the firſt king of the Hunns [s]. Several of the anceſtors of the famous Attila had, according to Priſcus the rhetorician [t], been honoured with the command of the Hunns. Mundiuchus, or, as others call him, Mundzuchus, father to that prince, maintained, to uſe the expreſſion of Jornandes, the antient ſplendor of his family [u]. He had three brothers, Octar, Roas, who were both kings or leaders of the Hunns, but not of the whole nation, and Oebarſus, who outlived the other two, but ſerved under Attila [w]. Octar and Uptar, who made war upon the Burgundians in 436, as we ſhall relate anon, ſeem to have been one and the ſame perſon; but we muſt not confound, as ſome have done, Roas, whom Priſcus calls Roua [x], and Tyro Proſper Regula [y], with Rougas, general of the Hunns, who was killed with a flash of lightning in 426, while he was making war upon Theodosius II [z]. Roas was the immediate predecessor of Attila. As to the origin of the Hunns, Procopius seems to insinuate, that they were descended from the Albanians, and that they removed from Albania, lying on the Caspian sea, into Asiatic Sarmatia, where they settled. Jornandes, an irreconcileable enemy to the Hunns, who had driven his countrymen the Goths from their antient habitations, gives us the following account of their original, an account intirely owing to the hatred he bore them. Filimer, the son of Gandaric the Great, and the fifth king of the Goths after their going out of the peninsula Scanzia or Scandinavia, having entered the Scythian territories, discovered among his people a great number of witches, called in the language of this country aliorumnæ. These he drove into the wilderness far from his army, where the unclean spirits, who haunted those wild and solitary places, being taken with their charms, kept them company, and from their conversation sprung the nation of the Hunns [a]. We are almost ashamed to allow a place in our history to such a ridiculous fable, though very gravely related by Jornandes [b], and with no less gravity confuted by a modern writer [c]. As for the name of Hunns, some authors will have them to have been so called from one of their leaders named Hunnor; but of this Hunnor no mention is made by any antient writer. They are frequently styled Ugri by Procopius and other writers; and the word Ugre, in the Sclavonic language, signifies aquatic, that is, living in or near the water, a name well adapted to a nation living in wet or marshy places, and such were the antient seats of the Hunns bordering on the Palus Mæotis and the Tanais [d]. Ptolemy, in his Sarmatia Europæa, mentions a people, whom he calls Chuni, dwelling in his time on the banks of the Borysthenes. These the Hunns subdued, and settled in their country; whence, from their name Chuni, some derive that of Hunni. But, to dwell no longer on conjectures, we shall now give a succinct account of the several migrations and expeditions of the Hunns, from their first coming into Europe, to their settling in Pannonia, called afterwards from them Hungary, following therein Ammianus Marcellinus, the most antient author that speaks of them, at least among such as have reached our times, and other credible writers, who lived in or near those times.

The

THE Hunns, as we have obſerved above, dwelt on the eaſt ſide of the Palus Mæotis, now the ſea of Zabache, quite unacquainted with the people and countries lying on the oppoſite ſide, till a hind, purſued by ſome hunters, or, as we read in other authors, an ox ſtung by a gad-fly, having paſſed the marſh, ſome Hunns followed their guide to the oppoſite ſide, where they diſcovered a country far more agreeable than their own. Hereupon, returning to their own country, they acquainted their countrymen with what they had ſeen, and at the ſame time informed them, that what they had till then looked upon as a deep ſea, was only a marſh, and might be paſſed without the leaſt danger [e]. Encouraged with this account, and deſiring to ſettle in a more kind ſoil, they paſſed the marſh; and entering the country of the Alans, who dwelt on the banks of the Tanais, and were thence called Tanaites, they laid it waſte far and near, made a dreadful havock of the inhabitants, and obliged ſuch of them as were left alive, and able to bear arms, to join them. Thus reinforced, they fell upon the Goths, by Ammianus called Greuthongi, and by Jornandes, Oſtrogoths, and ſpread every-where ſuch terror among them, that Ermenric their king, though a warlike prince and conqueror of many nations, laid violent hands on himſelf, to avoid ſeeing the calamities, that threatened his people, and to him ſeemed unavoidable [f]. Jornandes tells us, that Ermenric, whom he calls Ermanaric, having puniſhed with death a woman named Saniolk, of the nation of the Roxolani, for the murder of her huſband, her two brothers, Sarus and Ammius, conſpiring againſt him, gave him a dangerous wound in the ſide, which, with the concern he was under in ſeeing his country over-run by the Hunns, occaſioned his death, in the hundred and tenth year of his age [g]. He was ſucceeded by Vithimir, who, having hired a body of Hunns, with them and his own troops, made, for ſome time, a vigorous reſiſtance; but was in the end, after many loſſes, ſlain in battle. He left behind him a ſon named Vitheric or Videric, whom, as he was under age, he committed to the care of Alatheus and Saphrax; but theſe, though men of known valour and experience in war, foreſeeing all their efforts would prove unſucceſsful againſt the numerous and formidable forces of the enemy, thought it adviſeable to abandon the country they then held, and retire, with all their people, to the plains between the Boryſthenes and the Danube; which country is now known by the name of Podolia. Athanaric, king or chief of the Thervingi or Viſigoths, being informed of what had happened to the Ostrogoths, resolved to stand upon his guard, and prepared for a vigorous defence on the banks of the Danastus, now the Nieper, which parted the Greuthongi from the Thervingi.

Defeat the Visigoths, and oblige them to abandon their country.

But the Hunns falling upon him before he had the least notice of their approach, he was put to flight after having lost great numbers of his men, and obliged to take shelter among the neighbouring mountains. As the enemy, overloaded with booty, pursued him but slowly, he built a wall with incredible expedition for his own defence, extending from the Gerasus or the Pruth to the Danube, in the country now known by the name of Moldavia [h]. All the Gothic nations being alarmed at this sudden and unexpected irruption of the Hunns, such of them as had the good luck to escape the dreadful havock, which those barbarians made of their people, resolved to abandon their country to an enemy, whom they were no longer able to withstand, and to save themselves within the Roman dominions, separated by the Danube from the countries over-run by the Hunns. Accordingly they retired from their antient seats, and, approaching the banks of the Danube, dispatched embassadors to the emperor Valens begging, in a most submissive manner, to be admitted into Thrace. The Romans were struck with terror and amazement, in hearing, that such multitudes of barbarians were hovering about the banks of the Danube, driven out of their seats by greater barbarians than themselves. Valens, however, complied with their request, allowing them to pass the Danube, and enter Thrace in such numbers, that Ammianus compares them to the sparks, which, at that very time, issued out of mount Ætna, and to the sands of the Libyan shore [i]. These were, for the most part Thervingi or Visigoths, the subjects of king Athanaric. As for the Greuthongi or Ostrogoths, they being likewise driven out of their country by the Hunns, flocked in swarms to the banks of the Danube, and, encouraged by the reception their countrymen had met with from Valens, begged to be admitted within the Roman dominions; but the emperor not thinking it advisable to comply with their request, after they had continued some time on the banks of the Danube, they passed it in spite of the Romans. Athanaric, king of the Thervingi, not thinking it safe to take refuge in the territories of the Romans, on account of his having assisted the usurper Procopius, retired, with part of his people, to a place defended by inaccessible rocks, named Caucalanda, having driven from thence the Sarmatians and the Taifali, whose country lay west of the Gerasus or the Pruth [k]. Thus the Hunns, in this year 376, not only ſettled in Europe, but made themſelves maſters of that vaſt country, which extends from the Tanais to the Danube, and was, before their arrival, poſſeſſed by the Alans, the Goths, and ſeveral other barbarous nations, whom they either drove out, or forced to ſubmit to their victorious arms.

The Hunns maſters of the whole country between the Tanais and the Danube.

OF the Hunns, who ſettled in Europe, we find no further mention made in hiſtory till the year 388, when great numbers of them are ſaid to have liſted themſelves in the Roman armies, Theodoſius I. who was then emperor, encouraging them with large ſums to ſerve under his banner, both on account of their warlike temper, and to divert them from raiſing diſturbances on the frontiers of the empire [l]. But the Nephthalite Hunns, who had continued in Aſia, and were neighbours to the Perſians, as we have obſerved above, breaking into the Roman dominions, over-ran Meſopotamia in 383, and even laid ſiege to Edeſſa; but were repulſed by the Roman gariſon, and obliged by a body of troops, conſiſting chiefly of Goths, ſent to the relief of the place, to abandon the enterpriſe, and retire [m]. The European Hunns firſt paſſed the Danube in 391, and being joined by the Goths and other barbarians, committed dreadful ravages in Mœſia and Thrace. But Stilicho, marching againſt them, gave them a total overthrow, and purſuing them cloſe, ſhut them up in a narrow valley, where they muſt have periſhed with hunger, or ſurrendered at diſcretion, had not Theodoſius choſen to conclude a peace with them, following therein, ſays the poet Claudian, the pernicious counſel of the traytor Ruſinus [n]. About four years after, that is, in 395, the Hunns, breaking unexpectedly into the eaſtern provinces, penetrated as far as Antioch, deſtroying all with fire and ſword, and committing every-where unheard-of cruelties [o]. St. Jerom, ſpeaking of this irruption of the Hunns, All the eaſt, ſays he, trembled, when the diſmal news was brought, that ſwarms of Hunns, coming from the far-diſtant Mæotis, and dwelling between the frozen Tanais and the country of the ſavage Maſſagetes, flew up and down, and filled all places with blood and ſlaughter. While the Roman armies, continues that writer, were employed in civil wars, that is, againſt the uſurper Eugenius, the cruel enemy roved, without controul, where they pleaſed, preventing, by their ſpeed, the report of their coming. They had no regard either to religion or dignity; no age they ſpared, nor were they ſoftened by the tears of the crying infant; but put thoſe to death, who

He adds, that the general terror and conſternation ſpread as far as Paleſtine, upon a report, that they propoſed to advance to Jeruſalem, and plunder the holy city [p]. The ſame author ſpeaks of this irruption of the Hunns in ſeveral other places [q] (A), and likewiſe St. Chryſoſtom [r], Philoſtorgius [s], Socrates [t], and Sozomen [u]. St. Chryſoſtom tells us in one of his homilies [w], that ſeveral chriſtians, on that occaſion, ſuffered martyrdom; and that others were brought to Antioch, to be ſold there or ranſomed. Philoſtorgius places this irruption of the Hunns, after the death of Rufinus, and even after that of the eunuch Eutropius, who ſucceeded him in his power and employments. But he was therein certainly miſtaken, ſince not only Claudian [x], but Socrates [y], Sozomen [z], and Zoſimus [a], tell us in expreſs terms, that Rufinus privately ſtirred up, by his emiſſaries, the Hunns to break

(A) Socrates, Sozomen, Zoſimus, and the poet Claudian, agree in this, that the Hunns invaded the eaſtern provinces at the inſtigation of Rufinus. On the other hand, it is manifeſt from the ſame authors, as well as from the code, and the Alexandrian chronicle, that Rufinus was put to death in the month of November 395. In the code are ſeveral laws enacted the following year, and addreſſed to Cæſarius, who ſucceeded Rufinus in the office of præfectus prætorio. Socrates writes, that Rufinus was put to death on the twenty-ſeventh of November 395 (1); which is confirmed both by the Alexandrian chronicle, placing his death after the laſt offices paid to the body of Theodoſius on the ninth of the ſame month (2), and by the code, where the laws are addreſſed to Rufinus till the eleventh of October, and, from the thirtieth of November, to his ſucceſſor Cæſarius (3). However, St Jerom, in his third epiſtle (4), which we cannot ſuppoſe to have been written before the year 397, ſays, that this irruption had happened the year before, Ecce tibi anno præterito, &c. But St. Jerom was either miſtaken, or ſpeaks in that epiſtle only of the ravages and devaſtations, which began in 395, but were continued as appears from Claudian (5), in 396.

into the empire, and likewiſe the Goths, under the conduct of the famous Alaric. What he aimed at in thus encouraging the barbarians to invade the empire, we have related elſewhere [b], from the authors we have juſt now quoted. The Hunns, having over-run and plundered ſeveral provinces, returned home of their own accord, loaded with booty, and carrying with them an incredible number of captives. They met with no oppoſition, the armies that had been ſent into the weſt, to ſuppreſs the uſurper Eugenius, not being yet returned; and this is what St. Jerom meant, or ought to have meant, in ſaying, that the Hunns broke into the empire, while the Roman armies were engaged in a civil war, the diſturbances raiſed in the weſt by Eugenius being happily appeaſed, and the author of them diſpatched, before the irruption of thoſe barbarians.

They break into Thrace. Year of Chriſt 404.

AFTER this irruption, the Hunns ſeem to have continued quiet for the ſpace of nine years, that is, till the year 404, when paſſing in great multitudes the Danube, they entered Thrace; and having over-run that province, they penetrated into Eaſt Illyricum, committing every-where dreadful ravages, and deſtroying with fire and ſword what they could not carry with them [c]. A modern writer quotes a letter written this year by Honorius, emperor of the weſt, to his brother Arcadius, who reigned in the eaſt, to expreſs his concern for the ravages committed by the Hunns in Thrace, and for the ruin and loſs of Illyricum. Theſe calamities Honorius aſcribes to the wrath of Heaven, juſtly provoked at the iniquitous proceedings of the court againſt the holy biſhop Chryſoſtom [d]. By the loſs of Illyricum is only meant in the above-mentioned letter the ruin of that province; for the Hunns, upon advice that the imperial troops were aſſembling with a deſign to cut off their retreat, repaſſed the Danube with all the haſte the immenſe booty they carried with them allowed [e].

The Hunns diſtinguiſh themſelves in the Roman ſervice.

The following year 405, we find great numbers of Hunns ſerving in Stilicho's army againſt Radagaiſus, who had invaded Italy, as we have related at length elſewhere [f]. Theſe Hunns were led by Uldin, one of their chiefs or kings, and to him was chiefly owing the ſignal victory gained by Stilicho in Hetruria; for having, with his Hunns, ſurrounded one of the three bodies, into which Radagaiſus had divided his army, he cut them all in pieces, to the number of an hundred thouſand men [g]. Oroſius aſcribes this victory not to the Hunns, but to a panic, which, ſpreading all on a ſudden through the camp, obliged Radagaiſus to withdraw from before Florence, which he had inveſted, to the neighbouring mountains of Fieſoli, where moſt of his men periſhed with famine, and the reſt ſubmitted to the Romans. Thus the victory, ſays the ſame writer, was owing to the Lord of hoſts, and not to his enemies the Hunns [h]. But to them it is aſcribed by St. Auſtin, Zoſimus, and Proſper, whoſe authority is of far greater weight with us, than that of Oroſius. Uldin was well known to the Romans before this time, from the vigorous oppoſition he had made in the year 400, againſt the famous Gainas, commander of the Goths in the Roman ſervice, of whom we have ſpoken at length in our Roman hiſtory [i]. Gainas was commander in chief, not only of his countrymen the Goths, but of all the troops of Arcadius. However, turning his arms againſt the prince who had thus raiſed him, he formed a deſign of ſurpriſing and plundering the city of Conſtantinople; but, failing in that attempt, he ravaged all Thrace in an hoſtile manner. Hereupon Fravitus, another Goth in the Roman ſervice, and greatly attached to the Roman intereſt, falling upon him, cut great numbers of his men in pieces. With the reſt Gainas marched thro' Thrace to the banks of the Danube, which he paſſed, being deſirous to end his days in the antient country of the Goths. But Uldin, king of the Hunns who had driven out the Goths, and had been now in the quiet poſſeſſion of thoſe countries for the ſpace of twenty-four years, alarmed at the arrival of ſo renowned a commander, with an army of his own nation, met him on the frontiers, and, after ſeveral conflicts, defeated and killed him in a pitched battle [k]. His body being found on the field of battle, Uldin cauſed his head to be cut off, and ſent it to Arcadius [l], who received it at Conſtantinople on the third of January of the enſuing year 401 [m].

Uldin ravages Thrace. Year of Chriſt 408.

No prince had hitherto deſerved better of the empire than Uldin. But two years after the ſignal victory obtained chiefly by his means over Radagaiſus, he became, on what provocation we know not, an irreconcileable enemy to the Romans; and paſſing the Danube, entered Thrace at the head of a numerous army, conſiſting of Hunns and Squiri, or Scyri, a northern nation, ſubject, in all likelihood, to the Hunns. As this irruption happened during the minority of Theodoſius II. Anthemius, who had taken upon him the adminiſtration, did all that lay in his power to appeaſe Uldin; but he confiding too much in his own ſtrength, and inſiſting upon conditions that could not be honourably granted, Anthemius ordered a body of Roman troops to march againſt him, at whoſe approach ſeveral of his officers, offended at his haughty and imperious behaviour, laid hold of that opportunity to abandon him, and ſide with the Romans. This alarmed Uldin, who thereupon retired with great precipitation, and repaſſed the Danube, after having loſt, on his haſty march, many of his men. As for the Squiri, the emperor's troops coming up with them before they reached the Danube, they were all to a man either killed or taken. The priſoners were ſold, and diſperſed all over Aſia, to prevent their ever returning to their own country [n]. By this overthrow, and one they had received in 381, from Theodoſius the Great, grandfather to the reigning emperor Theodoſius the younger, that nation, once very numerous, was almoſt utterly extirpated [o]. From this time the Hunns ſeem to have continued quiet till the year 425, when the emperor Honorius dying, and John his chief ſecretary aſſuming the purple, they were prevailed upon by the celebrated Aetius, who had ſided with the uſurper, to eſpouſe his cauſe. As Aetius had been formerly given to them, on what occaſion we know not, as an hoſtage, and was, by that means, become acquainted with their chiefs, the uſurper ſent him, as the moſt proper perſon, with large ſums, to engage them in his cauſe. Accordingly, a few months after his departure, he returned at the head of ſixty thouſand Hunns. Upon his entering Italy, he was met by Aſpar, one of the generals of Theodoſius, who, upon the death of his uncle Honorius, had cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor of the weſt. Hereupon a bloody battle enſued, without any conſiderable advantage on either ſide. But in the mean time Aetius, being informed of the death of the uſurper, who had been taken and beheaded in Ravenna three days before the battle, ſubmitted to Theodoſius, and perſuaded the Hunns, not without diſtributing conſiderable ſums among them, to return home [p]. However, Thrace was this very year pillaged and laid waſte by ſome of that nation, whom Theodoret ſtyles Scythian Nomades, that is, Scythian wanderers. They were led by one Rougas or Roilas, who, in a boaſting manner, threatened to over-run the whole empire, and to lay ſiege to Conſtantinople itſelf, which, he bragged, he would take at the firſt aſſault, and, having plundered it, lay it in aſhes [q]. But Theodoſius, not in the leaſt frightened at the menaces of the barbarian, committed the event, according to cuſtom, ſays Socrates, to Providence, and ſoon obtained what he deſired; for Rougas was killed with lightning, a plague broke out in his army, and ſwept off the greateſt part of his men, and fire from heaven conſumed moſt of thoſe whom the plague had ſpared. This complication of misfortunes, as we may call it, ſtruck the barbarians with ſuch terror, that they retired of their own accord, dreading, not the arms of the Romans, ſays Socrates, but the power of Heaven, which had evidently eſpouſed the cauſe of Theodoſius [r]. Socrates adds, that St. Proculus, who preached then at Conſtantinople, and was afterwards raiſed to the ſee of that city, made a ſermon to the people on the diſperſion of the Hunns, applying to them what we read in the prophet Ezekiel concerning Gog and Magog [s] (B).

Six years after this irruption, that is, in 432, we find the Hunns in poſſeſſion of Pannonia; for Aetius, being that year diſgraced by Valentinian III. or rather by his mother Placidia, who governed during the minority of her ſon, is ſaid to have retired to the court of Roas, king of the Hunns in Pannonia [t]. Priſcus tells us, that they ſettled in Pannonia in virtue of a treaty concluded with Aetius; but when, or on what occaſion, this treaty was made, we are no-where informed. They were not in poſſeſſion of that country in 427, for in that year Theodoſius is ſaid to have tranſplanted the Goths from Pannonia, which they had held ever ſince the year 377, when they firſt entered it, into Thrace, and to have reunited that province to the empire [u]. On the other hand, they were maſters of Pannonia, or at leaſt held part of that province, in 432; for in that year Aetius, as we hinted above, not thinking himſelf ſafe in the Roman dominions, is ſaid to have taken refuge among the Hunns in Pannonia [w]. In 437, Valentinian III. yielded, as we read in Caſſiodorus [x], Eaſt Illyricum, which compriſed Pannonia, to Theodoſius II. which muſt be underſtood of the towns and fortified places, for theſe the Romans ſeem to have kept; and hence it is, that we find Attila, ſeveral years after the Hunns had been in poſſeſſion of Pannonia, obliged to lay ſiege to Sirmium, the metropolis of that province [y]. As the Hunns were chiefly indebted to Aetius for the lands they held in Pannonia, Roas their king not only received that able commander with the greateſt demonſtrations of kindneſs and friendſhip, upon his being diſgraced at the court of Placidia, and obliged to quit the Roman territories, but ſent him back at the head of a powerful army of Hunns; which ſo terrified Placidia, that ſhe reſtored Aetius to all his employments, and raiſed him to the rank of a patrician [z]. In the year 435, a ſtrong body of Hunns, marching through Germany into Gaul, joined Aetius againſt the Burgundians, who, having been allowed, in 413, to ſettle in that part of Gaul, which bordered on the Rhine, had revolted from the Romans, and ravaged Belgic Gaul. Aetius, having gained a complete victory over them, obliged Gondicarius their king to ſue for peace; which he granted, but neither Gondicarius nor his people long enjoyed; for, in the beginning of the following year, he was cut off, with twenty thouſand of his men, by the Hunns [a], at the inſtigation of Aetius, provoked, as ſome authors write [b], at their revolting anew; while others charge Aetius on this occaſion with breach of faith and the blackeſt treachery. Socrates writes, that the unhappy Burgundians, harraſſed with continual inroads by the Hunns, and no longer in a condition to make head againſt ſo powerful an enemy, only three thouſand of them being left alive, had recourſe to Heaven; and repairing to a city in Gaul, there declared their deſire of embracing the chriſtian religion. The biſhop of the place injoined them a ſeven days faſt, during which time he inſtructed them in the myſteries of our holy religion, and, having afterwards adminiſtered to them the ſacrament of baptiſm, he ſent them home full of courage and confidence. In this condition they marched againſt the Hunns; and finding them deſtitute of a leader, Uptar their king dying the night before, gorged with immoderate eating and drinking, they fell upon them, cut ten thouſand of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to ſave themſelves by a precipitous flight [c]. Thenceforth the Burgundians, adds Socrates, continued ſtedfaſt in the chriſtian religion [d]. Notwithſtanding this overthrow, the Hunns, either this year 436, or the following, as Idatius will have it [e], marched with a conſiderable body to the aſſiſtance of the Romans againſt the Goths, who had been allowed to ſettle in Aquitain, but, not ſatisfied with the countries allotted them, had made themſelves maſters of ſeveral neighbouring cities belonging to the Romans, and even laid ſiege to Narbonne.

(B) Valeſius is of opinion, that Rougas, leader of the Hunns in this irruption, and Rouas, the immediate predeceſſor of Attila, and his uncle, according to Jornandes (6), on the father's ſide, are one and the ſame perſon (7). But this opinion is no-ways agreeable to what we read in Socrates, Theodoret, and Priſcus the rhetorician; for the two former writers tell us, that Rougas loſt his life in this incurſion, in the manner we have related (8). On the other hand, it is manifeſt from Priſcus (9), that there was no war between the Romans and Hunns when Rouas died. Beſides, it is certain, that Rouas did not die in 425, the year in which the Hunns, under the conduct of Rougas, broke into Thrace; for Priſcus tells us, (10), that Plintha and Dionyſius, who were ſent with the character of embaſſadors to Rouas, had been conſuls; and Dionyſius was not conſul till the year 429.

The Hunns oblige the Goths to raiſe the ſiege of Narbonne.

Againſt them the Romans called the Hunns to their aſſiſtance; who, being led by count Litorius, fell upon the Goths, buſied in the ſiege, put them to flight, and entered the city, each horſeman carrying with him two buſhels of corn; which proved a very ſeaſonable ſupply, the inhabitants being reduced to the utmoſt extremity [f]. Idatius aſcribes the raiſing of the ſiege to Aetius [g], probably becauſe Litorius acted by his orders, he being commander in chief of all the armies of the weſtern empire. The Hunns, who thus ſignalized themſelves againſt the Goths, had, the year before, been employed by the Romans againſt the rebellious Armorici, whom they reduced. From Armorica they marched againſt the Goths of Aquitain; but, on their march, they plundered the province of Auvergne, though belonging to the Romans, whom they ſerved as auxiliaries [h]. Litorius, after having gained great advantages over the Goths, laid ſiege to Toulouſe, their capital; but was in the end overcome in a pitched battle by Theodoric their king, and taken priſoner, moſt of his Hunns being cut in pieces, as we have related elſewhere [i]. It was probably during this war between the Romans and Goths in Gaul, which laſted four years, that Gauſeric, king of the Hunns, beſieged the city of Bazas belonging to the Goths; but was obliged, by a miraculous apparition, to drop the enterprize, and retire, as the reader will find related at length by Gregory of Tours [k]. About this time two chiefs of the Hunns, Baſic and Curſic, having numerous bodies of their nation under their command, which they had, for ſome time, employed againſt the Perſians, came to Rome, and entered into the ſervice of Valentinian III. emperor of the weſt [l].

Rougas, king of the Hunns, of whom we have ſpoken above, had been ſucceeded, in 425, by Rouas or Roas, who concluded Theodoa peace with Theodoſius II. whereof one of the conditions was, ſius II. that the emperor ſhould pay him a yearly penſion of three hun- pays a dred and fifty pounds weight of gold [m]. But Rouas, reſolving, yearly pen- a few years after the concluſion of this peace, to ſubdue the ſion to the Boiſchi, and other nations dwelling on the banks of the Danube, Hunns. whom Theodoſius had taken under his protection, diſpatched one Elias to the court of Conſtantinople, threatening to make wat upon Theodoſius, if he lent them the leaſt aſſiſtance. Hereupon Plintha and Dionyſius, two generals of no ſmall renown, were appointed to treat with the king of the Hunns, and divert him, if poſſible, from the reſolution he had taken [n]. In the mean time, Rouas died, and was ſucceeded by his two nephews Bleda Bleda and and Attila [o]. Bleda alone is named by Tyro Proſper [p], and the Attila ſucceed firſt by count Marcellinus [q]; whence authors conclude, that Rouas. he was the elder brother. Jornandes thinks, that to his ſhare fell the provinces bordering on the weſtern empire, and to Attila's the more eaſtern [r]. But we cannot help thinking Jornandes therein miſtaken, ſince not to Bleda, but to Attila, the princeſs Honoria applied, as we ſhall relate anon, ſtirring him up to make war upon her brother Valentinian, emperor of the weſt. News of the death of Rouas reaching Conſtantinople before the departure of the embaſſadors, they were ordered to treat with the two princes his ſucceſſors, and impowered to conclude with them a laſting peace; but in the room of Dionyſius was ſent the quæſtor Epigenes, a man of great experience in negotiations. This change was made at the requeſt of Plintha, who could not agree with Dionyſius [s]. The embaſſadors had an interview with the two princes in the neighbourhood of Margum, a city on the Danube in Upper Mœſia, at a place where the Margus falls into that river, and, according to Sanſon, ſtands the preſent city of Galombea in Servia. The embaſſadors were obliged to confer with them on horſeback, the Hunns refuſing to diſmount [t]. The peace formerly concluded Theodowith Rouas was confirmed, but upon ſuch conditions as evi- ſius con- dently betrayed the deplorable ſituation of the empire, and an cludes unaccountable puſillanimity in the Romans; for they agreed to with them deliver up to Attila and Bleda, ſuch Hunns as had taken, or a ſhameful treaty. Year of Chriſt 441.

ſhould take, for the future, refuge in the Roman dominions, and likewiſe to ſend back all the Roman captives, who had made their eſcape, or to pay eight pieces of gold for each of them. It was likewiſe ſtipulated, that, inſtead of three hundred and fifty pounds weight of gold, the Romans ſhould pay annually ſeven hundred; and that they ſhould not lend the leaſt aſſiſtance to any barbarous nation, when attacked by, or at war with, the Hunns [u]. In compliance with this ſhameful treaty, ſome princes of the royal blood of the Hunns, who had taken refuge among the Romans, were delivered up to Attila and Bleda, who cauſed them immediately to be crucified in a caſtle called Carſus, on the Danube, in Thrace [w]. Hence it is plain, that the Hunns had at this time ſome footing in Thrace. Attila and Bleda, being, in virtue of this treaty, at liberty to make what conqueſts they pleaſed, reduced ſeveral northern countries; inſomuch, that their authority was acknowledged by all the barbarous nations from the Danube to the moſt diſtant coaſts of the Euxine ſea [x]. Among the reſt he ſubdued the Acatziri, who dwelt on the north coaſt of the Euxine ſea, and were divided into ſeveral nations, each of them having a king of their own. But the moſt antient among thoſe princes had, it ſeems, ſome pre-eminence above the reſt; for Priſcus, who lived in thoſe times, tells us, that the jealouſy, which Couridachus, the eldeſt of the kings, conceived of the reſt, gave Attila an opportunity of ſubduing them all. Theodoſius II. in order to unite them, and induce them to renounce the friendſhip of Attila, and enter into an alliance with the empire, ſent rich preſents to each of them; but the perſon, whom the emperor employed on this occaſion, not applying in the firſt place to Couridachus, that prince, thinking himſelf thereby highly injured, acquainted Attila with what had paſſed, inviting him at the ſame time to come and revenge the affront, that had been offered him. Attila laid hold of the opportunity; and having, without loſs of time, ſent a powerful army againſt the Acatziri, he ſoon reduced the other princes, but ſuffered Couridachus to enjoy his dominions undiſturbed [y]. Some time after, Attila invited him to his court; but Couridachus, alledging he could not bear the preſence of ſo great a god, prudently declined complying with his invitation. The Hunn, pleaſed with this plea, never offered him the leaſt violence; but gave the countries belonging to the other Acatzirian princes to his eldeſt ſon, named Ellac, appointing him king over all the nations bordering on the Euxine ſea. The young prince, in going to take poſſeſſion of his new kingdom, had the misfortune to break his right arm by a fall from his horse [z]. Attila, having, with the assistance of his brother Bleda, brought under subjection all the northern nations, began, as his ambition knew no bounds, and his arms had been hitherto attended with wonderful success, to entertain thoughts of reducing, not only the Goths settled in Thrace, but the Romans themselves, and making himself master of the whole empire. With this view, having drawn together a very numerous and formidable army, without any regard to the above-mentioned treaty, he passed the Danube, and, entering Thrace, put all to fire and sword, without distinction of sex, age, or condition. At this time perhaps happened what we read in Priscus, viz. that, during a fair, the Hunns fell upon the Romans, killed a great many of them, and made themselves masters of a castle. The Romans complained of these hostilities; but the Hunns pretended, that the Romans had been the aggressors, the bishop of Margum having plundered, they said, their treasure; on which account they insisted upon his being delivered up to them, with all those of their nation, who had taken refuge in the Roman dominions. The bishop denied the charge; but the Hunns, who wanted only a pretence to quarrel with Theodosius, engaged at this time in two troublesome and expensive wars with the Persians and Vandals, without offering to prove it, entered the empire in an hostile manner [a]. Vorburgus supposes Attila to have been stirred up by Genseric, king of the Vandals, powerfully attacked at this time by Theodosius [b]. Be that as it will, Attila and his brother Bleda took several towns and castles, which the Romans had built on the banks of the Danube, to awe the barbarians, and restrain them from entering the empire [c]. Among the other towns, they made themselves masters of Viminacium, a place of great importance on the Danube in Upper Mœsia. The Romans, alarmed at this sudden inundation of the Hunns, advised the emperor to comply with their request, and deliver up to them the bishop of Margum; which he no sooner understood, than he repaired to the enemy's camp, and found means to put them in possession of the city [d]. Attila, elated with this success, dispatched a messenger to Theodosius, requiring him to deliver up forthwith all the Hunns, who had taken refuge in the Roman territories, to pay him the arrears of his yearly pension, which had been stopt ever since he took up arms, and to send proper persons to settle what sums should be paid him for the future. He added, that there was no time to lose, since he could no longer restrain or moderate the ardor of his troops, thirsting after blood and spoil. Theodosius, though not a little terrified at these menaces, chose rather to try the chance of war, than abandon those whom he had taken under his protection. He therefore only promised to send proper persons to Attila, with full powers to conclude a lasting peace [e]. Attila, not satisfied with this answer, pursued his ravages with more cruelty than ever, reducing several cities and strong-holds, viz. Retiarium, Singidunum, Naissus, and Sirmium, formerly the capital of all Illyricum [f] (C). While Sirmium was besieged by the Hunns, the bishop of the place delivered to one Constantius, by nation a Gaul, whom Aetius had formerly sent to Attila and Bleda, to serve them in quality of secretary, some sacred vessels, to be employed in redeeming him, if he outlived the siege, or others, if he perished in it. These vessels Constantius kept for himself, and pawned them with one Sylvanus, who sold them to the church. Some time after, Attila and Bleda having caused Constantius to be crucified, upon a suspicion that he betrayed them, Attila, pretending that Sylvanus had stolen the vessels from Constantius, insisted all their differences to Attila, looked upon his decisions as oracles, and in every thing submitted to him as to the king of kings. Among these kings were two, to whom Attila paid a particular regard, viz. Valamir or Balamir, king of the Ostrogoths, who had remained among the Hunns, a man of a frank and open temper, and an enemy to all art and dissimulation; and Arderic, king of the Gepidæ, a prince of great penetration, and inviolably attached to Attila [o]. As to the person of Attila, Jornandes has left us the following portrait of him: he was black, low in stature, had a ~~broad~~ breast, a large head, a flat nose, and small eyes [p]. He was fond of war; but depended more upon his counsel, than upon his sword, employing not only force and menaces, but often craft and artifice, and sometimes low wiles, and even lies, to obtain his end [q]. He was constantly forming new projects and vast designs, aspiring at nothing less than the monarchy of the universe. He was so elated with his great power and success, as not to hearken to reason, however plain and evident [r]. The pride and haughtiness of his mind appeared in all his actions and motions, in his gait, eyes, and looks; insomuch, that no one could behold him, without concluding, that he was sent into the world to disturb it [s]. His presence, joined to the reputation he had acquired, struck all who beheld him with such awe and terror, that very few ventured to approach him, or speak to him [t]. However, we are told, that an embassador sent to him by Valentinian III. appeared quite unconcerned before a man, who made the world tremble. As the embassador had justice on his side, he was not afraid of his wild and menacing looks; but, in spite of the rage to which he abandoned himself, answered all his complaints, without betraying the least fear, leaving him at his departure calm and capable of reason, though he had found him quite outrageous and untractable [u]. In his time was found a sword, thought to be the sword of Mars, and, on that account, held in great veneration by the antient kings of Scythia. It had been lost for some ages, and was said to have been found in the following manner: a cow-herd, observing one of his cows wounded in the foot, followed her bloody traces to the place where she had received the wound. There he discovered the edge of a sword appearing above ground, which the cow had trod upon. The sword he immediately dug up, and carried it to the king; who knowing it to be the famous sword of the god of war, received it with inexpreſſible joy, as portending, that he was to extend his conqueſts to the moſt diſtant limits of the world [w]. Priſcus, from whom Jornandes copied this account, writes, that nothing gained Attila ſo much reſpect and veneration among the ſuperſtitious vulgar, as the diſcovery of this ſword in his time [x]. The ſame author adds, that he was ſo blinded with pride, as to forget he was a man, and to ſuffer divine honours to be paid to him [y]. He was not, however, without ſome good qualities; for to thoſe who referred their controverſies to him he adminiſtered juſtice, according to the ſtricteſt rules of equity. He treated his ſubjects with great mildneſs, ſuffering them quietly to enjoy their eſtates, and levying only ſuch ſums as they could eaſily pay [z]. In his dominions, ſays Sylvianus, no poor were ſeen oppreſſed with tributes and taxes [a]. He was ever ready to forgive thoſe who ſubmitted to him; and was never known to have abandoned ſuch as he had once taken under his protection [b]. He was ſo far from placing his grandeur in pomp and ſhow, which ſerve only to dazzle the eyes of the ſenſeleſs multitude, that, on the contrary, he affected an air of ſimplicity, and contempt for ſtate and all kind of outward magnificence. His dreſs was proper, but plain. He could not abide any gold, precious ſtones, or the leaſt ornament on his ſword, or the trappings of his horſe, though in great requeſt among the princes who attended him, and thoſe of his court [c]. Priſcus, who attended Maximinus, ſent by the emperor Theodoſius in 449, to the court of Attila with the character of embaſſador, tells us, that they found him ſitting in his tent on a wooden chair [d]. The ſame writer followed him ſeveral days journey beyond the Danube, till he reached one of his moſt magnificent palaces, which was all of wood, and ſtood in a large village, and in a country where no wood or ſtones were to be found [e]. Attila, ſoon after his arrival, invited Maximinus and Priſcus to a grand entertainment, at which the gueſts were all ſerved in ſilver and gold; but before the king was ſet a diſh of plain meat, of which he ate but very ſparingly, and on a trencher. He drank very little, and out of a wooden cup, while the reſt were regaled with great variety of liquors in cups of gold, enriched with precious ſtones. During the banquet, ſomething happened, which made all the company laugh; but Attila, as Priſcus obſerved, maintained his uſual gravity amidſt their mirth, without the leaſt ſmile or change of countenance [f]. He had, according to the cuſtom of his nation, many wives [g], or, as Jornandes expreſſes it, troops of wives [h], by whom he had almoſt a numberleſs iſſue. His favourite wife was one Crecha or Recha, who reſided in his capital, and by whom he had his eldeſt ſon Ellac, with two others. Priſcus, who carried her ſome preſents, found her ſitting on a bed amidſt the women who attended her ſitting on the ground, and working [i]. The ſame writer mentions two other wives of Attila [k]. Among his children are mentioned Ellac his eldeſt ſon, Dengizic, who periſhed in making war upon the Romans, and Hernac or Hernas, the youngeſt of them all [l]. Attila had an extraordinary eſteem and affection for Ellac, whom he raiſed above all his brothers, made him in his life-time king of the Acatzirians, and appointed him his ſucceſſor after his death; but the ſon did not long outlive the father, being killed in a battle ſoon after his acceſſion to the crown [m]. Next to Ellac, Hernas was the father's favourite, the ſoothſayers having foretold, that he was to outlive all his brothers, and maintain the ſplendor and glory of his family. The firſt part of this ſuppoſed prediction proved true; but as to the other, Hernas was ſo far from maintaining the glory of his family, that, declining to engage in the war, which his brother Dengizic undertook againſt the empire, he contented himſelf with ſome lands given him by the emperor Marcian in Little Scythia [n]. This is all we find in the antient writers concerning the celebrated Attila and his numerous iſſue. The modern authors add many things, and among the reſt, that, while Attila was in Gaul, a holy hermit told him, That he was the ſcourge of God, who had put the ſword of juſtice into his hand, to puniſh the vices of the chriſtians; but would ſnatch it from him as ſoon as they were reclaimed. They add, that Attila, after the famous defeat he received in Champagne, mindful of the ſaying of the hermit, added to his other titles that of flagellum Dei, or the ſcourge of God [o]. But what we read in the modern hiſtories of Hungary concerning thoſe early times is, for the moſt part, either quite groundleſs, highly improbable, or evidently fabulous.

But to reſume the thread of our hiſtory: Attila being, by the death of his brother Bleda, become ſole maſter of ſo many nations, all ready to follow his banners, and execute his commands, he looked upon the Roman emperors with ſuch contempt, that he is ſaid to have ſent, out of mere wantonneſs, two Goths, with the character of embaſſadors, the one to Theodoſius, and the other to Valentinian, with this haughty and inſulting meſſage; Attila, my maſter and yours, commands you to get ready a palace for his reception [q]. What anſwer they returned, we are no-where told. However, we do not find, that Attila openly broke the peace he had concluded with Theodoſius, as we have related above, till the year 447. It is true, he often threatened him with war, but only in order to draw from him money, corn, proviſions, and whatever elſe he ſtood in need of, the Romans, who trembled at the very name of Attila, complying, like ſo many ſlaves, with all his demands, that he might have no pretence to take arms againſt them. The embaſſadors he ſent to Conſtantinople returned always loaded with preſents; inſomuch, that when he thought any of his ſubjects worthy of any extraordinary reward, he uſed to ſend them, under ſome pretence or other, with the character of embaſſadors to Theodoſius [s]. Attila continued thus trampling under foot the majeſty of the empire, and inſulting the weakneſs of Theodoſius, till the year 447, when, no longer ſatisfied with the annual penſion paid him by the emperor, and the rich preſents yearly ſent him, he declared war againſt the empire, upon what provocation we know not, probably without any; for Theodoſius complied with all his demands, however unjuſt and arrogant. Thrace felt the calamities of this war the firſt; for Attila, entering it at the head of a formidable army, laid it waſte, ſays Theophanes [r], from the Euxine ſea to the ſtraights of Gallipoli and Seſtos. They ravaged, ſays count Marcellinus, almoſt all Europe, laying every-where the towns and caſtles in aſhes [s]. They advanced as far as the caſtle of Anthirc [t], placed by Baudrand [u] between Selymbria and Conſtantinople. Jornandes writes, that Attila, with an army of Hunns, Gepidæ, Goths, Alans, &c. commanded by their reſpective kings, ravaged all Illyricum, Thrace, both Dacias, Mæſia, and Scythia [w]. They took and plundered Philippopolis in Thrace properly ſo called, Arcadiopolis in the province of Europe, Conſtantia, a city mentioned only by Theophanes, Marcianopolis, the metropolis of Lower Mæſia, and extended their ravages to the ſtraights of Thermopylæ, leading from Theſſaly into Achaia [x]; ſo that they muſt have croſſed Macedon and Theſſaly. That they over-ran Macedon and Greece, is affirmed by a modern writer, who quotes Procopius [y]; but we have not been able to find that paſſage. Seventy towns and upwards, belonging to the eaſtern empire, were taken and ranſacked in this irruption of the Hunns and other barbarous nations ſubject to Attila [a]. The generals Theodoſius employed againſt them were, Aſpar, Arcobindus, and Arnegiſceles, whom Theophanes names Argaliſcles [a], the chronicle of Alexandria, Anargiſcles [b], and Jornandes, Arnegiſtles [c]. What the other two did, we are no-where told; but Arnegiſceles, who was magiſter militiæ in Mæſia and Thrace, engaged Attila in Lower Dacia, or rather Mæſia, on the banks of the Utis, which falls into the Danube at a ſmall diſtance from a city of the ſame name [d]. The battle proved very bloody, Arnegiſceles having, on this occaſion, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a moſt eminent manner, and killed many of the enemy with his own hand; but, falling unluckily from his horſe in the heat of the engagement, he was himſelf killed, and his army put to the rout [e]. Jornandes ſuppoſes, that this battle was fought in the neighbourhood of Marcianopolis. Another battle was fought in the Cherſoneſus, not far from Gallipoli, in which no better ſucceſs attended the Romans than in the other [f]; ſo that Theodoſius, finding he could no longer withſtand the power of the barbarians, diſpatched the patrician Anatolius to Attila, and with him Vigilius, who was well acquainted with the language of the Hunns, charging them to conclude a peace upon any terms [g]. A peace was accordingly agreed to on the following conditions: That the Romans ſhould pay immediately to Attila ſix thouſand pounds weight of gold, and every year two thouſand; that they ſhould ſend back to him all his deſerters, and receive none for the future; that they ſhould deliver up the Romans, who, being taken in war, had made their eſcape without paying their ranſom, or pay for each of them twelve pounds weight of gold; and finally, that the Romans ſhould ſend no embaſſadors to Attila, till all the deſerters and fugitives were delivered up. Theſe conditions were highly opprobious to the Roman name; but the deſpirited Romans choſe rather to ſubmit to any terms, than purſue the war with an enemy, whom they deſpaired of ever being able to conquer. One Scotta was ſent by Attila to Conſtantinople, to haſten the execution of the treaty [h]. Count Marcellinus writes, that, in 448, embaſſadors came from Attila to Conſtantinople, to demand the money, which they had refuſed before [i], inſinuating thereby, that Attila had rejected the conditions, which he afterwards agreed to. Purſuant to the articles of this treaty, ſix thouſand pounds weight of gold were immediately ſent to Attila, with the Hunns, who had taken refuge in the Roman dominions, among whom were ſome princes, who had never ſubmitted to Attila, and now choſe rather to be killed by the Romans, than fall into his hands [k]. The inhabitants and gariſon of Aſemontium, a caſtle of great ſtrength in Thrace, had refuſed to open their gates to Attila, and repulſed him with great loſs, when he attempted to ſtorm the place; ſo that he was obliged to withdraw from before it. The barbarian, highly provoked at their gallant behaviour, which a generous enemy would have commended, after the concluſion of the peace, inſiſted upon their delivering up to him all the Roman captives, with the Hunns, who had taken refuge in the fortreſs, refuſing to withdraw his troops, till ſuch time as his demand were complied with. The inhabitants anſwered, That there were no Romans at all in the place, and only two Hunns; and this anſwer they confirmed with a ſolemn oath, not thinking perjury a crime, ſays our hiſtorian, when they could, by no other means, reſcue many unhappy Romans from death or ſlavery [l]. In virtue of this peace, Attila claimed the quiet poſſeſſion of the countries he had conquered, that is, of the tract extending along the Danube from Pannonia to the city of Noves, placed by Sanſon in Lower Mœſia; but he afterwards relinquiſhed this claim [m].

SOON after the concluſion of the peace, that is, in the beginning of the year 449, Attila ſent one Edecon to Conſtantinople, with the character of embaſſador, attended by his chief ſecretary Oreſtes (D). As Edecon ſeemed to be greatly taken with

(D) Oreſtes was by birth a Roman, that is, he was born a ſubject of the empire. As he lived in Pannonia, perhaps his native country, when that province was yielded to the Hunns in 430, he liſted himſelf among the troops of Attila, who, diſcovering him to be a man of parts, made him his ſecretary. His father, named Tatula, bore likewiſe ſome conſiderable employment at the court of Attila. Oreſtes married the daughter of count Romulus, ſent by Valentinian III. on an embaſſy to Attila in 449, and had by her a ſon, by Malas called Romulus Auguſtus, but, by all other hiſtorians, Romulus Auguſtulus. Oreſtes, leaving the Hunns, ſerved in the Roman armies with great reputation, and was raiſed to the rank of a patrician, and appointed by the emperor Nepos general of the troops in Gaul; when turning his arms againſt the prince, who had entruſted him with them, he drove him from the throne, and cauſed his ſon Auguſtulus, with the ſplendor and magnificence of the court, and deſirous to continue among the Romans, the eunuch Chryſaphus, the emperor's chief chamberlain, thinking him thereupon capable of committing, without remorſe, the blackeſt crimes, propoſed to him the aſſaſſinating of his prince; which he undertook to do, tempted by the promiſes of the eunuch. To this wicked attempt the emperor not only conſented, but, in order to the more effectual execution of ſo ſcandalous an undertaking, diſpatched a ſolemn embaſſy to Attila, ſtrictly injoining thoſe who attended the embaſſadors, eſpecially their interpreter Vigilius, a bold and enterpriſing man, to be aſſiſting to Edecon in murdering Attila. Maximinus, who, in 422, had perſuaded the Perſians to conclude a peace with the Romans, was at the head of this embaſſy; but, as he was a man of an unblemiſhed character, the emperor did not think fit to truſt him with the ſecret. The embaſſadors no ſooner arrived at the court of Attila, than Edecon, either apprehenſive of the dangers attending ſuch a deſperate attempt, or deceiving the whole time the traytors with more refined treachery, diſcovered the whole to his prince; who immediately cauſed Vigilius to be ſeized, and ſent back his ſecretary Oreſtes to Conſtantinople, with the purſe in which the money had been brought, that was to have been paid to Edecon after the aſſaſſination, charging him to aſk Theodoſius and Chryſaphus, whether they knew it; to reproach the emperor in the ſevereſt terms with ſuch a black piece of treachery, and to inſiſt upon his inſtantly delivering up to him Chryſaphus, the author and contriver of the plot [n]. But the emperor, unwilling to ſacrifice the eunuch his chief favourite, inſtead of complying with Attila's demand, diſpatched the patrician Anatolius and Nomus to the king of the Hunns, charging them to do all that lay in their power to appeaſe him. Anatolius, at that time comes domeſticorum, that is, captain of the guards, had negotiated a peace with Attila the year before. As for Nomus, he was one of Chryſaphus's particular friends, and generous to ſuch a degree, that no one doubted, but, with his rich preſents,

he would ſoften Attila. It happened accordingly; for Attila not only promiſed to live in peace and amity with Theodoſius, but relinquiſhed his claim to the countries on the Roman ſide of the Danube, pardoned Chryſaphus, ſet Vigilius at liberty, ſent back many Roman captives without ranſom, and diſmiſſed the embaſſadors loaded with preſents. Thus Priſcus, who was an eye-witneſs of what he relates, having attended Maximinus to the court of Attila [o]. The ſame author writes, that Conſtantius, ſecretary to Attila, being ſent embaſſador to the court of Conſtantinople, promiſed to befriend the Romans, and do all that lay in his power to divert his maſter from breaking anew into the empire, provided Theodoſius procured him ſome rich heireſs in marriage. Hereupon the emperor promiſed him the daughter of Saturninus, whom Eudoxia had cauſed to be put to death in 444, after he had been for ſome years comes domeſticorum, or captain of the guards. But Zeno, commander in chief of all the emperor's forces, without any regard to the word or honour of his prince, took her by force out of the caſtle, where ſhe was kept, and gave her in marriage to a friend of his, named Rufus. Of this Conſtantius complained to Attila, and Attila to Maximinus, who was then at his court, telling him, that Conſtantius muſt either have the daughter of Saturninus, or another of equal wealth; and that it was a ſhameful thing in a prince to fail of his word, charging him at the ſame time to tell his maſter from him, that he was amazed to find he had thus gone back from his word, and forfeited his honour; that, from his not puniſhing Zeno, he concluded that general to have been countenanced by him in what he had done; but if he was therein miſtaken, if Theodoſius durſt not reſent ſuch inſults from his own ſubjects, he was ready to teach them the reſpect, ſubmiſſion, and obedience they owed their ſovereign. Theodoſius, piqued with this reproach, cauſed the eſtate, not of Zeno, whom he was afraid to provoke, but of Saturninus, to be confiſcated, thinking to cover his weakneſs with this piece of injuſtice [p].

Attila ſpares the conſpirators.

He reproaches Theodoſius as a weak prince.

THE following year 450, Theodoſius II. died, and was ſucceeded by Marcian; which Attila no ſooner underſtood, than he diſpatched embaſſadors to the new emperor, demanding the annual penſion paid him by the deceaſed prince. Marcian, not thinking himſelf bound by the ſhameful treaty, which his predeceſſor had concluded with the barbarians, diſmiſſed the embaſſadors with this anſwer, That Theodoſius was no more; and as for himſelf, he had gold for his friends, and ſteel for his enemies. Attila, provoked at this anſwer, began to draw together his troops, in order to break into the empire. Hereupon Marcian, who had found the affairs of the empire in a moſt deplorable condition, to gain time, ſent a ſolemn embaſſy to Attila, at the head of which was Apollonius, a general of no ſmall renown, perhaps the ſame perſon to whom Theodoret wrote his ſeventy-third and three hundred and third letter [q]. But the king of the Hunns, underſtanding he had not brought with him the uſual penſion, would neither ſpeak to him nor ſee him. However, he commanded him, on pain of death, to convey to him the preſents, which the emperor had ſent him. To this meſſage Apollonius anſwered, That the king needed not demand, with menaces, things which he might have when he pleaſed, either as preſents, if he was determined to live in amity with the Romans, or as ſpoils, if, forgetful of the right of nations, he thought fit to uſe violence with an embaſſador. Hereupon Attila, chuſing rather to loſe the preſents, than declare himſelf a friend to the Romans, or offer the leaſt violence to an embaſſador, ordered him to quit his dominions, and return home [r]. However, not thinking it adviſeable at that juncture to engage in a war with Marcian, and, on the other hand, impatient of peace, he reſolved to turn his arms againſt the weſtern empire, then governed by Valentinian III. a weak and unwarlike prince. Roua, uncle to Attila, had concluded a peace with Valentinian a little before his death, that is, about the year 433, as we have related above. Attila, who ſucceeded him, had no ſooner taken poſſeſſion of the crown, than he was, with repeated letters and meſſages, preſſed by Juſta Grata Honoria, Valentinian's own ſiſter, to break the peace, and invade the weſtern empire. Honoria had been honoured with the title of Auguſta to divert her from marrying, there being, at that time, no man in the whole empire, whoſe rank anſwered her high ſtation; for it was thought proper, that ſhe ſhould continue unmarried, as the ſiſters of Theodoſius II. had done. But celibacy had been their choice; whereas Honoria had no inclination to lead a ſingle life, but was forced to it, and cloſely watched by Valentinian's orders, or rather by her mother Placidia's [s]. The young princeſs therefore, no longer able to bear this reſtraint, diſpatched privately one of her eunuchs to Attila, preſſing him to enter Italy at the head of a powerful army, and marry her [t]; nay, ſhe ſent him, either at this time or afterwards, a ring, as a pledge of her fidelity [u]. She was then about ſixteen or ſeventeen, being born before her brother Valentinian in 417, or 418. Attila, who had then juſt begun to reign, not caring to engage in this enterprize, Honoria ſuffered herſelf to be debauched by one of her own domeſtics, named Eugenius. Placidia no ſooner perceived her with child, than ſhe cauſed her to be ſhut up in a private houſe, and ſoon after ſent her to Theodoſius at Conſtantinople [w]. This happened in 434, three years before Valentinian married the daughter of Theodoſius [x]. Valeſius writes, that Valentinian cauſed Eugenius to be put to death, which is highly probable, but, we may venture to ſay, not affirmed by any of the antients. The ſame author maintains, that Honoria was not ſent to Conſtantinople, and, what is ſurpriſing, quotes Jornandes, who ſays in expreſs terms ſhe was [y]. Honoria continued preſſing Attila to make war upon her brother; but he, it ſeems, not giving ear to her ſolicitations, prayers, and intreaties, lived in peace with Valentinian till the year 449. We have ſeveral proofs of a good underſtanding and friendly correſpondence between him and Aetius, commander in chief of Valentinian's armies; for that general ſent to Attila and Bleda a Gaul, by name Conſtantius, to ſerve them in quality of ſecretary; but he being ſuſpected of treachery, and thereupon put to death, Aetius ſent them for the ſame office another of the ſame name, but by birth an Italian [z]. After the year 444, Attila ſent as a preſent to Aetius a famous mimic and buffoon, named Zercon, who was a native of Mauritania, and ſtrangely deformed [a]. About the year 448, ſome miſunderſtanding aroſe between Attila and Valentinian, on account of the ſacred veſſels, of which we have ſpoken above. To convince Attila of the injuſtice of his claim, were ſent to his court count Romulus, Promotus governor of Noricum, and Romanus, who had a command in the army. Romulus was a native of Petavium in Noricum, a man of great addreſs and experience in negotiations, and father-in-law to Oreſtes, at that time Attila's chief ſecretary [b]. An anonymous writer, publiſhed by Valeſius with the works of Ammianus Marcellinus, tells, that Oreſtes attended Attila into Italy [c]. If what that author writes be true, Attila muſt have made an irruption into Italy, which no other hiſtorian has taken notice of, it being certain Oreſtes had left the ſervice of Attila before that, which we ſhall ſpeak of anon, and which is the only one known to the writers, who have reached our times (E). (E) Some authors think, that Jornandes mentions this irruption among the other tranſactions of the year 434, in the following words

dors from Valentinian met, at the court of Attila, Maximinus, sent thither by Theodosius; but, tho' they had evidently justice on their side, the only answer they could get from Attila was, that he must have the vessels, or Sylvanus must be delivered up to him, otherwise he was resolved to declare war. However, he paid the embassadors great respect, and entertained them at his table with those of Theodosius [d]. He was, without all doubt, himself well apprised of the injustice of his demand; but, being determined to make war, wanted a pretence to begin it. He had received in 448, and entertained at his court, one Eudoxus, by profession a physician, a man of great address, but of a restless temper, who, being accused of stirring up the Bagaudæ to take up arms against the empire, had made his escape, and found a sanctuary amongst the Huns [e]. But as the emperor, dreading above all things a war with Attila, took no notice of his thus protecting a traitor and fugitive, recourse was had to a new claim, which the king of the Huns was very sure would produce a war. We have observed above, that Honoria, the emperor's sister, had maintained a private correspondence with Attila, and even sent him a ring. Attila therefore dispatched a solemn embassy to Valentinian, demanding his sister Honoria, whom he pretended to be his wife, and, with her, half the western empire, as belonging of right to her. The embassadors brought with them the ring, which she had sent him, to convince the emperor of their marriage [f]; and at the same time complained, in their master's name, of the ill usage she met with; adding, that he was both able and resolved to revenge it. Valentinian answered, That his sister was already married; and that, among the Romans, women had no right to the crown, nor to any part of the empire [g]. Of this marriage no mention is made by any other writer, nor indeed of Honoria, since the year 434, when she was sent to Constantinople. She was probably, upon the death of Theodosius, sent back to her brother Valentinian, and received from him some harsh treatment; perhaps he obliged her to marry a person she disliked. Be that as it will, Valentinian, having dismissed the words: Cumque veniente Attila votum suum nequiret explere (16). But these words may equally import, that Honoria, of whom Jornandes speaks in that passage, could not prevail upon Attila to come and marry her; and that she could not marry him, though he was come.

embaſſadors with the anſwer related above, thought it adviſeable to ſend a ſolemn embaſſy to Attila, in order to convince him, if poſſible, of the injuſtice of his claim. The perſons choſen for this purpoſe were Caſſiodorus, father to the writer of that name, the emperor's chief ſecretary, and Carpilio, the ſon of Aetius. Caſſiodorus, who was a man of great eloquence, addreſs, and experience in negotiations, confuted ſo evidently and fully all the frivolous pretences alledged by Attila to juſtify his breaking with Valentinian, that, in the end, he ſeemed inclined to renew the peace, which it was no-ways his intereſt to grant, ſays Caſſiodorus [h], to ſo rich an empire, ready to become his prey. A peace was accordingly concluded, to the great ſurpriſe of Valentinian, and the embaſſadors themſelves, by whom it was negotiated. It was, however, but a ſham peace, the better to deceive the unwary Romans, and fall upon them unawares. It was likewiſe with this view, that he ſent ſoon after embaſſadors to Valentinian, with a very friendly, in appearance, and obliging letter, aſſuring him, that he had no reaſon to be alarmed at his warlike preparations, ſince they were deſigned againſt Theodoric, king of the Viſigoths in Languedoc (F); that, as to the Romans, he ſhould ever look upon them as his friends, provided they did not eſpouſe the cauſe of the enemy [i]. At the ſame time, he wrote to Theodoric, putting him in mind of the cruel war the Romans had made upon him about ten years, and preſſing him to renounce their alliance [k]. Thus, joining craft to force, he endeavoured to ſet the Goths and Romans at variance, the more eaſily to cruſh them both [l].

He deceives the Romans with a pretended peace.

(F) Genſeric, king of the Vandals, having ſent for the daughter of Theodoric, and married her to Hemeric his eldeſt ſon, treated her ſoon after with his uſual cruelty, cauſing her noſe to be cut off, upon a groundleſs ſuſpicion, that ſhe deſigned to poiſon him, and ſending her back thus diſfigured to her father. As he did not doubt but Theodoric would reſent this affront, he reſolved to be before-hand with him; and therefore ſent embaſſadors, with rich preſents, to court the friendſhip of Attila, and perſuade him to fall upon Theodoric. Hence Attila, to deceive the Romans, gave out, that the warlike preparations, which were carrying on throughout his dominions, were deſigned againſt Theodoric (17). This ſtorm, it ſeems, began to be apprehended in 449, for, in that year, St. Leo deſired to be excuſed from aſſiſting at the council of Epheſus, alledging the uncertain and wavering ſtate of affairs (18).

DURING these negotiations, he assembled one of the most powerful and formidable armies we find mentioned in history. He had, as we have observed above, people of many different nations among his troops, and a great number of kings at his devotion. Among the kings the most powerful were, Ardaric king of the Gepidæ, and Valamir king of the Ostrogoths [m]. His army consisted of the following nations, viz. Hunns, Gepidæ, Ostrogoths, Rugians, Gelonians, Squiri, Burgundians, Bellonotes, Neurians, Basternæ, Turingians, Bructerians, Franks dwelling on the Neckar, Marcomans, Suevians, Quadians, Heruli, Turcilingians, and, in short, of all the northern barbarians, to the number of five, or, as others write, seven, hundred thousand men [n]. With this formidable host he set out from Scythia in the depth of winter, and, bending his march through Germany, never halted till he reached the banks of the Rhine. There the Franks, who still dwelt in great numbers on the other side of that river, attempted to stop him; but they were, at that time, unluckily divided among themselves, the whole nation being rent into two factions or parties, by the two sons of Clodion quarrelling about the succession to their father's dominions. The elder brother had implored the assistance of the Hunns; and the younger, probably Merouée, was supported by Aetius, who had, in a manner, adopted him for his son [o]. Being thus disunited, they were easily overcome; and on this occasion probably happened what we read in Fredigaire, viz. that Childeric, the son of Merouée, was taken prisoner by the Hunns, with his mother, and carried into captivity, but rescued out of their hands by the courage and fidelity of a Frank, named Wiomaud [p]. We are no-where told what Attila did, after his victory over the Franks, in favour of Clodion's eldest son, whose cause he had espoused. The king of the Hunns, having now no enemy to oppose him (for the Romans, giving credit to his deceitful protestations, looked upon him as a friend) caused whole forests to be cut down, in order to build boats, with which the Rhine in a short time was covered [q]. He passed that river without opposition in the beginning, as is supposed, of the year 451 [r], giving out, that his design was to make war upon the Visigoths; that he was determined to live in friendship with the Romans; and that he only wanted to cross Gaul, and pass the Loire at Orleans, in order to fall upon his enemies the Goths in Guyenne and Languedoc [s]. Being therefore looked upon as a friend by the credulous and unwary Romans, ſeveral cities opened their gates to him; but his men behaving in the cities, that had received them, more like enemies than friends, the other towns refuſed to admit them [t]. Hereupon Attila, pulling off the maſk, beſieged, took by ſtorm, and plundered, many places in Gaul [u]. The cities that ſuffered moſt on this occaſion, were Tongres [w] (G), Treves, formerly the metropolis of Gaul, which had been four times pillaged before the year 440, and was now laid in aſhes by the Hunns [x], Straſbourg, Spires, Worms, Mentz, Andernach, and moſt of the towns in that neighbourhood [y]. Attila, advancing thence into the country, and dividing his numerous army into ſeveral bodies, took, pillaged, and laid in aſhes, many other cities, and among the reſt Arras [z], Benſançon, Toul, and Langres [a]. The barbarians attacked the town of Laon; but were repulſed with great ſlaughter [b]. At Mentz they arrived the night preceding the ſolemnity of Eaſter, which, in 451, fell on the eighth of April; and having ſoon forced the gates, and entered the city ſword in hand, they made a dreadful havock of the inhabitants, maſſacred the prieſts at the altars, and ſet fire to the place, which ſoon reduced all the private and public buildings to aſhes [c], ſparing only the chapel of St. Stephen, if Gregory of Tours is to be credited, where ſome reliques of that ſaint were lodged [d]. At- He takes and deſtroys ſeveral cities.

(G) Gregory of Tours writes, that, when it was firſt heard in Gaul, that Attila's deſign was to paſs through that country, the holy biſhop of Tongres, named Aravacus or Arvacus, went to viſit the holy places at Rome, where, with fervent prayers, and many tears, he begged Heaven to avert the calamities, that threatened his flock, and all Gaul. But St. Peter, appearing to him, told him, that the Almighty had, in his juſtice, immutably decreed, that the Hunns ſhould come into Gaul, and ravage the whole country; but as for him, he ſhould not live to ſee the miſeries of his diſtreſſed flock. With this anſwer he returned to Tongres, and thence repaired to Maeſtricht, where he died ſoon after (19). The credulity of this excellent writer is the effect of his great piety, which often gets the better of his good ſenſe and underſtanding.

tila, thus putting all to fire and ſword, arrived at length before Orleans, which he immediately inveſted, the inhabitants refuſing to admit him into the city. In the mean time, Aetius, arriving from Italy at Arles, took care to encourage, by frequent meſſengers, the inhabitants and gariſon of Orleans to make a vigorous defence, aſſuring them, that, in a ſhort time, he would march to their aſſiſtance. He had brought with him but a ſmall number of troops, not doubting but the Viſigoths would join the Romans in oppoſing the furious torrent, which threatened both nations alike; but finding the Viſigoths reſolved to wait for the enemy in their own country, he uſed all kinds of arguments, in order to perſuade them to change that reſolution, ſending to them for that purpoſe Avitus, who was raiſed to the imperial dignity a few years after [e]. The epitomizer of Idatius, ſuppoſed to have lived in the time of Charlemagne [f], tells us, that, on this occaſion, the holy biſhop of Orleans, St. Agnan, was likewiſe ſent by Aetius to Theodoric king of the Viſigoths [g].

Be that as it will, Theodoric yielded at length to the reaſons alledged by the deputies of Aetius, which the reader will find in Jornandes [h], promiſing to join the Romans with all his forces againſt the common enemy. This change of meaſures in the king was highly acceptable both to the nobility and his people, who received the news of it with loud acclamations of joy, occaſioned by the eager deſire they had to try their ſtrength with the Hunns [i] (H). In the mean time, Aetius aſſembled what troops he could in Gaul, which were reinforced by the powerful ſuccours brought him by Theodoric, who commanded them in perſon, attended by his eldeſt and ſecond ſons, Thoriſmond and Theodoric [k]. Beſides the Viſigoths, the following nations are mentioned among the troops, that compoſed the army of Aetius, viz. the Franks, under the conduct of their king, Merouée, the Sarmatians, Burgundians, Saxons, Armoricans, the Lyſians, dwelling on the banks of the Lis in Flanders [l], the

(H) The epitomizer of Idatius, who often adds to his author ſomething of his own, tells us, that Aetius offered half Gaul to Theodoric, on condition he joined him againſt the Hunns; and that, having by this means engaged him to ſide with the Romans, he made the ſame offer to Attila, provided he made war upon Theodoric (20). But this ſeems to us altogether incredible.

Reverins

Reverins or Ripuarians, inhabiting the banks of the Rhine towards Cologne, the Ibrions, by Valesius called Brions and Breons, and placed by him in Vindelicia, now Suabia and Bavaria[m], and several other nations of Celtic Gaul and Germany, whom the Romans had formerly commanded as their subjects, but were now glad to reckon among their auxiliaries and allies[n]. Thus Aetius assembled an army not much inferior in number, according to Prosper, to that of Attila[o].

WHILE Aetius was thus busied in assembling his troops, Attila pursued the siege of Orleans with great fury, battering the walls night and day with an incredible number of warlike engines, till at length he became master of the place. Valesius is of opinion, that the holy bishop Agnan caused the gates to be opened, lest the city should be taken by assault, and plundered[p]. And Gregory of Tours seems to insinuate, that it was not taken by storm; for he writes, that the enemy entered the place, when the walls were shaken with the battering-rams, and ready to fall[q], no breach being then made, according to that writer. On the other hand, the word irruptio, used by Apollinaris Sidonius, and signifying a violent breaking or rushing in, imports, that the town was taken by storm[r]. Be that as it will, the Hunns were scarce entered, when Aetius and Theodoric, arriving with all their forces, fell unexpectedly upon them, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged them to retire with much precipitation out of the town. Many of them threw themselves into the Loire, and perished there[s]; a plain proof, that they had passed that river, and invested the town on the south side; which has been denied by some modern writers. Theophanes mentions this defeat of Attila near the Loire and the city of Orleans[t]. As for the epitomizer of Idatius, he evidently confounds this encounter with the great battle of Chalons[u]. For this success, Aetius is by Apollinaris Sidonius styled the deliverer of the Loire[w]. He is supposed to have gained it on the fourteenth of June, that day being marked in an antient martyrology of Orleans as a day of general thanksgiving, for the happy deliverance of that city out of the hands of its cruel enemies[x]. Attila, being obliged to abandon Orleans, retired with his army towards the Rhine; and having

(I) This memorable battle was fought in the plains of Mauriac, ſay ſome, in the plains of Catalaunum or Chalons, ſay others (21); but, to reconcile them, we are only to ſuppoſe the ſame plain to have been known by theſe two different names; a very natural ſuppoſition, and founded on the authority of Jornandes, who tells us in expreſs terms, that the Catalaunic were alſo called the Mauriac fields; Convenitur in campos Catalaunicos, ſays he, qui & Mauriaci nominantur (22). However, Valeſius diſtinguiſhes theſe two plains; and, to reconcile the authors, ſuppoſes two battles to have been fought, the one, not deciſive, in the plains of Mauriac, that is, near Meri on the Seine, in the dioceſe of Troyes, and the other, which proved deciſive, in the neighbourhood of Catalaunum or Chalons (23). But thoſe who ſpeak of the battle fought in the plains of Mauriac, ſuppoſe it to have been deciſive, and to have put an end to the war, in the ſame manner as thoſe do, who deſcribe the battle of Chalons. As for the name of Mauriac, Valeſius ſuppoſes Meri upon the Seine, in the dioceſe of Troyes, to have been ſo called, and quotes Fredegaire in favour of this ſuppoſition (24). But Blondel takes the ſmall village of Heiz le Maurou on the river Delir, in the dioceſe of Chalons, to be the antient Mauriac. Papirius Maſſon places the Mauriac fields about three leagues from Chalons, near a place called Notre Dame de l' Epine, or Our lady of the Thorn (25). He is therein followed by Cointius (26), and by Sanſon, in his maps of the dioceſes of Chalons and Rheims. As for thoſe, who will have this battle to have been fought beyond Orleans at Mauriac in Auvergne, or in the neighbourhood of Toulouſe, in a diſtrict held at this time, as they ſuppoſe, by the Catalaunians or Catalans of Spain, though they agree perhaps therein with Olaus, a modern writer, of no authority in himſelf, they diſagree with Gregory of Tours, and all thoſe who write, that Aetius delivered Orleans, namely, with Apollinaris Sidonius, whom we may call an unqueſtionable author and eye-witneſs. That author tells us in expreſs terms, that Attila took Orleans by ſtorm; but was driven out by Aetius, before he had time to plunder it, and obliged to return back, directing his march towards the Rhine. He did not therefore, according to that writer, penetrate ſo far into Gaul as Auvergne or Languedoc; and conſequently the battle could not be fought at Mauriac in Auvergne, or near Toulouſe in Languedoc. Jornandes writes, that Thorifmund, upon the death of his father, who was killed in the could repaſs the Rhine. The Roman general, being informed by his ſcouts, that Attila was waiting for him in thoſe vaſt plains, reſolved, notwithſtanding the enemy's advantageous ſituation, to advance, and put the whole to the iſſue of a battle. As he arrived late at night in the plains where Attila was encamped, the Gepidæ, who ſerved under Attila, and the Franks, who followed Aetius, meeting in the dark, engaged with ſuch fury, that, on both ſides, above fifteen thouſand men were left dead upon the ſpot [y]. We are told, that Attila, deſirous to know before-hand the iſſue of the approaching battle, conſulted his aruſpices, who, after having narrowly examined the entrails of the beaſts offered in ſacrifice, and, according to their cuſtom, ſcraped their bones, returned the following anſwer: That the event would not prove favourable to him; but,

Catalaunic fields, entered Toulouſe veſted with royal majeſty; Theriſmundus ergo, patre mortuo in campis Catalaunicis, ubi & pugnaverat, regia majeſtate ſubvectus Toloſam ingreditur (27). From theſe words ſome conclude the battle to have been fought in the neighbourhood of Toulouſe. But Jornandes does not ſay, that Thoriſmund made his entry into Toulouſe the ſame day his father was killed, or the day following; nay, he confines it to no certain time, but evidently ſuppoſes it not to have happened immediately after the battle; for he tells us, that, after the battle, Aetius adviſed Thoriſmund to return home, ut ad ſedes proprias remearet. The battle therefore was not fought in the territories of the Goths, but at a conſiderable diſtance from Toulouſe. The young prince, following the advice of Aetius, returned to Gaul, rediit ad Gallias, ſays Jornandes, who, by Gaul, could only mean Celtic Gaul, called alſo Gallia Lugdunenſis; ſo that Thoriſmund, in marching to the field of battle, had croſſed Celtic, and entered Belgic Gaul, to the latter of which belongs the dioceſe of Chalons. Hence Scaliger thinks thoſe writers, who will have Attila to have been defeated near Toulouſe, to have been guilty of a miſtake altogether childiſh, how able ſoever they may be in other reſpects. The plains of Chalons, where the two armies engaged, were, according to Jornandes (28), one hundred leagues in length, and ſeventy in breadth; but that author allows only fifteen hundred paces to each league. His allowing that extent to the plains of Chalons, gives us room to believe, that he compriſed, under that name, all the champaign country, whence the province was afterwards called Champagne, a name by which it was well known ſo early as the ſixth century (29). On the ſame plain of Chalons was fought, in 273, a great battle between the emperor Aurelian and the uſurper Tetricus.

on the enemy's side, their chief man would fall in the engagement. This answer greatly encouraged Attila, who did not in the least doubt, but by the chief man was meant Aetius, whose death he was glad to purchase at any rate, since he looked upon that great commander as the only person in the whole empire capable of defeating his vast designs [z]. He therefore resolved to give battle, but not to engage till the day was far spent, that night coming on might prevent the Romans from pursuing the victory [a]. He placed himself in the centre, with the flower of his army around him, as if his chief care had been, says Jornandes [b], to preserve himself, and not to conquer. In the wings were posted the Ostrogoths, the Gepidæ, and the other nations, that followed his banner [c]. On the other hand, Aetius placed the Romans, whom he commanded himself, in the left wing, the Visigoths, under the command of Theodoric and his son Thorismund, in the right, and the Alans, with their king Sangiban (K), and probably the Franks, and other auxiliaries, with their respective leaders, in the centre. Thus were those spacious plains quite covered with infinite numbers of combatants, the flower of innumerable nations, ready, says Jornandes, to destroy each other, without any private pique or quarrel, but merely in compliance with the ambition of one man, which, in them, supplied the room of the most mortal hatred and irreconcileable enmity. What pity, continues our historian, that, by the passion and folly of one man, should perish, in a few hours,

(K) Valesius takes Sangiban to be the same person with Sambida, chief of the Alans, on whom Aetius bestowed, about the year 440, as Tyro Prosper informs us, some lands that lay uncultivated in the Valentinois (30). Others will have him to be the successor of Eocavic, chief of another body of Alans, whom Aetius placed on the banks of the Loire in 447, at a small distance from Armorica, in order to awe the Armoricans, and put a stop to their incursions (31). Sangiban was in Orleans when Attila entered Gaul, having obtained leave to reside there; but, as the barbarians drew near that city, he was ordered to quit it, upon a report, that he designed to deliver it up to them (32). All these Alans had entered Gaul in 406. In the battle Aetius, distrusting Sangiban, placed him in the centre, that, being surrounded by the Romans and Visigoths, he might have no opportunity, says Jornandes (33), of putting in execution the design of which he was suspected.

what nature has produced in many years[d]! Between the two armies was an eminence of an easy ascent, which both parties strove to seize; but Aetius and Thorismund, having possessed themselves of it the first, repulsed without much-ado the Hunns, who attempted to dislodge them. This advantage, gained by the Romans in the very beginning of the engagement, raised their courage, and greatly damped the ardour of the enemy; which Attila observing, strove to re-animate his men by a speech, which the reader will find in Jornandes[e], who made it for him. The battle began about four in the afternoon, and is by all writers reckoned one of the most bloody and obstinate engagements mentioned in history. A small brook, that crossed the plain, swelled, says Jornandes[f], to a torrent, by the great quantity of blood that was shed. Aetius pressed the Hunns on this side; and Thorismund never ceased harrassing them from the eminence he had seized. The Goths, leaving the Alans behind, charged the enemy with no less vigour than the Romans had done. Theodoric, notwithstanding his great age, flew from rank to rank, encouraging his men; but falling unluckily from his horse, he was, according to some, trod to death by his own men. Others write, that he was killed with a dart by a Goth, named Andagus, who fought under Attila, and was descended from the Anali, that is, from the royal family of the Goths[g]. The Goths, though no longer animated by the presence of their king, pressed the Hunns so warmly, that Attila, no longer able to withstand them, retired in the end, with those who surrounded him, to his camp, which he barricaded with all the carts and waggons of his army. It being night before the battle was ended, Thorismund, coming down from his eminence to rejoin his own people, found himself entangled among the carts and waggons of the enemy, who fell upon him with great fury. On this occasion he received a wound on the head, and was thrown from his horse; but other Goths flying to his assistance, he was rescued from the danger, and brought back to his camp. As for Aetius, he continued the engagement, till night coming on, the enemy withdrew to their camp, when he likewise retired, not daring to pursue them, as not knowing whether the Goths were conquerors, or conquered. The new day discovered a dreadful sight, those vast plains almost quite covered with dead bodies; but Attila, who, they expected, would renew the engagement at break of day, kept close in his camp, and was resolved, as the Romans were afterwards informed, to burn himself alive, if they had forced it, rather than suffer himself to be taken prisoner. He caused a great noise to be made in his camp, and the trumpets every-where to sound, as if he was upon the point of sallying out, and falling upon the Romans; but did not, however, stir from his entrenchments. Hence the Romans concluded, that he was conquered, and that his loss was great. However, not thinking it advisable to attack him in his camp, as he had but a small quantity of provisions, they resolved to keep him closely blocked up [h].

He declines a second engagement.

IN the mean time, the Goths, missing their king, sought him on all sides, and at last found him among the dead. His body was carried, in the sight of the Hunns, with the greatest solemnity and all possible marks of honour, from the field of battle to the camp, where the last duties were paid him, in the midst of which his son Thorismund was proclaimed king, and, in that quality, he ended the ceremony [i]. Such is the account the antients give us of this famous action, in which near three hundred thousand men were killed, according to Idatius, on both sides, and two hundred and fifty-two thousand, according to the Amsterdam edition of Jornandes in 1655, including those who fell the night before the battle in the encounter between the Franks and the Gepidæ. Both armies suffered extremely, and the Romans challenged the victory, for no other reason, but because Attila kept in his camp the next day, and withdrew afterwards to his own country, without daring to venture a second engagement [k]. Cassiodorus and Theodoric, king of Italy, owns, that, in this action, Aetius had the chief command; but ascribe the victory to the courage and bravery of the Goths [l]. Victor Tunniensis extols the courage of the Goths, without so much as mentioning Aetius; and Gregory of Tours will have the success of that day to be owing to the prayers of St. Agnan, bishop of Orleans [m]. As to the account of this battle given by the continuator of Idatius [n], Valesius looks upon it as altogether fabulous. Thorismund, greatly affected with the death of his father, resolved to revenge it on the Hunns, and, at the head of his Goths, attack them in their camp; but having first consulted Aetius, whose known wisdom and long experience gave great weight to his counsels, that general advised him to return home without delay, and take possession of his father's dominions, lest his brothers, seizing on the deceased king's treasures, should raise disturbances in his absence, and give rise to a civil war. This advice Aetius gave with a political view, fearing, that if the Hunns were utterly extirpated, the Goths, no longer awed by so formidable a power, might prove a no less troublesome enemy to the empire, than those barbarians. However, Thorismund, not suspecting in the least the zeal and sincerity of Aetius, readily embraced his advice, and returned home [o]. Thus, giving way to groundless suspicions, we often let slip the most favourable opportunities, being wholly taken up in guarding against imaginary evils. The continuator of Idatius tells us, that Aetius, going in the night to the enemy's camp, assured Attila, that the Roman army had been reinforced with a very considerable number of Visigoths, in order to oblige him to retire with more haste, and even to purchase with money a safe retreat. By a like artifice he persuaded Thorismund, according to the same writer, to retire, and pay him a considerable sum. He adds, that Thorismund, finding afterwards he had been imposed upon by Aetius, sent to challenge the promise he had made him, which was to yield to him half Gaul, if he drove out Attila; but Aetius, in lieu of the promised dominions, only sent him a golden dish, weighing five hundred pounds, and enriched with precious stones [p]. But to such accounts we can give no credit, upon the bare testimony of a writer, whose authority is of no great weight with us. Thorismund was no sooner gone, than Aetius, by the same artifice, persuaded Merouée, king of the Franks, whose brother aspired at the crown, to withdraw his troops, and return home. Thus he got for himself the spoils that were left in the field of battle [q].

that

WHEN Attila was first told, that the Visigoths were retired, he imagined it to be only a feint, in order to surprise him, and therefore kept for some time close in his camp; but being afterwards informed of the truth, he resumed courage, says Jornandes [r], and began to hope for victory. However, he made no attempt, but retired quietly to the Rhine, with a small number of troops, says Gregory of Tours [s]; and truly his army must have been greatly weakened, since he did not offer to attack Aetius, even after the departure of the Goths and Franks. Valesius concludes from hence, that the army he led into Gaul did not consist, as Jornandes seems to insinuate [t], of five hundred thousand men [u]. Jornandes perhaps only meant, that his troops amounted to that number, and not that he marched them all into Gaul. He had, no doubt, left a considerable number of his forces in the countries he had conquered, to awe the people, and garison his forts and strong-holds. Besides, it is certain, that this very year 451, a body of Hunns broke into Illyricum, and ravaged that province; but were in the end driven out by Ardaburius, who was thereupon appointed by Marcian, emperor of the east, commander in chief of all his forces [w]. The anonymous author of the Altissiodorensian chronology tells us, that Aetius, after the engagement, returned to Italy, leaving Attila to commit what ravages he pleased in Gaul [x]. This seems highly improbable, the more as that writer supposes the city of Mentz to have been destroyed on this occasion; whereas all other authors speak of the ruin of that city as happening before the siege of Orleans. Such was the issue of Attila's expedition into Gaul, so much spoken of by the writers of those times. The ravages he committed there were, no doubt, very great; but posterity has not a little increased them, charging Attila and his Hunns with all the devastations, that were afterwards committed by the Franks, the Alemans, and other barbarous nations [y]. It was a long time before the towns he had ruined were rebuilt, or repeopled; nay, so great was the consternation of the inhabitants, that Lupus, the famous bishop of Troyes, returning to his see, after he had attended Attila to the banks of the Rhine, found the city quite abandoned, though Attila, out of regard to him, had spared it; insomuch, that he was obliged to retire to a mountain, named Latisco, about fifteen leagues from Troyes, where he endeavoured to persuade his people, who had taken refuge there, to return to their antient habitations; but, not being able to remove their fears, after he had continued two years among them, he left them, and retired to Mascon [z]. Aetius pursued Attila as far as the Rhine; but never offered to attack him, thinking it, as most authors conjecture, impolitic to weaken him too much, lest he should no longer be in a condition to awe the Franks and Goths, and divert them from raising disturbances in the empire.

Attila invades Italy. Year of Christ 452.

Attila, rather enraged than disheartened at the disappointment he had met with, and the loss he had sustained in Gaul, resolved to make an irruption into Italy, where he hoped to find more booty and less opposition, there being no Goths, Franks, Alans, or Burgundians there to oppose him. Pursuant to this resolution, having reinforced his army with powerful supplies sent him out of Scythia, he left Pannonia; and finding the passes of the Alps unguarded, as no hostilities were expected on that side, he entered Italy in the latter end of the year 451, as

Jornandes and Idatius ſeem to inſinuate [a], or, what is more probable, in the beginning of the following year 452. It is impoſſible to expreſs the terror and conſternation, which ſo ſudden and unexpected an irruption occaſioned, even in the moſt diſtant provinces. Aetius, who had oppoſed the barbarians ſo vigorouſly in Gaul, betrayed, on this occaſion, no leſs fear than the reſt; nay, he was at firſt for retiring with the emperor out of Italy, and taking refuge in Gaul; but ſhame getting the better of his fear, he continued in Italy, and began to aſſemble the forces, that were diſperſed up and down the provinces. In the mean time, frequent councils were held at court, in the ſenate, and in the aſſemblies of the Roman people; but the only expedient that occurred was, to ſend embaſſadors to Attila, and try whether they could, by offering him moſt advantageous terms, induce him to conclude a peace, and retire. In the mean time, he ravaged, without reſtraint or controul, the Italian provinces, and took by ſtorm ſeveral cities [b]. He met with no oppoſition till he came to Aquileia, the metropolis of the province called Venetia. As that city was well fortified, and defended by the flower of the Roman troops, all his efforts againſt it proved, for a long time, unſucceſsful; inſomuch, that his men began to mutiny, and declare, they would abandon the ſiege [c]. But Attila, having one day obſerved ſome ſtorks carrying their young ones out of the city into the fields, as he was then deliberating with himſelf, whether he ſhould raiſe or purſue the ſiege, took this for a lucky omen; and turning to his men, Behold, he ſaid, thoſe birds abandoning a city, which, they know, by a natural inſtinct, is near ruin. The ſoldiers, believing their king well ſkilled in aruſpices, were ſo animated with this obſervation, that, doubling their efforts, they made an incredible number of warlike engines, with which they continued battering the city night and day, and at length took it by ſtorm, plundered it for ſeveral days, and laid it in aſhes, not one houſe being left ſtanding, nor one perſon alive, that fell into their hands [d]. Encouraged with this ſucceſs, without much-ado, they made themſelves maſters of the other cities of that province, viz. Trevigio, Verona, Mantua, Cremona, Breſcia, and Bergamo, which they plundered with the utmoſt cruelty, putting all to fire and ſword, without diſtinction of ſex, age, or condition. It is commonly ſaid and believed, that, on this occaſion, the inhabitants of the province of Venetia, to avoid the cruelty of the Hunns, retired to the iſlands on their coaſt, Aquileia, and ſeveral other cities, taken, and deſtroyed.

Venice founded.

and there laid the foundation of a city, which, borrowing its name from the province, was called Venetiæ, and is known to us by the name of Venice [e] (L). From the province of Venetia, Attila advanced into Liguria, where he took and plundered Milan, the metropolis of that province, and the usual seat of the emperors of the west. He laid in ashes the city of Pavia, and several other places in that neighbourhood, raging every-where with such cruelty, as can hardly be expressed or conceived [f] (M).

Attila designs to march to Rome.

He was prompted, by his thirst of booty, to march to Rome, and plunder that metropolis of the western empire; and the Romans expected daily to see him at the gates of their city, which, it seems, they were not in a condition to defend against so powerful an enemy; for Leo the Great writes, that Heaven, by granting them peace, had saved Rome, and delivered the Roman people from slaughter and bondage [g]. However, Attila, though he had publicly declared his resolution of marching to Rome, was afterwards diverted from putting it in execution by his own men, says Jornandes, mindful of the untimely end of Alaric, who died soon after he had plundered that metropolis, and dreading the same fate might overtake their leader [h]. But this motive surely could be of no great weight with Attila. His army was greatly weakened for want of provisions; a contagious distemper raged amongst his troops to such a degree, that Heaven seemed to fight against him; Marcian, emperor of the east, had sent a chosen body of troops to the assistance of Valentinian, which, under the conduct of

What diverted him from putting his design in execution.

(L) Cassiodorus speaking of the Venetians, as he styles them, about fifty years after, says, that they inhabited the islands of the Adriatic; that they had no other fence against the waves but hurdles, no other food but fish, no wealth besides their boats, and no merchandize but salt, which they exchanged for other provisions. They were employed, in the time of Cassiodorus, in carrying from Istria to Ravenna the corn and oil, which that province was obliged to furnish (34); so that they were then subject to the Goths.

(M) We are told, that Attila seeing at Milan some pictures, representing the Roman emperors sitting on thrones of gold, and the Scythians, that is, the Goths or Huns, prostrate at their feet, caused himself to be painted sitting on a throne, and the Roman emperors carrying on their shoulders sacks filled with gold, which they emptied at his feet (35).

Aetius, had gained ſome advantages over the Hunns; ſuch of that nation as had remained at home, were at the ſame time greatly harraſſed by the forces, which Marcian had ſent againſt them.

WHILE Attila, thus embarraſſed, was in ſuſpence whether or no he ſhould purſue his march to Rome, embaſſadors arrived from Valentinian, with propoſals for an agreement. The ſending of embaſſadors was the only expedient, as we have hinted above, that occurred to the prince and his council, to deliver Italy from the cruel ravages of the barbarians. At the head of this embaſſy was the celebrated Leo, biſhop of Rome, a perſon famed for his eminent piety and learning. His collegues were Albienus or Avienus, who had been conſul in 450, and Trigecius, formerly prefect [i]. They found Attila on the banks of the Menzo, not far from Mantua, and were received by him with uncommon demonſtrations of kindneſs and eſteem. He concluded with them, ſoon after their arrival, a kind of treaty, which, it ſeems, was but a truce; for he threatened to return to Italy, and commit there greater ravages than ever, unleſs the princeſs Honoria was ſent him, with the ſhare of the imperial treaſures that was due to her [k]. One of the articles of this treaty was, that an annual penſion ſhould be paid to Attila, the emperor being glad to redeem the empire at any rate from the calamities it ſuffered [l]. The treaty was no ſooner ſigned, than Attila commanded his men to forbear all hoſtilities; and ſoon after leaving Italy, he retired, with all his troops, beyond the Danube [m]. This peace, or rather truce, was probably concluded in the beginning of July; for Leo was ſtill at Rome on the tenth of June, as appears from one of his letters to Theodorus of Frejus bearing that date [n].

Attila concludes a truce with Valentinian.

He retires out of Italy.

As Attila was incapable of living himſelf or ſuffering others to live, in peace, he was no ſooner returned to his own country, than he began to threaten the eaſtern empire with an invaſion, if Marcian did not ſend him, without delay, the tribute, which his predeceſſor Theodoſius the younger had agreed to pay him yearly [o]. But this was only a feint, ſays Jornandes, to conceal his real deſign, which was to return into Gaul, and there make war upon the Viſigoths. Purſuant to this deſign, having left Pannonia, and croſſed Rhætia, he followed the courſe of the Rhone, entered the country now known by the name of Dauphiny, and there fell unexpectedly upon the Alans,

who had been allowed by Aetius, as we have hinted above, to settle in the Valentinois. But Thorismund, king of the Visigoths, whose dominions were parted from those of the Alans only by the Rhone, being well apprised, that Attila, in reducing the Alans, had no other view but to open himself a way into his territories, joined his neighbours with all his forces, and, meeting Attila, gave him a total overthrow; which obliged him to return with shame and disgrace into his own country [p]. Jornandes and Sigebert are the only writers, who mention this second irruption of the Hunns into Gaul; and Valesius, not without reason, questions the truth of what they write [q]. Perhaps Thorismund made war upon the Alans, who, finding themselves attacked by so powerful an enemy, called in a body of Hunns to their assistance; but were defeated, together with their allies, by the king of the Visigoths; for Gregory of Tours tells us, that Thorismund subdued the Alans [r]. As for Jornandes, we have shewn, in several places of the Roman history, that he was far from being well acquainted with the affairs of the Visigoths. We find no farther mention of Attila in the antient historians, till the time of his death, which happened, according to Idatius, immediately after he was returned from Italy [s]. Count Marcellinus places it in 454, but Prosper, Cassiodorus, and Victor Tunniensis, in 453, or 452. Jornandes gives us the following account of his death, which he copied from Priscus: Attila, not satisfied with the many wives he had already, married a young woman of extraordinary beauty, named Ildico. On the day of the nuptials, which were celebrated with the utmost magnificence, the king, transported with joy, drank to excess, contrary to his custom; and being overcome with sleep, retired with his bride, and slept with his face upwards. In that posture he was seized with an hæmorrhagia, or flux of blood, to which he was subject. As the blood had not a free course through the usual passages, it fell into his throat, and stifled him [t]. The next day day, his officers, not seeing him appear, began to apprehend, that some misfortune had happened to him. Having therefore long waited for him in vain, they called him with great noise, and, not hearing him stir nor answer, they at length forced the doors of his apartment, when they found him dead, without any marks of violence, and his bride sitting by him bathed in tears, and covering her face with her vail. At this sight they cut part of their hair, according to the custom of their nation, and tore their faces, to bewail so great a warrior, not with tears, like women, but, like men, with blood [u]. To this account Priscus adds a very remarkable circumstance, which he will not allow us to call into question, viz. that the very night Attila died, the emperor Marcian being very uneasy and restless in reflecting on the menaces and great power of that warlike prince, his bow was shewn him broken in many pieces; which was revealing to him the death of an enemy, whom he so much dreaded, and at the same time informing him, that the vast empire he had founded in the north would be soon divided, and, as it were, broken in pieces. Count Marcellinus writes, that the tyrant of Europe underwent the fate of Holophernes, being killed, as he was, by a woman [x]. But Cassiodorus [y] and Theophanes [z] agree in their account of his death with Jornandes. Thus, he was justly punished, says Jornandes [a], with a dishonourable and ignominious death, for the cruel and unnatural murder of his brother, and the streams of blood, which his unbounded ambition had prompted him to shed. His body was conveyed with great solemnity from the place where he died to the fields, and there laid under a silk tent, which some horsemen, chosen out of the whole nation of the Hunns, often riding round, sung, in a doleful strain, the noble atchievements of their king. This mournful ceremony was succeeded by a joyful one, a great banquet on the deceased prince's tomb, which lasted till the night was far spent, when his body was secretly interred, being inclosed in three coffins, the first of gold, the second of silver, and the third of iron. The latter was to signify, that he had subdued many nations with his sword; and the two former, that he had obliged the Roman emperors to share their treasures with him. In the same grave with him were buried the arms and rich spoils, which he had taken in war from other princes, and great commanders. In the end, all those were put to death, who had been employed about his grave, lest their avarice should, some time or other, prompt them to plunder it [b]. This is all we find in the antients concerning Attila the renowned king of the Hunns. We might have added many things from the chronicles of Hungary, from Callimachus, and Olahus, who have written the life of that prince, and filled whole books with his exploits; but, as their accounts are not vouched by the antients, and their authority is of no weight in itself, we have not thought any thing they relate worthy of notice. With Attila ended the empire, which he had, with so much blood and treaſure, founded in the north; for a civil war being kindled upon his death among his numerous iſſue, the ſeveral nations he had ſubdued laid hold of that opportunity to ſhake off the yoke, and recover their antient liberty. Thus the Hunns ceaſed to be the terror of both empires, and, for ſeveral ages, performed nothing which hiſtorians have thought worthy of mention.

He is ſucceeded by Ellac. Year of Chriſt 453.

Attila had by his laſt will, as we read in Jornandes [c], appointed Ellac, his eldeſt ſon, to ſucceed him, and to rule over his other children as well as over the many nations he had conquered. Ellac was, it ſeems, a man of great boldneſs, intrepidity, and experience in war, and conſequently capable of maintaining, and even extending the conqueſts of his father; but as he had an incredible number of brothers, and they all jointly inſiſted upon an equal diviſion of their father's dominions, a bloody war was kindled, which involved in the utmoſt confuſion, not only the northern provinces, but both Pannonias, and the other countries on the Danube, where the Romans had allowed them to ſettle. But while they all ſtrove to be ſovereigns, they all loſt the ſovereignty for which they ſtrove; for Ardaric, king of the Gepidæ, hearing that they propoſed to divide among them by lot the nations, which their father had conquered, and not able to bear, that powerful kings, and warlike people, ſhould be thus treated like the meaneſt ſlaves, openly declared, that he would not obey the ſons of Attila, but reſcue himſelf and his people from the yoke they ſo ſhamefully groaned under. His example was followed by ſeveral other nations, that haſtened to join him. Ellac, leaving for the preſent his brothers, marched againſt him at the head of all his forces. Hereupon a battle enſued on the banks of the Netad in Pannonia, in which the Hunns were utterly routed, and thirty thouſand of them killed on the ſpot, with their king Ellac, who is ſaid on that occaſion to have performed wonders, and to have behaved like a true ſon of the great Attila [d]. The Hunns were ſo diſheartened with this overthrow, and the general revolt of the nations they had conquered, that, being preſſed by the Gepidæ, they retired to the country, which they had taken from the Goths in 376, towards the Euxine ſea and the mouths of the Danube, and the Gepidæ remained maſters of all antient Dacia, lying north of that river, which the Hunns had poſſeſſed ever ſince their firſt irruption into Europe. The Gepidæ begged the friendſhip of the Romans, and a ſmall annual penſion to ſupport them; which was readily granted, and continued to be paid even in the time of the emperor Juſtinian [e]. Several other nations, thus delivered from the yoke of the Hunns, begged and obtained leave of Marcian, or his ſucceſſor Leo, to ſettle in the Roman territories. Among theſe mention is made of the Squiri, Satagairæ, and Alans, who, under the conduct of Candax, their king or leader, ſettled in Leſſer Scythia and Lower Mæſia. To the Rugians, Sarmatians, and Cemandrians, lands were granted in Illyricum, near a place called the Caſtle of Mars. To the Oſtrogoths Marcian granted all Pannonia, from Sirmium, now Sirmiſh in Sclavonia, to Vindobona, at preſent Vienna in Auſtria. Even Ernac, Attila's youngeſt ſon, and with him ſeveral Hunns, ſubmitted to the Romans, who granted them lands on the moſt diſtant borders of Leſſer Scythia in Dacia, and amongſt the Sarmatians in Illyricum [h]. The other ſons of Attila, uniting their forces, attempted to drive the Goths out of Pannonia, and recover that province; but Valemir, king of the Goths meeting them with only a handful of men, ſays Jornandes, put them to flight, and purſued them with ſuch ſlaughter, that few of them eſcaped [i]. About eight years after, while the Goths were engaged in a war with the Satagæ, Dinzio, one of Attila's ſons, and ſtyled by Jornandes king of the Hunns, having aſſembled what forces he could, entered the territories of the Goths, putting all to fire and ſword, and laid ſiege to Baſiana, thought to be the preſent city of Poſega, the metropolis of a country bearing the ſame name, and lying between the Save and the Drave [k]. This the Goths no ſooner underſtood, than, leaving the Satagæ, they marched againſt the Hunns, and drove them out with ſuch ſlaughter, that they never after offered to moleſt them [l].

They are utterly routed by the Goths.

THE Hunns, thus weakened by their inteſtine wars, and the great loſſes they had ſuſtained in the two above-mentioned irruptions, continued quiet till the year 466, when paſſing the Danube in the depth of winter on the ice, they broke into Dacia, under the conduct of one Hormidac, and committed dreadful ravages in that province, putting all to fire and ſword. But Anthemius, who was afterwards emperor, marching againſt them with another general, whom our author does not name, gained ſeveral advantages over them, and at laſt defeated them in a pitched battle, during which the other general went over to the enemy; but his men, probably the cavalry, for Anthemius was general of the foot, not following him, Anthemius, without betraying the leaſt fear or ſurpriſe, continued the engagement, and in the end gained a complete victory. However, he ſuffered the Hunns to retire unmoleſted, upon their putting to death the general who had gone over to them [m]. The Hunns

were no sooner returned to their own country, than the children of Attila sent deputies to Leo, then emperor of the east, to propose a peace, and beg he would appoint a market to be held on the Danube, to which the Hunns might freely resort, and trade with the Romans. To this Leo would by no means consent; which Dengizic, one of the sons of Attila, by Jornandes [n] called Dinzio, and by others Dinziric [o], resented to such a degree, that he was for continuing the war. But his brother Hernac, who, as we said above, had been allowed by the emperor Marcian to settle in Lesser Scythia, and was then engaged in other wars, declared he would by no means enter into this [p]. Dengizic however, persisting in his first resolution, drew together a considerable army, and encamped on the banks of the Danube. Arnagastus, who, at that time, guarded the banks of that river on the side of Thrace, sent immediately an officer to the Hunns, to inquire upon what provocation they had taken arms. Dengizic answered, That he had taken arms with a design to make war upon Leo, unless he granted to him and his men lands and money. To this Arnagastus replied by the emperor's orders, That Leo would readily grant both to such as were willing to submit to him, and serve him in his wars. But Dengizic, not satisfied with this answer, began hostilities, and continued the war, of which we know no particulars, till he was killed by Arnagastus, styled, on that occasion, general of Thrace [q]. His head was sent to Constantinople in 468, or 469, and carried into the city with great pomp, while the people were beholding the sports of the circus, which they left for a sight to them far more agreeable. It was borne through the chief streets of the city on the point of a spear, and left for some days exposed to public view [r].

The Hunns, disheartened with the losses they sustained in this war, and the death of their leader, continued, it seems, quiet for the space of near sixty years, without molesting either the Romans, or their neighbours; for we find no mention made of them from this time to the year 526, the first of the emperor Justinian's reign, when two of their kings, Styrax and Glones, stirred up by Cabades king of Persia, then at war with the Romans, broke into the empire at the head of two powerful armies; but Boarex, the widow of Balach king of the Sabirite Hunns, a woman of a warlike genius, and manly temper, espousing the cause of the Romans against the Persians, led to the assistance of the emperor an army of an hundred thouſand ſtrong; and, meeting the two kings, gave them battle, cut moſt of their men in pieces, and took Styrax himſelf priſoner, and ſent him in chains to Conſtantinople [s]. It is a great pity, that neither Theophanes, nor the author of the miſcellaneous hiſtory, have named this brave Amazon, this warlike heroine, who deſerved ſo well of the empire. The ſame year Gordas, king of the Hunns dwelling near the Boſporus Cimmerius, came in perſon to Conſtantinople, to court the friendſhip of Juſtinian, and conclude an alliance with that prince; which he did accordingly. As he had an opportunity, during his ſtay at Conſtantinople, of ſeeing the ceremonies of the chriſtian religion, he was ſo taken with them, that he deſired to be inſtructed in the myſteries of our holy faith, and, in the end, with great ſolemnity, received the ſacrament of baptiſm in the preſence of the emperor, who was his ſponſor. Upon his departure, Juſtinian loaded him with rich preſents, committing to him the defence of the borders of the empire on that ſide, eſpecially of the city of Boſporus. Gordas, returning home, ordered the idols to be broken, and their temples demoliſhed, throughout his dominions; which enraged the ſuperſtitious populace to ſuch a degree, that, revolting from their prince, they ſeized him, put him to death, and raiſed his brother, named Mugaris, to the throne in his room. Mugaris was no ſooner proclaimed king, than he marched, with all his forces, againſt the city of Boſporus, and, having ſurpriſed it, put all the Romans he found there to the ſword. The emperor, being acquainted with what had happened, and greatly grieved for the death of his friend and ally, diſpatched one John, who had been conſul, at the head of a numerous army of Scythians, to recover the place, and take vengeance of the rebels; but, at his approach, they abandoned the city, and fled with ſuch precipitation, that the Roman general could never come up with them [t]. We ſhould more readily give credit to theſe remarkable events, were they vouched either by Procopius or Agathias; but the ſilence of theſe two writers makes us queſtion the truth of what the others relate. But the irruption, which happened in 539, the thirteenth of the emperor Juſtinian's reign, is atteſted by Procopius. The Hunns, according to that writer, paſſing the Danube that year in great multitudes, laid waſte Thrace, Greece, Illyricum, and all the provinces from the Ionian ſea to the very ſuburbs of Conſtantinople; nay, having croſſed the Helleſpont, they extended their ravages to Aſia, where they committed unheard-of cruelties; and thence croſ-fing again into the Cherſoneſus, they returned home, loaded with an immenſe booty. In this irruption they took thirty-two caſtles in Illyricum, deſtroyed Caſſandria, and carried with them unmoleſted an hundred and twenty thouſand captives [u]. Being thus become anew formidable to the empire, Juſtinian, to keep them quiet, allowed them ſome lands in Thrace, and agreed to pay them an annual penſion, upon their promiſing to ſerve, when wanted, in the Roman armies. Theſe were the Cuturgurian Hunns. As for the Uturgurians, who had joined them in this irruption, they retired, with their booty, to their own country bordering on the Euxine ſea; but, finding that too narrow for them, they drove out the Goths, by Procopius called Detraxitæ, who had ſettled in the neighbourhood of the Palus Mæotis, and poſſeſſed themſelves of their country. As they were at a great diſtance from the empire, they turned their arms againſt their neighbours the Sarmatians, endeavouring to enlarge their bounds on that ſide, without giving any further moleſtation to the Romans. But the Cuturgurians, notwithſtanding the penſion paid them yearly by the emperor, made ſeveral inroads into the neighbouring provinces, behaving like declared enemies, ſays Procopius, while they pretended to be friends and allies. Hereupon the emperor wrote to the Uturgurians, complaining to them of their countrymen, and offering to pay to them the penſion, which he allowed the Cuturgurians, provided they put a ſtop to the ravages of the latter, and engaged to make war upon them as often as they broke into the empire. The Uturgurians, encouraged with this offer, paſſing the Tanais, beyond which many of them dwelt, haſtened with long marches into the Roman territories, and, falling unexpectedly upon the Cuturgurians, while buſied in plundering the provinces lying on the Danube, defeated them with great ſlaughter, obliged them to quit their booty, and drove them quite out of the empire [w]. However, a few years after, that is, in 558, the Cuturgurian Hunns, taking advantage of the froſt, paſſed the Danube, and, after having laid waſte great part of Mæſia and Thrace, divided their numerous forces into two bodies, one of them taking their route towards Greece, and the other marching for the Thracian Cherſoneſus. The latter, under the conduct of one of their chiefs, named Zamerga, having paſſed the long wall, came, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition, within an hundred and fifty furlongs of Conſtantinople, and laid waſte the whole country round it. But Beliſarius, though weakened with old age to ſuch a degree, that he was ſcarce able to hold a ſhield, or brandiſh a ſword, marching out againſt them with a handful of men, fell upon them unawares, put them to flight, and delivered both the emperor and the city from the dangers that threatened them; but that brave commander being diſgraced upon his return to Conſtantinople, as we have related elſewhere [x], the barbarians, who were haſtening back to their own country, no ſooner heard, that he was no more to be employed againſt them, than they returned before the royal city, committing dreadful ravages in all the countries through which they paſſed. But one Germanus, a youth of great expectation, putting himſelf at the head of the imperial troops, fell unexpectedly upon them, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to ſave themſelves by a precipitous flight. The victory had proved complete, had not young Germanus, by expoſing his perſon more than a prudent general would have done, received a dangerous wound, which prevented him from purſuing the fugitives. Soon after, that party, which had taken their route towards Greece, finding the ſtraights of Thermopylæ guarded by the natives, returned to Thrace, and there joined Zamerga, who, being thus reinforced, threatened to renew his ravages, and to put to death all the priſoners he had taken, unleſs a ſufficient ſum was ſent forthwith to redeem them. Juſtinian, not caring to provoke the barbarians, and at the ſame time pitying the condition of the unhappy captives, ſent a conſiderable ſum to Zamerga; who no ſooner received it, than he ſet the priſoners at liberty, and, putting a ſtop to all hoſtilities and depredations, returned beyond the Danube. In the mean time, the emperor privately diſpatched embaſſadors to Sandilichus, king of the Uturgurian Hunns, to whom he paid an annual penſion, acquainting him with the late inroads of the Cuturgurians, to whom, he ſaid, he had paid the ſum that was due to him, and was reſolved to do ſo for the future, unleſs he ſhewed himſelf, by a ſpeedy revenge, worthy of his friendſhip. Upon this meſſage, Sandilichus, highly incenſed againſt the Cuturgurians, broke into their territories at the head of a powerful army, and, falling upon Zamerga as he was returning from Thrace, cut great numbers of his men in pieces, and obliged him to quit the rich booty, with which his army was loaded. This gave riſe to a bloody war between the two nations, which laſted many years, ſays Agathias [y], from whom we have borrowed this whole account, and ended at laſt in the ruin of both; for, being greatly weakened by their civil wars, they became a prey, ſays that writer, to other nations, inſomuch, that they loſt their very name, and were blended with the nations they ſerved. But the utter deſtruction of that people, continues our hiſtorian, happened afterwards, as ſhall be related by us, according to the order of time. With theſe words he cloſes the fifth book of his hiſtory, the laſt of thoſe that have reached us; ſo that for a further account of the affairs of the Hunns, we muſt have recourſe to more modern writers. Among theſe, Venantius Fortunatus tells us, that, in 560, a great body of Hunns, probably driven out of their own country by the neighbouring nations, took their route through Germany, with a deſign to paſs the Rhine, as Attila had formerly done, and ſettle in Gaul. In that country then reigned the four ſons of Clotharius, viz. Cherebert at Paris; Chilperic at Soiſſons; Guntram at Orleans; and Sigebert at Mentz. The latter was no ſooner informed of the motions of the Hunns, than, paſſing the Rhine at the head of a powerful army, he reſolved to meet them in Thuringia, which then belonged to him, and there give them battle. Accordingly the two armies met, and engaged on the banks of the Elb with incredible fury. The victory was long doubtful; but in the end Sigebert, who was a warlike prince, gained a complete victory over the barbarians, of whom he killed many thouſands, and obliged the reſt to return through by-ways into Pannonia [z].

They are defeated by Sigebert, king of the Franks. Year after Chriſt 560.

No farther mention is made of the Hunns by any credible hiſtorian, till the reign of Charles the Great, in whoſe time they were maſters of Dacia, now Tranſylvania, and Valachia; of Upper Mœſia, now Servia; and of the two Pannonias, viz. the Upper, containing the preſent provinces of Carniola, Carinthia, and the greater part of Auſtria; and the Lower, comprifing Boſnia, Sclavonia, and that part of Hungary that lies beyond the Danube. In the year 776, while Charles was in Saxony, two princes of the Hunns, Caganus and Jugunus, ſent embaſſadors to him, deſiring his friendſhip and alliance. Charles received them with extraordinary marks of honour, and readily complied with their requeſt. However, they entered, not long after, into an alliance with Taſſilo duke of Bavaria, who, revolting from Charles, raiſed great diſturbances in Germany. This Charles wiſely diſſembled, till he had utterly reduced Bavaria, when a miſunderſtanding ariſing between him and them about the borders of their reſpective territories, he reſolved to lay hold of that opportunity to be revenged on them for their ſending under-hand ſuccours to Taſſilo. Accordingly he ordered levies to be made throughout his dominions, and having by that means aſſembled a very numerous army, he divided it into two bodies, whereof one he committed to the conduct of count Theodoric, and Magnifrid, his chamberlain, with orders to break into Dacia, while he himself, with the other, entered Pannonia by the way of Bavaria. The two armies laid waste the territories of the Hunns far and near, burnt their villages, and took several of their strong-holds, to which they had fled, not being able to keep the field against so powerful an enemy. Thus he continued ravaging the country, putting all to fire and sword, for the space of eight years, till that warlike nation was intirely subdued, and almost utterly extirpated. In one of these expeditions, Henry duke of Forum Julii, now Friuli, took the royal palace of the Hunns, called Rhing, in which he found an immense booty, great part whereof was, by Charles's orders, sent to Rome, as a present to that see, or, as they term it, to St. Peter [a]. The intire reduction of the Hunns happened, according to the best chronologers, in the year of the christian æra 794. Some authors write, that, by this long war, the whole race of the antient Hunns was cut off; and that the country was afterwards peopled by the neighbouring nations, to whom the present Hungarians owe their origin. Of this opinion was the celebrated Æneas Sylvius, raised afterwards to the see of Rome. But the Hungarian writers maintain their nation to be descended from the antient Hunns, who, they say, were subdued, but not utterly extirpated, by the Franks. To confirm this, Bonfinius tells us, that in his time, a nation was, by some merchants, discovered on the banks of the Tanais, speaking the same language with that of the present Hungarians, and that Matthias, then king of Hungary, being assured by persons of credit, whom he himself had sent into those parts, that the report of the merchants was true, dispatched embassadors to the chiefs of that nation, intreating them to send a numerous colony into Hungary, at that time but thinly inhabited, by reason of the long war, in which great numbers of the natives had perished. The prince's request, says our author, has not yet been, but will be, we hope, one time, or other, complied with [b]. Others write, that, upon the death of Attila, the Hunns were quite driven out of Pannonia, and never returned till the year 744, when, under the conduct of one Hungar, a word signifying in their language courageous or valiant, they entered Pannonia anew, and settled in the antient seats of their forefathers, after having driven out those, who, coming from the neighbouring countries, had seized them, and held them for some ages. From Hungar they were called Hungarians, and the country no longer Pannonia, but Hungary. Thus Ranzacus [c]; but what he writes evidently contradicts all the antient historians, who, as we have seen in the course of this history, speak frequently of the irruptions of the Hunns, of their passing the Danube, and laying waste the Roman provinces, long after the death of Attila and his children. Besides, the inhabitants of Pannonia are, by the writers of those times, constantly styled Hunns, and no mention is made of any other nation dwelling in that country. As for the name of Hungari, most writers will have it to be compounded of Hunni and Avares, two names of one and the same nation [d]. But, on this subject, nothing can be offered, but what is founded on mere conjecture. And this is all we have been able to gather from the antients concerning the origin, migrations, government, manners, and wars, of the Hunns. As for the modern writers of the history of Hungary, their accounts of those antient times are, for the most part, evidently fabulous, quite groundless, or altogether improbable. We have therefore all along confined ourselves to the antient and original writers, who lived in or near the times, in which the things they relate were transacted, not thinking any thing related by the moderns, and not vouched by them, worthy of a place in our history.

The antient state and history of the Goths, till the settling of the Visigoths in Spain, and the Ostrogoths in Italy.

Scandinavia the country of the Goths.

THE Goths, a warlike nation, and, above all others, famous in the Roman history, came originally, according to Jornandes [a], out of Scandinavia, a country rightly styled by him officina gentium, and vagina nationum, on account of the incredible multitudes of people, that, issuing from thence in swarms, over-ran and stocked with inhabitants other, as well distant as neighbouring, countries. Scandinavia, comprising the present Sweden, Norway, Lapland, and Finmark, was, by the antients, thought to be an island [b]; but it is now well known to be a peninsula. It is by Pliny called Scandinavia [c], or, as Vossius [d], and after him Groncovius, will have it, Scandinovia; by Xenophon Lampsacenus, Baltia [e]; by Timæus, Basilea; silea; and by Pytheas, sometimes Basilea, and sometimes Abalus [f]. The writers of the middle ages style it Scanza, Scanzia, Scantia, and Scandia; which names, as well as that of Scandinavia, some derive from the German or Gothic word Scanzen, signifying castles; for the first inhabitants, say they, turned the high and steep rocks, with which the country abounds, into castles; and hence came the word Scandinavia, that is, a country filled with castles [g]. Others will have the names Scandinavia, Scanzia, &c. to come from the word Seekanten, importing the sea-coast or shore [h]. As for the Greek word Baltia, it signifies a breaking in of the sea. What we call the Baltic, was known to Tacitus by the name of the Suevian sea; and to Mela and Pliny by that of the Codan gulf. The bay into which the Vistula, now the Weissel, empties itself, is called by Ptolemy the Venedic bay, no doubt from the neighbouring Venedi, the antient inhabitants of Livonia, Lithuania, and part of Poland. In antient times the Vistula was the boundary on the east between Germany and Sarmatia. In Scandinavia Tacitus places two different nations, the Suiones and the Sittones, of whom the former inhabited the present Sweden, and the latter Norway; for they were separated, according to Tacitus, by mount Sevo, now Scagen; which mountain, or rather ridge of mountains, parts Norway from Sweden. The Suiones were divided, according to Ptolemy, into the following tribes, viz. the Chedini, Phavoni, Phiræsi, Dauciones, Hilleviones, Scritofinni or Scritobani, mentioned also by Procopius [i], and the Gutæ. But these were either Gothic nations, or had settled in the country after the Goths were masters of it, it being certain, that, long before Tacitus's time, Scandinavia was inhabited by the Goths, though not yet known to the Romans by that name; nay, the learned Grotius, and after him Sheringham, and most of the northern writers, maintain with arguments, which have not yet been confuted, that the Cimbrians, Getes, and Goths, were one and the same nation; that Scandinavia was first peopled by them; and that from thence they sent colonies into the islands in the Baltic, the Chersonesus, and the adjacent places, yet destitute of inhabitants. The islands were called by them with one common name Wetallaheedh, signifying, in the Gothic language, land surrounded on all sides with water; but the Romans, after they became acquainted with the Goths under the name of Cimbrians, called them the Cimbrian islands; which placed there by Tacitus and Ptolemy.

appellation

appellation they gave likewiſe to the Cherſoneſus, now Jutland[k]. The time when the Goths firſt ſettled in Scandinavia, and the time when they firſt peopled with their colonies the iſlands, the Cherſoneſus, and the neighbouring places, are equally uncertain, though the Gothic annals ſuppoſe the latter to have happened under the conduct of king Eric, whom they make contemporary with Saruch, the great-grandfather of Abraham. But it is not at all probable, as Sheringham well obſerves, that Scandinavia, a country of no ſmall extent, ſhould, in the time of Saruch, who died ſoon after the confuſion of languages, abound with people, ſo as to ſend colonies into other countries[l]. Of this migration of the Getes or Goths from Scandinavia into the above-mentioned places, under the conduct of king Eric, mention is made in all the antient Gothic chronicles, and it is moreover vouched by the Daniſh, as well as the Swediſh, writers, who agree all in this, though they diſagree, as it generally happens between neighbouring and rival nations, in moſt other points. The Danes ingenuouſly confeſs, and confeſs it they muſt, unleſs they give the lye to their own chronicles, that their country was firſt peopled by the Goths of Scandinavia; that to them they owe their origin, and that Dan, the ſon of Humelus, king of the Goths, from whom their country was called Dania, and they Dani, was the founder of their kingdom[m]. This is agreeable to what we read in Jornandes and Freculphus, who tell us, that the Danes were the deſcendants of the Oſtrogoths dwelling in Scanzia[n]. The peopling of the iſlands in the Baltic ſea, of the Cherſoneſus, and the adjacent places on the continent, is called, by the northern writers, the firſt migration of the Goths or Getes.

The ſecond migration is related by Jornandes, and ſuppoſed to have happened ſeveral ages after the firſt, when the above-mentioned countries being overſtocked with people, Berig, at that time king of the Goths, went out with a fleet in queſt of new ſettlements, and landing in the country of the Ulmerugians, now Pomerania, drove out the antient inhabitants, and divided their lands amongſt his followers. He fell next upon the Vandals, whoſe country bordered on that of the Ulmerugians, overcame them, but, inſtead of forcing them, as he had done the Ulmerugians, from their antient ſeats, he only obliged them, probably becauſe they were of Gothic extraction, to ſhare their poſſeſſions with the new-comers[o].

THE Goths, who had ſettled in Pomerania, and the adjacent parts of Germany, being greatly increaſed, inſomuch, that the country could no longer maintain them, they went out in great numbers under Filimer, ſurnamed the Great, their fifth prince after their leaving Scandinavia, and, taking their route eaſtward, entered Scythia, advanced to the Cimmerian Boſporus, and, driving out the Cimmerians, ſettled in the neighbourhood of the Mæotic lake. Thence, in proceſs of time, they ſent numerous colonies into Thrace, Dacia, and Mæſia, and laſtly into the countries bordering on the Euxine ſea, forcing everywhere the antient inhabitants to abandon their native ſeats. Thus Jornandes [p], and Ablavius, a celebrated writer among the Goths, who flouriſhed long before him. In the neighbourhood of the Mæotic lake, they had Filimer for their king, a warlike prince; in Thrace, Mæſia and Dacia, Xamolxis, a great philoſopher; and in the countries on the Euxine ſea, princes of the illuſtrious families of the Balthi and the Amali, the Viſigoths being ſubject to the former, and the Oſtrogoths to the latter [q]. In all theſe countries they were one and the ſame people, though ſubject to different princes, and known by different names. Thus, in Cimmeria, Sarmatia, Scythia, they were called Cimmerians, Sarmatians, Scythians; in Thrace, Dacia, and Mæſia, Thracians, Dacians, and Mæſians; and in the neighbourhood of the Iſter and the Pontus, Iſtrians and Pontics. As for the appellations of Weſtrogoths, ſoftened by the Latins into that of Viſigoths and Oſtrogoths, they were diſtinguiſhed by theſe names, as Grotius ſhews from Jornandes, before they left Scandinavia, being called Weſtrogoths and Oſtrogoths, or Weſtern and Eaſtern Goths, from their ſituation there to the eaſt and weſt, the former inhabiting that part of Scandinavia, which borders on Denmark, and the latter the more eaſtern parts, lying on the Baltic [r]. What Jornandes writes of the various migrations and ſettlements of the Goths, is intirely agreeable to what we read in the antient Greek and Latin authors, concerning the various migrations and ſettlements of the Getes [s]. And truly, that the Goths and Getes were one aud the ſame people, is ſuppoſed by all the writers, who flouriſhed in or near the times, in which both empires were over-run by them. Theſe authors, without all doubt, well acquainted with their origin, call them ſometimes Goths, ſometimes Getes, and ſometimes Scythians; nay, ſeveral writers, namely Oroſius [t], who flouriſhed in the reign of Arca-

dius and Honorius, when the Goths broke into Italy, under the conduct of the famous Alaric, St. Jerom [u], St. Austin [w], Synesius [x], Photius [y], Capitolinus [z], Vopiscus [a], Spartian [b], tell us in expres terms, that the Getes and Goths were one and the same nation; and that they had been long known to the Romans, and likewise to the Greeks, by the former name, but not by the latter, till their breaking into the empire. That this opinion was not, as some modern authors have been pleased to call it, a vulgar error, may be plainly proved; for in the first place, it is evident from all the antients, that the Getes inhabited that part of Scythia, which is by Ptolemy called Asiatic Sarmatia, and comprises the Taurica Chersonesus, with the countries lying between the Tanais, the Mæotic lake, and the Euxine sea. On the other hand, it is no less evident from all the writers, who speak of the Goths, that, from those very countries, they broke into the empire. Since therefore the Goths dwelt in the countries, where all the antients place the Getes, we cannot help concluding from thence, that they were one and the same people, though known by different names. Ptolemy, who lived in the time of the emperor Antoninus, mentions no Goths in Scythia, Thrace, Mæsia, or Pannonia; and nevertheless, scarce was half a century passed, when the Goths, coming in swarms from those very countries, over-ran great part of the empire. These Goths therefore, if we will not allow them to have dropt all on a sudden from the clouds, must have been the very people, who are by Ptolemy called Getes, Pontics, Istrians, Trapezites, Gelonians, and Sauromatæ, and were soon after known to the Romans by the common name of Goths. Were all those nations utterly destroyed, and their seats seized by the Goths? Of this general slaughter no mention is made by any historian; and we cannot persuade ourselves, that, if it happened, the writers of those times, who speak of the Goths, would have passed over in silence such a memorable event. Cluverius, who will have the Getes and Goths to be two different nations, believes, or at least would make us believe, that they dwelt together in the same countries. But is it at all probable, that two nations, obeying different princes, should live peaceably together in the same country, in the same cities, and within the same walls? How came the Getes to be so early known to the Romans, and the Goths, living among them, utterly unknown till their breaking into the empire? It

ſeems to us a paradox that the Romans, who were conſtantly at war with thoſe nations, and had both colonies and gariſons among them, ſhould be well acquainted with the Getes, and utterly unacquainted with the Goths, a warlike and numerous nation, inhabiting the ſame countries. Beſides, Mela tells us in expreſs terms, that Thrace, the banks of the Tanais, Sarmatia, and the countries lying eaſt of the Mæotic lake, were inhabited by one and the ſame people, though known by different names [c]; and Strabo, that the Iſtrians, Dacians, Mæſians, and Thracians, ſpoke the ſame language, and conſequently were the ſame people [d]. To theſe we may add Procopius, and Ammianus Marcellinus, of whom the former writes, that there were ſeveral nations of the Goths, ſome being called by the antients Sauromatæ, others Melanclæni, and ſome Getes; but that theſe nations differed only in name [e]; and the latter, ſpeaking of the Goths, ſays, that they inhabited Thrace, Mæſia, and Dacia, and were ſprung from the fierce nations, that dwelt before in thoſe countries, that is, from the Getes [f]. That the Getes and Goths were one people, and not two different nations living in the ſame country, as Cluverius would have it, may be further confirmed by the great conformity of their laws, manners, and inſtitutions; for, if we compare the accounts, which the antients give us of the manners of the Getes, we ſhall find them intirely agreeable to thoſe of the more modern writers deſcribing the cuſtoms and manners of the Goths [g]. Their language was likewiſe the ſame, the Gothic being ſpoken by the Getes and Thiſſagetes in Scythia, Thrace, Pontus, &c. as Grotius [h], and after him Sheringham [i], have ſhewn; nay, Buſbequius aſſures us, that, in his time, the Gothic language was ſtill ſpoken, though with ſome variation in the dialect, by the Tartars of Precop [k]; and Joſaphat Barbarus, a nobleman of Venice, who lived among them, that they not only ſpeak the antient Gothic language, but call themſelves Goths, and their country Gothia [l]. Scaliger adds, that the chriſtian Tartars of Precop ſtill have the ſcripture written with the ſame characters, that were invented by Wulphilas, the firſt biſhop of the Goths, and that they read it in the very language they ſpoke in the time of Ovid [m]. This is agreeable to what we read in Lucian and Procopius, of whom the former tells us, that the language of the Alans, who were, without all doubt, a Gothic nation, was common to all the Scythians; and the latter, that the Sauromatæ and the Melanclæni, by moſt writers called Getes, were Gothic nations, and ſpoke the language of the Goths [n]. Of the antient language of the Getes only the names of a few kings have reached us, and theſe Boxhornius ſhews to be all Gothic [o].

The migration of the Goths under Woden.

THE Goths, being in proceſs of time greatly increaſed in Scythia, reſolved to ſeek new ſettlements; and accordingly, taking their route eaſtward, and travelling through ſeveral countries, they returned at length into Germany. Their leader, in this migration, was the celebrated Woden, called alſo Voden, Oden, Othen, Godan, and Guodan. Of this Woden many ſtrange and wonderful things are related in the Sueo-Gothic chronicles. He was king of the Aſgardians, whom the northern writers will have to be the ſame people with the Aſpurgians, mentioned by Strabo and Ptolemy. They were called Aſpurgians from the city of Aſpurgia, placed by Strabo near the Boſporus Cimmerius [p]; and in the ſame place ſtood, according to the northern writers, the city of Aſgardia: and truly that theſe were but two different names of one and the ſame city, is highly probable, the word gard ſignifying, in the Gothic language, the ſame thing as purgos in the Greek, viz. a fortreſs or caſtle. Aſpurgia was the metropolis of a province, which Strabo calls Aſia; and Woden and his followers are ſtyled by the antient Gothic writers Aſæ, Aſiani, and Aſiotæ. The kings of Aſpurgia were maſters of all that part of Scythia, that lay weſt of mount Imaus, and was by the Latins called Scythia intra Imaum, or Scythia within mount Imaus. In this large tract of ground are placed by Ptolemy three different nations, the Auſones, the Syebi, and the Iotæ; but they are all blended by Strabo under the common name of Aſpurgians. Of this Aſpurgia, or Aſgardia, Woden was king, who, committing the government of the kingdom to his two brothers, Ve and Velir, went out, with incredible multitudes of his people, in queſt of new ſettlements, foreſeeing by his magic, ſay ſome antient chronicles, in which art he excelled all men, that he, and his poſterity, ſhould reign for many ages in the northern parts of the world. He firſt entered Riiſland, and having, with great ſucceſs and expedition, obliged the inhabitants to ſubmit, he appointed his ſon Bo to reign over them. Riiſland, called by the Latins Roxalania and Ruſſia, extended from the mouth of the Viſtula to the Palus Mæotis, the banks of the Tanais, and the Riphæan mountains, and compriſed Pruſſia, Livonia, and great part of Muſcovy. From Riiſland he went by ſea into the north parts of Germany, and, landing in Saxony, he reduced that country, and divided it amongſt his children, appointing Vegdegg king of Eaſt Saxony, Begdegg of Weſtphalia, and Sigg of Francenia. Johannes Martinus, Wittekindus, Cranzius, and all the Saxon writers, aſſure us, that, time out of mind, a tradition has univerſally obtained among the Saxons, that their anceſtors came firſt by ſea into thoſe countries. From Saxony, Woden paſſed into Reidogothland, now Jutland, which he likewiſe ſubdued, and gave to his ſon Skiold, from whom deſcended the kings of Denmark, thence called Skiolldungar, that is, the poſterity of Skiold. Leaving Jutland, after he had ſettled his ſon there, he advanced into Suithiod, now Sweden, where he was kindly received by Gylfus or Gylvo, king of the country, and, being allowed to ſettle there with his followers, he built the city of Sigtunum, where he reigned to his death, and became ſo famous, that his name reached all countries, and he was, by the northern nations, ranked among the gods, and worſhipped with divine honours. He is ſuppoſed to have brought with him out of Aſia the Runic characters, and to have taught the northern nations the art of poetry; whence he is ſtyled the father of the Scaldi or Scaldri, who were their poets, and deſcribed in verſe the exploits of the great men of their nation, as the bards did thoſe of the Gauls and Britons. They were called Scaldi or Scaldri, according to Loccenius [q], from the ſound ſkal, often heard in their verſes and poems. The dialect, in which they wrote, was called Aſamal, that is, the Aſiatic dialect, becauſe brought by Woden out of Aſia. As for the Runic letters, the Goths uſed them in all their ſpells and inchantments, to which they were greatly addicted; whence after embracing the chriſtian religion, out of a blind and indiſcreet zeal, they deſtroyed ſeveral antient monuments, and burnt a great number of books, becauſe written with thoſe characters. At length, in the year 1001, the Runic characters were quite laid aſide in Sweden, and the Roman letters taken in their room. The Swedes being perſuaded thereunto by the pope, and by Sigfrig, a Britiſh biſhop [r]. In Spain they were forbidden in 1136, by Alphonſo king of Caſtile and Navar, and condemned by the council of Toledo in 1115 [s]. They were called Runic letters, according to ſome, from the Gothic word Ryn or Ren, ſignifying a furrow; according to others, from Ryne, ſignifying art, eſpecially that of magic [t]. One Fimbul, Fimbultyr, or Fimbulthular, is ſuppoſed to have invented theſe characters [u]. Wulphilas, the firſt biſhop of the Goths, invented other characters, which he made

uſe of in tranſlating the ſcripture into the Gothic tongue. But to return to Woden:

That the Goths, under his conduct, came out of Scythia into the north parts of Germany, is a received opinion among the northern writers, and confirmed by an immemorial tradition, by all the antient chronicles of thoſe countries, and by a great many monuments and inſcriptions in Runic characters, ſome of which are ſtill to be ſeen in Sweden, Denmark, and the neighbouring iſlands: and truly that there were ſuch migrations, can hardly be queſtioned, ſince we find the ſame names common to the inhabitants of Scandia and Aſiatic Scythia, and likewiſe the ſame language, as Grotius, and after him Sheringham, has ſhewn [w]; nay, the antient language of the Goths is ſpoken at this very day by the Tartars of Precop, as we have obſerved above; ſo that, upon the whole, we may conclude the Scandian Goths and the Aſiatic Scythians to have had one and the ſame original. As to Woden, there was, without all doubt, a famous hero of this name, who became wonderfully revered by all the northern nations; but we will not take upon us to vouch the ſtrange things that are related of him in the Suegothic and Sacogothic chronicles. Some writers ſuppoſe the migration of the Scythian Goths into the north parts of Germany, under the conduct of Woden, to have happened about twenty-four years before the birth of Chriſt; for at that time, ſay they, Pompey laid waſte Syria and great part of Aſia; and it is not improbable, that the Scythians, flying from him, went out in queſt of new ſettlements. But Sciold, who was by his father Woden appointed king of Reidogothland, or Jutland, as we have related above, lived, according to the Daniſh chronology, about a thouſand years before Pompey; ſo that, according to this account, Woden muſt have been more antient than Homer. On the other hand, how can this be reconciled with the genealogies of our Saxon kings, the founders of the heptarchy, who all derived their pedigree from Woden. Hengiſt, the firſt that came into Britain, did not arrive in this iſland till the year 449, of the chriſtian æra, and nevertheleſs he is ſaid to have been the abnepos or great-grandchild of Woden, as Cerdic, the founder of the kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons, the tenth by deſcent from him. To reconcile theſe ſeeming contradictions, ſome authors are of opinion, and their opinion does not at all ſeem to us improbable, that ſeveral perſons or great men bore the name of Woden, and what was done by all, was aſcribed to one, in the ſame manner as it happened among the Greeks with reſpect to Hercules. Be that as it will, the deſcendants

of the Scythians, or Asiatic Goths, who, under the conduct of Woden, settled in the north parts of Germany, were first known to the Romans by the name of Cimbrians, derived, according to the opinion, which seems to us the best grounded, from the Gothic word Kimber, signifying valiant. The Cimbrians held antiently the islands in the Baltic sea, the Chersonesus, and the neighbouring countries, and by degrees extended their conquests along the German ocean to both the mouths of the Rhine. The inland countries in that tract were likewise inhabited by them; but, in the different countries where they dwelt, they were distinguished by different names, some of them being called Saxons, others Suevians; some Angles, Sicambrians, Jutes, &c. but, by the Romans, they were all blended under the common name of Cimbrians, till the Saxons, placed by Ptolemy in the north part of the Chersonesus, became known to them by their conquests, and then the name of Cimbrians was quite laid aside, and that of Saxons used by the Latin writers in its room, which they gave likewise to the nations the Saxons had subdued, calling Saxony that part of Germany, which lies between the Rhine and the Elbe, and had been reduced by them. Thus far of the migrations of the Goths out of Scandinavia into the neighbouring islands and continent, thence into Germany, from Germany into Asia, and from Asia back again into Germany. These migrations the northern writers endeavour to make out against Verstegan and Cluverius, who will have Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, not to have been inhabited, till Germany so abounded with people, that they were obliged to remove into those countries, which they had not chosen to settle in at first, on account of the greater cold and barrenness of the soil. To confute this opinion, which derives the origin of the Goths from Germany, the above-mentioned writers, especially Grotius, who outshines all the rest, prove Scythia to have been peopled before any other of the northern countries had inhabitants. The antients indeed went farther; for they supposed, as appears from the epitomizer of Trogus Pompeius [x], that all the other parts of the world, continued quite destitute of inhabitants, till Scythia, no longer able to support such multitudes, sent out numerous colonies to people them. To maintain this, would perhaps be overshooting the mark; but that Scythia was peopled before any of the northern countries, is highly probable, since, of all the northern countries, it lay the nearest to Babylon, and the only way to them by land was through Scythia. Several eminent writers, and among the rest Luther, Goropius Becanus, and sir Walter Raleigh, are of opinion, that the ark, on the subsiding of the waters, reſted on the Imaon mountains in Scythia; others ſay on the Gordiæan mountains, at a ſmall diſtance from Scythia, and conſequently that Scythia muſt have been peopled, when the other northern countries ſtill continued uninhabited. Now, as the way was much ſhorter from Scythia into Scandinavia, than into Germany, and lay in a direct line, it is more natural to ſuppoſe, that thoſe, who were ſeeking places to ſettle in, went ſtraight into Scandinavia, than by much longer and round-about ways through Sarmatia into Germany; nay, as Sarmatia and Scandinavia were near Scythia, and the ways leading to them not obſtructed, it would not be abſurd to ſuppoſe them to have been overſtocked with people, while not only Germany, but all the other countries of Europe, were quite deſtitute of inhabitants, as being ſeparated from Aſia by the Mediterranean ſea, the Boſporus Cimmerius, and the Palus Mæotis, unſurmountable obſtructions, till the art of navigation was found out, which happened many ages after the confuſion of languages. Then, and not till then, the inhabitants of Scandinavia paſſed into the neighbouring iſlands and places lying over-againſt them on the continent, till that period uninhabited. From thence, in proceſs of time, they ſent colonies into Germany, who, driving out the antient inhabitants, ſettled in their country, as we have related above. To prove the migrations of the Goths out of Scandinavia into the iſlands in the Baltic ſea, the Cherſoneſus, and the adjacent places in Germany, ſeveral antient monuments and inſcriptions in Runic characters on ſtones and rocks are alledged by the northern writers, namely by Zeilerus [y], Bureus [z], Suaningius [a], and Wormius [b], in whoſe times many of them were ſtill extant, mentioning their leaving Scandinavia, and their ſettling in the places we have ſpoken of above, with the names of ſome of their leaders. Beſides theſe antient monuments and inſcriptions, the northern writers endeavour to make it appear by other arguments, that the Goths came originally out of Scandinavia into Germany, and not out of Germany into Scandinavia, as Verſtegan would have it. Their arguments are, 1. That the Scandian Goths were not ſubject to the Germans; but, on the contrary, the firſt inhabitants of the Cherſoneſus, and the adjacent places, to the Scandian Goths; which proves them to have been a colony. 2. It is hardly credible, ſay they, that the Germans ſhould chuſe to ſettle in Norway and Sweden, when they might have ſettled in a far more friendly climate and fruitful ſoil, by only croſſing

the Rhine on one ſide, or the Danube on the other. They add, that no mention is made in hiſtory of any colonies ſent out of Germany into Scandinavia; whereas we read of many coming out of Scandinavia to ſettle in Germany. Among theſe are reckoned by Freculphus [c] the Franks, by Grotius the Vandals and Lombards [d], and by Lazius and Rhabanus Maurus [e] the Marcomanns. 3. Polygamy was not allowed among the Germans, as appears from Tacitus [f]; whereas thoſe among the Goths, who had but four or five wives, were thought to live in a ſtate of celibacy. It is therefore far more probable, that the Goths ſhould increaſe ſo as to people other countries with their colonies, than the Germans; and accordingly all the antients ſpeak of the Goths iſſuing in ſwarms out of Scandinavia, which is therefore ſtyled by Jornandes, as we have obſerved above, officina gentium, and vagina nationum. We may further add, that all the other Gothic nations owned themſelves deſcended from thoſe of Scandinavia, as we find atteſted by Ablavius, an antient Gothic writer, by Roderichus Toletanus, and by Jornandes. Theſe are the arguments urged by the northern writers againſt Verſtegan and Cluverius, whoſe opinion, deriving the origin of the Goths from Germany, ſeemed ſo abſurd to Grotius, that he could ſcarce forbear reviling thoſe, who maintained it, eſpecially Cluverius, whom he taxes with introducing new opinions, in defiance to the moſt authentic writers, and ſupporting, without the leaſt regard to truth, what he thought would be beſt reliſhed by his countrymen [g]. Thus far of the origin of the Goths from the beſt antient as well as modern writers.

The cuſtoms, laws, and manners of the Goths.

As for the manners of the Goths, they were famous for their hoſpitality and kindneſs to ſtrangers, even before they embraced the chriſtian religion; nay, from their being eminently good, they were called by the neighbouring nations Goths, that name being, according to Grotius and moſt other writers, derived from the German word Goten, ſignifying good [h]. They encouraged, ſays Dion, the ſtudy of philoſophy, above all other barbarous or foreign nations, and often choſe their kings from among their philoſophers. Polygamy was not only allowed, but countenanced, among them, every one being valued and reſpected, according to the number of their wives [i]. By ſo many wives they had an incredible number of children, of whom they kept but one at home, ſending out the reſt, when come to man's eſtate, in queſt of new ſettlements [k]; and hence thoſe ſwarms of people, that over-ran ſo many countries. With them adultery was a capital crime, and irremiſſibly puniſhed with death [l]. This ſeverity, and likewiſe polygamy, prevailed among them, when they were known to the Greeks and Romans only by the name of Getes, as appears from the poet Menander, who was himſelf a Gete [m], and from Horace [n], who beſtows great encomiums on the virtue and chaſtity of their women. As for their laws, they do not fall much ſhort of thoſe of the antient Romans, as will appear when we come to ſpeak of the Alaric code, and the laws of the Viſigoths in Spain, and the Oſtrogoths in Italy. Their government was monarchical; for, as we have obſerved above out of Jornandes, in the neighbourhood of the Palus Mæotis, they had Filimer for king; in Dacia, Mæſia, and Thrace, Xamolxes; and in that part of Scythia, which bordered on the Euxine ſea, princes ſprung from the illuſtrious families of the Amali and the Balthi. Of the latter Jornandes gives us the following ſeries, viz. Gaptus, Hulmul, Auges, Amalus, Iſarna, Oſtrogotha, Cniva, Araric, Auric, Giberic, Hermanaric. To theſe princes were ſubject both the Viſigoths and Oſtrogoths. The former inhabited the country lying between the Boryſthenes and the Tanais, and were afterwards allowed by the Roman emperors to ſettle in Pannonia, Thrace, and Illyricum. The latter dwelt between the Danube and the Boryſthenes, and, in the reign of Honorius, after having over-run Italy, ſettled in Gaul, as we ſhall relate anon. Upon the death of Hermanaric, the Viſigoths were driven out of their native country by the Hunns, and were admittted by the emperor Valens within the Roman dominions. Theodoſius allowed them lands in Thrace, whence, in the reign of Honorius, they broke into Italy, under the conduct of the celebrated Alaric, who took and plundered Rome. Alaric was ſucceeded by Ataulphus, who founded the kingdom of the Viſigoths in Gaul, and Ataulphus by the following princes of the family of the Balthi, viz. Sigeric or Rigeric, Wallia, Theodoric, Thoriſmund, Theodoric II. Theodoric III. Euric, Alaric, Geſalaich, Amalaric, Theudis, Theudiſelus, Athanagild, Liuva, Leunigild, Ermenigild, Ricared, Liuva II. Witteric, Gundemar, Siſebatus, Reccared, Sainthila, Rechimir, Siſenand, Chintila, Tulga, Chindaſuinthus, Receſuinthus, Wamba, Ernigius, Egica, Witiza, and Roderic. driven out of both, and their nation almoſt utterly extirpated, by the Arabs, as we ſhall relate at length in a more proper place.

THE Viſigoths, being driven out of their own country by the Hunns, as we have related above, the Oſtrogoths continued, after their departure, in the ſame ſeats, but ſubject to the Hunns, who nevertheleſs allowed them to be governed by their own kings of the houſe of the Amali. Theſe were Winithar, Hunnimund, Thoriſmund, Wandalar, nephew to Hermanaric by his brother, and the three ſons of Wandalar, viz. Walamir, Theodemir, and Widemir, who were all ſubject to Attila; but, upon that prince's death, they were allowed by the Romans to ſettle in Pannonia and Mœſia. Theodemir was ſucceeded by his ſon Theodoric, who, having overcome Odoacer, made himſelf maſter of Italy, and was acknowledged king of that country. His ſucceſſors in that kingdom were, Athalaric, Theodotus, Vitiges, Ildebald, Eraric, Totila, and Teia, the laſt king of the Oſtrogoths in Italy [o]. As to the religion of the Goths, it ſeems to have been the ſame with that of the antient inhabitants of Scandinavia and Saxony, of which we have ſpoken above [p], and ſhall ſpeak more at length in the hiſtory of the northern kingdoms. Apollinaris Sidonius deſcribes their dreſs thus: They are ſhod, ſays he, with high ſhoes made of hair, and reaching up to their ankles; their knees, thighs, and legs are without any covering; their garments of various colours, ſcarce reaching to the knee; their ſleeves only cover the tops of their arms; they wear green caſſocks, with a red border, their belts hang on their ſhoulders; their ears are covered with twiſted locks; they uſe hooked lances, and miſſile hatchets [q].

The religion of the Goths.

As to the antient hiſtory of the Goths, Jornandes, ſuppoſing them to be one and the ſame people with the Scythians, Getes, Sarmatians, and Sauromatæ, aſcribes to them all the exploits, that are ſaid by the Greek and Latin writers to have been performed by thoſe nations, eſpecially by the Scythians. But of that warlike nation, and their migrations into Europe, under the names of Cimmerians, Celtes, Gauls, &c. we have ſpoken elſewhere, and therefore ſhall confine ourſelves here to the hiſtory of the Goths, from the time they became generally known by that appellation. The firſt Roman writer, that mentions the Goths, is Spartian, who, in the life of Caracalla, tells us, that he overcame in ſome encounters the Getes, who, says he, were the same people with the Goths [r]. The same author writes elsewhere [s], that Maximin, afterwards emperor, upon the death of Caracalla, quitted the service, and, retiring into Thrace, kept up from thence a friendly correspondence with the Goths. His father, named Micea or Micca, was by nation a Goth, and his mother Ababa or Abala, an Alan [t]. Hence Vorburgus concludes the Goths to have been masters of the countries bordering on Thrace before Maximin was born, that is, before the year 177 [u]. Caracalla was the first Roman emperor that quarrelled with the Goths, and the advantages he gained over them were, it seems, very inconsiderable; for, according to Spartian [w], he overcame them only in a few skirmishes. This must have happened about the year 215, the fifth of Caracalla's reign; for about that time he marched from Germany into Dacia [x], and the Goths held then, according to Grotius [y], part of that province. The Romans began very early to dread the power of that warlike nation; for even in the reign of Alexander, which began in 222, considerable sums were annually sent them from Rome to keep them quiet, and prevent them from disturbing the peace of the empire. Thus Petrus the patrician, who adds, that the Carpi, dwelling in Sarmatia towards the present Poland, demanded the same sums, that were paid yearly to the Goths; but their request was rejected by Menophilus, whom that writer styles duke of Mœsia, that is, general of the troops quartered in that province [z]. The Goths, notwithstanding the large sums sent them yearly by the Roman emperors, hearing of the death of the emperor Maximin, who was of Gothic extraction, as we have hinted above, and had been murdered by his own soldiers, resolved to revenge it; and accordingly, breaking into Mœsia, laid waste that province, and utterly destroyed the city of Istria or Istriopolis, on the most southern mouth of the Danube [a]. Balbinus, who, with Maximus, had succeeded Maximinus, resolved to march against them, but was in the mean time murdered, with his collegue, by the mutinous soldiery; so that the Goths, loaded with booty, retired beyond the Danube unmolested [b]. Not long after, they made themselves masters of Thrace; but were driven from thence beyond the Danube by the emperor Gordian about the year 242, the fifth of that prince's reign [c].

But

But Gordian dying, and Philip, who ſucceeded him, refuſing to pay them their annual penſion, they paſſed the Danube, and, entering Thrace, committed dreadful ravages in that province, as well as in Mæſia. Philip diſpatched againſt them the ſenator Decius, who was afterwards emperor; but he, not thinking it adviſeable to engage them, returned to Rome, after having diſcharged with diſgrace the troops, that had ſuffered them to paſs the Danube. Theſe went over in a body to the enemy, commanded at that time by their king Oſtrogotha, the grandſon of Amalus, who received them kindly, and, being thus reinforced, laid ſiege to Marcianopolis, the capital of Mæſia; but, not being able to reduce it, he abandoned the undertaking for a large ſum ſent him by the inhabitants, who were glad thus to compound with him, and redeem themſelves from the calamities attending long ſieges. Oſtrogotha was ſcarce returned to his own country, when Faſtida, king of the Gepidæ, elated with the ſucceſs, that had attended his arms againſt the Burgundians, whom he had almoſt utterly deſtroyed, ſent him the following haughty meſſage, viz. That the Gepidæ, being ſtraightened for want of room, he muſt either allow them lands, or prepare for war. Oſtrogotha anſwered, That he ſhould be ſorry to engage in a war with the Gepidæ his kinſmen (for they were a Gothic nation); but was determined to part with no lands. Hereupon both nations took the field, and a bloody battle enſued, in which the Gepidæ were defeated with great ſlaughter; but Oſtrogotha, contenting himſelf with the victory, ſuffered the Gepidæ to retire, and live in their own country unmoleſted [c].

Oſtrogotha was ſucceeded by Cniva, who, breaking into Mæſia, was defeated with the loſs of thirty thouſand men, by Decius, the eldeſt ſon of the emperor of that name, whom, in the end, he overcame, and, having cut his whole army in pieces, obliged the young prince to ſave himſelf by flight into the neighbouring provinces. Having now no enemy to oppoſe him, he made himſelf maſter of Philippopolis on the Hebrus, put the inhabitants, to the number of one hundred thouſand ſouls, ſays Ammianus [d], to the ſword, ravaged Thrace, and laid waſte great part of Macedon [e]. Hereupon the emperor Decius, ſetting out from Rome, haſtened into Pannonia; and, putting himſelf at the head of his army, he overcame the Goths in ſeveral engagements, and drove them out of the Roman dominions [f]. But they returned ſoon after with a numerous army, headed by their king Cniva; which obliged Decius to take the field a ſecond time, when he was attended, at firſt, with the ſame good

ſucceſs, as he had been in their former irruption; for he reduced them to ſuch ſtraights, that they offered to ſet at liberty all the priſoners they had taken, and relinquiſh their booty, provided he would ſuffer them to retire unmoleſted. But the emperor, who had ſent Trebonianus Gallus, with a ſtrong detachment, to cut off their retreat, thinking he had it now in his power to rid the empire of ſo troubleſome an enemy, inſtead of hearkening to their propoſals, marched with all his forces againſt them. The Goths, knowing that all lay at ſtake, received him with great intrepidity, and, fighting like men in deſpair, gained a complete victory. In the battle fell firſt Decius, the emperor's eldeſt ſon, and then the emperor himſelf, upon whoſe death the Goths made a dreadful havock of the diſheartened army [g]. We only touch upon theſe events here, having related them at length elſewhere [h]. Decius being killed, Gallus was by the ſoldiery proclaimed emperor in his room; but he, inſtead of revenging the death of the late emperor, and the overthrow of the army, concluded a peace with the Goths, ſuffering them to retire unmoleſted with all their booty, and the priſoners they had taken at Philippopolis, and elſewhere; nay, he engaged to pay them yearly a conſiderable ſum, provided they continued quiet in their own country [i]. However, three years after, that is in 253, they entered the Roman territories in an hoſtile manner, probably becauſe their penſion was not paid them. But Æmilianus, who commanded the troops in Pannonia, marching againſt them, put them to flight, and drove them quite out of the empire, though his ſoldiers, at firſt, betrayed great unwillingneſs to engage ſo formidable an enemy [k]. This Zonaras relates in a manner, which we do not well comprehend; for he ſuppoſes the Goths, who were overcome and put to flight by Æmilianus, to have lived in friendſhip and amity with the Romans [l]. In 256, the Goths, with the Carpi, the Burani, and the Burgundians, all nations dwelling on the banks of the Danube, made a new inroad into the empire, laying waſte, according to Zoſimus [m], all Illyricum, and Italy itſelf, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition. But this we can hardly believe, ſince no other writer takes notice of any ravages committed by them in Italy. They continued all this year in Illyricum, laying the country waſte far and wide; but the following year, Aurelian, afterwards emperor, being ſent to ſucceed Ulpius Crinitus in the command of the troops in Thrace and Illyricum, drove them out of thoſe provinces, took a great number of them priſoners, and, purſuing them beyond the Danube, laid waſte their country, and returned to Thrace loaded with booty [n]. After this, they continued quiet till the year 262, the ninth of the emperor Gallienus, when, breaking unexpectedly into Thrace, they made themſelves maſters of that province, and from thence over-ran all Macedon, and laid ſiege to Theſſalonica; but, not being able to reduce it, they attempted to enter Achaia, when Macrianus, who had aſſumed the title of Auguſtus, arriving in Greece on his march into Italy, fell upon them unexpectedly, and obliged them to ſave themſelves by flight into their own country [o]. At the ſame time, another party of the Goths, having croſſed the Helleſpont under the conduct of one Raſpa, committed dreadful ravages in Aſia, plundered ſeveral cities, and even the famous temple of Diana at Epheſus [p]. Jornandes tells us, that, in this irruption, they deſtroyed the city of Chalcedon, which, though afterwards rebuilt, ſays he, by one Cornelius Avitus, and enriched by the neighbourhood of Conſtantinople, yet, for the ſpace of three hundred years and upwards, ſhewed the dreadful marks of its former ruin [q]. On their return, they laid in aſhes the poor remains of antient Troy; and, having repaſſed the Helleſpont, they made an attempt upon Anchialum in Thrace; but, having ſpent ſome days in vain before that place, they abandoned the enterpriſe, and, after having ravaged Thrace, returned home, carrying with them an immenſe booty [r]. The following year 263, they made a new irruption into Aſia, but were ſoon driven out by the Roman troops quartered there [s]. Two years after, that is, in 265, they made themſelves maſters of all Dacia beyond the Danube, extending from that river to the Carpathian mountains, which had been reduced by Trajan to a Roman province, and joined to Mœſia by a bridge, the moſt magnificent and wonderful of all that emperor's works [t]. Encouraged with this ſucceſs, the following year, having built an incredible number of veſſels, they embarqued on the Euxine ſea, and, landing at Heraclea in Pontus, over-ran Aſia Minor, Lydia, and Bithynia, made themſelves maſters of Nicomedia, plundered the Greek cities in thoſe countries, and laid waſte the provinces of Phrygia and Troas [u]. some opposition; for we are told, that a battle was fought there; and, from what happened afterwards, it appears, that the Goths carried the day; for on one side the Romans, dissatisfied with the conduct of Gallienus, were for setting up another emperor; and on the other, the Goths, pursuing their ravages, advanced as far as Galatia and Cappadocia, laying waste, without restraint, the countries through which they passed [w]. Eutropius, and after him St. Jerom [x], and Orosius [y], mention the ravages committed by the Goths in Pontus and Asia; and Philostorgius names several cities ruined by them in Galatia and Cappadocia [z]. We learn from St. Basil, that Dionysius, who was raised to the see of Rome in 259, and died in 270, wrote a consolatory letter to the church of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, sending at the same time considerable sums to redeem the christian captives [a], among whom were many holy ecclesiastics, who could not be ransomed, says Philostorgius [b], because they were destined by Heaven to convert their conquerors. In the mean time, the brave Odenatus, of whom we have spoken at length in our Roman history [c], pitying the miserable condition, to which Asia was reduced by the Goths, hastened to the relief of that province. But the Goths, unwilling to engage so renowned a commander, reimbarqued at Heraclea, and, by the Euxine sea, returned home with an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives [d]. Many of them however were drowned, being attacked on their return by the Roman fleet [e]. The following year, they embarqued anew on the Euxine sea, and, landing at the mouth of the Danube, laid waste great part of Mœsia; but were defeated by the troops and generals who guarded Byzantium. However, they advanced as far as Illyricum; but being informed there, that the Heruli had received a dreadful overthrow in Greece, they began to retire, when Marcian and Claudius, whom Gallienus had sent against them, pursuing them close, cut great numbers of them in pieces [f]; nay, Claudius was for cutting off their retreat, as might have been easily done, and putting them all to the sword; but Marcian thought it more adviseable to suffer them to retire [g]. To be revenged on Claudius, they no sooner heard, that he was raised to the empire, than, stirring up all the northern nations against him, they assembled on the banks of the Tyras, now the Niester, and

there built, says Zosimus [h], six thousand ships; but Pollio, who makes the most of this war, writes, that their vessels amounted only to two thousand [i], and he is therein followed by Ammianus Marcellinus [k]. Having employed the whole year 268, in making the necessary preparations, they embarqued, to the number of three hundred and twenty thousand fighting men, and, landing in Lesser Scythia, laid siege, at the same time, to the city of Tomi in that province, and to Marcianopolis in Mœsia; but being, in several attacks, repulsed at both places, they reimbarqued on the Euxine sea, and entered the straights of the Bosporus, where, by the rapidity of the current, and the great number of their ships running foul of one another, they suffered a great loss both of men and vessels, and besides, they met with a vigorous opposition from the inhabitants of Byzantium [l]. Making therefore what haste they could out of the straights, they attacked the city of Cyzicus on the Propontis; but, not being able to reduce it, they abandoned the enterprise, and, entering the Ægean sea, they refitted their shattered vessels at mount Athos in Macedon, and then laid siege to Cassandria and Thessalonica, two cities in the same province. But, when they were upon the point of making themselves masters of both, news was brought them, that Claudius approached at the head of a powerful army [m]. That prince, upon the first news of their breaking into the empire, had dispatched his brother Quintillus against them, but, under him, committed the chief command of the army to Aurelian, afterwards emperor, whom he had, on that occasion, appointed general of all the troops in Thrace, Illyricum, and the other frontier provinces; but, when he was informed of the number of the enemy's forces, he resolved to head the army in person [n]. Zonaras writes, that while they were deliberating at Rome, whether the emperor should march against the Goths, or against Tetricus, who had usurped the empire in Gaul, and was then besieging Autun, Claudius told them, That the war with Tetricus was his: but that with the Goths was the war of the Roman people, whose interest he preferred to his own [o]. However, he could not set out so soon as he wished, it being no easy matter, as the empire had been quite exhausted by his predecessor Gallienus, to make the necessary preparations for an expedition of such importance, and to draw together an army fit to be commanded by him [p]. The Goths therefore, abandoning the siege of Thessalonica upon the first report of his approach, advanced into the country lying on the river Axius, plundered Pelagonia, and committed great ravages in the neighbourhood of Doberus in Pæonia, where they were vigorously attacked by the Dalmatian horse, who signalized themselves on this occasion, and killed near three thousand of the enemy [q]. The rest took their route to Upper Mœsia, and were met by Claudius in the neighbourhood of Naissus, whom they immediately engaged [r]. The victory continued long doubtful; nay, the Romans at first gave ground; but, returning through certain narrow passes to the charge, they fell unexpectedly upon the Goths, who, after a long and obstinate resistance, were in the end put to flight, and utterly routed [s]. Such of them as had the good luck to make their escape, returned towards Macedon, covering their rear with their waggons; but they found no fence against the famine that raged amongst them, and daily carried off great numbers of men and horses. The Roman cavalry, attacking them in front, cut off many thousands of them, and, by guarding the passes of Macedon, obliged them to shut themselves up on mount Hæmus, where they passed the winter in the greatest hardships imaginable [t].

Their army is utterly routed by Claudius.

Their fleet ravages Thessaly and Achaia, &c.

As for their fleet, one part of it, separating from the rest, ravaged Thessaly and Achaia, and took a great many prisoners in the open country, says Zosimus [u], not being able to reduce one single city. However, Zonaras tells us, that they made themselves masters of Athens; and that having laid together in one heap all the books they found there, with a design to set fire to them, they would have deprived the world of that invaluable treasure, had not one among them, more discerning than the rest, told his companions, that, while the Greeks amused themselves with those books, they neglected the art of war, and were easily overcome [w]. The same author adds, that Cleodemus, a native of Athens, having assembled some troops and vessels, attacked them by sea, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to save themselves by flight into other countries [x]. From Athens they sailed to the islands of Crete, Rhodes, and Cyprus; but no-where performed any thing worth mentioning; nay, they lost great numbers of their men by the plague, that raged among them. They returned therefore to winter in Macedon; where the contagious distemper completed their ruin [y]. Thoſe who had taken refuge on mount Hæmus, as we have related above, were, before the end of winter, reduced by the plague and famine to a very ſmall number; ſo that Claudius might have ſaved himſelf the trouble of attacking them. However, that prince, bent upon their utter deſtruction, marched againſt them early in the ſpring, and, having ſhut them up on all ſides, in different ſkirmiſhes, put ſeveral thouſands of them to the ſword. Nevertheleſs the infantry having one day attacked them without the cavalry, which was employed elſewhere, the Romans, after having behaved ſome time with great gallantry, turned their backs, and fled. On this occaſion, the loſs on the ſide of the Romans was very conſiderable, and had been much greater, had not the cavalry come ſeaſonably to their relief [z]. Pollio perhaps ſpeaks of this encounter, where he owns the Romans to have loſt in an attack near two thouſand men [a]. But theſe were, as that writer tells us, Roman ſoldiers, who, after having put the enemy to flight, were buſied in plundering their baggage; and Claudius, according to him, was not yet arrived in the camp: whereas Zoſimus writes, that the infantry attacked the enemy by the emperor's orders: but he may therein be miſtaken. However that be, the Romans, not in the leaſt diſheartened with this loſs, continued harraſſing the Goths without intermiſſion, and ſtraightening them daily more and more. As the plague at the ſame time made a dreadful havock among them, they were in the end obliged to ſubmit, and beg quarter; which was granted them. Some of them were incorporated among the Roman troops; to others lands were given to cultivate; and a ſmall number of them found means to make their eſcape [b]. We have inſerted elſewhere two letters relating to this war, written by the emperor himſelf, the one to the ſenate, while he was upon the point of engaging the enemy, the other, after the battle, to Junius Brocchus, governor of Illyricum [c]. As the army was compoſed of divers northern nations, and followed by a great number of women, ſervants, and children, all the provinces of the empire were filled with captives, among whom were ſeveral kings and women of diſtinction. The emperor cauſed ſome of their waggons to be burnt, and gave the reſt, with a great number of ſlaves, to the public [d]. twenty-fourth of March of the present year 270, but soon after died at Sirmium of the plague, which had contributed so much to his victory over the Goths. He was succeeded by his brother Quintillus, during whose short reign the Goths, who had made their escape from mount Hæmus, plundered the city of Anchialum in Thrace, and made an attempt upon Nicopolis, in Lower Mœsia; but were driven out of that province by the Roman troops quartered there [f]. Ammianus speaks of their taking both Anchialum and Nicopolis [g]; but this must have happened in some other irruption. The same year 270, the Goths, notwithstanding the losses they had sustained, broke anew into the empire, and, entering Pannonia, laid waste that province; which Aurelian, who had been just raised to the empire, no sooner understood, than he left Rome, and, putting himself at the head of the army, marched against them. As the enemy did not retire at his approach, a battle ensued, which lasted till night coming on parted the two armies, without the least advantage on either side. However, the Goths, not caring to renew the combat, repassed the Danube in the dead of the night, and sent embassadors the next morning to sue for a peace [h]; which was readily granted them, the Alemanns being at that time in arms, and ready to invade Italy; which they did accordingly, as we have related elsewhere [i]. But this peace was not of long duration; for two years after, that is, in 272, Aurelian, on his march into the east against the celebrated Zenobia, found them ravaging Thrace, and drove them out of that province; nay, he even passed the Danube, and having engaged Cannabaud, a Gothic prince, slew him, and five thousand of his men [k]. It was perhaps on this occasion, that the emperor took a chariot drawn by four stags, which he afterwards made use of in his triumphal entry into Rome; for he is said to have taken it from a Gothic prince [l]. Among the prisoners were ten women, who had fought in the habit of men, and a great many more were found among the dead. The emperor, in a letter to Gallonius Avitus, governor of Thrace, mentions some Gothic women of distinction, whom he had sent to Perinthus to be kept there, and entertained in a manner suitable to their rank [m]. Among these was a woman of the blood royal, named Humila, whom the emperor gave in marriage to Bonosus, one of his generals, who, in the reign of Probus, usurped the sovereignty, as we have related elsewhere [n]. Two years after, the Goths settled in Dacia beyond the Danube, abandoned by Aurelian, who was well appriſed, that he could not maintain it, without an immenſe charge, in the midſt of ſo many barbarous nations [o]. The following year 275, they entered, in ſeparate and numerous bodies, Pontus, Cappadocia, Galatia, and Cilicia, pretending to have been invited by Aurelian, who died ſome months before, to ſerve as auxiliaries againſt the Perſians; but Tacitus, who had ſucceeded that prince, not thinking it adviſeable to truſt them, endeavoured, by fair means, and even by offering them conſiderable ſums, to induce them to return home. His offers were accepted by ſome; but others refuſing to retire upon any terms, the emperor and his brother Florianus fell upon them, cut great numbers of them in pieces and drove the reſt quite out of the empire [p]. Of this victory mention is made on one of Tacitus's medals [q]; and from an antient inſcription may be gathered, that he took the ſurname of Gothicus [r]. In 278, the ſecond of the reign of Probus, they broke into Thrace, and advanced as far as Illyricum, laying waſte the country with fire and ſword; but they no ſooner heard that the emperor was marching againſt them, and had already entered Rhætia, then they withdrew, leaving their booty behind them. From Rhætia the emperor purſued his march into Illyricum, and thence into Thrace, where he was met by deputies from all the Gothic nations, either ſuing for peace, ſays Vopiſcus [s], or ſubmitting to his power. No further mention is made of the Goths till the year 289, the fifth of Dioclesian's reign, who is ſaid to have gained a complete victory over the Sarmatians, that is, the Goths [t]; nay, Eumenes writes, that the whole nation of the Sarmatians was cut off, and the province of Dacia beyond the Danube, which they had ſeized, re-united to the empire [u]. For this victory Dioclesian aſſumed the ſurname of Sarmaticus, as appears from ſeveral antient coins and inſcriptions [w]. But that the advantages he gained over the Goths were greatly exaggerated by Eumenes, is manifeſt from another panegyriſt [x], who, in a ſpeech he pronounced two years after in the preſence of the emperor, takes notice of the victories lately gained by the Goths over the Burgundians dwelling on the banks of the Danube, whom they had overcome, and were then bent upon utterly extirpating the whole nation, which it would be no eaſy matter for them to effectuate, the Burgundians being powerfully ſupported by the Alans and Thervingians.

gians. He adds, that another Gothic nation, assisted by the Taifalæ, made war upon the Vandals and Gepidæ. The Goths therefore were still a powerful nation, and had not been, as Eumenes boasts, utterly extirpated by Diocletian; nay, the panegyrist, whom we have quoted above, ascribes their not disturbing the peace of the empire to their being engaged in wars with other barbarous nations, and not to any awe they stood in of Diocletian.

They overcome the Burgundians and Vandals.

FROM the year 289, the fifth of Diocletian's reign, to the year 321, the fifteenth of Constantine's, the Goths gave no disturbance to the empire, being engaged, as we have observed above, in wars with the neighbouring nations. But all we know of these wars is, that they not only overcame the Burgundians, but likewise the Vandals, with their king Visumar, a prince of great renown, and descended from the Asdingi, the most illustrious family of that nation. The Vandals were, it seems, quite driven out; for we are told, that they begged and obtained Pannonia of the emperor Constantine [a]. The Goths were no sooner disengaged from other wars, than they broke into the empire; but they were overcome by Constantine in several battles fought at Campana in Pannonia, and at Marga and Bononia in Upper Mœsia [b]. Zosimus speaks of a city besieged by Rausimodes king of the Sarmatians, and relieved by Constantine, who, having defeated the enemy, and put them to flight, pursued them cross the Danube, and forced them to a second battle, in which great numbers of them were slain, and among the rest the king himself. Such as escaped the general slaughter, submitted to Constantine, who returned from this expedition with an incredible number of captives [c]. Notwithstanding this defeat, the following year the Goths broke anew into the empire, while the emperor was busied in making a port at Thessalonica, and, over-running Thrace and Mœsia, ravaged both provinces, and took a great many prisoners [b]. It was on occasion of this irruption, that Constantine enacted the two laws, dated the twenty-eighth of April 323, whereof the one commands those to be burnt alive, who shall lend the least assistance to the barbarians, or receive any part of their booty; the other forbids the tribunes of the cohorts, and the other subalterns, to suffer the soldiers to be absent from the camp and their colours, on pain of death, in time of war; and of banishment and confiscation of their estates, in time of peace [c]. Constantine marched against the Goths with incredible expedition, and, falling upon them, gave them a total overthrow, and purſued them with great ſlaughter into the dominions of Licinius; which that prince highly reſenting, a war was kindled between him and Conſtantine, of which we have ſpoken at length elſewhere [d]. Some writers are of opinion, that the victory gained at this time over the Goths gave riſe to the Gothic ſports, which began, according to Bucherius's kalendar, on the fourth, and ended on the ninth, of February. The Goths, thus overcome, ſued for peace; which was granted them, upon their ſetting at liberty all the priſoners they had taken [e]; nay Conſtantine entered, it ſeems, into an alliance with them; for they aſſiſted him againſt Licinius with a body of forty thouſand men, who were diſtinguiſhed by the name of fœderati, or allies [f]. Theſe are, without all doubt, the Goths, who, as we read in an anonymous writer publiſhed by Valeſius [g], fought at the battle of Chalcedon, under the conduct of one of their princes named Aliquaea. Notwithſtanding the peace and alliance they had made with Conſtantine, they began about eight years after, that is in 332, to make new inroads into the empire. Zoſimus writes, that the Taifalæ, a Gothic nation, having broken into the Roman territories with five hundred horſe, Conſtantine, who was then in Mœſia, ſuffered them to lay waſte the the country to the very gates of his camp; and that, inſtead of putting his troops in battle-array to oppoſe them, he betook himſelf to a precipitous flight, after having loſt great part of his army [h]. Zoſimus is the only author, who relates this event, altogether incredible. Socrates tells us, that the Goths and Sarmatians over-ran ſome provinces, but were overcome and driven out by Conſtantine [i]. The ſame year, a war breaking out between the Goths and Sarmatians, the latter had recourſe to Conſtantine, who, glad of the opportunity that offered to humble that fierce nation, fell upon them, when they were buſied in plundering the territories of the Sarmatians, and gained a memorable victory over them on the twentieth of April. Near an hundred thouſand of the enemy were either cut in pieces, or periſhed after the battle with hunger and cold; which obliged Araric their king to ſue for peace, and deliver hoſtages to the emperor, among whom was his own ſon [k]. This victory is aſcribed by ſome to Conſtantine Cæſar; and the emperor Julian tells us, that one of Conſtantine's ſons awed the Goths with his victories [l]. But Eu-

tropius [m] and Eusebius [n] tell us in expreſs terms, that the Goths were overcome by Conſtantine in a great battle; nay Euſebius writes, that Conſtantine, ſcorning to pay tribute to the barbarians, as other emperors had done, marched againſt them, while they were engaged in a war with the Sarmatians, and, having ſubdued the whole nation, obliged, what by dint of arms, what by treaties, the innumerable tribes, into which they were divided, to obey his commands [o]. Sozomen and Socrates write, that the victory he gained over them was ſo evidently miraculous, that the Goths, acknowledging the power of the God adored by Conſtantine, great numbers of them embraced the chriſtian religion, which had been firſt preached among them about the year 270 [p] (A). Jornandes takes no notice of the

(A) The Goths, ſays Sozomen (1), and the other barbarous nations dwelling on the banks of the Danube, had embraced the chriſtian religion long before Conſtantine was ſole maſter of the empire, providence having made uſe of the very ravages they committed under Gallienus and his ſucceſſors, to convert them to the true faith; for, having croſſed over from Thrace into Aſia, and there taken an incredible number of captives, and amongſt the reſt ſeveral holy eccleſiaſtics, who, by only invoking the name of Jeſus, cured their ſick, and delivered ſuch among them as were poſſeſſed with a devil, they began to hearken to their doctrine; and obſerving, on the other hand, that their lives were quite blameleſs, many of them reſolved to follow the example, that was ſet them by ſuch wonderful men, and to acknowledge the God, whom they adored. Accordingly they took them for their teachers, hearkened with reſpect to their inſtructions, received the ſacrament of baptiſm, built churches, and there celebrated, like other chriſtians, the holy myſteries of our religion. Having embraced our faith, they diveſted themſelves of their former fierceneſs, and led thenceforth more regular lives. Thus Sozomen; and what he writes is confirmed by Philoſtorgius, who, ſpeaking of the ravages they committed in Aſia, Galatia and Cappadocia, under Valerian and Gallienus in 266, tells us, that they carried back with them, among the many other captives, the anceſtors of Wulphilas, who, about the latter end of the fourth century, was revered by them as their prophet (2). This gives ſome light to what we read in St. Baſil. viz. that from Cappadocia were brought to the Goths the firſt ſeeds of the chriſtian religion (3). St. Cyril of Jeruſalem, in 347, names the Goths and Sarmatians among the victory gained over the Goths by Constantine; but only tells us, that they supplied his army with a body of forty thousand men, which was kept always complete [q]. Eutropius writes, that Constantine, having granted a peace to the Goths, left among them a great opinion of his humanity and good nature [r]; and Eusebius, that he even preferred to great dignities and employments the most illustrious among them [s]. In the time of Themistius was still to be seen at Constantinople, behind the hall where the senate used to assemble, a statue, which Constantine had caused to be erected in honour of the father of Athanaric king of the Goths; but this was done, says our author, to soften and gain over that barbarian [t].

THE Goths not only continued quiet, but served the Romans with great fidelity, during the remaining part of Constantine's reign, and in the reigns of Constans, Julian, Jovian, and Valentinian I [u]. But in 364, the first of Valens, they broke into Thrace, and laid waste that province [w]. The emperor, who was yet scarce well seated on his throne, instead of employing his troops against them, sent them a considerable sum; They serve in the Roman army.

the nations, that had bishops, priests, deacons, monks, virgins, and even martyrs (4); for the whole nation did not at once embrace the christian religion; nay, after it was preached among them, they had some pagan kings, who persecuted the christians (5). Sozomen writes, that the barbarians, who inhabited Gaul and the banks of the Rhine, down to the ocean, embraced the christian religion by the same means, and at the same time, as those who dwelt on the Danube (6) However, we find no footsteps of christianity among the Franks, whom Sozomen seems chiefly to hint at, till the reign of Clovis, which began about the year 508. Eutyches, who began, according to St. Basil (7), the conversion of the Goths, and the other illustrious captives, fulfilled in a literal sense what we read in the prophet Isaiah: And the people shall take them, and bring them to their place, and the house of Israel shall possess them in the land of the Lord for servants and handmaids; and they shall take them captives whose captives they were, and they shall rule over their oppressors 8. To them may be likewise applied the words of Tobit, In the land of my captivity do I praise him, and declare his might and majesty to a sinful nation (9).

which they no ſooner received, than they forbore all hoſtilities, and returned home [x]. The following year 365, while the emperor was in Bithynia, news was brought him, that the Goths were ready to break anew into Thrace. Hereupon Valens diſpatched a body of troops to reinforce thoſe, that, under the command of count Julian, were poſted on the banks of the Danube; which prevented their paſſing that river [y]. In the mean time, Procopius having revolted, and aſſumed the title of emperor, the Goths, eſpouſing his cauſe, ſent a body of three thouſand men to his aſſiſtance; but Procopius being defeated, taken, and put to death, before their arrival, they continued in the territories of the empire, committing great ravages in Thrace and Mœſia. Valens diſpatched a ſtrong detachment againſt them, who, having cut off their retreat, obliged them to lay down their arms, and yield themſelves priſoners [z]. Hermanaric was then king of the Goths, of thoſe at leaſt, who by Ammianus are ſtyled Greuthongi, and by Jornandes, Oſtrogoths; but the above-mentioned body of troops had been ſent to the aſſiſtance of Procopius by Athanaric, whom Ammianus calls ſometimes one of the moſt powerful men among the Goths [a], and ſometimes the judge of the Thervingian Goths [b], that is, according to Jornandes, of the Viſigoths [c]. He was a man of great courage, and yet his courage, ſays Themiſtius [d], fell ſhort of his penetration, eloquence, and addreſs. He no ſooner received the news of the captivity of his men, than he diſpatched embaſſadors to Valens, requiring they might be ſet at liberty, ſince they had been ſent by a friend and ally of the Romans to the aſſiſtance of a Roman emperor. At the ſame time, the letters were produced, which he had received from Procopius. On the other hand, Valens ſent Victor, general of the horſe, to complain of Athanaric, for aſſiſting a rebel againſt his lawful ſovereign. The Goths anſwered, that they had looked upon Procopius as the kinſman of Conſtantine; and that it was not their buſineſs to examine whether he was, or was not, a lawful prince; and therefore, if they were deceived therein, the emperor ought to excuſe them [e]. But Valens could not be prevailed upon to ſet the captive Goths at liberty, being bent, as he was then engaged in no other ware, upon humbling that powerful nation [f]. With this view, great preparations were made throughout the empire; which occasioned no small consternation among the people, who, as they had a mighty opinion of the valour of the Goths, dreaded the issue of this war [g]. At the same time, in the dismantling of Chalcedon, certain verses were found engraved on a stone, which doubled their fears; for they seemed antient, and foretold a dreadful inundation of barbarians in Thrace [h]. The emperor himself seems to have been under no small apprehension of this war; for Theodoret tells us, that, before he set out on so dangerous an expedition, in order to render Heaven propitious to his undertaking, he received the sacrament of baptism [i]. The Goths, on the other hand, finding the emperor bent upon war, began to draw together their forces, with a design to attack him the first; which Valens no sooner understood, than he ordered his troops to take the field, though in the depth of winter, and soon after came in person to head them. Upon his arrival, he sent strong detachments to guard the banks of the Danube, and encamped, with the rest of the army, in the neighbourhood of Marcianopolis, the metropolis of Lower Mœsia [k]. Ammianus [l] and Zosimus [m] tell us, that early in the spring he left Marcianopolis, and, having passed the Danube on a bridge of boats, he ravaged the enemy's country far and near, without meeting with the least opposition, the Goths having retired at his approach to the neighbouring mountains. In the beginning of the autumn he led back his army to the Roman dominions [n], and passed the winter at Marcianopolis, whence, as soon as the season was fit for action, he marched to the banks of the Danube, with a design to cross that river, and pursue the ravages he had begun the year before; but the Danube continuing swelled beyond measure the whole summer, he was obliged to remain encamped in the same place, till the latter end of autumn, when he returned to Marcianopolis, and there took up his winter-quarters [o].

THE following year 369, the emperor marched into Lesser Scythia, and, having passed the Danube at Noviodunum, advanced far into the enemy's country, destroying all with fire and sword. The Goths, not daring to keep the field, lay concealed in the woods and morasses, whence they frequently sallied out upon the Romans. Against them the emperor employed not the soldiers, but the servants of the army, and those who attended the baggage, promising them a certain sum for each head they ſhould bring. Hereupon, avarice ſupplying the place of courage, they reſolutely entered the woods and marſhes, and, hunting the Goths like wild beaſts, put great numbers of them to the ſword in their very aſylums; which ſtruck them with ſuch terror, that they ſent embaſſadors to ſue for peace [p]. Thus Zoſimus; but Ammianus writes, that Valens, having attacked and overcome in ſeveral encounters the Greuthungi, a warlike nation of the Goths, dwelling at a conſiderable diſtance from the Danube, at laſt gave a total overthrow to Athanaric, who, at the head of a numerous army, had ventured to engage him [q]. After this victory, Valens returned to Marcianopolis, with a deſign to winter there, and renew the war early in the ſpring. But in the mean time, the Goths earneſtly ſuing, by repeated embaſſies, for peace, he was at laſt prevailed upon by the ſenate of Conſtantinople to hearken to their propoſals [r]. What induced the ſenate to become mediators in behalf of a nation by them ſo much dreaded, and now reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs, we are no-where told. Valens, after returning a favourable anſwer to the embaſſadors, approached the Danube, and appointed Victor and Arintheus to treat with the Goths. After ſome conferences, a peace was concluded highly honourable for the Romans; for, in virtue of this treaty, the Goths were not, for the future, to paſs the Danube, or ſet foot on the Roman territories, on any account whatſoever, barring that of trade, which was now confined to two cities on the Danube; whereas they had been formerly allowed to carry it on with what cities of the empire they pleaſed. They were not to expect or claim the penſions which had been paid them annually by other emperors; but Valens conſented to continue Athanaric's penſion to him. This peace was ratified and ſigned by Valens and Athanaric, who met for that purpoſe in boats in the middle of the Danube, the latter abſolutely refuſing to paſs that river, by reaſon his father had obliged him, as he pretended, ſolemnly to ſwear never to tread on Roman ground [s]. Valens, having thus concluded a peace with the Goths, ordered the forts on the Danube to be repaired, and ſome new ones to be built, and then, leaving ſtrong gariſons in them, as if he diſtruſted the barbarians, he returned to Marcianopolis, and from thence to Conſtantinople [t]. At this time, Hermanaric was king of the Goths, as we have hinted above: he was deſcended from the noble family of the Amali, and had ſignalized himſelf in ſeveral wars; inſomuch, that he was compared

Among the reſt he mentions the Heruli dwelling near the Palus Mæotis; the Venedi on the German ocean; and the Æſtii on the borders of the preſent Pruſſia and Poland; nay, Ablavius, as quoted by Jornandes [w], aſſures us, that Hermanaric was obeyed by all the nations both of Scythia and Germany. However, not thinking himſelf in a condition to withſtand the Hunns, who, paſſing the Palus Mæotis in 376, over-ran his country, he choſe rather to lay violent hands on himſelf, than to behold the calamities that threatened his people [x]. He was ſucceeded by Vithimir, who, attempting to make head againſt the Hunns, was killed in a battle. His ſon Vitheric, driven out by the Hunns, retired with his people to the preſent Podolia, lying between the Nieper and the Danube. Athanaric, king or chief of the Thervingi or Viſigoths, alarmed at this ſudden irruption of the Hunns, encamped, with all the forces he could aſſemble, on the banks of the Danaſtus or Nieſter, in order to diſpute with the enemy the paſſage of that river, parting the country of the Thervingi from that of the Greuthongi or Oſtrogoths. But the Hunns, falling upon him when leaſt expected, obliged him to abandon his country, and take refuge in the preſent Moldavia, where he fortified himſelf with a wall from the Pruth to the Danube [y].

A general conſternation being now ſpread among the Goths, ſuch of them as had the good luck to eſcape the dreadful havock, which the Hunns made of their nation, either ſubmitted to them, or fled for refuge to the Roman dominions. Two hundred thouſand of them were admitted by Valens into Thrace, upon their promiſing to live peaceably there, and to ſerve, when wanted, in the Roman armies. But, being juſtly provoked at the cruel treatment they met with from the Roman officers, who were to ſupply them with proviſions, they had ſcarce entered Thrace, when they began to mutiny, and plunder the country. This gave riſe to a long and bloody war between them and the Romans, the particulars whereof we have related at length in our Roman hiſtory [z], to which we refer the reader. At length they ſubmitted to Theodoſius I. in the year 382, and were allowed by him to ſettle in Thrace and Mæſia; which two provinces were almoſt quite diſpeopled by the frequent incurſions of the neighbouring barbarians, and the late deſtructive war [a].

The

Having submitted to Theodosius, they receive lands in Thrace. Year after Christ 382.

The emperor exempted them from all the tributes and taxes, that were paid by the other subjects of the empire. Great numbers of them entered into the Roman service, but formed a separate body, and were commanded by officers of their own nation; which proved the source of many evils; but as they were well acquainted with the avarice, injustice, and cruelty, of the Roman officers, they refused to put themselves into their power, and insisted upon their continuing united, in order to secure themselves against such insults, as they had reason to apprehend, when dispersed among the Roman troops. Zosimus does not forget to blame the conduct of Theodosius, and his want of foresight, in suffering them to continue united, not only in the army, but in the countries that were allotted them [b]; and Synesius thinks it was highly impolitic to suffer them to settle upon any terms within the Roman dominions; for speaking to Arcadius, The Goths, says he, after having been punished by the arms of Theodosius for the evils they had brought upon the empire, were forced, with their wives and children, to implore the clemency of that prince, who, as he was naturally generous and merciful, suffered himself to be overcome by the prayers of those, whom he had overcome with his arms. He granted them all the rights and privileges of Roman citizens, and distributed lands among them; which was encouraging all the other barbarians to demand, and even to exact, the same favour; and hence flowed the many evils, under which the empire has long groaned [c]. Thus Synesius. But Themistius, who lived in those very times, in a speech, which he pronounced before the emperor himself, told him, that he had learnt by experience how dangerous a thing it was to reduce the Goths to despair [d]. And truly, as the Hunns had seized on their country, the emperor must either have allowed them settlements within the Roman dominions, or cut them all off; which it was highly dangerous for him to attempt, the Goths not being yet weakened to such a degree, as not to be able to make a stand, and even endanger the empire. Besides, people were wanting to inhabit and cultivate Thrace, where the lands had long lain fallow and uncultivated. Hence Zosimus himself, tho' no great friend to Theodosius, owns, that, partly by his victories, and partly by his treaties, he put a stop to the evils, that had almost overwhelmed the empire; that under him trade began to revive, and likewise agriculture, the husbandman cultivating his lands, and attending his flocks, without the least apprehension of seeing himself bereft by the barbarians of the fruits of his labour [e]. What chiefly induced the Goths to lay down their arms, and submit to Theodosius, was, if Orosius is to be credited, that prince's generous behaviour to Athanaric, who being, by a faction at home, driven out of the country, which he had kept, in spite of the Hunns, beyond the Danube, came to Constantinople, notwithstanding his pretended oath never to tread on Roman ground. The emperor went out to meet him, received him with great marks of friendship, and attended him into the city, which he entered on the eleventh of January 381 [f]; but he died soon after, viz. on the twenty-fifth of the same month (B). The emperor caused him to be buried after the Roman manner, with such pomp and solemnity, that the Goths, who had attended him in his flight, out of gratitude to the emperor, who had thus honoured the memory of their deceased prince, took upon them to guard the banks of the Danube, and prevented the Romans from being attacked on that side [g]; nay, the Goths, who had, for several years, maintained a war with the Romans in the very heart of the empire, were so taken with the generosity and good nature of Theodosius, that they renounced all further thoughts of war, and submitted to the laws of the empire. Thus Orosius [h], and likewise Idatius and count Marcellinus [i]. Soon after the submission of the Goths, a soldier of that nation having committed some disorder at Constantinople, the populace fell upon him, and, having murdered him, threw his body into the sea. The emperor, fearing the Goths might, upon this provocation, fly to arms, and re-

(B) Prosper writes, that Athanaric was killed (10); but he was therein certainly mistaken; for Ammianus, who lived in those times, and count Marcellinus, tell us in expres terms, that he died a natural death (11); and Zosimus, with all the other writers, only that he died, which must be understood of a natural death; for, had it been violent, they would have expressed themselves in a different manner. Zosimus especially, a declared enemy to Theodosius, would not have let slip this opportunity of upbraiding that prince with treachery and perfidiousness, had he only suspected him to have been any ways accessory to the death of Athanaric, who had put himself under his protection. The manner he speaks of this death plainly shews, that no one entertained the least suspicion of any violence. Hence De Pontac thinks we ought to read in St. Prosper, occiditur, instead of occiditur.

new the war, resented his death to such a degree, that he deprived the people of the bread, which, by his orders, was daily distributed among them. The emperor, however, was appeased after a few hours, and the order he had given revoked[k].

THE Goths, who were allowed by Theodosius to settle in Thrace, were, for the most part, Thervingians, or Visigoths. As for the Greuthongians, or Ostrogoths, they continued in their antient seats, but subject to the Hunns, who, as we have hinted above, suffered them to be governed by their own kings. However, great numbers of them, not able to brook that subjection, in the year 386, broke into the empire under the conduct of Odotheus, whom Claudian honours with the title of king[l]. Their design was to settle, as their countrymen the Visigoths had done, in some of the Roman provinces; but Theodosius, fearing the empire might be thus over-run by the barbarians, marched against them in person, with his son Arcadius, gave them a total overthrow, and returned, with an incredible number of captives, to Constantinople, which he entered in triumph on the twelfth of October of the present year[m]. This victory is likewise mentioned by count Marcellinus, who tells us, that Theodosius delivered Thrace from the barbarians, who had invaded that province; and that he afterwards returned, with his son, in triumph, to Constantinople[n]. Claudian too speaks of a victory gained in the fourth consulship of Honorius, that is, in the present year 386, over the Greuthongians and their king Odotheus[o]. This is, without all doubt, the victory which Zosimus describes in two places; but, to rob Theodosius of the glory that was due to him, he would make us believe, that it was intirely owing to Promotus, who commanded in Thrace, in quality of general of the foot[p]. According to that writer's account, Odotheus having assembled an incredible number of barbarians, among whom were several nations never before heard of, Promotus fell upon them, as they were attempting to pass the Danube, and, having utterly defeated them, invited Theodosius, who was encamped at a small distance, to come and see the great number of prisoners, and the immense booty he had taken[q]. This, according to Zosimus, is all the share Theodosius had in that victory. But all other authors suppose the emperor to have commanded his troops in person; nay Claudian tells us, that he engaged Odotheus himself, who was killed in the battle[r]. The far greater part of this numerous army being either cut in pieces, taken priſoners, or drowned in the Danube, the emperor ordered Majoranus, who commanded under him, to croſs the Danube, and lay waſte the enemy's country; which he did accordingly, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition [s]. Theodoſius ordered all the priſoners to be ſet at liberty, and even made them rich preſents, in order to entice them into his ſervice, ſays Zoſimus [t], and employ them againſt Maximus, of whom we have ſpoken at length elſewhere [u].

THE Goths continued quiet from this time to the year 395, the firſt of Arcadius and Honorius, when they were ſtirred up by the famous Rufinus to invade the empire. Rufinus governed with an abſolute ſway in the eaſt under Arcadius; and Stilicho, with the ſame arbitrary ſway, ruled in the weſt under Honorius; but as the latter pretended to have been appointed by Theodoſius guardian to both his children, he was preparing to march into the eaſt to diſpoſſeſs his rival of the authority he had uſurped. Rufinus therefore, to divert this ſtorm, reſolved to ſet all in a flame, and involve the whole empire in the utmoſt confuſion. With this view, he privately ſtirred up the Hunns, who advanced as far as Antioch, deſtroying all with fire and ſword, as we have related above. At the ſame time, he encouraged the celebrated Alaric to put himſelf at the head of his countrymen the Viſigoths, and to break into Greece. Alaric was deſcended from the family of the Balthi, the moſt illuſtrious of the Gothic nation, after that of the Amali. He paſſed the Danube in 376, with his countrymen driven out of their own country by the Hunns, and ſerved, with great reputation, in the war between the Romans and Goths, which laſted from that time to the year 382, when they all ſubmitted to Theodoſius, and were allowed to ſettle in Thrace, upon condition of their ſerving, when wanted, in the Roman armies. Purſuant to this agreement, they attended Theodoſius in his expedition againſt the uſurper Eugenius; on which occaſion Alaric commanded a body of his countrymen. As Theodoſius had preferred him to no higher rank, he was highly diſſatisfied, and even threatened to revolt. Rufinus therefore, finding him thus diſpoſed, encouraged him by his emiſſaries, and even by privately conveying to him conſiderable ſums, to aſſemble as many barbarians as he could, and with them lay waſte the Roman provinces, aſſuring him, that he might penetrate as far as Greece, without the leaſt oppoſition [w]. Alaric, thus animated, aſſembled a numerous army, consisting chiefly of his countrymen, among whom served a body of Hunns, who, that winter, had passed the Danube on the ice, and, entering Pannonia, laid waste that province, as he did afterwards Macedon and Thessaly. When he drew near the famous straights of Thermopylæ, Gerontius, one of Rufinus's creatures, who guarded them, withdrew, pursuant to the orders he had received from his patron, and opened a free passage for the barbarians into Greece, where they raged with incredible fury, rifling the temples, pillaging the cities, and committing such ravages and devastations, as were felt by the unhappy inhabitants for many years after, Antiochus, at that time proconsul of Achaia, and another of Rufinus's creatures, never offering to oppose them [x]. Thus was the whole country between Dalmatia, the Adriatic gulf, and the Euxine sea, laid waste, and the city of Constantinople itself, in a manner, besieged, parties of the barbarians advancing, with great boldness, to the very gates of that metropolis. Rufinus, attired after the Gothic manner, went out, as he said, to treat with them, and was received by the barbarians with extraordinary marks of esteem; which confirmed the suspicion most people entertained of his treachery [y]. News of these ravages were no sooner brought to Stilicho, than he resolved to march to the relief of Greece; in which undertaking he embarqued the more readily, as he hoped it would afford him an opportunity of ruining his rival Rufinus, and getting the whole power of both empires into his own hands. Leaving therefore Gaul, where he then was, he set forward with all the western troops, and those likewise of the east, that had been left in the west after the defeat of Eugenius. He passed with incredible expedition the Julian Alps, crossed Dalmatia, and, entering Thessaly, was but at a small distance from the enemy's army, when an officer arrived in the camp, with a peremptory order from Arcadius to send him forthwith the oriental troops, and return with the rest into the west. This order Rufinus had procured, concluding, that if the barbarians were overcome and repressed, the storm would fall upon his own head. However, Stilicho, not daring to disobey it, sent back the troops belonging to the eastern empire, under the conduct of one Gainas, by nation a Goth, and his intimate friend, and returned with the rest to Italy, leaving the Goths to pursue their ravages without controul [z]. Zosimus writes, that they spared the city of Athens, defended, says he, by Minerva and Achilles, whose power Alaric dreaded, and therefore entered the city as a friend, and would not suffer his men to commit any ravages in Attica. But St. Jerom, who wrote at that very time, tells us, that the Athenians, and all the other Greeks, submitted to the barbarians [a]. Claudian names the Athenians among those, who were carried into captivity [b]; and Eunapius ascribes to the ravages committed by Alaric the intire suppression of the ceremonies, religion, and sacrifices, of Ceres and Proserpine, which had continued at Athens till that time [c]. Thus the remains of idolatry, which the christian princes had never been able to abolish with their laws, were at length utterly extirpated by Alaric and his Goths. During these ravages, several philosophers, over-zealous for the worship of their gods, were either put to the sword by the Goths, or died of grief in seeing their mysteries despised, their gods trod under foot, and their altars pulled down. Among the former were Proterus, Hilarius, and Priscus, a celebrated magician, who had been one of the emperor Julian's chief favourites [d]. Thus the Goths continued in Greece, and the other Roman provinces, all the year 395, and part of 396, destroying all with fire and sword, and sending into their own country an incredible number of captives, with the whole wealth of the ravaged provinces.

Stilicho returns to the relief of Greece.

As Arcadius, to whom these provinces belonged, seemed intirely to neglect them, Stilicho, pitying the condition to which they were reduced, set out anew with the western troops to relieve them. He embarqued on the Adriatic sea, and, landing in Peloponnesus, cut off great numbers of the barbarians in several encounters, and obliged the rest to take refuge on a mountain in Arcadia, named Pholoe, at a small distance from Pisa. But, after he had shut them up on all sides, and even turned the course of a river, that supplied them with water, he suffered them, by his misconduct, says Zosimus, to escape, to withdraw out of Peloponnesus unmolested, and to ravage Epirus in their retreat [e]. After this, he returned to Italy, suffering his soldiers to destroy and carry off whatever had escaped the avarice and fury of the Goths [f]. Orosius thinks that Stilicho's design was to deliver Greece, without destroying the barbarians, whom he might, some time or other, have occasion to employ; and therefore he often overcame them, often shut them up on all sides, but always suffered them in the end to escape [g]. But the poet Claudian tells us, that Stilicho would have put Alaric and all his men to the sword, as he had already killed great numbers of them on the mountains of Arcadia, had not Arcadius taken them under his protection, and ordered Stilicho to withdraw his troops out of Greece, a province belonging to the eastern empire [h]. Arcadius had, without all doubt, been induced to conclude a peace with the barbarians by the eunuch Eutropius, who had succeeded Rufinus, not only in his power and employments, but in his cruelty, avarice, and other detestable qualities. He was no less jealous of Stilicho's great power, than his predecessor had been; and, therefore, to rob him of the glory of delivering the empire, and triumphing over the barbarians, he persuaded the emperor to conclude a peace with them, and order Stilicho, to whom he must otherwise have been highly indebted, to leave the barbarians, and return with his forces into the west. Soon after, Alaric was appointed, no doubt in virtue of this treaty, commander of the troops in East Illyricum, which comprised Greece, and the other provinces he had laid waste [i]. Claudian complains, and indeed with a great deal of reason, that the barbarian, who, in defiance to the most sacred ties, had turned his arms against the empire, should be preferred and enriched, and the person, to whom the empire owed its safety, stripped of all his honours, and reduced to poverty [k]; for Stilicho, though he immediately retired with his troops out of Greece, pursuant to the orders of Arcadius, yet that prince caused him to be declared a public enemy by the senate of Constantinople, and the lands he had in the east to be seized and confiscated [l]. It was, without all doubt, after Alaric had been raised to this dignity, and not during the war, that, coming to Athens with a small attendance, he was received by the inhabitants, as we read in Zosimus [m], with all possible marks of honour.

Alaric preferred by Arcadius.

And Stilicho declared a public enemy.

ABOUT three years after, new disturbances were raised in the east by two Goths, subjects of the empire, and in the Roman service, viz. Gainas and Tribigild. The former had, under Theodosius, the chief command of all the Goths and other barbarians in the Roman armies, to which post he had been raised, by degrees, from a common soldier. He reconducted, as we have hinted above, the eastern army to Arcadius, and, on that occasion, caused Rufinus to be cut in pieces by the soldiery, in the manner we have related elsewhere [n]. For this eminent piece of service, he was preferred by Eutropius, who succeeded Rufinus in all his employments, to the post of general of the Roman horse and foot; but, not yet satisfied, he resolved to dispatch Eutropius, as he had done Rufinus, hoping, if he was once removed to ſucceed him in his power and authority. With this view he perſuaded Tribigild to revolt, who, at the head of a numerous body of his countrymen under his command, at Nicolia in Phrygia, over-ran that province, and likewiſe Piſidia, pillaging the cities, and putting to the ſword ſuch of the inhabitants as fell into his hands. Eutropius diſpatched a body of troops againſt him, under the conduct of one Lea, who was greatly attached to his intereſt; but, as he was a perſon in every reſpect unfit for that command, Tribigild, falling unexpectedly upon him, cut moſt of his men in pieces. Leo himſelf, attempting to make his eſcape, periſhed among the marſhes. At length Gainas, who pretended to be highly provoked againſt Tribigild, on account of his revolt, was ſent againſt him; but he, keeping the whole time a private correſpondence with the rebels, inſtead of oppoſing them, encouraged them to rage with greater fury than ever, magnifying, in all the letters he wrote to the emperor, the conduct of Tribigild, his exploits, and the number of his troops, and ſuggeſting, that the only means to ſave the empire from imminent ruin, was to comply with his demands, the chief of which was, that Eutropius, the author of the preſent calamities, ſhould be delivered up into his hands. A report being ſpread at the ſame time, that the king of Perſia was preparing to invade Syria, the emperor, to put an end to the domeſtic diſturbances, reſolved at laſt to ſacrifice the miniſter to the welfare of the ſtate; and accordingly, having ſent for him, cauſed him to be ſtripped of the conſular enſigns, and diſcharged him. He was afterwards baniſhed to the iſland of Cyprus; but Gainas having cauſed ſeveral charges to be brought againſt him, he was conducted from thence under a ſtrong guard to Pantychium, between Chalcedon and Nicomedia, and there tried, condemned, and beheaded [o]. We only hint at theſe events here, having related them at length elſewhere [p]. Eutropius being thus diſpatched, Gainas, joining Tribigild with all the forces under his command, laid waſte ſeveral provinces, and approaching Conſtantinople, obliged the emperor to come to an agreement with him, upon terms highly diſhonourable to the imperial dignity [q]. Soon after, he formed a deſign of plundering the city of Conſtantinople, and enriching himſelf, and his Goths, with the ſpoils of that wealthy metropolis; but, failing in his attempt, he pulled off the maſk, and, making open war upon the empire, ravaged the neighbouring country, and thence

From the Cherſoneſus he marched back to Thrace, and was there, according to Socrates [r] and Sozomen [s], cut in pieces, with all his men, by the Romans, who purſued him. Zoſimus writes, that, being deſirous to end his days in the antient country of the Goths, he paſſed the Danube, but was met on the frontiers by Uldin king of the Hunns, then maſters of thoſe countries, and, after a ſharp diſpute, cut in pieces, with all his men [t]. Alaric breaks into Italy.

DURING the above-mentioned diſturbances raiſed by the Goths in the eaſt, the weſtern provinces were alarmed with a ſudden irruption of the ſame barbarians, under the conduct of Alaric. Arcadius, as we have related above, entered into a treaty with him, and appointed him commander in chief of all the Roman forces quartered in Eaſt Illyricum. The Goths, who were ſubject to the empire, created him, according to Jornandes [w], about the ſame time their chief and general, with the title of king of the Viſigoths. He was, in this very year 400, when he firſt broke into Italy, general of the Illyrian troops; whence ſome have thought he made that irruption by order of Arcadius, and as his general; for Arcadius never well agreed with his brother Honorius. But it is not at all probable, that Arcadius ſhould chuſe to make war upon his brother, while moſt of his forces were employed againſt Tribigild and Gainas. What Jornandes writes ſeems to us far more probable, viz. that the Goths, deſpiſing both Arcadius and Honorius, and diſcontented becauſe they had not ſent them the uſual preſents, reſolved to make war on the empire, in order to enrich themſelves with the ſpoils of ſo many wealthy provinces; and with this view it was that they choſe Alaric for their chief, and even gave him the title of king [x]. However that be, it is certain, that, in the year 400, the Goths, under the conduct of Alaric, entered Italy, and committed there dreadful ravages, laying the country waſte far and near, and carrying off with them an incredible number of captives, as we have related elſewhere [y]. out controul, the provinces of Venetia and Liguria, there being then no army in Italy to oppose him. The emperor Honorius, who then resided at Milan, not thinking himself safe there, retired to Ravenna; which thenceforth became the usual place of his residence. In the mean time, Stilicho, having assembled what forces he could, marched against the enemy, whom he found encamped at Pollentia on the Tanaro in Piedmont. There the two armies engaged; but, as to the issue of the battle, there is a great disagreement among authors, as we have observed in our Roman history [z]. The wife of Alaric, with his children and daughters-in-law, fell into the hands of the Romans; which he no sooner understood, than he sent deputies to Stilicho to sue for peace; which was readily granted him, and the captives sent back, upon condition of his marching forthwith out of Italy. Pursuant to this agre ment, he repassed the Po; but, having plundered the country in his retreat, Stilicho detached a strong body of barbarians against him, by whom he was defeated, and obliged to take refuge among the mountains, where they kept him blocked up, till most of his men forsaking him, and join- ing the Romans, he privately withdrew in the night-time, and returned through by-ways into Thrace [a]. Three years after, Radagaisus invaded Italy with an army of two hundred thousand Goths, and other barbarians dwelling beyond the Danube and the Rhine, who were then all blended under the common name of Goths; but this numerous army was defeated and cut in pieces, and Radagaisus himself taken prisoner by Stilicho, with the assistance of a body of Huns and Goths, who served the Romans as auxiliaries, under the conduct of Uldin and Sarus [b]. Of this invasion we have given a particular and distinct account in our Roman history, to which we refer the reader [c].

Rut is driven out by Stilicho.

THIS storm was scarce blown over, when another was raised by Stilicho, who, in order to kindle a war between Arcadius and Honorius, persuaded the latter, that not only West-Illyricum, but the whole province, belonged to the western empire; nay, he even prevailed upon the weak prince to appoint Alaric general of all the Roman troops in West Illyricum, in order to recover, with them and his own Goths, that part of the province, which he pretended to be unjustly with-held from him by his brother Arcadius. Stilicho, in thus setting the two brothers at variance, had nothing less in view than the raising of himself to the empire; for, while the Goths invaded the eastern empire, his countrymen the Vandals and their allies were to break into the western provinces, and there second his treacherous and wicked design [d]. At the same time that he acquainted Alaric with his promotion, he caused a considerable sum to be transmitted to him, to defray the charges of the war; which he no sooner received, than leaving Pannonia and Dalmatia, where lands had been granted to him and his Goths, he entered Epirus, then belonging to the eastern empire, and there waited for orders from Stilicho to begin hostilities. But while that general was upon the point of setting out from Ravenna to join him with the Roman forces, he was stopped by letters from Arcadius, acquainting him with the revolt of Constantine in Britain, and, by a false report, with the death of Alaric [e]. Hereupon Alaric, after having long continued inactive in Epirus, left at length that country, and, bending his march to-towards Italy, arrived at Æmona, now Lanbach, between Upper Pannonia and Noricum. Thence he continued his route, and, passing the river Aquila and the straights of the mountains that bound Pannonia on that side, where a handful of men might have stopped his whole army, he entered Noricum [f]. From thence he dispatched a messenger to Honorius, demanding a sum of money for the time he had spent in Epirus, and the trouble of marching his troops into Noricum. Upon this demand the senate being assembled, (for Honorius was then at Rome) Stilicho pleaded so warmly in his favour, that it was agreed four thousand pounds weight of gold should be sent him [g]. But the emperor putting off from time to time the payment of this sum, Alaric entered Italy, and marching strait to Rome, laid siege to that metropolis, and, in a short time, reduced it to such straights, that the unhappy inhabitants, afflicted both with the plague and famine, were obliged to redeem themselves with an immense sum; which Alaric no sooner received, than he raised the siege, and retired with his army into Hetruria [h]. But soon after, he returned anew before Rome, the emperor shewing great backwardness to execute the articles of the treaty between Alaric and the Romans, which he himself had ratified. On this occasion, the Romans, after a few days siege, opened their gates to Alaric, who entered the city attended by a small guard, obliged the Romans to renounce their allegiance to Honorius, and acknowledge Attalus, then prefect of Rome, for emperor. But Honorius having, in the mean time, declared, employed by them in driving out the Vandals, Alans, and Suevians, who had entered Spain in 409, and in the space of two years reduced almost the whole country, and divided it among them; but he was assassinated by his own people the seventh day after his election, perhaps on account of his cruelty to the children of his predecessor Ataulphus [n]. In his room was chosen Vallia, after he had caused all those to be assassinated, who stood in competition with him for the crown [o]. As the chief provinces of Spain were already possessed by the Vandals, Alans, and Suevians, he resolved to pass over into Africa, and attempt the reduction of that country, which still continued subject to the Romans; but the fleet he was sending thither being shipwrecked, and a great number of Goths on board of it drowned, he not only concluded a peace, but entered into an alliance, with the Romans, upon the following terms; viz. that Placidia, whom the emperor had promised to Constantius, should be sent back; that the Goths should make war upon the barbarians, who had settled in Spain, restoring to the Romans the places and territories they should recover out of their hands; that, on the other hand, the Romans should reward the Goths with lands within the empire, and send them forthwith six hundred thousand measures of corn. Pursuant to this agreement, the promised corn was immediately sent to the Goths, who were then in the utmost distress; and they no sooner received it, than Vallia sent back Placidia to her brother, and began to make the necessary preparations for the intended war with the barbarians in Spain [p]. Jornandes writes, that Constantius advanced at the head of a powerful army to the frontiers of Spain, with a design to make war upon Vallia, in case he refused to send him Placidia, who had been promised to him in marriage; that Vallia came to meet him, on the Pyrenean mountains, with an army no-ways inferior to his; and that the above-mentioned peace and alliance was there concluded [q]. But Jornandes is so little acquainted with the history of those times, even that of his own nation, that we cannot give intire credit to any thing he writes.

marched next, and made such a dreadful havock of that nation, that their king Ata being killed, the few who remained, instead of chusing him a successor, fled for protection to Gonderic, king of the Vandals, who had settled in Galicia, and submitted to him [q]. To reward these eminent services of Vallia and his Goths, Honorius bestowed on them Aquitania Secunda, comprising the present archbishopric of Bourdeaux, and some neighbouring cities, that is, the whole tract from Toulouse to the sea; to which was added, soon after, Novempopulania, or Aquitania Tertia, that is, the provinces of Auch and Gascony [r]. Vallia, on the other hand, yielded to the Romans, not only the country he had taken from the Vandals and Alans, but likewise Catalonia, which the Goths had held ever since their entering Spain, under the conduct of Ataulphus their second king. Vallia fixed his residence at Toulouse, which by that means became, and continued to be, for the space of eighty-eight years, the metropolis of the kingdom of the Visigoths. Vallia died soon after he had brought his Goths back into Gaul, that is, in the year 418, according to the chronicle of Idatius [s], having reigned only three years [t]. He left behind him one daughter, married to a Suevian, by whom she had the famous Ricimer of whom we have made frequent mention in our Roman history [u].

Vallia was succeeded by Theodoric, who, breaking the alliance which his predecessor had concluded with the Romans, made himself master of several places in Gaul belonging to them, and even laid siege to Arles; but, at the approach of Aetius, he abandoned the enterprise, and returned to Toulouse [w]. He made peace soon after with the Romans; for Sidonius tells us, that after the siege of Arles, which the Goths had attempted in vain to reduce, several Gauls were delivered up to them as hostages, and among the rest one Theodorus, who was nearly related to Avitus, afterwards emperor: he adds, that Avitus went to visit his kinsman at the court of Theodoric; on which occasion he rejected the great offers, with which Theodoric endeavoured to entice him into his service [x]. After this, the Goths continued quiet in the countries, that had been allotted them in Gaul, for the space of ten years, that is, to the year 436, when the Romans being engaged in a war with the Burgundians, Theodoric laid hold of that opportunity to inlarge his dominions. Having, therefore made himself master of several cities, he laid siege in the end to Narbonne. But the Re- mans having, in the mean time, concluded a peace with the Burgundians, count Litorius haſtened to the relief of the place at the head of a body of auxiliary Huns, and, falling upon the Goths, put them to flight, and entered the city, each horſeman carrying with him two buſhels of corn; which proved a ſeaſonable relief to the inhabitants, reduced, by the long ſiege, to the utmoſt extremity [y]. Idatius aſcribes the raiſing of the ſiege to Aetius [z]; probably, becauſe Litorius commanded under him, and acted by his orders. The Romans purſued the war againſt the Goths with great vigour and equal ſucceſs. In 438, a battle was fought, in which Aetius, who commanded the Roman forces, cut eight thouſand of them in pieces [a]. The following year, Litorius, who commanded the auxiliary Huns, gained great advantages over them, and even laid ſiege to Touloufe, their capital. Theodoric, who was in the place, ſent ſeveral biſhops to Litorius, hoping, by their mediation, to prevail upon the Roman general to accept the advantageous terms, which he offered; but Litorius, who thought the Goths reduced to the laſt extremity, openly declaring, that he would hearken to no propoſals, Theodoric marched out at the head of his men, and offered him battle; which he not declining, as a more prudent commander would have done, both armies engaged with the utmoſt fury. Victory continued a long time doubtful, the loſs being equal on both ſides; but Litorius having in the end advanced too far at the head of his Huns, in whoſe valour he chiefly confided, the Goths, making a laſt effort, cut moſt of them in pieces, put the reſt to flight, and, having ſurrounded Litorius, who had received a dangerous wound, took him alive, and carried him, with his hands tied behind his back, into the city, which he had hoped to enter that very day in triumph. Theodoric cauſed him to be expoſed for ſome time to the inſults and outrages of the populace and children, and then to be thrown into the public priſon; where, after he had undergone inexpreſſible hardſhips, he was by the king's orders put to death. After this victory the Goths might have extended their conqueſts to the Rhone; and this reſolution they had taken, according to Sidonius, Actius, who at that time had neither men nor money [c], being no-ways in a condition to oppoſe them. However, Theodoric, at the requeſt of Avitus, then prefect of Gaul, and by him had in great eſteem, readily hearkened to the propoſals that were made to him, and concluded a peace with the Romans on the same terms he had offered them before the battle [d]. Who concludes a peace with the Romans.

SOME years after, that is in 453, Theodoric, entering into an alliance with the Romans, assisted them powerfully against the Hunns, who had entered Gaul, and, heading his own troops in person, distinguished himself in the famous battle of Chalons; but, falling unluckily from his horse, he was, according to some, trod to death by his own people, who did not know him; according to others, killed by a Goth, named Andagus, who served under Attila, and was descended from the royal family of the Amali [e]. He was succeeded by his son Thorismund, who had fought under his father, and had been wounded in the same battle. The young prince was for revenging the death of his father on the Hunns, and attacking Attila in his camp; but Aetius, fearing the Hunns, whom he considered as a check upon the Goths and Franks, might be thus intirely cut off, craftily advised him to return home, lest his brothers should raise disturbances during his absence, and, seizing on the royal treasures, give rise to a civil war. Thorismund followed his advice, and, returning with his troops to Toulouse, was there received as king, with the greatest demonstrations of joy imaginable [f]. Being soon after apprised of the deceitful advice given him by Aetius, he broke the alliance he had made with the Romans, and laid siege to Arles; but was prevailed upon by Ferreolus, prefect of Gaul, to drop that enterprise, and retire [g]. Sidonius writes, that Ferreolus did more by an entertainment, than Aetius could have done with an army; that, by his obliging manner and agreeable conversation, he gained Thorismund, and saved Arles [h]. The same year Thorismund had a favourable opportunity of revenging, on the Hunns, the death of his father; for Attila having invaded Gaul anew, with a design to make war upon the Alans, next neighbours to the Visigoths, and, by reducing them, get footing in Gaul, Thorismund joined the Alans with all his forces, engaged Attila, and, having gained a complete victory over him, obliged him to return with shame and disgrace into his own country [i]. Gregory of Tours writes, that he overcame and subdued the Alemanns and the Alans [k]. It appears from Sidonius, that his dominions extended to the Rhone [l]: that writer styles him the haughty and untractable king of Gothia [m]; for in his whole He is killed in the battle of Chalons. Thorismund his successor breaks with the Romans. Defeats Attila.

conduct he betrayed great pride and arrogance, was incapable of living himself, or suffering others to live, in peace, and seemed to delight in nothing but wars and slaughter. On the the other hand, his brothers Theodoric, Frederic, Turic, or rather Euric, Rotemer, and Himnarit, were inclined to peace; which occasioned daily quarrels between them and the king. At length, his brothers, especially Theodoric and Frederic, finding they could by no other means divert him from engaging in new wars, resolved to dispatch him. Being therefore one day let blood on account of some slight indisposition, while his vein was still open, one of his officers, named Ascaleru, having first removed privately his arms, cried out aloud, that assassins were coming in to murder the king, and at the same time threw himself upon him with several others. Thorismund, missing his weapons, with the only arm he had free, laid hold of a foot-stool, and with it dispatched some of the conspirators; but was in the end overpowered and slain [n]. This Idatius supposes to have happened in 452, and he is followed therein by Isidore, who will have Thorismund to have reigned only one year; but Prosper places the death of that prince in 453, and the year must have been near ended, since Thorismund was then, according to Jornandes [o], in the third year of his reign.

He is murdered.

Year after Christ 453.

Theodoric II.

Thorismund was succeeded by his brother Theodoric, a prince, according to Sidonius [p], whom he honoured with his intimacy, of uncommon parts and great accomplishments, but in point of religion a mere hypocrite. The same writer calls him elsewhere a martial prince, who even surpassed his illustrious parent, the glory of the Gothic nation, and the support of the Roman empire, not able to maintain itself without the assistance of the barbarians, whom the Romans had so often overcome [q]. He was, it seems, a man of some learning, and well versed in the Latin poets [r]. In the beginning of his reign he not only concluded a peace, but entered into an alliance, with the Romans, sending his brother Frederic with a chosen body of troops into Spain, to make war upon the Bagaudæ, who, driving out the Romans, had sized on great part of Hispania Tarraconensis. Frederic recovered several places out of their hands, which he restored to the Romans [s]. However, in the year 455, the emperor Maximus, apprehending that Theodoric designed to break with the empire, sent Avitus, who was greatly esteemed and respected by the Goths, to the court of Toulouse, to divert that storm. Avitus was received by the king with the greatest marks of friendſhip and eſteem, and the peace between the two nations confirmed. But, in the mean time, Maximus dying, Theodoric preſſed Avitus to aſſume the ſovereignty, promiſing to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of his power. Avitus, encouraged with this promiſe, ſuffered himſelf to be proclaimed emperor by the Goths at Toulouſe, on the tenth of July; and was, on the eighth of Auguſt, acknowledged and proclaimed anew at Arles by the Roman ſoldiery, and all the perſons of diſtinction in Gaul. Theodoric went immediately, attended by his brothers, to Arles, to congratulate the new prince on his acceſſion to the empire, and was received by him as one to whom he was chiefly indebted for the dignity he enjoyed [t]. The following year, the Suevians, taking advantage of the confuſion which the aſſaſſination of Valentinian III. and Maximus had bred in the empire, over-ran and pillaged the province of Cartagena, with a deſign to drive the Romans quite out of Spain. Hereupon Avitus diſpatched count Fronto to Requiarius their king, putting him in mind of the treaties concluded between him and the Romans: Theodoric likewiſe interpoſed his good offices, conjuring Requiarius, who had married his ſiſter, not to diſturb the public tranquility; and at the ſame time acquainting him with the engagements which he had entered into with Avitus [u]. What anſwer Requiarius returned to the embaſſadors our hiſtorian does not tell us; but he had no ſooner diſmiſſed them, than, aſſembling his forces, he entered the province of Tarraco, which then belonged to the Romans, and there committed unheard-of ravages, without any regard to the faith of treaties, or the laws of juſtice. Upon this, Theodoric ſent him a ſecond embaſſy, to which he anſwered with great haughtineſs, that he did not underſtand, why the king of the Goths ſhould concern himſelf with his affairs; that if he found fault with his conduct, he would ſoon give him an account of it at Toulouſe. Theodoric, piqued at this anſwer, began to prepare for war; but in the mean time Requiarius, entering anew the province of Tarraco, laid it waſte far and near, carrying with him into Galicia a great number of captives [w]. Soon after, Theodoric, having concluded a peace with all his neighbours, left his own dominions, and, with the conſent and approbation of Avitus, entered Spain at the head of a numerous army, conſiſting of Goths and Burgundians; the latter, whom he had called to his aſſiſtance, being commanded by their king Hilperic or Chilperic. Requiarius met him about twelve miles from Aſtorga on the Urbicus, now the Orbigua: hereupon a battle enſued, in which the Suevians were utterly defeated, and their king, who was dangerously wounded, obliged to fly for shelter to the most distant corner of Galicia [x]. This battle was fought on the fifth of October, and Theodoric, pursuing the fugitives, entered Braga on a Sunday, the twenty-eighth of the same month, and gave it up to be plundered by his soldiers, who abstained from slaughter, and spared the sacred virgins, but committed all other disorders [y]; Requiarius had retired to a place called Portucal, thought to be the present city of Porto on the Douro; and from thence attempted to make his escape by sea; but, being driven back by a storm, he was taken and delivered up to Theodoric, who kept him under close confinement till December, and then ordered him to be put to death [z]. The Suevians, disheartened by the captivity of their king, and destitute of a leader, were most of them either taken prisoners, or put to the sword; tho' Theodoric had strictly injoined his men to spare all, who laid down their arms, and submitted [a]. Thus was the power of the Suevians reduced by the Goths to the lowest ebb. Some authors think, that Avitus, who owned himself indebted to Theodoric for the imperial dignity, had yielded to him all the countries in Spain he should recover out of the hands of the Suevians: others are of opinion, that, Avitus being in the mean time deposed, Theodoric thought he might retain for himself the countries he had conquered in the name of that prince. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the king of the Visigoths, appropriating to himself the countries he had taken from the Suevians, appointed one Aquiulphus to govern them. Aquiulphus, or, as others call him, Acliulphus, was not a Goth, as Jornandes takes care to tell us, but born in the country of the Warni, who are thought to have passed about this time from Lower Saxony into Frisia and Holland [b]. He therefore, without any regard to the most sacred ties, abandoned the Goths, and, retiring into Galicia, endeavoured to persuade the Suevians dwelling there to acknowledge him for their king [c]; but a powerful army being sent against him by Theodoric, he was overcome in battle, taken, and beheaded [d]. Thus Jornandes; but Idatius only says, that he died in the month of June of the following year 456 at Porto [e]. The Suevians, who, refusing to submit to Theodoric, had retired into Galicia, upon the news of the death of their king, chose one of their own nation, named Maldra, in his room.

mans, and, taking unexpectedly the field, made himself master of several cities in Gaul belonging to him. But Majorianus, who was then at Arles, marching against him with what troops he could assemble, defeated him in a pitched battle, and obliged him to sue for peace, which was readily granted him, upon his promising to assist the Romans against the Suevians and Vandals [n].

But Majorianus dying soon after, Theodoric thought himself no longer obliged to maintain the peace he had concluded with him; and therefore made himself master of several places in Gaul belonging to the Romans, and among the rest of Narbonne, which was betrayed to him by one Agrippina. From Narbonne he marched to Arles, which he invested, but was obliged to raise the siege by Ægidius, a native of Gaul, whom Severus, the successor of Majorianus, had appointed commander in chief of the Roman forces there [o]. The following year 463, Ægidius gained a signal victory over the Goths in the neighbourhood of Orleans. In this battle great numbers of the Goths were slain, and, among the rest, Frederic, the king's brother, who commanded in chief [p]. The Goths being overcome and dispersed, Ægidius laid siege to Chinon in Touraine; but the vigorous resistance he met with obliged him to drop the enterprise, and retire [q].

He takes Narbonne.

But is defeated by Ægidius.

The Goths masters of the greater part of Spain.

The Goths were attended with better success in Spain than in Gaul; for Idatius speaks of them as now masters of the whole country, except part of Galicia, which was still held by the Suevians; and the provinces of Tarraco and Cartagena, which belonged to the Romans, and were governed by a duke; for in 465, a Roman, named Vincentius, resided at Tarraco with that title [r]. The provinces subject to the Goths were governed by the generals Sunieric and Nepotianus, the former a Goth, and the latter a native of Languedoc, which was subject to the Goths.

In the year 464, died Ægidius, and upon his death the Goths, says Idatius [s], made themselves masters of the far greater part of Gaul. But he is therein certainly mistaken; for Berri, Sens, and Auvergne, still belonged to the Romans in 472 [t]; Syagrius, the son of Ægidius, held Soissons and its territory [u]; Childeric king of the Burgundians reduced the city of Paris after a siege, according to some, of five, according to others, of ten, years [w]. The Franks were masters of the countries bordering on the Rhine, the Saxons of Nants and Bayeux, and the

Britons driven out by the Angles of Vennes and Trequier [x]. The following year 465, Theodoric, more bent on making acquisitions in Gaul than in Spain, came to an agreement with Remismund king of the Suevians; but before he could put his vast designs in execution, he was taken off by the same crime that had raised him to the throne, being murdered by his brother Euric, after he had reigned thirteen years [y]. Jornandes, ever favourable to the Goths, only writes, that the joy Euric had betrayed on this occasion induced some to imagine, that he had been accessory to the death of his brother [z]. Euric, called also Eoric, Evarix, and Euthoric, had no sooner ascended the throne, than he dispatched embassadors to Leo emperor of the east, to Remismund king of the Suevians, and to Genseric king of the Vandals. Remismund no sooner heard the embassadors, than he sent others to Euric, to the emperor, and to the king of the Vandals [a]; but, what was the subject of so many embassies, our historian has not thought fit to acquaint us. All we know is, that the embassadors, sent by Euric to the king of the Vandals, hearing that the Romans were making great preparations to attack that people, returned in great haste to Tolouse; and that Remismund, upon the departure of Euric's embassadors, recalled, and assembled into one body, the troops he had sent out in small parties to ravage the country [b]. These people were perhaps negotiating an alliance among themselves against the common enemy the Romans. Be that as it will, Euric, this very year 466, committed great ravages in Lusitania, and, having reduced the cities of Pampelona and Saragosa, made himself master of Upper Spain [c]. The following year, Remismund, having entered Lusitania, took Coimbra, made himself master of several other places, and ravaged the country, committing every-where unheard-of cruelties. Hereupon the natives, recurring not to the Romans, which shews that their power in Spain was now reduced to a very low ebb, but to the Visigoths, sent a solemn embassy, at the head of which was one Opilio, to implore the protection of Euric, who readily interposed his good offices, but, it seems, to no effect; for Remismund, upon the departure of the embassadors sent to him by Euric, plundered the city of Coimbra, destroyed several houses, with part of the walls, and carried such of the inhabitants, as had not the good luck to make their escape, into captivity [d]. Idatius adds, that the embassadors sent by the Lusitanians reported, upon their return, that several prodigies had happened in Gaul, and, among the rest, that a fountain of blood had sprung up in the midst of Tolouse, and flowed a whole day [e]. Euric having made himself master of Pampelona and Cæsaraugusta, or Saragosa, as we have related above, Tarraco with its territory was the only place held now in Spain by the Romans; and that city Euric besieged in 461, the second of the emperor Anthemius's reign, and having, after a long siege, reduced it, levelled it with the ground. Thus were the Romans driven quite out of Spain, and a period put to their empire there, after they had been at least seven hundred years masters of that country. All those provinces, except Galicia and part of Lusitania, which were subject to the Suevians, acknowledged Euric for their king, who, residing at Tolouse, governed them by his lieutenants.

Drives the Romans quite out of Spain.

Euric, not satisfied with the conquests he had made in Spain, resolved to extend his dominions likewise in Gaul. With this view he began to draw together his forces, and make other military preparations; which the emperor Anthemius no sooner understood, than he wrote to Riotham king of the Britons, who had settled on the Loire, pressing him to join the Romans against the common enemy; for the Britons were greatly attached to the Roman interest. Riotham readily complied with the emperor's request, and, having assembled a body of twelve thousand men, marched at the head of them to Bourges, and from thence to Bourgdeols on the Indre, in the province of Berri; but, being there met by Euric, he was overcome by the Goths with great loss, and obliged to abandon that province, and take refuge among the Burgundians, the friends and allies of the Romans [f]. Gregory of Tours writes, that, after the defeat of the Britons, one Paul, whom he distinguishes with the title of count, having assembled a body of troops, consisting of Romans and Franks, made war upon the Goths, and gained considerable advantages over them [g]. However, Sidonius tells us, that the Goths overcame the Franks, and afterwards entered into an alliance with them [h]. He writes elsewhere, that Euric gave his daughter in marriage to Sigimer a barbarian prince [i], whom Valesius conjectures to have been by nation a Frank [k]. The war between the Romans and Goths continued all this and the following year 471, but the authors, who speak of that war without descending to particulars, only tell us, that the Goths gained great advantages over the Romans, and in the end made themſelves maſters of the provinces of Berri and Gevaudan [l], the inhabitants, who were greatly oppreſſed by the Roman officers, eſpecially by Seronatus, governor of Gaul, chuſing rather to live under the Goths than the Romans [m], or, as Salvianus expreſſes it, chuſing rather to live free, under the appearance of ſlavery, than be treated like ſlaves under the appearance of liberty [n]. In 473, a peace was concluded [o]; but Anthemius being murdered the ſame year by Ricimer, and Olybrius proclaimed emperor in his room, as we have related in our Roman hiſtory [p], Euric, taking advantage of the weak and diſtracted ſtate of the empire, renewed the war, hoping to drive the Romans quite out of Gaul, as he had done five years before out of Spain. Auvergne was the only province they ſtill held in Aquitania Prima, lying between the ocean, the Rhone and the Loire; and into this province Euric broke at the head of a powerful army in the beginning of the year 474, but met with a vigorous reſiſtance from the inhabitants, who, without the aſſiſtance of any regular troops, gained ſome conſiderable advantages over the enemy. But in the end they laid ſiege to Clermont, and continued before that place, without being able to reduce it, till the rigour of the ſeaſon obliged them to retire [q]. As they ſeemed reſolved to renew the ſiege early in the ſpring, Nepos, who had ſucceeded Olybrius in the empire, thinking he could better ſecure by treaty, than by arms, what he ſtill poſſeſſed in Gaul, diſpatched the quæſtor Licinianus with the character of embaſſador to Euric, in order to enter into a negotiation with that prince. Euric received him in a very obliging manner, and ſeveral conferences were held, at which ſome biſhops of Provence were allowed to aſſiſt; viz. Leontius biſhop of Arles, Fauſtus of Riez, Grecus of Marſeilles, and Baſilius of Aix [r]. To Baſilius, Sidonius, then biſhop of Clermont, wrote a letter, recommending to him the intereſt of the Catholic religion, and begging he would take care, that by the treaty the Catholics ſhould be allowed to ordain biſhops for the vacant churches in the countries ſubject to the Goths. For the Goths held the doctrine of Arius, and Euric, a profeſſed enemy to the catholics, would not allow them to appoint new biſhops in the room of thoſe who died; inſomuch, that nine epiſcopal ſees were at that time vacant [s]. which

which proved afterwards true, that a treaty was upon the point of being concluded between the Romans and Goths, in virtue of which Auvergne was to be delivered up to the Goths, Sidonius, who was bishop of Clermont in that province, and a zealous defender of the orthodox faith, wrote a letter to Grecus bishop of Marseilles, conjuring him not to agree to so shameful an article, and assuring him, that the inhabitants were ready to undergo the greatest hardships, rather than submit to the Goths, who, mindful of the vigorous resistance they had often met with from them, would treat them more like criminals than slaves. He concludes by earnestly begging, that if the country was to be yielded to the Goths, the inhabitants might be allowed to retire, and some place allotted to them within the bounds of the empire [t]. However, the treaty was concluded, and Auvergne delivered up to Euric, tho' he would not by any means consent to the ordaining of catholic bishops for the vacant churches within his dominions [u].

FIVE years after, that is in 480, the few places in Gaul, that were still held by the Romans, having submitted to Odoacer, who, after putting to death Orestes, and deposing his son Augustulus the last emperor of the west, had assumed the title of king of Italy, that prince yielded them to the Goths, whose dominions, by that addition, extended from the Loire to the Alps [w]. However, the cities of Arles and Marseilles held out, it seems, some time against the Goths [x]. We leave Bucherius to inquire why Odoacer abandoned these countries, and, in abandoning them, chose rather to bestow them on the Goths, than the Burgundians, the friends and allies of the empire [y]. That writer supposes the Burgundians, jealous of the too great power of the Goths, to have made war upon them; and that this is the year of which Jornandes speaks, where he tells us, that a war was kindled between two nations in Gaul [z]; for he speaks soon after of the war between the Burgundians and Goths. The Burgundians, sprung originally from the Vandals, had entered Gaul in 406, with the Vandals and Alans, and having some years after made themselves masters of the country, now known by the name of Alsace, they were allowed to settle there as friends and allies of the Roman people. They were removed from thence in 431, by Aetius to the present duchy of Savoy. In 456, they seized on part of Spain, and made themselves masters of the city of Lyons, and in 478, reduced the whole province called Lugdunenſis Prima. Jornandes writes, that in the preſent year 482, the Goths gained great advantages over them [a]. However, it appears from the acts of the council of Agde held in 526, and of the council of Epaune in 527, that no fewer than twenty-eight cities or dioceſes belonged to the Burgundians, in which number were Lyons, Vienne, Beſançon, and Embrun [b]; ſo that the Goths were not, as Jornandes ſuppoſes them to have been, maſters of all the ſouth parts of Gaul [c]. Euric, having thus made himſelf maſter of the beſt part of Gaul, that is, of the whole tract between the Rhone and the Loire, and of all Spain, except a ſmall corner of Galicia, and part of Luſitania held by the Suevians, was ſtill bent on making new conqueſts, and reducing the remaining part both of Spain and Gaul, when death put an end to his vaſt deſigns. He died at Arles in 484, the nineteenth year of his reign [d], after the eleventh, and before the end of September [e]. He had made himſelf way to the throne by the murder of his brother, and governed his ſubjects with a rod of iron [f]. He paſſed the greater part of his life in the field, was conſtantly quarrelling with his neighbours, and never pleaſed, but when he had an opportunity of ſtaining his hands in the blood of his enemies [g]. He was a prince of great penetration, formidable in war, and attended with ſucceſs in moſt of his undertakings [h]; whence he was dreaded by all nations, and his friendſhip courted by the neighbouring as well as the diſtant people [i]. Sidonius, ſpeaking in 476, of the court of this prince then at Bourdeaux, deſcribes the Saxons, the Franks, the Heruli, the Burgundians, and even the Romans and Perſians, falling down before him in the poſture of ſuppliants and conquered people [k]. Upon this Bucherius makes a long deſcant [l], to which we refer the reader. Apollinaris Sidonius makes ſeveral excellent reflections on the ſucceſs that attended Euric in moſt of his undertakings [m], though he was not only ſeparated from, but an irreconcileable enemy to, the catholic church, being a zealous Arian, and firmly perſuaded, ſays Sidonius, that the ſucceſs of his arms was owing to the purity of his faith. His averſion to the catholic church was ſo great, that he could not even endure the name of catholic [n]. Gregory of Tours writes, that having raiſed a perſecution againſt the catholics, he cauſed

their churches to be ſhut up, and either baniſhed, impriſoned, or put to death, their biſhops, their clergy, and all who dared to oppoſe or impugn the Arian impiety [o]. But if that writer had no other voucher for that perſecution but Sidonius, whom he quotes, his account is greatly exaggerated; for Sidonius only ſays, that Euric baniſhed two biſhops, and would not ſuffer any to be named to the vacant ſees [p]. Moſt churches, continues Sidonius, in the countries held by the Goths, are without paſtors, and the biſhoprics end there with the lives of the biſhops. Of theſe vacant biſhoprics he names nine, viz. Bourdeaux, Peregueux, Rhodes, Limoges, Mande, Eauſe, Bazas, Cominges, and Auch. He adds, that the vacancy of the ſees was attended with the ruin of religion, ſince it was the province of the biſhops to provide the churches with inferior miniſters, and bring back to the fold the ſheep gone aſtray; that chriſtianity was almoſt extinct in thoſe dioceſes; that the churches were ready to fall both in the towns and villages; that ſome of them were ſhut up by the thorns and briars that grew in the entry, and others lay open only for the ſheep, that came to graze at the very foot of the holy altar. If ſuch was the ſtate of affairs in 474, when Sidonius wrote, we leave the reader to judge to what a deplorable condition they muſt have been reduced before the end of Euric's reign, which laſted ten years longer; for that prince never ſuffered the vacant ſees to be filled. The two biſhops he baniſhed in 474, were Crocus, ſuppoſed to have been biſhop of Niſmes, and Simplicius, whoſe ſee is quite unknown [q].

The firſt who gave written laws to the Goths.

Euric was the firſt who gave written laws to the Goths, governed, till his reign, by cuſtoms only [r]. The laws he publiſhed were called the Theodorician laws; which appellation has occaſioned great diſputes among authors. Baronius ſuppoſes them to have been ſo called, becauſe the two Theodorics, predeceſſors of Euric, were the authors of them [s]. But Iſidore tells us in expreſs terms, that Euric was the firſt who gave written laws to the Goths. Cujacius will have them to have been called Theodorician laws from Theodoric the Oſtrogoth king of Italy [t], not reflecting, that they are ſtyled Theodorician by Apollinaris Sidonius, who died, as is plain from Gregory of Tours [u], before Theodoric was maſter of Italy. Beſides, it is certain, that Theodoric king of Italy paid the greateſt reſpect to the Roman laws, and governed by them. Sirmund and Alteſerra are of opinion, that they were, by paronomaſia, called Theodoricianæ, in oppoſition to the Theodoſianæ; but this paronomaſia, ſays the learned Sa- varon [w], would have been but very inſipid, had not Evaric, the author of theſe laws, been likewiſe called Theodoric; and that this was his true name, is plainly ſhewn, both by him, and by Grotius in his nomenclature. As for the name of Evaric or Euric, which Grotius explains by legibus pollens, it was given him on account of the laws he publiſhed. Theſe laws were by Euric obtruded upon the people of Gaul and Spain, who had been long accuſtomed to the Roman laws; but Alaric, his ſon and ſucceſſor, reſtored the Roman laws to their former ſplendor, cauſing them to be obſerved throughout his dominions, as we ſhall ſee in the reign of that prince, where we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak of the Alaric code. The perſon Euric chiefly employed in compiling his laws was Leo, his prime miniſter, and one of the moſt learned men and beſt civilians of his time [x] (C). Some Spaniſh writers tell us, that, beſides Leo, he employed ſeventy biſhops, among whom was one Severus, biſhop of Barcelona, whom he afterwards put to death, with a country-

(C) Leo was, according to Sidonius, a man of uncommon parts, the beſt civilian of his time, and well verſed in every branch of literature (2). Hence he was highly eſteemed by Euric, and raiſed to the firſt honours in his court. By him were penned all the letters that prince wrote to foreign kings and ſtates (3). His advice was of ſuch weight with Euric, that he ſuffered himſelf to be intirely guided by him in affairs of the greateſt importance (4). He was deſcended from Cornelius Fronto, who was preceptor to the emperor M. Aurelius, and one of the greateſt orators of antiquity (5). He profeſſed the catholic faith in the court of an Arian prince, and led a life without blemiſh or reproach (6). Sidonius, in ſending him the life of Apollonius Tyaneus, beſtows great encomiums upon him, and returns him thanks for the many favours he had received at his hands (7). Leo had adviſed him to apply himſelf to the writing of hiſtory; and Sidonius exhorts him to undertake that taſk himſelf, telling him, that no one was better qualified for it (8). St. Gregory of Tours tells us, that Alaric the ſon of Euric having once complained in the preſence of Leo, that a fine view from his palace was obſtructed by the church of Narbonne, he adviſed him to lower the church; which was done accordingly. Gregory of Tours adds, that Leo paid dear for this advice, having ſoon after intirely loſt his eyeſight (9).

man named Emeterius, on account of their zeal for the catholic faith. But what these authors write is founded on an antient tradition, which Bollandus thinks quite groundless *. Euric married one Ragnahild or Ragnachild, the daughter of a king, for whose use in bathing Evodius caused a silver vessel to be made, on which were engraved some verses composed by Sidonius [y]. By her he had a son named Alaric, by whom he was succeeded, and a daughter, who was married to a barbarian prince named Sigismer [z]. From the description which Sidonius, who saw that prince, gives of him, Valesius concludes him to have been by nation a Frank; and that Euric gave him his daughter in marriage, hoping, by that means, to gain the nation of the Franks, which began to be very powerful in Gaul. But by that very nation the son he had by her was killed in battle, and a period put to the kingdom of the Visigoths in Gaul, who, being driven from thence, fixed their royal seat at Toledo in Spain. But, as in Euric's reign they firmly established their dominion in the latter of these countries, we shall, in compliance with our plan, leave them for the present, and reserving for modern history an account of their affairs from the time they settled in Spain to the loss of that country to the Arabs, return to the Ostrogoths, who, as we have observed above, upon the departure of their countrymen the Visigoths admitted by Valens in 376, into the empire, continued in their antient seats, but subject to the Hunns, who nevertheless allowed them to be governed by their own kings of the illustrious family of the Amali.

The history of the Ostrogoths. Their kings.

THE Ostrogoths, as we have related above, upon the death of Ermenric or Hermanaric their king, chose Vithimir, by some called Winithar, in his room. The new king gained at first some small advantages over the Hunns, but was in the end overcome, and killed in battle by Balamir or Balamber, king of the Hunns [a]. His son Vitheric withdrew, attended by great numbers of his subjects, into the plains between the Borysthenes and the Danube, that is, into the present Podolia. Of him no further mention is made in history. He was succeeded by Hunimund, the son of Ermenric, who submitted to the Hunns, and is said to have made war upon, and gained a signal victory over, the Suevians. His son Thorismund reigned next, who defeated with great slaughter the Gepidæ; but was soon after killed in the flower of his age by a fall from his horse. The Goths so lamented the loss of this prince, that, for the space of forty years, they chose no king in his room. After so long an inter-regnum, Wandalar, son to the brother of Ermenric, was raised to the throne; but of him no further mention is made in history. He was succeeded by his three sons Valemir, Theodomir, and Videmir, who reigned jointly, and attended Attila in most of his expeditions. Upon that prince's death, several nations, by him formerly subdued, revolting from his children, begged and obtained leave from Marcian, then emperor, to settle in the Roman territories, almost quite dispeopled by the frequent incursions of the Hunns and other barbarians. Among these mention is made of the Squiri, Satagairæ, and Alans, who settled in Lesser Scythia and Lower Mœsia. To the Rugians, Sarmatians, and Cemandrians, lands were granted in Illyricum, near a place called the Castle of Mars. To the Ostrogoths Marcian granted all Pannonia, from Sirmium, now Sirmish, in Sclavonia, to Vindobona, now Vienna in Austria [b]. The Goths, as well as the other barbarians, acknowledged the authority of the Constantinopolitan emperors, and were subjects of the empire; but at the same time governed by their own princes, to whom the emperors agreed to pay an annual pension, upon their promising to guard the frontiers of the empire, and serve, when wanted in the Roman armies [c]. Pannonia being granted to the Ostrogoths, the three brothers divided that country among them, Valemir settling in the eastern part of it, Theodomir in the western, and Videmir between the other two [d]. They were scarce warm in their new seats, when the sons of Attila, pursuing them even into Pannonia, fell upon Valemir in the neighbourhood of Sirmium; but that prince with a handful of men, overthrew them with great slaughter, and obliged them to take refuge in that part of Scythia, which bordered on the Danube [e]. About eight years after, the Goths being engaged in a war with the Satagæ, Dintzio, one of Attila's sons, laying hold of that opportunity, entered Pannonia at the head of a considerable army; and, having ravaged the country, laid siege to Bassiana, thought to be the present city of Posega, which gives name to a county in Hungary between the Save and the Draw. But the Goths leaving the Satagæ, marched with all their forces against the Hunns, who readily engaged them, but received such an overthrow, that they ever after stood in awe of the Goths, and never offered to molest them [f]. In the year 455, the emperor Leo refusing, under several pretences, to pay to the Ostrogoths their usual pension, they entered Illyricum, and there committed dreadful ravages; but Anthemius, son-in-law to the emperor Marcian, having assembled the troops quartered in that province, obliged them to retire with no small loss [g]. Soon after, Leo sent deputies to Valemir, to upbraid him with his late conduct, and renew the antient treaties [h]. The treaties were accordingly renewed, and the peace re-established, upon the emperor's promising to pay to the Goths what was due to them at that time, and for the future three hundred pounds weight of gold a year. On the other hand, Valemir sent to Constantinople by way of hostage the famous Theodoric, afterwards king of Italy, but then only eight years old [i]. Males the historian, and Damascus, who wrote the life of Isidore, and was contemporary with Theodoric himself, suppose him to have been the son of Valemir [k]. But Jornandes, who lived some time after, but was perhaps better acquainted with the history of the Ostrogoths, being himself one of that nation, assures us, that Theodoric was the son of Theodomir by a concubine named Erelieva, and consequently only nephew to Valemir [l]. Leo received him with the greatest marks of esteem and affection, maintained him for the space of ten years at his court, in a manner suitable to his rank, and took care to have him instructed by the best masters in every branch of polite literature [m].

They conclude a peace with Leo, and send him Theodoric as an hostage.

In the year 466, the tenth of Leo's reign, a war breaking out between the Goths in Pannonia and the Squiri, whom the emperor Marcian had allowed to settle in Lesser Scythia and Lower Mœsia, both nations had recourse to Leo, whose subjects they were, imploring his assistance. Aspar, Leo's chief favourite, was for aiding neither, but suffering them to destroy each other. However, the emperor wrote to the governor of Illyricum, injoining him to march with all the troops under his command to the assistance of the Squiri, who nevertheless were utterly defeated, and most of them cut in pieces either in the fight or the pursuit. But the Goths lost on this occasion Valemir their king, who, falling from his horse as he was riding full-speed through the ranks to animate his men, was surrounded, and, with many wounds, dispatched by the enemy [n]. Such of the Squiri as escaped the general slaughter, had recourse to the Sarmatians, the Rugians, and the Gepidæ, who, readily joining them, renewed the war, and, entering the territories of the Goths, laid them waſte far and near. Hereupon the Goths, putting themſelves under the conduct of the two remaining brothers Theodomir and Videmir, took the field, and, engaging the enemy on the banks of the Danube, cut ten thouſand of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to retire with great precipitation beyond that river, which Theodomir paſſed ſoon after on the ice, and, having laid waſte the enemy's country, returned loaded with booty into Pannonia [o]. In this war Theodomir not only defeated the Sarmatians, Rugians, and Gepidæ, but gained a ſignal victory over the Suevians and Alemanns, who had joined the above-mentioned nations [p]. Upon his return, he received with great joy his ſon Theodoric, whom Leo had ſent back loaded with rich preſents, after having kept him at his court as a hoſtage for the ſpace of ten years [q]. He was ſcarce returned, when news was brought, that Babai, king of the Sarmatians, having defeated a Roman general named Camundus, had made himſelf maſter of Singidunum in Upper Mæſia. Hereupon Theodoric, having aſſembled, without his father's knowledge, a ſmall body of troops, paſſed the Danube, and, entering the Sarmatian territories, fell upon Babai, put him and moſt of his men to the ſword, and, on his return home, retook Singidunum; but did not reſtore it to the Romans [r].

Purſuant to this reſolution, the two brothers Theodomir and Videmir met, when it fell to the lot (for they caſt lots) of the latter to invade Italy, where Glycerius then acted as emperor, and to that of Theodomir to attack the eaſtern empire, governed at that time by Leo I. Videmir immediately ſet out on his march; but had ſcarce entered Italy, when he died, leaving the command of his troops to his ſon, who bore the ſame name. Jornandes adds, that the young prince being prevailed upon by the rich preſents, which Glycerius ſent him, to retire out of Italy, he marched into Gaul, and, joining the Viſigoths, ſettled there, aſſiſted them in the conqueſt of that country, and in the reduction of Spain, becoming one people with them [s]. duced, without any conſiderable oppoſition, the cities of Ulprana, Heraclea, and Lariſſa. Having afterwards re-united their forces, and left a ſtrong garriſon in Naiſſus, they laid ſiege to Theſſalonica. But Clarianus, governor of the place, prevailed upon Theodomir, with rich preſents, to abandon the enterpriſe, and retire. Soon after a peace was concluded between the Romans and the Goths, during which Theodomir died, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Theodoric, called Amalus, being deſcended from the Amali, the moſt illuſtrious family among the Goths [t]. The emperor Zeno, overjoyed at the news of the young prince's acceſſion to the crown, immediately invited him to court, received him with the greateſt marks of friendſhip and eſteem, raiſed him to the rank of a patrician, and even adopted him, if Jornandes is to be credited, for his ſon [u]. Theodoric was ſcarce returned to Pannonia, when news was brought him, that Baſiliſcus, of whom we have made frequent mention in our Roman hiſtory [w], revolting from Zeno, had been proclaimed and acknowledged emperor by the ſenate of Conſtantinople. The uſurper was chiefly ſupported by a Goth in the Roman ſervice, named likewiſe Theodoric, who had been raiſed to the firſt poſts in the army, and the command of his countrymen, who, following the example of their leader, had all declared for Baſiliſcus. However, king Theodoric, eſpouſing the cauſe of Zeno, marched againſt them; but as his troops were far inferior in number to thoſe of the enemy, Zeno aſſured him, that he ſhould be joined at the ſtraights of mount Hæmus by the general of Thrace, with ten thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe; and that, after paſſing the mountains, he ſhould find twenty thouſand horſe on the banks of the Hebrus ready to join him; but at neither place did he find any troops, and the guides, who had been ſent him by the Romans, leaving the known road and beaten ways, led him through deſerts, where his men ſuffered greatly for want of proviſions, and over ſteep mountains, till they brought his army, quite ſpent with ſuch long and fatiguing marches, in ſight of the enemy, encamped in a moſt advantageous poſt. But though they might, with great eaſe, have cut the king and his whole army in pieces, yet Theodoric their leader ſent only ſome perſons to upbraid the king with making war on his countrymen in favour of the Romans, who had thus betrayed him with fair promiſes, and only ſought to ſet Goths againſt Goths, that they might have the cruel ſatisfaction of ſeeing them deſtroy each other. finding himself reduced to the alternative of being abandoned by his own men, or coming to an agreement with Theodoric, chose the latter. The two generals conferred, having a river between them, and, in the end, agreed not to make war upon each other. They both dispatched embassadors to Constantinople, Theodoric to demand the arrears that were due to him and his army, and the king to acquaint the emperor with the treaty he had made, and at the same time to let him know, that, unless provisions were sent to the army, it was not in his power to restrain his men from plundering Thrace [x]. What answer Zeno returned to the former, we are no-where told; but to the latter he made a long apology for not sending, as he had promised, the Roman troops to join him. But the author of Zeno's life, though not a little biassed in favour of that prince, cannot help owning, that he was therein greatly to blame [y]. The emperor did all that lay in his power to persuade the king to break the treaty he had lately concluded with Theodoric, sending to him for that purpose two solemn embassies, and promising not only to reward him with large sums and great revenues, if he should defeat the rebels, but to give him in marriage Juliana, the daughter of Olybrius, and grand-daughter of Valentinian III. But the king could not, by any offers, be prevailed upon to make the least breach in the treaty with Theodoric; which obliged the emperor to conclude a peace with him upon the following terms, highly dishonourable to the imperial dignity; viz. that Theodoric should have the command of the emperor's guards; that he should retain all the honours conferred upon him by the usurper Basiliscus; that his estate, which had been confiscated, should be restored to him; and lastly, that he should be appointed commander in chief of the Roman cavalry, which post was then held by king Theodoric, but, in virtue of this treaty, taken from him, and bestowed on the other [z].

He breaks with Zeno, and ravages Thrace and Macedon.

IN the mean time, king Theodoric, who was still with his army among the mountains of Thrace, not receiving from the Romans either money or provisions to support them, marched down into the province of Rhodope on the Ægean sea, and, being highly provoked at the emperor's conduct, laid waste the most fertile places of Thrace, destroying with fire and sword what he could not carry off. The emperor sent several generals to oppose him; but though he lost, as we are told, a great many men in skirmishes, yet the loss on the side of the Romans must have been far more considerable, since, in the end, all the emperor's generals declined the command of the army in

Thrace.

Thrace [a]. From Thrace Theodoric marched into Macedon, and, having pillaged the open country, made himself master of Stopi on the river Axius. From thence he marched into the neighbourhood of Thessalonica; which threw the inhabitants into such consternation, that, thinking themselves abandoned by the emperor, they pulled down and broke in pieces all his statues, and were ready to fall upon their governor, named John; but, in the end, contented themselves with taking from him the keys of the city, and delivering them to the bishop [b]. Theodoric, without making the least attempt on Thessalonica, led his army from thence to Heraclea, where he was met by embassadors from Zeno, with proposals for an accommodation; which he being willing to conclude, sent others to Constantinople, and, in the mean time, ordered his men to forbear all hostilities. The person employed by Zeno to treat with Theodoric was the patrician Adamancus, who, as appears from some laws, had been governor of Constantinople, and was, on this occasion, honoured with the consular ornaments, but not with the consulship. During the negotiations, Theodoric found means of making himself master of Duras on the Adriatic sea, that he might have some place of strength to retire to, in case the negotiations should not have the desired effect. Hereupon the conferences were broken off, Adamancus declaring, that he could not treat with the Goths, till they had restored the city of Duras to the empire. Theodoric could not, by any means, be prevailed upon to part with that important place during the winter; but promised to abandon it early in the spring, to march against the other Theodoric, who had raised new disturbances in the empire, and, that the emperor might not question the sincerity of his intentions, to deliver up to him his mother and sisters as hostages. He likewise offered, with the emperor's approbation, to march into Italy, and restore Nepos, who was nearly related to the empress Verina, Zeno's mother-in-law, and had been lately driven from the throne by Glycerius. To these proposals Adamancus answered, That he had no power to grant him any terms, till Duras was restored [c]; but that he would write to the emperor, and acquaint him with his answer. The Romans, in the mean time, became more intractable, being elated with some advantages they gained at that very time over the Goths. Theodoric had marched before with a strong detachment to surprise Duras, while the main body, with the baggage, followed by slow marches, under the conduct of his brother Theudimund. This Sabinianus, general of Illyricum, and at that time the best commander in the whole empire, no sooner

ſooner underſtood, than he ordered all the troops quartered in that province to aſſemble at Lychnidus in Macedon, and, marching from thence with incredible expedition, overtook the Goths, as they were deſcending from the mountains of Candavia, between Lychnidus and Duras. Theudimund, and his mother, who followed the army, had juſt time to paſs a torrent, and cauſe the bridge to be broken down, by which means they ſaved themſelves, but ſtopped the march of the army; ſo that the Romans, falling upon them, cut moſt of them in pieces, took five thouſand priſoners, two thouſand waggons, and an immenſe booty [d]. Zeno, elated with this victory, and not doubting but he ſhould either take Theodoric himſelf priſoner, or oblige him to ſubmit to what terms he pleaſed, wrote to Subinianus, and to Gento, a Goth of great reputation in the Roman ſervice, to purſue the war, and not ſuffer Theodoric, with the troops he had with him, to retire, but to keep him ſhut up on all ſides, ordering at the ſame time Adamancus to break off the conferences, and return to Conſtantinople [e]. But of this war all we know is, that the following year 480, Theodoric ravaged Greece, and that Sabinianus, as count Marcellinus writes, put, in the end, a ſtop to his ravages, more by addreſs than by dint of arms [f]; which plainly ſhews, that the Romans had not been attended with the ſucceſs they expected.

Moſt of Theodoric's army cut in pieces by the Romans. Year after Chriſt 479.

No further mention is made of Theodoric till the year 482, when, Sabinianus being dead, he ravaged without controul both Macedons with Theſſaly, and even took and plundered Lariſſa, the metropolis of the latter province [g]; inſomuch, that the emperor, to appeaſe him, was at length obliged to yield to him part of Lower Mœſia and Lower Dacia, to give him the command of the troops of the houſhold, and to name him conſul for the enſuing year 484, which was the greateſt honour he could confer upon him. Hereupon Theodoric, diſbanding his troops, ſet out for Conſtantinople with a ſmall retinue, and, being received there by the emperor with the greateſt marks of kindneſs and eſteem, diſcharged the following year the office of conſul [h]. During his conſulſhip, Leontius, a native of Chalcis in Syria, and commander of the troops in that province, revolting, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor. Againſt him Zeno diſpatched Illus, captain of his guards; but he, inſtead of oppoſing Leontius, joined him, and both together defeated and took priſoner Longinus, the emperor's brother, who, at the head of a conſiderable army, had ventured to engage them in the neighbourhood of Antioch; which city, after his defeat, submitted to the usurper. Zeno, upon the news of the defeat and captivity of his brother, dispatched one John, an officer of great valour and experience in war, into Syria, and prevailed upon Theodoric to join him with a numerous army of Goths. These two commanders, meeting Leontius and Illus in the neighbourhood of Seleucia, gave them a total overthrow, and obliged them to fly for refuge to the strong castle of Papyra in Cilicia [i]. Evagrius and others ascribe this victory to the Valamerians, that is, the Goths; for so we find them styled by several writers, from their king Valemir [k]. As the rebels were no more in a condition to give the least apprehension or uneasiness, Theodoric, leaving part of his forces with the other commander to pursue the war, returned with the rest to Constantinople; but finding that Zeno began to mistrust him, and even to seek under-hand his destruction, he withdrew from court, and retired into Thrace, the emperor having, some time before, appointed him general of the troops quartered in that country. Thus Evagrius [l]. But Marcellinus, accusing Theodoric of ingratitude towards his benefactor Zeno, tells us, that, not satisfied with the innumerable favours he had received at the emperor's hands, he retired from court, and began to seek some plausible pretence of making war on the empire [m]. Jornandes, ever favourable to that prince, but not well acquainted with his history, supposes him to have retired into Pannonia, chusing rather to live in poverty amongst his Goths, than in affluence among the Romans [n]. Be that as it will, it is certain, that, soon after his leaving Constantinople, he fell upon the Bulgarians, who, under the conduct of their king or leader named Libertem, had broken into Thrace, and gained a complete victory over them, Libertem himself being dangerously wounded, and most of his men cut in pieces [o]. The following year 486, Theodoric spent in raising forces, and in 487, broke into Thrace at the head of a powerful army, putting all to fire and sword. Upon what provocation he thus turned his arms against the empire, we are nowhere told; but, without all doubt, the same motives that, some time before, had induced him to withdraw from court, prompted him now to act as an enemy. Having ravaged Thrace, he approached Constantinople, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Melantiades, a city placed by Sanson about fifteen miles west of Constantinople, with a design, as was believed,

He defeats the usurper Leontius.

He falls out with Zeno, and retires from Constantinople.

He defeats the Bulgarians.

He ravages Thrace.

of laying ſiege to the imperial city. But, while the inhabitants were under the utmoſt conſternation, Theodoric, decamping all on a ſudden, marched back to Novæ in Mœſia, whence he was come [p]. Some writers aſcribe his ſudden retreat to the regard he had for that metropolis; others to a private treaty between him and Zeno, who, putting him in mind of the kindneſs he had ever ſhewn him, and of the many honours he had heaped upon him, and repreſenting to him at the ſame time the danger to which he expoſed himſelf in making war on the empire, perſuaded him to conclude a peace with the Romans, and turn his arms againſt Odoacer, who, having put Oreſtes to death, and depoſed his ſon Auguſtulus, had taken upon him the title of king of Italy [q]. The Romans afterwards pretended, that Zeno had ſent Theodoric to conquer Italy, not for himſelf, but for the emperor of the eaſt, to whom of right it belonged [r]. On the other hand, the Goths maintained, that Zeno had yielded Italy to Theodoric and his poſterity [s]. Of this opinion was not only Jornandes [t], by nation a Goth, but Procopius, a Roman writer [u], who tells us, that Zeno encouraged Theodoric to conquer Italy, which he was to keep for himſelf. Ammianus writes, that, in virtue of this treaty with Zeno, Theodoric was to hold Italy during his life; but that, upon his death, it was to be reunited to the empire [w]. Be that as it will, it is certain, that Theodoric received with joy the propoſal made him by the emperor of driving Odoacer out of Italy, and returned, as we have hinted above, to Novæ in Mœſia, in order to make the neceſſary preparations for that expedition.

THE following year 488, Theodoric, having aſſembled, ſays Ennodius [x], an infinite number of people, carrying with them on waggons their wives, children, and all their effects, ſet out from Novæ, bending his march towards Italy. His mother, and ſiſter named Amafrides, attended him in this expedition [y]. Several Romans of great diſtinction flocked to him from all parts to ſerve as voluntiers in this war, and among the reſt Artemidorus, who was nearly related to, and in great favour with, the emperor; but joyfully abandoned his country, and the grandeur he lived in at Conſtantinople, to ſhare with Theodoric in his good and bad fortune, who afterwards created him a patrician, and made him governor of Rome [z]. hand, a great many Goths declined following Theodoric into Italy, and, ſettling on the ſea-coaſt in Thrace, formed there a ſeparate nation, which lived in amity with the Romans, and is highly commended by Procopius [a]. From Novæ in Mæſia Theodoric marched ſtraight to the Adriatic ſea; but, for want of ſhips, was obliged to go round, and traverſe the ſeveral nations dwelling on the coaſt. This march he performed in the depth of winter, a violent plague and famine, ſays Ennodius [b], raging the whole time in his army, and carrying off great numbers of his people. He found the Gepidæ encamped on the banks of a certain river, with a deſign to oppoſe his paſſage; but Theodoric, paſſing at the head of a choice body of men, charged them ſo briſkly, that they immediately betook themſelves to a precipitous flight. At another place he was met by the Sarmatians, whom he likewiſe overcame, and put to flight [c]. Thus, after a long and fatiguing march, he entered at length Italy, and, advancing to the river Sontius, now Zonzo, in the neighbourhood of Aquileia, halted there, in order to reſt his men, being informed, that Odoacer was in full mareh to meet him with a very numerous army, conſiſting of various nations, commanded by their reſpective kings or chiefs [d]. Soon after Odoacer appeared, and was met by Theodoric with his men in battle-array. Hereupon an engagement enſued, in which Odoacer was, after a faint reſiſtance, put to flight, and great numbers of his men cut in pieces. Theodoric purſued the fugitives, and, on the 28th of Auguſt 489, entered their camp, though defended by a river and a great many works [e]. Odoacer retired to the plains of Verona, and encamped there at a ſmall diſtance from the city. But Theodoric, purſuing him cloſe, forced him to a ſecond engagement, when he met with a far more vigorous oppoſition than in the former, for great numbers were killed on both ſides; but, in the end, Odoacer was again put to flight, and obliged to ſhut himſelf up in Ravenna; ſo that Theodoric, having now no enemy in the field to oppoſe him, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral important places, and among the reſt of Milan and Pavia [f]. At the ſame time, Tufa, commander in chief of Odoacer's forces, came over to Theodoric, with moſt of his troops under his command, and was immediately by him diſpatched, with one of his own officers, in purſuit of Odoacer to Ravenna. Odoacer had left that city, and was advanced as far as Faenza, in which place he was cloſely be-ſieged by Tufa; but that treacherous commander, declaring for his former maſter, joined him anew with all his troops, delivering up to him, at the ſame time, ſeveral officers, who had been appointed by Theodoric to command under him, and were, by Odoacer's orders, ſent in irons to Ravenna [g]. Ennodius writes, that Theodoric did not ſend againſt Odoacer all the troops that came over to him with Tufa, but placed ſeveral detachments of them, together with his own forces, in the towns that had ſubmitted to him. He adds, that, when Theodoric was informed of Tufa's treachery, he cauſed them all, by a private order, to be cut in pieces, leſt they ſhould follow the example of their general [h]. About the ſame time, Frideric, the ſon of Fava king of the Rugians, who had joined Theodoric with a conſiderable body of his countrymen, fled over to Odoacer; who, being thus reinforced, left Faenza, and advanced as far as Milan; which city he is ſuppoſed to have taken, ſince he is ſaid to have recovered all Liguria [i]. Theodoric, in the mean time, finding himſelf abandoned both by Tufa and Frideric, kept himſelf ſhut up in Pavia, a place in thoſe days of great ſtrength, while Odoacer, without controul, ravaged the country that had ſubmitted to him, and beſieged him at laſt in Pavia, where the Goths, who had brought along with them their families and all their effects, were greatly ſtraightened for want of room. But Heaven, ſays Ennodius [k], openly declared in favour of Theodoric, the enemy's men quarrelling daily among themſelves, and every thing contributing to their ruin. However, Theodoric, fearing he ſhould in the end be overpowered with numbers, had recourſe to Alaric king of the Viſigoths, who had ſettled in Gaul. As the Viſigoths and Oſtrogoths were originally one and the ſame nation, and the Viſigoths had received among them, about ſixteen years before, a great number of Oſtrogoths, under the conduct of their king Videmir, couſin-german to Theodoric, they readily granted him the deſired ſupplies; which he no ſooner received, than, leaving Pavia, he marched to the river Addua, where the enemy lay encamped, engaged them the third time, and gave them a total overthrow. Odoacer took refuge anew in Ravenna; but left numerous garriſons in all the ſtrong places [l]. In this battle, which was fought on the eleventh of Auguſt, Odoacer loſt ſeveral officers of diſtinction, and among the reſt Pierius, his comes domeſticorum, or captain of the guards [m]. Theodoric, after the battle, marched in pursuit of Odoacer, and, approaching Ravenna, encamped at a place called Pinaia, about three miles from the city. On the other hand, Odoacer, with many new works, fortified himself in the town, and, with frequent sallies, especially in the night, greatly harrassed the Goths. The siege lasted three years, during which time, great numbers were killed on both sides in the frequent sallies and attacks. Authors speak in particular of a sally made, according to some, on the tenth, according to others, on the fifteenth of July 491, in which Odoacer commanded in person, and, at the head of the Heruli, entered the camp of Theodoric at Pinaia, and made a dreadful havock of his men; but he was, after a long and sharp dispute, obliged to retire. The Goths pursued him to the very gates of the city, killing many of his men, and among the rest Libila or Levila, who commanded the Heruli under the king, and had eminently distinguished himself on that occasion [n]. After this, Theodoric, leaving part of his army before Ravenna, marched with the rest against the strong-holds, in which Odoacer had left garisons, and was every-where received with great joy, except at Cesena in Romagna, where he met with some opposition [o].

He reduces all Italy.

Thus he made himself master of Italy [p], not at once, but by degrees; for he laid siege to Ravenna in 490, and pope Gelasius, who was raised to the see of Rome in 492, speaking of Odoacer, still gives him the title of king of Italy [q]. The sally we have spoken of above was made on the tenth or fifteenth of July, and Theodoric was, on the thirty-first of the following August, at Pavia, and returned to the siege of Ravenna on the twenty-ninth of August 492, pitching his camp at a place called the Little Palace. He was then master of Italy, no one place remaining to Odoacer, except Ravenna, in which he had been shut up three years with his foreign and some Roman troops, now reduced to great straights by the enemy without, and the famine within [r], wheat being sold at six pieces of gold a bushel [s]. On the other hand, the Goths were quite worn out with the fatigues of a three years siege; so that both parties being willing to put an end to the war, Odoacer sent John bishop of Ravenna to Theodoric, with proposals for an accommodation. This prelate died in 494, and there is still extant the original act of a donation made to him in January 491 [t]. Jornandes writes, that Odoacer only begged his life; which Theodoric bound himself by a solemn oath to grant him [u]. Procopius tells us, that they agreed to live together on equal terms in Ravenna [w]; which expression we do not well comprehend, it being altogether incredible, that Theodoric, who was already master of all Italy, and had reduced Odoacer to the last extremity, should suffer him to reign jointly, and have an equal share of power, with himself. The agreement was concluded on the twenty-seventh of February, Odoacer delivering up his son named Thelan to Theodoric as an hostage, who thereupon entered Ravenna in triumph by the Fleetgate, on the fifth of March [x]. Theodoric did not long stand to the agreement he had made; for having, a few days after, invited Odoacer to a banquet, unmindful of his oath, he dispatched him with his own hand, according to some, in the palace, according to others, in a grove of laurels adjoining perhaps to the palace [y]. Some authors pretend, that Odoacer had formed a design upon the life of Theodoric, which he being acquainted with, resolved to be before-hand with him [z]. But the dead are always found guilty. Jornandes, though himself a Goth, seems to insinuate, that Odoacer was murdered upon a bare suspicion, and that, as was then believed, quite groundless [a]. All his servants and relations were massacred at the same time, except his brother Onulphus, and a few more, who, having had the good luck to make their escape, retired beyond the Danube [b]. Theodoric had sent, some months before, Faustus Niger, a leading man in the senate of Rome, to obtain of the emperor Zeno the ensigns of royalty. But Odoacer having submitted before the return of the embassador, Theodoric, without waiting for the emperor's permission, caused himself to be proclaimed by his Goths king of Italy [c]. However, he dispatched soon after Festus or Faustus, his magister officiorum, and Irenæus, both distinguished with the title of illustrious, to Constantinople, to excuse the liberty he had taken [d]. The embassadors were received in a very obliging manner by Anastasius, the successor of Zeno, who readily confirmed the peace, which his predecessor had made with Theodoric, approved of what he had done, and sent him the ensigns of royalty [e]. Hence it is manifest, that Theodoric himself owned he held the kingdom of Italy of the emperors of the east, by whom he suffered even the Roman consuls to be named [f]. There is still extant a letter from Theodoric to Theodoric proclaimed by the Goths, and acknowledged by the emperor, king of Italy.

Anastasius,

Anastasius, concerning one Felix, who was consul in 511, wherein he acquaints the emperor, that he had named Felix for the consulship, and at the same time intreats him to confirm, by his suffrage, that dignity to so deserving a person [g].

Sicily submits to him.

Theodoric, now master of all Italy, began to make the necessary preparations for reducing the island of Sicily, which refused to acknowledge him; but the inhabitants were persuaded by Cassiodore to submit to their new lord without bloodshed. After this, Theodoric, sheathing his sword, endeavoured in the first place, to establish himself in his new kingdom, by alliances with the neighbouring princes. With this view, he sent Festus to Constantinople, to confirm the peace he had made with Anastasius, marrying at the same time Andefleda, the daughter of Chlodoveus king of the Franks, and bestowing his own two daughters, whom he had by a concubine, on Alaric king of the Visigoths in Gaul, and on Sigismund, the son of Gundobald king of the Burgundians. Having thus secured his new kingdom, he made it his chief study to govern it with salutary laws, following therein the advice of Cassiodore, a man of great learning and integrity, whom he had created a patrician, and raised to the dignities of count, of consul, and even to that of præfectus prætorio. He first placed all his Goths in the castles and strong-holds, with their officers who were to command them in time of war, and govern them in time of peace. The Roman laws he retained, and commanded them to be inviolably observed, and to have the same force, which they had had under the emperors of the west [h]. In the first five books of Cassiodore, consisting of the letters and edicts of Theodoric, nothing is so much recommended to the judges and magistrates as the due observance of, and respect for, the Roman laws. In these books are quoted many constitutions of the Theodosian code, and many novellæ of Theodosius, Valentinian, and Majorianus [i], Theodoric declaring, that he did not intend to introduce any new laws into Italy, the Roman laws, by which it had been so long governed, being the most equitable that could be enacted; nay, so great was the respect he bore to the Roman laws, that he ordered them to be observed, not only by the Romans, but likewise by the Goths, who lived among the Romans. To his Goths he left some of their own laws, or rather customs; but in all matters of moment, such as successions, testaments, adoptions, contracts, penalties, crimes, and in whatever belonged to public or private property, the Roman laws were common to all. All law-suits and disputes between a Roman and a Goth, or a Goth and a Roman, were to be decided by the Roman laws, as appears from one of Theodoric's reſcripts to Januarius, preſident of Samnium [k]. But when the diſpute aroſe between Goth and Goth, they were to have recourſe to their own judge, who decided it according to Theodoric's own edicts, which did not much differ from the Roman laws, and were given to thoſe, who were ſent into the provinces as judges of the Goths [l]. Theodoric not only retained the ſame laws, but the ſame form of government, the ſame diſtribution of provinces, the ſame magiſtrates and dignities. As the emperors had, before his time, tranſlated the imperial ſeat from Rome to Ravenna, to be near at hand, and ready to put a ſtop to the irruptions of the barbarians, who, on that ſide, broke into Italy, he likewiſe choſe that city for the uſual place of his reſidence, governing from thence the provinces by the ſame magiſtrates, that had preſided over them in the times of the emperors, viz. by the conſulares; the correctores, and the præſides. But, beſides theſe, he ſent, according to the cuſtom of the Goths, to each city inferior judges, diſtinguiſhed with the title of counts, who were to adminiſter juſtice, and decide all controverſies and diſputes; and herein the polity of the Goths, far excelled, as Grotius obſerves, that of the Romans; for, in the Roman times, a whole province was governed by a conſularis, a corrector, or a præſes, who reſided in the chief city, and to whom recourſe was to be had at a great charge from the moſt remote parts; but Theodoric, beſides the conſularis, the corrector, or the præſes, appointed, not only in the principal cities, but in each ſmall town and village, inferior magiſtrates of known integrity, who were to adminiſter juſtice, and, by that means, ſave thoſe who had law-ſuits the trouble and expence of recurring to the governor of the whole province [m], no appeals to diſtant tribunals being allowed, but in matters of the greateſt importance, or in caſe of manifeſt injuſtice [n]. Thus Italy, from the dominion of the Romans, came under that of the Goths, almoſt without perceiving the change. But of the eminent virtues of Theodoric, of his glorious reign, and the reigns of the Gothic kings of Italy his ſucceſſors, to the expulſion of the Goths by Narſes, we ſhall, purſuant to our plan, ſpeak at length in a more proper place, and, in the mean time, proceed to the hiſtory of other antient nations.

And the ſame magiſtrates.

SECT. III.

The antient ſtate of the Vandals, till their ſettling in Spain and Africa.

The origin of the Vandals.

THE Vandals were originally a Gothic nation; for Procopius, who could not be a ſtranger to their deſcent, being well acquainted with Gelomir their king, and the other Vandals, who were brought priſoners to Conſtantinople in the reign of Juſtinian, tells us in expreſs terms, that the Goths and Vandals were one and the ſame people, diſtinguiſhed in names, but agreeing in original and manners [o]. He adds, that they ſpoke the Gothic language, as did likewiſe the Gepidæ, Lombards, Burgundians, and Alans.

Their name.

They were called Vandals from the Gothic word Vandelen, which ſignifies to wander, becauſe they often changed their ſeats, wandering from one country to another [p]. They are ſuppoſed to have come originally out of Scandinavia with the other Goths, under the conduct of king Euric, of whom we have ſpoken in the foregoing ſection, and to have ſettled in the countries now known by the names of Mecklenburgh and Brandenburgh. Several ages after, another colony of the Goths, leaving Scandinavia under the conduct of king Berig, ſettled in Pomerania, after having driven out the Rugians, by Jornandes called Ulmerugians. At the ſame time Berig ſubdued the Vandals inhabiting the above-mentioned countries; but inſtead of driving them from their antient ſeats, he only obliged them, as they were a Gothic nation, to ſhare their territories with the new-comers [q]. In the reign of Auguſtus, part of the Vandals, ſtraightened in their own country for want of room, ſettled on the banks of the Rhine; but were driven from thence by Tiberius and Druſus, and obliged to return home. As their country was overſtocked with people, great numbers of them ſoon left it anew, and, taking their route eaſtward, entered the country lying between the Boſporus Cimmerius and the Tanais, inhabited at that time by the Sclavi, whom they drove out, and, ſeizing on their country, took the name of the antient inhabitants, calling themſelves Sclavi. Some of theſe, ſeveral ages after, that is, in the reign of Mauritius, which began in 586, ſettled in Dalmatia and Illyricum, which from them were called Sclavonia [r]. Others ſeated themſelves in the eaſtern parts of

Dacia

Dacia beyond the Danube, which province comprehended the preſent countries of Tranſylvania, Moldavia, Wallachia, and the eaſtern parts of Upper Hungary. From thoſe who remained in Germany, the preſent Poles and Bohemians are ſaid by moſt writers to derive their origin [s]. But the Vandals who, under Godegeſilus their king, broke into Gaul, and afterwards ſettled in Spain and Africa, came according to Procopius [t], from Dacia, and the neighbourhood of the Palus Mæotis. As the Vandals were a Gothic nation, the ſame cuſtoms, manners, religion, form of government, &c. obtained among them as among the Goths. They had, without doubt, their own kings long before they were known to the Romans; but Godegeſilus, under whoſe conduct they entered Gaul in 406, is the firſt of their princes, whom we find mentioned in hiſtory. He was ſucceeded by Gunderic, who, in 409, from Gaul paſſed into Spain, and ſettled in Galicia. Genſeric reigned next, who, abandoning Spain in 428, paſſed with his Vandals over into Africa, which the Vandals held under the following kings, Hunneric, Gundamund, Thraſamund, Genſeric II. and Gelimer, till the year 533, when an end was put to their dominion by Beliſarius, and Africa re-united to the empire. Salvianus, ſpeaking of the Vandals, ſays, that they were excelled by all the other barbarous nations both in power and courage; but nevertheleſs made themſelves maſters of the beſt and moſt fertile provinces of the empire. Providence ſo diſpoſing to convince the world, that their conqueſts were not owing to their valour, but to the Lord of hoſts, who made uſe of ſo weak and contemptible an enemy to puniſh the ſins of the Romans [u]. They embraced the chriſtian religion at the ſame time that the Goths were converted, but held, like the other Gothic nations, the tenets of Arius, and were irreconcilable enemies to the catholic church. Salvian however extols their continence and chaſtity [w]. Their kings.

As to their irruptions into the empire, for we know nothing of their wars with other nations, they firſt began to be troubleſome to the Romans in the reign of M. Aurelius and Lucius Verus, about the year 166, when, entering into an alliance with other barbarous nations, viz. the Marcomanns, the Nariſchians, the Hermundurians, Quadians, Suevians, Sarmatians, Victovalians, Roxolanians, Baſtarnians, Caſtobochians, Alans, Iazygians, &c. they broke into the empire, took and plundered ſeveral cities, and, having put to flight the Roman armies sent against them, committed every-where unheard-of ravages. Of this war, which is compared by the antients to the Punic and Cimbrian wars, we have spoken in our Roman history [x]. On this occasion the Marcomanns and Vandals made themselves masters of Pannonia, after having defeated and killed Furius Victorinus the præfectus prætorio, who, with a considerable army, attempted to put a stop to their inroads [y]. They continued in Pannonia till the year 170, when they were driven out by M. Aurelius, who pursued them to the Danube, and cut great numbers of them in pieces as they were passing that river [z]. They entered, it seems, afterwards into an alliance with the Romans; for one of the articles of the peace concluded in 180, between the emperor Commodus and the Alemanns was, that they should not make war upon the Vandals [a]. In the year 215, a war was kindled between them and the Marcomanns; for Caracalla, as we read in Dion [b], used to glory in his having set at variance these two nations, which, till then, lived in peace and amity with each other. By this war both nations were greatly weakened; and this is all we know of it.

The Vandals make themselves masters of Pannonia.

Are driven out by M. Aurelius.

In 271, the second of Aurelian's reign, while the emperor was engaged in a war with several German nations, who had broken into Italy, the Vandals, having passed the Danube under the conduct of two of their kings, and several other princes, laid waste the neighbouring provinces. Hereupon Aurelian, having gained a complete victory over the Germans, led his army against the Vandals, who, upon the news of his approach, retired with great precipitation. The emperor, however, pursued and overtook them before they reached the Danube, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to sue for peace; which he readily granted them, upon their delivering to him, as hostages, the sons of their two kings, and several other persons of great distinction. He incorporated two thousand of their best men amongst his own troops, and ordered the rest to be supplied with provisions at the public expence, till they reached the Danube. Five hundred of them, who had separated from the rest to plunder the country, were cut in pieces by the general of the foreign troops, and their leader put to death by their king's order [c]. They continued quiet the remaining part of Aurelian's reign; but they no sooner received the news of his death, which happened in 275, than entering into an alliance with the Lygians, Franks, and Burgundians, they advanced as far as the Rhine, and having, without oppoſition, croſſed that river, entered Gaul, and made themſelves maſters of almoſt the whole country, which they held for the ſpace of two years, that is till the year 277, when Probus, who had ſucceeded Tacitus, marching againſt them, overcame them in ſeveral battles. Moſt of the Lygians, a German nation, were cut off, and their king Semno taken priſoner; but he was ſoon after ſet at liberty, in virtue of a treaty, by which the Lygians, after having reſtored the booty, and diſmiſſed the priſoners, they had taken, ſolemnly promiſed not only to live in amity with the Romans, but to guard the confines of the empire againſt the other barbarians, who ſhould attempt to break into it [d]. The Vandals and Burgundians retired at the approach of the Roman army, and, having croſſed the Rhine before Probus could overtake them, encamped on the banks of that river. However, being provoked by the inſults and raillery of the Roman ſoldiers encamped on the oppoſite bank, they attempted to paſs the river, with a deſign to give them battle; but the Romans, falling upon the firſt that landed, cut great numbers of them in pieces, took many priſoners, and drove the reſt, who were haſtening to the aſſiſtance of their companions, back into the river, where moſt of them periſhed. The emperor was preparing to paſs the Rhine, in order to purſue the ſhattered remains of their army; but, upon their ſuing for peace, and promiſing to ſend back all the priſoners and booty they had taken, he agreed to let them retire unmoleſted. This promiſe they did not perform with due fidelity; which ſo provoked the emperor, that, croſſing the Rhine, he fell upon them as they were retiring, put many of them to the ſword, and took a great number of priſoners, among whom was Igillus their king, with other perſons of great diſtinction [e]. Theſe were afterwards ſent by Probus into Britain, and are ſuppoſed to have ſettled in the neighbourhood of Cambridge, where, according to Bucherius, they gave name to the village of Vandelſburg [f]. Two years after, Probus finding, on his return from Perſia, the province of Thrace almoſt quite deſtitute of inhabitants, allowed a great number of Baſtarnæ, a Scythian nation, ſome ſay an hundred thouſand, to ſettle there. He likewiſe granted lands in the ſame province to the Gepidæ, the Juthungians, and the Vandals. The Baſtarnæ continued faithful to the empire, and by degrees brought themſelves to live after the Roman manner; but the other nations revolting, while the emperor's troops were employed againſt Saturninus and Proculus, of whom the former had aſſumed the purple in Egypt, and the latter in Gaul, over-ran, ſays our hiſtorian, the whole empire, committing every-where dreadful ravages, to the great diſhonour of the Roman name [g]. But Probus, having with great ſucceſs overcome the two uſurpers, marched all his forces againſt the barbarians, and, in ſeveral battles, the particulars of which are unknown to us, made ſuch a dreadful havock of them, that few of thoſe, who had entered the Roman dominions, had the good luck to eſcape the general ſlaughter [h]. No further mention is made of the Vandals till the year 291, the eighth of Dioclefian's reign, when we find them engaged in a war with the Goths. The Taifalæ aſſiſted the Goths, and the Gepidæ the Vandals; but as the Romans were no-ways concerned in this war, authors only tell us in general terms, that it was carried on with great vigour; and that the barbarians were ſo weakened by it, that, for a conſiderable time, they ſuffered the Romans to live in peace, not being in a condition to moleſt them [i]. As for the Vandals, they ſeem to have continued quiet till the year 406, the twelfth of Honorius's reign, when, ſtirred up by Stilicho, who hoped, by their means, to raiſe his ſon Eucherius to the empire, they broke into Gaul with the Alans and Suevians. The Vandals, in attempting to croſs the Rhine, were attacked by the Franks, who cut twenty thouſand of them in pieces, with their king Godigiſcles; and would have put them all to the ſword, had not the Alans and Suevians come ſeaſonably to their relief. Theſe, joining the Vandals, obliged the Franks to retire; and, croſſing without oppoſition the Rhine, entered Gaul, on the laſt day of the preſent year 406 [k]. Procopius writes, that the Vandals, who entered Gaul, had been obliged by a famine, that raged among them at home, to abandon their own country, and ſeek new ſettlements; but that the greater part of the nation continued in their antient ſeats beyond the Danube [l]. Having paſſed the Rhine, they firſt ravaged Germania Prima, took by ſtorm, and levelled with the ground, the city of Mentz, the metropolis of that province. From Germania Prima they paſſed into Gallia Belgica, and from thence into Aquitain, the moſt fertile and opulent province of all Gaul. Having advanced to the Pyrenean mountains, which they did not at firſt venture to paſs, they over-ran all the neighbouring provinces, committing every-where unheard-of ravages. The Vandals, Alans, and Suevians, were ſoon joined by the Burgundians and other barbarous nations,

ſtirred up partly by Stilicho, and partly by the deſire of booty, and hopes of enriching themſelves with the ſpoils of ſo many wealthy provinces [m]. An incredible number of barbarians, ſays St. Jerom, writing about this time, have ſpread themſelves all over Gaul: the whole country between the Alps, the Pyrenean mountains, the ocean, and the Rhine, is held by them [n]. In the mean time, Conſtantine being proclaimed emperor by the Britiſh legions, from Britain paſſed over into Gaul, taking with him all the Roman forces quartered in the iſland, and the flower of the Britiſh youth, who were joined, ſoon after his landing at Bologne, by the Roman troops quartered in Gaul. With theſe he overcame the Vandals and other barbarians in ſeveral battles, and, in the end, reduced them to ſuch ſtraights, that they were obliged to ſue for peace; which he granted, without obliging them to quit Gaul, probably becauſe he hoped to maintain himſelf, by their means, in the power he had uſurped [o]. Soon after, Geroncius, to whom Conſtans, the ſon of Conſtantine, had committed the government of Spain, revolting upon ſome diſguſt, and ſetting up one Maximus for emperor, the Vandals, Alans, and Suevians, flew to arms, probably at the inſtigation of the uſurper, and made themſelves maſters of ſeveral cities in Gaul. Hereupon the natives, expecting no relief either from Honorius or Conſtantine, reſolved to defend themſelves; and accordingly, uniting their forces, they fell upon the barbarians, and defeated them in ſeveral encounters. The barbarians, meeting with greater oppoſition than they expected, and at the ſame time acquainted with the diſtracted ſtate of Spain, which was repreſented to them as a wealthy and fruitful country, reſolved to try whether they could ſettle there. With this deſign, they bent their march towards the Pyrenees, which they paſſed without oppoſition, the guards, who had been placed there, either abandoning their poſts at the approach of ſuch multitudes, or joining them, in order to avoid the puniſhment due to the ravages they had committed in thoſe provinces before their arrival [p]. Thus the Vandals, Suevians, and Alans, firſt entered Spain in 409, according to ſome, on the twenty-eighth of September [q]; according to others, on the thirteenth of October [r]. They ſoon made themſelves maſters of ſeveral cities and ſtrong-holds, defeated the troops, which Conſtantine had ſent, under the conduct of his ſon Conſtans, to ſuppreſs the rebellion of Geroncius, and before the end of the year 410, obliged Conſtans himſelf to abandon the country, and retire to his father at Arles [s]. As for Geroncius, he entered into a kind of alliance with them againſt their common enemy Conſtantine [t]. And now the barbarians, having no enemy to oppoſe them, over-ran the whole country, committing every-where, without controul, unheard-of cruelties; which they themſelves afterwards repented [u]. St. Auſtin, ſpeaking of the duty of biſhops on ſuch occaſions, alledges the example of the biſhops of Spain, when over-run by the barbarians: Many holy biſhops, ſays he, fled, after having ſeen their flocks diſperſed by the barbarians, put to the ſword, deſtroyed by long ſieges, or carried into captivity; but many more remained among the barbarians, becauſe thoſe who were committed to their care, choſe to remain, being willing to endure all ſorts of hardſhips, rather than be wanting to their duty [w]. The barbarians allowed ſuch of the natives, as deſired to abandon the country, to retire unmoleſted; nay, for a ſmall ſum, they conducted them to ſuch places of ſafety, as they thought proper to chuſe [x].

The unhappy condition of thoſe provinces.

Idatius, who was about this time biſhop of a city in Spain, deſcribes at length the calamities ſuffered on this occaſion by that unhappy people. He tells us, that, in 409, the country was ravaged on one ſide by the barbarians, and on the other by a dreadful plague, which daily ſwept off great numbers [y]; that, beſides theſe two evils, ſo great a famine raged in 410, that many were reduced to the dreadful neceſſity of feeding upon human fleſh; that ſeveral parents, preſſed by hunger, devoured their own children; and that the wild beaſts, accuſtomed to live upon the dead bodies of thoſe who were killed by the barbarians, or died of the plague, being deprived of that food, fell upon the living, and made a dreadful havock of the country-people in the fields and villages. To theſe calamities was added, ſays our author, the cruelty of the ſoldiers and officers, who, being employed by Conſtantine to levy the taxes, ſeized and carried off the effects and wealth of the inhabitants, who had conveyed them into the towns, as places of ſafety [z]. Olympiodorus tells us, that the Romans, who, upon the breaking in of the barbarians, had taken refuge in the fortified cities and ſtrong-holds, were in the end obliged to feed upon one another. He adds, that a woman, who had no fewer than forty children, killed and devoured them one after the other; which the people no ſooner knew, than they fell upon her, and ſtoned her to death [a]. Such was the deplorable condition, to which the provinces of Spain were reduced by the Vandals, Suevians, and Alans, upon their firſt entering that country; and in this ſtate they continued from the year 406 to 411, when Heaven, ſays Idatius [b], inſpiring the barbarians with thoughts of peace, they began to prefer agriculture to war. Having therefore divided among themſelves by lot the provinces of Spain, they applied themſelves to the tilling of the ground, and to other works of agriculture. In that diviſion, Galicia fell to the Vandals and Suevians, the former having Gonderic, who had ſucceeded Godigiſcles, for their king, and the latter Ermeric; Luſitania and the province of Cartagena to the Alans; Bætica to the Vandals, called Silingians, who are ſuppoſed to have given to their lot the name of Vandaluſia, changed afterwards into that of Andaluſia [c]. Such of the natives as had eſcaped the general ſlaughter, and taken refuge in the fortified places, ſubmitted in the end to the barbarians, who, touching the holy book of the goſpels, ſwore, that they would treat them for the future as their friends and allies; which oath they obſerved ſo religiouſly, that many Romans choſe to live in poverty under the barbarians, rather than to return into the dominions of the empire [d]. However, the inhabitants of Galicia maintained their liberty, and formed a ſeparate ſtate in a corner of that province, where they were often attacked by Ermeric king of the Suevians, who, in the end, ſuffered them to live in peace, being ſeized with a diſtemper, of which he languiſhed the ſeven laſt years of the fourteen he reigned [e]. Pope Leo obſerves, that the catholic church ſuffered greatly by this irruption of the barbarians, who would not ſuffer the civil and eccleſiaſtical laws enacted againſt heretics, eſpecially the Priſcillianiſts, to be put in execution. On the other hand, the biſhops not meeting and holding councils as uſual, the followers of Priſcillian, who, till that time, had been obliged to keep themſelves concealed, began publicly to own their tenets, and gained over a great many proſelytes [f].

The Vandals, Alans, and Suevians, divide the provinces of Spain among them.

IN the year 416, Vallia, king of the Goths in Gaul, having concluded a peace with the Romans, took upon him to drive the barbarians out of Spain; which gave riſe to a war, of which we know but very few particulars. Oroſius writes, that on this occaſion Vallia gave ſignal proofs of his zeal for the welfare of the empire [g]; and Idatius, that Vallia made head againſt the

The unhappy condition of thoſe provinces.

Idatius, who was about this time biſhop of a city in Spain, deſcribes at length the calamities ſuffered on this occaſion by that unhappy people. He tells us, that, in 409, the country was ravaged on one ſide by the barbarians, and on the other by a dreadful plague, which daily ſwept off great numbers [y]; that, beſides theſe two evils, ſo great a famine raged in 410, that many were reduced to the dreadful neceſſity of feeding upon human fleſh; that ſeveral parents, preſſed by hunger, devoured their own children; and that the wild beaſts, accuſtomed to live upon the dead bodies of thoſe who were killed by the barbarians, or died of the plague, being deprived of that food, fell upon the living, and made a dreadful havock of the country-people in the fields and villages. To theſe calamities was added, ſays our author, the cruelty of the ſoldiers and officers, who, being employed by Conſtantine to levy the taxes, ſeized and carried off the effects and wealth of the inhabitants, who had conveyed them into the towns, as places of ſafety [z]. Olympiodorus tells us, that the Romans, who, upon the breaking in of the barbarians, had taken refuge in the fortified cities and ſtrongholds, were in the end obliged to feed upon one another. He adds, that a woman, who had no fewer than forty children, killed and devoured them one after the other; which the people

no ſooner knew, than they fell upon her, and ſtoned her to death [a]. Such was the deplorable condition, to which the provinces of Spain were reduced by the Vandals, Suevians, and Alans, upon their firſt entering that country; and in this ſtate they continued from the year 406 to 411, when Heaven, ſays Idatius [b], inſpiring the barbarians with thoughts of peace, they began to prefer agriculture to war. Having therefore divided among themſelves by lot the provinces of Spain, they applied themſelves to the tilling of the ground, and to other works of agriculture. In that diviſion, Galicia fell to the Vandals and Suevians, the former having Gonderic, who had ſucceeded Godigiſcles, for their king, and the latter Ermeric; Luſitania and the province of Cartagena to the Alans; Batica to the Vandals, called Silingians, who are ſuppoſed to have given to their lot the name of Vandaluſia, changed afterwards into that of Andaluſia [c]. Such of the natives as had eſcaped the general ſlaughter, and taken refuge in the fortified places, ſubmitted in the end to the barbarians, who, touching the holy book of the goſpels, ſwore, that they would treat them for the future as their friends and allies; which oath they obſerved ſo religiouſly, that many Romans choſe to live in poverty under the barbarians, rather than to return into the dominions of the empire [d]. However, the inhabitants of Galicia maintained their liberty, and formed a ſeparate ſtate in a corner of that province, where they were often attacked by Ermeric king of the Suevians, who, in the end, ſuffered them to live in peace, being ſeized with a diſtemper, of which he languiſhed the ſeven laſt years of the fourteen he reigned [e]. Pope Leo obſerves, that the catholic church ſuffered greatly by this irruption of the barbarians, who would not ſuffer the civil and eccleſiaſtical laws enacted againſt heretics, eſpecially the Priſcillianiſts, to be put in execution. On the other hand, the biſhops not meeting and holding councils as uſual, the followers of Priſcillian, who, till that time, had been obliged to keep themſelves concealed, began publicly to own their tenets, and gained over a great many proſelytes [f].

The Vandals, Alans, and Suevians, divide the provinces of Spain among them.

IN the year 416, Vallia, king of the Goths in Gaul, having concluded a peace with the Romans, took upon him to drive the barbarians out of Spain; which gave riſe to a war, of which we know but very few particulars. Oroſius writes, that on this occaſion Vallia gave ſignal proofs of his zeal for the welfare of the empire [g]; and Idatius, that Vallia made head againſt the

Alans and Vandals, masters of Lusitania and Bætica, and gained great advantages over them [h]. This is all we know of the present war. In 422, the emperor Honorius, acquainted with the low condition to which the Vandals had been reduced by the Goths under the command of Vallia, resolved to attempt the recovery of the provinces held by them in Spain. With this view, he ordered Castinus, general of the foot, and captain of the guards, to march against them at the head of a considerable army, in which served a great number of Goths. Castinus defeated them in several encounters, and reduced them to such straights, that they began to think of abandoning the country, which they had seized; but the Roman general having in the mean time unseasonably ventured an engagement, twenty thousand of his men were cut in pieces, and he obliged, with the poor remains of his shattered army, to take refuge in the city of Tarraco [i]. Idatius ascribes this defeat to the treachery of the Goths, who served as auxiliaries in the Roman army; but Gregory of Tours, and Salvian, suppose it to be intirely owing to the rashness of Castinus. After this victory, the Vandals made themselves masters of Seville; and, having firmly established their dominion in Andalusia, they ravaged the neighbouring provinces, almost utterly destroyed the city of Cartagena, and, passing over into the Balearic islands, committed unheard-of ravages there, carrying back with them into Spain an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives [k]. Not long after, the Vandals and Suevians falling out, Gonderic, king of the Vandals, gained great advantages over Ermeric king of the Suevians, whom, in the end, he obliged to fly for refuge to the mountains of Biscay, and there kept him and his people blocked up. But in the mean time, Asterius, count of Spain, and the vicar Mauroscelus, falling unexpectedly upon Gonderic, cut great numbers of his men in pieces, and obliged the rest to abandon Biscay and Galicia, and retire into Andalusia [l]. Gonderic, on his return to Seville, took the church of that city from the catholics, and gave it to the Arians; upon which, being immediately possessed, says Idatius, and tormented with an evil spirit, he perished soon after, that is, in 428, in a miserable manner [m]. The Vandals gave out, that he had been taken prisoner by the Suevians, and by them put to death, hoping by that means, say some modern writers, to conceal his shameful end; which was a manifest condemnation of the tenets of Arius held by them. Gonderic left several sons behind him; but was nevertheleſs ſucceeded by his brother, named by the antients Gaiſeric, Geiſeric, and Gizeric, but now commonly known by the name of Genſeric. Procopius tells us, that he was the natural ſon of Gondigiſcles, killed by the Franks in 406, and Sidonius, that he was the ſon of a king; but that his mother was a ſlave [p]. He renounced the catholic faith, which he firſt profeſſed, to embrace the doctrine of Arius held by the Vandals his countrymen [o]. He was remarkably brave and courageous, well ſkilled in the art of war, and, from his infancy, inured to the hardſhips and toils attending a military life [p]. But, as we have elſewhere drawn his character [q], we ſhall only add here from Idatius, that, before his acceſſion to the crown, he was well known to the Romans by the many advantages he had gained over them in Spain; that the victory over Caſtinus in 422, was no leſs owing to his bravery, than to the raſh conduct of the Roman general; and that chiefly by his means the Suevians in Spain were reduced to to the loweſt ebb of power [r]. Upon his arrival in Africa, he cauſed the wife of the deceaſed king to be drowned in the river Amſachus, and ſoon after put all her children to death, to prevent the diſturbances they might have raiſed, as they had an undoubted right to the crown [s]. Genſeric had ſcarce taken poſſeſſion of the throne, when he was invited over into Africa by count Bonifacius, who commanded the Roman troops in that province. Bonifacius had ſerved the empire with the utmoſt fidelity, and, on that account, had been raiſed by the empreſs Placidia to the higheſt honours, and ſent with an unlimited power into Africa; which province he had defended with great bravery againſt the repeated attempts of the uſurper John. His riſe gave no ſmall jealouſy to his rival Aetius, who thereupon found means to perſuade Placidia, that Bonifacius had preſerved Africa for himſelf, and only waited an opportunity of pulling off the maſk, and eſtabliſhing there an independent ſovereignty. Placidia, giving intire credit to the inſinuations of Aetius, whom ſhe did not in the leaſt miſtruſt, declared Bonifacius a public enemy, as we have related more at length elſewhere [t], and diſpatched a ſtrong body of troops againſt him. Bonifacius, finding the empreſs bent upon his ruin, and himſelf not in a condition to contend with the whole ſtrength of the empire, had recourſe to Genſeric king of the Vandals, who, at this time, peaceably enjoyed the province of Andaluſia. Procopius writes, that, in virtue of the treaty concluded between them and Bonifacius, Gonderic, whom he ſuppoſes to be ſtill living, againſt the teſtimony of Idatius, and Genſeric, were to have two-thirds of Africa, and he the other; and that they were to aſſiſt each other to the utmoſt of their power [u]. The treaty being agreed to, Genſeric began to make the neceſſary preparations for ſo important an expedition. The barbarians, ſays Proſper [w], had no veſſels, neither did they know how to make uſe of them; but thoſe who employed them, took care to ſupply them with every thing they wanted. When neceſſary veſſels were got ready, and the Vandals upon the point of going on board, Genſeric was informed, that Hermigarius, a celebrated commander of the Suevians, was laying waſte the neighbouring provinces. Hereupon Genſeric, putting himſelf at the head of a choſen body of troops, went in queſt of the enemy; and, coming up with them in Luſitania, gave them a total overthrow. Hermigarius their leader attempted to make his eſcape; but was drowned in croſſing on horſeback the river Guadiana near Merida [x]. Idatius looks upon his death as a puniſhment inflicted upon him for ſpeaking contemptuouſly of St. Eulalia, and pillaging the city of Merida, where the body of that ſaint was kept and revered [y].

He is invited by Bonifacius into Africa.

He defeats the Suevians.

FROM this expedition Genſeric returned to the place where the veſſels were kept in readineſs for his embarkation. There he had ordered, before his departure, all the Vandals to aſſemble, with their wives, children, and effects; and having, upon his return, commanded them to go on board, he put to ſea in the month of May of the year 428, and, abandoning Spain, croſſed the ſtraights of Gibralter, and landed in Africa [z]. The Romans took poſſeſſion anew of the provinces, which the Vandals had abandoned, and held them, till they were driven out by the Suevians, as the Suevians were in their turn by the Goths, as we have related above. Genſeric gave out, that his army was eighty thouſand ſtrong; but in that number he muſt have compriſed the old men, the children, and even the ſlaves [a]. The author of St. Auſtin's life deſcribes at length the dreadful ravages committed by them in that wealthy province. According to that writer, they were, in the month of May of the year 430, already maſters of all the cities of Africa, except Carthage, Cirtha, and Hippo. Caſſiodore writes, perhaps to curry favour with thoſe under whom he lived, that the Vandals were driven out of Spain by the Goths [b]. But Salvian aſſures us, that they abandoned

thoſe countries of their own accord, when they were in a condition to maintain themſelves in the poſſeſſion of what they had acquired with their valour, in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of their enemies, Heaven, that had made uſe of them to puniſh the ſins of the Spaniards, employing them for the ſame purpoſe againſt the Africans. The ſame writer adds, that they themſelves could not help owning, that they were animated to this enterpriſe more by a ſecret impulſe from Heaven, than by their own inclination [c]. In the mean time, Placidia, having diſcovered the true cauſe of the revolt of Bonifacius, wrote a moſt kind and obliging letter to him, aſſuring him of her favour and protection for the future, and exhorting him to return to his duty, and exert his uſual zeal for the welfare of the empire, by driving out the barbarians, whom the malice of his enemies had obliged him to call in for his own ſafety and preſervation. This Bonifacius readily undertook, offering them conſiderable ſums, provided they quitted Africa, and returned to Spain. But the Vandals, already maſters of the far greater part of Africa, firſt returned him a ſcoffing anſwer, and then, falling unexpectedly upon him, cut moſt of his men in pieces, and obliged Bonifacius himſelf to take refuge in Hippo; which place they inveſted in the month of May 430, about three months before the death of St. Auſtin biſhop of that city. The ſiege laſted about fourteen months, that is, till the month of July of the following year 431, when the Vandals were forced, by a famine that began to rage in their camp, to drop the enterpriſe, and retire [d]. Soon after, Bonifacius having received two reinforcements, the one from Rome and the other from Conſtantinople, under the conduct of the celebrated Aſpar, a reſolution was taken by the Roman generals to offer the enemy battle. The Vandals readily accepting the challenge, a bloody engagement enſued, in which the Romans were utterly defeated by the barbarians, who took an incredible number of captives, and obliged the reſt to take ſhelter among the rocks and mountains. Among the priſoners was Marcian, then aſſeſſor to Aſpar, and afterwards emperor. Aſpar, who commanded the eaſtern troops, eſcaped with much-ado out of Africa, and returned to Conſtantinople [e]. As for Bonifacius, he repaired with all ſpeed to Italy, being called thither by the empreſs Placidia. Upon their departure, the barbarians over-ran all Africa, committing every-where, without controul, unheard-of ravages; which ſtruck the inhabitants of Hippo with ſuch terror, that they abandoned their city, which was first plundered, and then set on fire, by the victorious enemy; so that Cirtha and Carthage were the only two strong places in Africa still held by the Romans [f]. About the same time, Genseric made several attempts upon Sicily; but was constantly repulsed by Cassiodore, great-grandfather to the celebrated senator of the same name [g]. At length a peace was concluded on the eleventh of February of the year 435, between Valentinian and Genseric [h], whose moderation is greatly extolled by Procopius [i]. But other writers ascribe his making peace with the Romans, not to his moderation, but to the apprehension he was under of being attacked anew by the united forces of both empires. Be that as it will, the Romans yielded to him part of Numidia, the province of Proconsularis, and likewise Byzacene [k]. Prosper writes, that, for these provinces, Genseric was to pay a yearly tribute to the emperor of the east [l]. He delivered up to the Romans his son Hunneric by way of hostage; but so great was the confidence they placed in Genseric, that, some time after, they sent him back his son; of which they had soon occasion to repent, being convinced by experience, that he had either brought with him into Africa, or learnt there, the treachery peculiar to the inhabitants of that country; for four years after, that is, in 439, the Romans being engaged in a war with the Goths in Gaul, Genseric, laying hold of that opportunity, surprised the city of Carthage on the twenty-third of October; by the taking of which place, the Vandals remained masters of the Proconsularis, of Byzacene, Gætulia, and part of Numidia [m]. However, Valentinian maintained, so long as he lived, the other provinces of Africa, though reduced to a most deplorable condition. These were the two Mauritanias, viz. Cæsariensis and Sitifensis, with Tripolitana, Tingitana, and that part of Numidia, in which Cirtha stood. Thus Carthage fell under the power of the Vandals, after it had belonged to the Romans for the space of five hundred and eighty-five years [n]. When news of the taking of Carthage by the Vandals was brought to Rome, Valentinian, not doubting but they would soon make some attempt upon Italy itself, ordered the walls, towers, and gates of all the cities on the coast to be repaired. The governor of Rome was strictly injoined to put that city in a state of defence against any sudden attack, and impowered to oblige all the inhabitants, without distinction, to concur in the work. Levies were made, and guards placed on the walls, and at the gates, as appears from a law enacted on the second of March, and addressed to the people of Rome [p]. From another law dated the twenty-fourth of June 440, we learn, that the Roman people had already received intelligence of Genseric's being sailed from Carthage with a powerful fleet, but were still unacquainted with his design. Hereupon Valentinian published a law, granting to all ranks of people the liberty of taking arms, to defend themselves against the common enemy. By the same law he yields to them whatever they shall take from the Vandals, and exhorts them to act on this occasion with the courage of true Romans, and with that moderation and justice, that become men of honour. He adds, that an army, destined by Theodosius for the defence of Italy, was in full march; and that Aetius would soon arrive from Gaul at the head of another army. Several bodies of troops were placed, at proper distances, along the coast, under the conduct of Sigisvult, by nation a Goth; and the people ordered to be in readiness to take arms upon the first alarm [q]. But, notwithstanding all these precautions, Genseric, in the month of June, made a descent upon Sicily, and, meeting with little or no resistance, ravaged the open country, and even laid siege to Palermo; but, not being able to reduce the place, he returned to Africa with an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives [r]. It was, without all doubt, on this occasion, that Pascasinus, bishop of Lilybæum, was carried into captivity, as pope Leo informs us, and kept in a most miserable servitude for the space of three years, viz. to the year 433, when he returned back to his see [s].

He ravages Sicily.

Genseric being now become formidable to both empires, Theodosius resolved to assist Valentinian his cousin and son-in-law against so powerful an enemy. Accordingly, he fitted out a fleet consisting of eleven hundred large ships, and, putting on board of it the flower of his army, under the conduct of Aspacuras, Ansilus, and Germanus, he ordered them to land in Africa, and, joining the western forces there, to drive Genseric out of the countries he had usurped. But Genseric pretending in the mean time to be desirous of concluding a peace with both empires, the Roman generals waited on the coast of Sicily the result of the negotiations, till the season proper for action was over. The following year 442, the Huns breaking into Thrace and Illyricum, and committing dreadful ravages, Theodosius was obliged to recal his forces, and Valentinian to conclude a peace with Genseric, which he could not obtain, but by yielding to him all the countries in Africa which he had seized [t]. Some years after, that is, in 455, Eudoxia, the widow of Valentinian III. being forced, by the usurper Maximus, who had murdered her husband, to marry him, in order to revenge this affront, dispatched a trusty messenger to Genseric, conjuring him to come and revenge the death of his friend and ally Valentinian, and rescue her out of the arms of a tyrant, who had imbrued his hands in the blood of her husband [u].

Genseric takes and plunders Rome. Year after Christ 455.

As the empress assured him, that he would meet with little or no resistance in Italy, and at the same time promised to assist him to the utmost of her power, he embraced, with great joy, so favourable an opportunity of enriching himself with the spoils of so wealthy a country; and, putting to sea without loss of time, steered his course straight to Rome, which he took and plundered, as we have related at length in our Roman history [w]. Amongst other persons of great distinction, Genseric carried with him over into Africa the empress Eudoxia, her two daughters Placidia and Eudocia, and Gaudentius the son of Aetius. Marcian, who succeeded Maximus, dispatched embassadors to Genseric, earnestly intreating him to suffer the empress and the two princesses her daughters to return to Rome; but he, despising both his intreaties and menaces, kept them till the year 462, when he sent back Eudoxia, with her second daughter Placidia, to Leo, the successor of Marcian; but kept Eudocia, and married her to Hunneric his eldest son, who had by her Hilderic, afterwards king of the Vandals in Africa [x]. Victor Tununensis tells us, that Leo, then bishop of Rome, went out to meet Genseric, and, with his affecting eloquence, persuaded him to forbear shedding the blood of the innocent citizens, and setting fire to the city [y]; but, according to Evagrius, the Vandals not only pillaged the city, but set it on fire; so that several public as well as private buildings were intirely consumed [z]. Baronius writes, upon what authority we know not, that Genseric spared, as Alaric had done, the churches of St. Peter, St. Paul, and the Lateran [a].

Genseric, upon his return to Africa, made himself master of the countries that were still held there by the Romans. Hereupon Avitus, who had succeeded Valentinian III. dispatched embassadors to him, putting him in mind of the treaty he had concluded with the empire in 442, and threatening, if he did not

obſerve the articles of that convention, to make war upon him, not only with his own forces, but with thoſe likewiſe of his allies, meaning the Viſigoths, that were ready to embarque and paſs over into Africa. Accordingly, he ſent a numerous fleet to Sicily, under the conduct of Ricimer, whom we have had frequent occaſion to mention in our Roman hiſtory, with orders to keep themſelves in readineſs to put to ſea upon the firſt notice [b]. But Genſeric, without the leaſt regard to the emperor's remonſtrances or threats, ſailed from Carthage with a fleet of ſixty ſhips, having on board a great number of land-forces, and ſhaped his courſe towards Corſica, it being yet a ſecret whether he deſigned to make a deſcent upon Italy or Gaul. But Ricimer no ſooner heard he had put to ſea, than he too weighed anchor, and, coming unexpectedly upon him near Corſica, utterly defeated him [c]. However, he returned ſoon after with a more numerous fleet, and, making a deſcent on the coaſt of Italy, carried off unmoleſted an immenſe booty and a great number of captives; which Marcian, emperor of the eaſt, hearing, and at the ſame time pitying the condition to which Eudoxia and her two daughters were reduced, diſpatched embaſſadors to Genſeric, earneſtly intreating him to ſend back the three princeſſes, and to forbear ravaging the lands of the empire, purſuant to the treaties he had concluded with the emperor of the weſt. Genſeric heard the embaſſadors; but diſmiſſed them without any anſwer. Upon their return, Marcian, imagining, that an Arian might ſpeak with more liberty to, and be more favourably received by, a prince of that perſuaſion, wrote a letter to him with his own hand, and charged Bleda, a biſhop of that ſect, to deliver it to him. Bleda, finding he could obtain nothing by prayers and intreaties, told him boldly, that he ought not to let himſelf be ſo blinded by the ſucceſs that had hitherto attended him, as not to reflect on the danger to which he expoſed himſelf, by provoking ſuch a warlike prince as Marcian. Genſeric heard him with patience; but refuſed to comply with either of the emperor's requeſts [d]. Some writers tell us, that Marcian, finding he could obtain nothing of Genſeric by fair means, reſolved to make war upon him, but died before he could put his deſign in execution [e]. Jornandes, as quoted by other writers, ſuppoſes him to have concluded a peace with the Vandals [f]. Procopius, who greatly extols Marcian in other reſpects, blames him for neglecting the affairs of Africa, and ſcrupling to make war upon Genſeric, by reaſon of the oath

he had been obliged to take, when prisoner in Africa, that he would never molest the Vandals [g]. Evagrius supposes Eudoxia, with her second daughter Placidia, to have been sent back to Marcian [h]; but he was therein certainly mistaken; for Genseric set those two princesses at liberty several years after, at the request of the emperor Leo. Priscus writes, that Genseric obtained of the emperor of the east, Marcian, or his successor Leo, part of the effects of the deceased emperor Valentinian, as the portion of Eudocia that prince's daughter married to Hunneric the son of Genseric [i]. But we do not well comprehend what right the emperor of the east had to dispose of what belonged to the emperor of the west. In the year 457, Avitus, emperor of the west, who had succeeded Valentinian III. being deposed, after a short reign, Majorianus was chosen in his room. In the beginning of that prince's reign, the Vandals made a descent on the coast of Campania; but the Romans, falling upon them while they were busied in plundering the country, put great numbers of them to the sword, among whom was the brother-in-law of Genseric, and obliged the rest to quit their booty, and save themselves on board their fleet [k]. Majorianus, not satisfied with this small advantage, resolved to pass over into Africa, and attempt the recovery of those wealthy provinces. With this view he assembled a fleet consisting of three hundred vessels, hired a great number of troops of the barbarians, who lived in amity with the empire, and are named by Sidonius [l], and made other necessary preparations for so great an undertaking; the Gauls, though greatly exhausted by heavy imposts, contributing with joy their share towards them [m]. Of these military preparations mention is made by Procopius [n], and likewise by Cassiodore [o], who tells us, that Majorianus spent the whole year 457, and the three following, in making the necessary preparations for driving the Vandals out of Africa. At length, in the year 460, Majorianus leaving Arles, where he then resided, soon after Easter, which that year fell on the twenty-seventh of March, bent his march towards Spain, which he entered in the month of May, with a design to cross over from thence into Africa [p]. Procopius writes, that Majorianus, the better to inform himself of the strength of the enemy, went in disguise to the court of Genseric, pretending to be an ambassador sent by the Roman emperor with proposals for an accommodation: he adds, that, while Genseric was shewing him his arsenal, all the arms moved of their own accord with a dreadful noise [p]. The Romans did not in the least doubt of success, having Majorianus for leader; and the Vandals, dreading the issue of a war under the conduct of so renowned a commander, did all that lay in their power to avoid it. Genseric sent embassadors with proposals for concluding a peace with the empire, which he promised to observe with the utmost fidelity; but these being rejected by the emperor, he laid waste all Mauritania, and even poisoned the waters, being informed, that Majorianus designed to land there, and thence march to Carthage [r]. In the mean time, the Roman fleet being assembled in the bay of Alicant, and Majorianus ready to embarque, a squadron of Genseric's best ships appeared unexpectedly, and, falling upon the Roman vessels at anchor, sunk a great number of them, disabled others, and returned with some in triumph to Africa. This misfortune, which, we are told, was owing to the treachery of some on board the Roman fleet, disconcerted all the emperor's measures, and put a stop to the enterprise. However, Majorianus, persisting in his resolution of invading Africa, ordered the ships to be repaired, and in the mean time returned to Arles, to pass the winter there. Genseric, finding the late misfortune had not diverted Majorianus from his former resolution, and dreading the arms and valour of so great a general, dispatched embassadors to him with new proposals, which he in the end accepted [s]. Thus a peace was concluded between Majorianus and Genseric; but the articles of the treaty have not been transmitted to us. Whatever they were, Genseric did not long observe them; for he was no sooner informed of the death of Majorianus, which happened the following year 461, than he sent a powerful fleet to pillage the coasts of Sicily and Italy, and even made himself master of Sardinia [t].

THE following year 462, the inhabitants of Italy, being informed, that Genseric was making great preparations with a design to renew his ravages on their coasts, had recourse to Leo emperor of the east, Severus, whom Ricimer had raised to the empire of the west, being no-ways qualified for that high station, and altogether incapable of protecting them against so powerful an enemy as Genseric. They earnestly intreated Leo either to supply them with ships of war, or to procure for them, by his mediation, some kind of agreement with the king of the Vandals. Leo declined sending them any supplies, which, he said, would be an open breach of the treaties subsisting between Genseric and the emperors of the east; but dispatched embassadors into Africa, with proposals for a peace with the western empire, earnestly pressing Genseric at the same time, to send back Eudoxia and her daughter Placidia. Genseric answered, that he would hearken to no terms till the effects of Valentinian were delivered up to him, which he claimed as the portion of Eudocia, that prince's eldest daughter, whom his son Hunneric had married. However, he sent back to Leo the two princesses, declaring, that he was willing to live in peace with the emperor of the east; but under the above-mentioned pretences he never failed, for some years, to make descents early in the spring on the coasts of Sicily and Italy, pillaging the country; but ever avoiding to engage the Romans, and retiring as soon as their forces appeared [u]. Olybrius, of whom we have spoken elsewhere [w], having soon after married Placidia, Genseric took from thence a new pretence to ravage Italy more than ever, declaring, that he would wage an eternal war with the western empire, unless Olybrius, brother-in-law to his son, was raised to the imperial dignity [x]. Hereupon the inhabitants of Italy had recourse anew to the emperor Leo, who dispatched the patrician Tatian to Genseric, injoining him to conclude a peace with that prince upon any terms; but Genseric would hearken to none [y]. In the mean time, the emperor Severus dying, the Romans sent deputies to Constantinople, intreating Leo to send Anthemius into Italy, whom they designed to chuse emperor. Anthemius was a native of Constantinople, descended of an antient and illustrious family, had married the daughter of the late emperor Marcian, and was at that time count of the east. Leo readily complied with the request of the Romans; so that Anthemius, arriving in Italy, was with one consent chosen emperor, notwithstanding the great interest made by Genseric in favour of Olybrius. Hereupon Genseric, highly provoked against Leo for contributing to the promotion of Anthemius, sent a powerful fleet with orders to ravage Peloponnesus and the Greek islands, which they did accordingly, committing unheard-of cruelties, and carrying off a great number of captives [z]. Leo was no sooner informed of these ravages, than he dispatched one Philarchus to acquaint Genseric, that, if he did not forbear such acts of hostility, he should be obliged to make war upon him, and repel force with force. But Genseric, despising his menaces, answered, that, if Leo thought fit to make war upon him, he

ſhould not find him unprepared; and ſoon after, to bid him, in a manner, defiance, he ſent his fleet to ravage anew the coaſts of Greece and the other maritime provinces of the eaſtern empire; nay, a report was ſpread in Conſtantinople, that his fleet had appeared before the city of Alexandria, which greatly alarmed the emperor and the whole court. But we are told, that the famous anchoret Daniel Stylita, to whom the emperor had recourſe, removed their fears, by aſſuring them, that the deſign of the barbarians would prove abortive; and that they would ſoon return to Africa, without being able to make themſelves maſters of Alexandria, or any other place. As he foretold, ſo it happened; for the barbarians, after ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts on Alexandria and ſome other places, returned home, without either captives or booty [a].

THE following year 468, Leo, reſolving, at all events, to revenge the affront offered by Genſeric to the eaſtern empire, made vaſt preparations for carrying the war over into Africa. Procopius writes, that on this occaſion he ſpent an hundred and thirty thouſand pounds weight of gold [b]. Candidus, as quoted by Suidas, tells us, that the prefects contributed forty-ſeven thouſand pounds weight of gold towards defraying the charges of this war; the prince ſeventeen thouſand of gold, and ſeventy thouſand of ſilver, out of his privy purſe; that the money ariſing from the ſale of confiſcated eſtates was employed in buying up proviſions, purchaſing ſhips, hiring troops, &c. and that Anthemius, emperor of the weſt, aſſiſted Leo to the utmoſt of his power both with men and money [c]. Cedrenus computes the charges of this war in a manner, that to us ſeems quite intelligible [d]. Leo, ſays Procopius, aſſembled all the ſhips that were found in the ſeas and ports of his empire [e], which, according to Theophanes, amounted to one hundred thouſand [f]. But that writer confounded perhaps the number of the ſhips with that of the men, who, according to Procopius [g], did not exceed that number. Nicephorus ſuppoſes, with Theophanes, the fleet to have conſiſted of an hundred thouſand ſail; but, ſpeaking of the rowers, he makes them to amount to no more than ſeven thouſand [h]; a miſtake altogether unpardonable. Procopius only ſays, that Leo fitted out the greateſt fleet the Romans had ever had [i]; and Cedrenus, that the number of the ſhips amounted to one thouſand one hundred and thirteen, each ſhip having an hundred men on board [k]. In this enterpriſe were employed the beſt beſt troops of both empires; for not only Anthemius ſent very conſiderable ſupplies both of men and ſhips [l], but likewiſe Marcellinus, who had eſtabliſhed a new ſovereignty in Dalmatia, as we have related elſewhere [m]; nay, that prince commanded in perſon, not only his own troops, but thoſe likewiſe that were ſent by Anthemius emperor of the weſt [n]. The fame of theſe warlike preparations ſtruck the whole world, ſays Conſtantine Manaſſes [o], with terror and amazement: nothing, continued he, ſeemed capable of defeating ſo numerous an army, ſo powerful a fleet, except gold, which no power can reſiſt. But as the time appointed by Providence for puniſhing the Vandals was not yet come, Heaven ſuffered Leo to commit the whole management of this war to Baſiliſcus, brother to his wife Verina. Baſiliſcus had gained great advantages over the barbarians in Thrace, where he had commanded as general of that province; ſo that, as to his military capacity, he ſeemed ſufficiently qualified for ſo great a command, the more as he had under him one John, a perſon of extraordinary courage and experience in war [p]. But, on the other hand, Baſiliſcus was actuated by two very dangerous paſſions, viz. avarice and ambition. The latter even prompted him to aſpire at the ſovereignty, which he hoped to attain by means of Aſpar, who governed under Leo with almoſt an abſolute ſway; but, as he profeſſed the doctrine of Arius, he was himſelf, on account of his religion, excluded from the imperial dignity. He had lately quarrelled with Leo, and therefore fearing, leſt that prince, if he got the better of the Vandals, ſhould, by his victory, be enabled to reduce his power, and puniſh him, as he well deſerved, for his arrogance, he is ſuppoſed to have entered into a private treaty with Baſiliſcus, promiſing to raiſe him to the throne, provided he ſpared Genſeric, for whom he might likewiſe have ſome regard, as for one who profeſſed the ſame tenets with himſelf [q]. The iſland of Sicily was appointed the place of the general rendezvous [r]. From thence Marcellinus was to ſail for Sardinia, which the Vandals had lately ſeized; Heraclius of Edeſſa, a brave and experienced officer, for Libya; and Baſiliſcus, with the greateſt part of the fleet and the flower of the troops, to ſteer his courſe ſtrait to Carthage [s]. Purſuant to this plan, Marcellinus landed in Sardinia, and made himſelf maſter of that iſland, while Heraclius, with the troops quartered in

Egypt, in Thebais, and Cyrenaica, landing unexpectedly in the province Tripolitana, reduced Tripolis, and the other cities in that country. From thence he began his march by land, with a design to join Basiliscus at Carthage [t]. That commander, sailing from Sicily, arrived with his fleet at cape Mercury, but fourteen leagues from Carthage, soon after Genseric had received the disagreeable news of the loss of Sardinia and Libya. The arrival of so formidable a fleet, and the losses he had already sustained, struck him, tho' a man of great intrepidity, with such terror, that, looking upon himself as irretrievably lost, he is said to have had some thoughts of evacuating Africa, and retiring elsewhere: and truly, if Basiliscus had marched directly to Carthage, during the panic which had seized the barbarians, he might, in all likelihood, have made himself master of that city, and put an end to the war at once, by an intire reduction of the country [u]. Some authors write, that he had already gained considerable advantages over the fleet of Genseric [w]; and Jornandes, that he attacked Carthage several times by sea; but either for want of skill, or because he was willing to favour Genseric, his attacks were not so vigorous as the barbarians expected [x]. Hereupon Genseric, recovering from his late consternation, sent deputies to the Roman admiral, begging a truce of five days, to settle with him the conditions, on which he was to submit to Leo [y]. Some writers tell us, that, with the embassadors, Genseric sent privately a considerable sum to Basiliscus, hoping to induce him, by that means, to grant him his request; which he did accordingly, continuing in the mean time inactive in his camp [z]. Genseric demanded the above-mentioned truce, hoping a favourable wind might spring up during that time for falling upon the Roman fleet; for his men were all on board the ships of war, which were to tow other light and empty vessels. The wind proving as favourable as the Vandals could wish, before the truce was expired, they weighed anchor, and, drawing near to the Roman fleet, set fire to the empty ships, which being, by the wind, driven upon the Roman fleet, spread to many of their ships, and threw their whole navy into the utmost confusion. While the Romans were thus in disorder, and busied either in keeping off the fire-ships, or extinguishing the flames on board their own, the Vandals, falling upon them, overwhelmed them with showers of darts, took several of their ships, sunk others, and obliged the rest to save

From these islands he sent yearly fleets to ravage the coasts of Italy, of Peloponnesus, and the Greek islands, equally despising both emperors, and bidding defiance to their power. The antient ſtate, &c. of the Sueves, till their ſettling in Spain.

THE Sueves were, in Cæſar's time, the greateſt and moſt warlike nation of all Germany [p]. Tacitus divides them into ſeveral tribes or nations, known by different names, comprehending, under the common name of Sueves, the following people, viz. the Longobardi, the Semnones, the Rheudingi, the Aviones, the Angli [q]. Ptolemy mentions only three nations of the Sueves, viz. the Suevi Longobardi, the Suevi Samnones, and the Suevi Angili, whom Tacitus, and other writers, call Angli. Some writers will have the Vandals and Sueves to be one and the ſame people, called Vandals from the word Wandrende, and Sueves from the word Schwachende, both which ſignify wanderers; for Strabo tells us, that the Sueves often changed their ſeats, wandering from place to place [r]. In the time of the emperor Nero, they dwelt between the Rhine and the Elbe; for Strabo, who flouriſhed under that prince, ſpeaks of them thus: The Sueves are a great and powerful people; for their country extends from the Rhine to the Elbe; nay, ſome of that nation dwell beyond the Elbe. Some years after, that is, in the time of Tacitus the hiſtorian, they were ſeated between the Elbe and the Viſtula or Weiſſer; for there they are placed by that writer [s]. From them the Surus, now the

Oder, took its name; and the Baltic was called the Suevian ſea. Solinus is of opinion, that they were called Suevi from mount Suevio, parting Germany from Sarmatia. As to their origin, nothing has been alledged by authors but what is very uncertain, and no-ways to be depended upon, ſome deriving their origin from Scandinavia, ſome from Sarmatia, ſome from Hungary, and ſome endeavouring, with ſeveral arguments and monuments of antiquity, to convince us, that they were originally a German nation [t]. Some writers tell us, that they came out of Scandinavia, and ſettled on the banks of the Albis or the Elbe; that they were there ſubdued by the Saxons, and thence blended under their name, as were all the other nations conquered by that people. However, the Sueves retained at the ſame time their own name; and hence the Angli, who were, as we have hinted above, a Suevian nation, are ſometimes called Saxones Angli, and ſometimes Suevi Angli. Ciſnerus ſuppoſes theſe to be two different nations [u]; but his opinion is plainly confuted by the learned Sheringham [w]. The Sueves were a warlike nation, and, as ſuch, are commended both by Cæſar and Tacitus, of whom the former often confounds them with the Catti, as after him does Strabo [x], and likewiſe Seneca the tragic writer [y]; for, by theſe writers, they are placed in the Hercynian foreſt, which was, beyond diſpute, inhabited by the Catti or Chatti. The Sueves had kings of their own, and ſeem to have agreed in cuſtoms and manners with the other German nations. But of their affairs we know very little till the Romans became acquainted with them, which happened in the year of Rome 742, the twenty-ſecond of Auguſtus's reign, and about eight years before the birth of our Saviour, when Druſus, the ſon of Livia and brother to Tiberius, paſſing the Rhine, entered Germany, and, in three campaigns, reduced all the nations between that river and the Elbe [z], and among the reſt the Sueves. But that young prince dying on his return to Rome, the nations he had ſubdued threw off the yoke; which obliged Auguſtus to diſpatch Tiberius againſt them, who over-ran great part of Germany, and forced the barbarians to ſend deputies to Auguſtus, ſuing for peace; but the emperor would not even hear them, becauſe the Sicambrians, one of the moſt warlike nations among them, had not ſent their deputies with those of the other barbarians. The war was therefore continued, till the Sicambrians, no longer able to hold out, submitted to such conditions as Augustus thought fit to impose upon them, as did likewise the Sueves, the allies and confederates of the Sicambrians [a]. The Sicambrians and Sueves having thus submitted, Tiberius, pursuant to the instructions he had received from Augustus, obliged forty thousand of them to pass the Rhine, and settle in Gaul [b]. Suetonius tells us, that seats were allotted to them on the banks of that river [c]; but Suetonius, says Bucherius, was therein perhaps mistaken, it being probable, that they were placed at a considerable distance from the Rhine, to prevent their passing that river, and joining the other German nations; nay, that author endeavours to prove from several antient monuments, which are still extant, that the country about Courtray was antiently inhabited by the Sueves [d]. Some are of opinion, that from these Sueves sprung the Burgundians, so called from the boroughs, in Latin burgi, in which they were placed by the Romans; but this opinion is generally exploded. There are no traces remaining, whence we can conjecture what country was allotted to the Sicambrians [e]. Tho' some of that people remained beyond the Rhine, yet, in the space of about sixty years, the whole nation was extinct [f]. Of them therefore is to be understood what we read in Dion, viz. that Augustus having distributed into several villages the Germans he had taken in war, they were so grieved thereat, that they destroyed themselves with their own hands, especially the persons of distinction among them, who were very numerous [g]. Mention is made of the Sicambrians after this time; but it is commonly thought, that the name of Sicambrians was given to the neighbouring nations, who settled in their country [h], that is, in the southern parts of Westphalia. Augustus thus obliged part of the Sicambrians and Sueves to quit their own country, in order to weaken them, having found by experience, that he could neither depend upon their word nor their hostages [i].

They drive out their king Marobodes.

In the reign of Tiberius, the Sueves, quarrelling among themselves, which was chiefly owing to his intrigues, drove out Marobodes their king, a prince greatly dreaded by the Romans, and chose Catualdes in his room, who, at the instigation of Tiberius, had stirred up the Sueves against him. Marobodes took refuge in the Roman dominions, and was allowed by Tibe- rius to ſettle at Ravenna, where he paſſed the laſt eighteen years of his life. Catualdes himſelf was ſoon after driven from the throne, and obliged to take refuge in the city of Frejus. As both princes came attended by great numbers of Sueves, their friends and adherents, Tiberius, apprehending they might diſturb the peace of the empire, allotted them lands beyond the Danube, and appointed a Quadian, by name Vannius, to reign over them. Vannius governed them for the ſpace of thirty years, that is to the year 50, of the chriſtian æra, the tenth of the emperor Claudius, when being in the end become obnoxious to the nation, on account of his haughty and imperious conduct, he was by them, with the aſſiſtance of their neighbours, the Hermundurians and Lygians, depoſed and baniſhed [k]. Claudius refuſed to aſſiſt him; but nevertheleſs allowed him to retire into Pannonia, and even gave him and his followers lands in that province [l]. Vangio and Sido, nephews to Vannius by his ſiſter, but his declared enemies, divided his dominions between them, and continued ever faithful to the Romans [m]. Sido, and Italicus, who had ſucceeded Vangio, joined Veſpaſian with all their forces againſt Vitellius, and on that occaſion commanded their troops in perſon [n]. In the year 83, a colony of Sueves was ſettled in Friſia; for Tacitus, in the life of Agricola, tells us, that ſome Germans in the Roman ſervice, and quartered in Britain, having killed their officers, and made their eſcape, were driven aſhore on the coaſt of Germany, and there taken and ſold for ſlaves by the Sueves and Friſians, who believed them pirates [o]. How, or on what occaſion, the Sueves came to ſettle there, we are no-where told. In the year 85, the Sueves, and their allies the Lygians, being greatly harraſſed by the neighbouring nations, ſent deputies to Domitian, earneſtly intreating him to aſſiſt them in their diſtreſs. Domitian diſmiſſed the embaſſadors with a favourable anſwer, but ſent them only one hundred horſemen; which ſo provoked the Sueves, that, joining the Iazyges, a Sarmatic nation, they reſolved to paſs the Danube, and, by laying waſte the Roman territories, revenge the affront that had been offered them; for they thought themſelves affronted and derided by the emperor [p]. What happened after, our hiſtorian has not thought fit to tell us; but Tacitus, in one place [q], writes, that the Sarmatians and Suevians roſe in arms againſt the empire: and in another [r], that, ſoon after Agricola was returned to Rome, that is, in 85, the Roman armies were defeated in Pannonia. The Sueves, of whom Dion ſpeaks here, were, without all doubt, thoſe to whom Tiberius had allotted lands beyond the Danube, as we have related above. That writer places them, and likewiſe the Lygians, in Mœſia, giving to that province a far greater extent than other hiſtorians and geographers have done; for, even according to him, theſe people dwelt beyond the Danube, which was, according to all other writers, the boundary of Mœſia to the north, that province extending along the ſouth ſide of the Danube, from the confluence of that river and the Saw or Savo, at Belgrade, to the Euxine ſea [s]. We find no farther mention of the Sueves till the year 168, when, joining the Marcomanns and other German nations, they laid waſte ſeveral provinces, defeated great armies, and threatened the empire with utter deſtruction. But of this war, which is compared, by the antients, to the Punic and Cimbrian wars, we have ſpoken at length in our Roman hiſtory [t], to which we refer the reader. In 268, the firſt of Claudius's reign, the Sueves, entering into an alliance with other German nations, broke into Italy, and advanced as far as the lake Benacus, now lago di Garda, in the neighbourhood of Verona; but were there utterly defeated by the emperor, and moſt of them cut in pieces [u]. This, perhaps, is the victory of which Vopiſcus ſpeaks, where he tells us, that, in the reign of Claudius, Aurelian fought a great battle with the Sueves, and gained a ſignal victory over them [w]. In 357, the twenty-firſt of Conſtantius's reign, the Sueves broke into Rhætia, the Quadians into Valeria, and the Sarmatians into Lower Pannonia and Upper Mœſia, which obliged the emperor, who was then at Rome, to quit that metropolis, and march againſt them [x]. But as he returned ſoon after to Italy, and no mention is made of any engagement, we may conclude from thence, that at his approach the barbarians withdrew, and retired to their reſpective countries. The poet Claudian, in his poem againſt Eutropius, tells us, that when news was brought to Honorius of that miniſter's promotion to the conſulſhip, the prince was then buſied, with Stilicho, in receiving the ſubmiſſions of the Alemanns, the Sicambrians, and the Sueves; in giving them kings, and ſettling the number of troops which they were to furniſh [y]. This is ſuppoſed to have happened about the year 398, but as theſe nations are not ſaid, by any hiſtorian, to have ſubmitted

to Honorius, we are inclined to believe these pretended submissions to be only a poetical fiction. In the year 406, they entered Gaul with the Alans and Vandals, and from thence passed into Spain in 409, as we have related above. They continued ravaging that country, putting all to fire and sword, till the year 411, when, the Romans being quite driven out, they made peace with the natives, and divided the Spanish provinces by lot among them. In this division, Galicia fell to the Vandals and Sueves; but the inhabitants of that province, refusing to submit to the barbarians, stood up in defence of their liberties, and formed a separate state in a corner of their antient country, where they were often attacked by the Sueves, under the conduct of Emeric or Ermeric, their king. But that prince, being seized with a lingering distemper, suffered them to live in peace the seven last years of his reign [z]. About three years after the Sueves, Vandals, and Alans, had divided the Spanish provinces among them, Ataulphus, king of the Visigoths, quitting Gaul, settled in Catalonia, where he was murdered the same year, as was likewise his successor Sigeric, after a short reign of seven days, as we have related above. But Vallia, who succeeded Sigeric, having concluded a peace with the Romans, fell upon the Sueves, Vandals, and Alans in Spain, gained several advantages over them, and cut off such numbers of the Alans, that the few who escaped the general slaughter, were obliged to submit to Gonderic, king of the Vandals. The Sueves likewise sustained great losses in this war; but nevertheless maintained, against the utmost efforts of the Goths, that part of Galicia, which, in the division of the provinces, had fallen to their share. The Goths returning soon after, that is in 418, to Gaul, where Constans had bestowed on them Aquitania Secunda, the Vandals and Sueves began to quarrel among themselves; for, the year after the departure of the Goths, we find the Sueves, with their king Emeric, shut up by Gonderic, king of the Vandals, among the mountains of Biscay. But Asterius, count of Spain, and Mauroctelus, vicar to the præfectus prætorio, falling unexpectedly upon the Vandals, obliged them to leave the Sueves, and retire out of Galicia into Bætica [a]. Upon their retreat, the Sueves made themselves masters of that part of Galicia which had been held by them. In the year 430, a body of Sueves attempted to cross the Rhine, with a design to enter Gaul, and from thence to pass into Spain, and join their countrymen settled in Galicia; but Aetius, who was then in Gaul, falling upon them, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to return to their own country, between the Elbe and Weiſſel [b]. Of this victory Jornandes ſpeaks without all doubt, where he tells us, that Aetius overcame the Sueves, made a dreadful havock of that nation, and ſubjected them to the empire [c]. At the ſame time, he defeated with great ſlaughter the Juthongians, whoſe country bordered on Rhætia, and the Norici, who were ſubjects of the empire, but had revolted, and joined the Sueves and Juthongians [d].

The Sueves in Spain make war upon the natives of Galicia.

IN Spain the Sueves made their utmoſt efforts to reduce the inhabitants of Galicia; but that brave people ſtill maintained themſelves free, defending their ſtrong-holds, againſt the repeated attacks of the barbarians, with ſuch reſolution, that Emeric thought it adviſeable to conclude a peace with them, that his people, who began to be greatly diſtreſſed for want of corn, might apply themſelves to the tilling of the land, and other works of agriculture. This peace, however, was but ſhort-lived; for, the following year 431, the Sueves began hoſtilities anew, and, breaking into the territories of the natives, committed there dreadful ravages, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. Hereupon the unhappy Galicians diſpatched Idatius the chronologer, their biſhop, into Gaul, to acquaint Aetius with the deplorable condition to which they were reduced; and to intreat him to ſend what troops he could ſpare to their aſſiſtance. Aetius, who was then at war with the Franks, not being able to afford them the leaſt aid, ſent count Cenſorius into Spain, with the character of embaſſador, to Emeric, hoping to induce him, by that means, to conclude a peace with the natives. Emeric received the Roman embaſſador with the greateſt marks of honour, and, at his requeſt, began to treat with the Galicians; but the treaty was ſoon broken off, and hoſtilities renewed, which continued till the year 437, when Cenſorius was ſent again to the court of Emeric, with one Fretimund, to bring about an accommodation between that prince and the Galicians; which they did in the end, Emeric being ſeized with a lingering diſtemper, and thereby rendered incapable of bearing the toils of war [e]. A peace being thus concluded, Emeric reſigned the crown to his ſon Rechila, after he had reigned twenty-eight years, reckoning from the year 409, when the Sueves firſt entered Spain under his conduct. He lived four years after his reſignation quite retired, without ever concerning himſelf with public affairs [f]. Rechila ſignalized the beginning of his reign, ſays Idatius, with a victory gained in Bætica over one Andevotus, whoſe rich treaſures he pillaged [g]

but who this Andevotus was, we are no-where told. In the year 439, Rechila, entering Lusitania, made himself master of Merida, the capital of that province [h]; and, pursuing his conquests, reduced, the two following years, the city of Seville, and the two provinces of Bætica and Cartagena. Hereupon the Romans, who had anew taken possession of Bætica, upon the departure of the Vandals, dispatched into Spain one Astierus, to drive them out of the provinces they had seized. Astierus fell upon the Bagaudæ, who had lately settled in the province of Turraco, and, cutting most of them in pieces, recovered that country [i]; but we do not find, that he attempted any thing against the Sueves. Not long after, Vitus, who commanded a considerable body of Roman troops in Spain, with the title of magister militiæ, entering the provinces of Bætica and Cartagena, committed there great ravages; but a body of Goths, who came to his assistance, being defeated by Rechila, both he and his army were seized with such a panic, that, betaking themselves to a shameful flight, they left the Sueves at full liberty to pillage the country at their pleasure, and reduce several strongholds, that, till then, had been held by the Romans [k]. Two years after, that is, in 447, died Rechila, and was succeeded by his son Rechiarius, who took the royal ensigns at Merida, in the month of August of the present year, notwithstanding the opposition he met with from some of his own nation [l]. He professed the catholic faith; but began his reign by plundering his neighbours lands [m]. The following year, he married the daughter of Theodoric, king of the Goths in Languedoc, and, immediately after his marriage, entering the territories of the Gascons, who were still in Spain, says father Labbé in his chronology, laid them waste far and near [n]. From thence he went to pay a visit to his father-in-law at Tolouse, and, on his return to Spain, surprised the city of Lerida, whence he carried with him a great number of captives. He afterwards pillaged the territory of Saragosa [o], which, according to Isidorus, in his chronology of the Sueves, belonged to the Romans [p]. The same writer adds, that in this expedition Rechiarius had with him a body of Goths; and that he likewise laid waste the province of Cartagena, which Rechila, says he, had restored to the Romans [q]. In the year 452, the twenty-seventh of the reign of Valentinian III. Mansuetus, count of Spain, and count Fronto were sent, by the emperor, to Rechiarius, with proposals for an accommodation between him and the natives of Spain, who ſtill continued ſubject to the Romans. Rechiarius not only received the Roman embaſſadors with the greateſt marks of eſteem, but concluded a peace upon the terms which the emperor had injoined them to propoſe. What theſe terms were, we are no-where told; but they are ſaid, by Idatius, to have been very advantageous to the empire [r]. The peace, thus concluded, was religiouſly obſerved by Rechiarius till the death of Valentinian in 455, when, taking advantage of the general confuſion occaſioned by the murder of that prince, and likewiſe of his ſucceſſor Maximus, he over-ran and pillaged the province of Cartagena, with a deſign, ſays Jornandes, to make himſelf maſter of all the countries that were ſtill held in Spain by the Romans [s]. Hereupon Avitus, who had ſucceeded Maximus, diſpatched count Fronto into Spain to put the king of the Sueves in mind of the treaty he had concluded with Valentinian. At the ſame time, Theodoric, king of the Viſigoths, who had eſpouſed the intereſt of Avitus, diſpatched embaſſadors to Rechiarius his ſon-in-law, earneſtly intreating him not to ſeize on the countries belonging to the empire, leſt he too ſhould be obliged to treat him as an enemy, and join the emperor, whom he was bound to ſupport againſt him [t]. What anſwer Rechiarius returned to the embaſſadors, our hiſtorian does not inform us: he only tells us, that he had no ſooner diſmiſſed them, than, breaking into the province of Tarraco, which belonged to the Romans, he laid it waſte, without the leaſt regard either to treaties or juſtice [u]. Hereupon Theodoric ſent him a ſecond embaſſy, to which he anſwered, with great haughtineſs, that if Theodoric found fault with his conduct, he was ready to give him an account of it at Toloufe. Theodoric, piqued at this anſwer, began to prepare for war; and, having firſt concluded a peace with the neighbouring nations, he ſet out, with the conſent and approbation of Avitus, for Spain, leading with him a very numerous army, conſiſting of his own people, and a body of auxiliary Burgundians, commanded by Gondiac and Hilperic, or Chilperic, the ſon, as is ſuppoſed, of Gundicarius, king of that people, who was killed about the year 436 [w]. Rechiarius was in the mean time buſied in ravaging anew the province of Tarraco, whence he carried with him into Galicia a conſiderable booty and a great number of captives [x]. But hearing that Theoderic was marching againſt him, he went to meet him at the head of a powerful army. Hereupon an engagement enſued on the banks of the Urbicus, now Orbegua, at a place about twelve miles from Astorga. Both armies engaged with great resolution and intrepidity; but in the end the Sueves were utterly defeated, and put to flight. Rechiarius, who was dangerously wounded, with much ado made his escape, and took refuge in a distant corner of Galicia. The battle was fought on a Friday, the fifth of October; and Theodoric, pursuing the enemy, entered Braga on a Sunday, the twenty-eighth of the same month, and gave it up to be plundered by his soldiers[y]. From Braga he advanced to a place called Portucal, whither the fugitive king had retired. Jornandes writes, that Rechiarius attempted to make his escape by sea, but was driven back by a storm [z]. Be that as it will, all authors agree, that he was taken and delivered up to Theodoric, by whose orders he was put to death, after he had been kept some time in prison [a]. The Sueves, disheartened by the captivity of their king, submitted to the Goths, by whom great numbers of them were put to the sword, though Theodoric had ordered their lives to be spared [b]. Theodoric appointed one of his officers, named Aquiulphus, to govern the Sueves who had submitted to him. But he, revolting from Theodoric, caused himself to be proclaimed king of the Sueves; which obliged Theodoric to send a powerful army against him, by whom he was defeated, taken prisoner, and, by Theodoric's orders, soon after beheaded [c]. Thus Jornandes; but Idatius only says, that he died the following year at Porto [d]. The Sueves, who, refusing to submit to the Goths, had retired to the most distant corner of Galicia, no sooner heard, that Rechiarius was dead, than scorning to live in subjection either to the Goths, or the treacherous Aquiulphus, they chose one Maldra, the son of Massilel, in his room [e].

Theodoric king of the Visigoths, after the above-mentioned victory over the Sueves, had marched from Galicia into Lusitania, and there, after reducing several other cities, had laid siege to Merida, the metropolis of the province, which, in the end, was obliged to surrender. The king designed at first to give up the city to be plundered by his soldiers; but St. Eulalia, a famous martyr of that place, is said to have deterred him, by some prodigies, from putting his design in execution [f]. Being soon after obliged to return to Gaul, he left behind him part of his troops, consisting of different nations, and commanded by several generals, with orders to march into Galicia, and there reduce such of the Sueves, as had not yet submitted to him.

But these troops, after having committed dreadful ravages in the countries belonging to the Romans, were recalled by Theodoric, who had occasion to employ them elsewhere, before they began to act against the Sueves. That people, having now nothing to apprehend from so formidable an enemy, began to quarrel among themselves, some of them continuing faithful to Maldra, whom they had lately chosen, and others setting up against him one named Franton. Being thus divided among themselves, they made peace with the Galicians, or the natives of that province, who still held several strong-holds, and maintained themselves a free people among the mountains, and in some of the fortified towns [g]. These are, by most authors, styled Romans, because they still acknowledged the Roman emperor, and looked upon themselves as subjects of the empire. Notwithstanding the peace concluded between them and the Sueves, the partisans of Maldra, breaking unexpectedly into Lusitania, pillaged the country, and put to the sword a great number of Romans, under pretence of making war on the Goths. Being received into Lisbon as friends, they made themselves masters of the city, and kept it [h]. Soon after, that is, in 458, Franton dying, the whole nation of the Sueves acknowledged Maldra for their king, by whose orders they laid waste that part of Galicia, which lay on the Douro, without the least regard to the treaty of peace concluded the year before [i]. About this time, Theodoric sent an army into Spain against the Sueves, under the conduct of Cyrila, who, entering Bætica, which belonged to the Romans, committed there the same disorders, as the Sueves did in Galicia, without offering to molest those against whom they were said to have been sent. At the same time, embassadors were sent to the Sueves, both by Theodoric king of the Visigoths, and by Genseric king of the Vandals in Africa, probably to conclude, not only a peace, but an alliance with them against the emperor Majorianus, whose great parts and military genius gave them no small umbrage. The peace however was not concluded; for the following year 459, Theodoric, having recalled Cyrila, and the army commanded by him, sent one Sunieric with another army in his room; which did not prevent the Sueves from pillaging Lusitania under the conduct of Maldra, and Galicia under that of his son Remismund [k], by Jornandes called Richmund. Some writers speak of a battle fought this year between the Sueves and Galicians, in which the latter lost many persons of distinction [l]. The same year, 459, Maldra killed, upon what

provocation we are not told, his brother, whoſe name has not been tranſmitted to us. Soon after this murder, he ſurpriſed the ſtrong caſtle of Portucal, which was held by the natives. But he was ſoon overtaken by the doom his treachery and barbarity well deſerved, being killed, by whom our hiſtorian does not tell us, in the end of February of the following year 460 [m]. Upon his death his ſon Remiſmund and Frumarius divided his troops between them. Frumarius was likewiſe, as we may ſuppoſe, the ſon of Maldra, and brother of Remiſmund; for he not only had part of the troops, but ſhared with Remiſmund the dominions of the deceaſed prince. In the firſt year of their reign, the Sueves of Lugo in Galicia, falling treacherouſly upon the Romans, who lived in that city, on Eaſter day, which in 460, fell on the twenty-ſeventh of March, cut great numbers of them in pieces, as they were not upon their guard, thinking themſelves ſufficiently protected by the ſolemnity of a day held by all chriſtians in the greateſt veneration [n]. Sunieric and Nepotianus, who commanded the troops of Theodoric in Spain, no ſooner heard of this outrage, than they detached part of their forces to take vengeance on the traytors. The Goths, entering Galicia, laid waſte the territory of Lugo; but a falſe report being ſpread among them by Dictines, Spinio, and Aſcanius, who were natives of the country, but held a private correſpondence with the Sueves, they returned into their own territories, without daring to advance farther into the enemy's country [o]. The ſame year, the three above-mentioned perſons led a party of Sueves through by-ways to ſurpriſe the city of Aquæ Flaviæ, where they took Idatius, biſhop of the place, priſoner, on the twenty-ſixth of July, and carried him into captivity, as he himſelf relates [p]. After this, Frumarius laid waſte the territory of Braga, and Remiſmund, at the ſame time, that of Orenſo, on the Minho in Galicia. But the two princes, growing jealous of each other's power, began to quarrel, which gave the natives ſome reſpite; for with them they concluded a peace, that they might be more at leiſure to watch each other's motions. This peace was obſerved for the ſpace of four years, that is, till the year 464, when Frumarius dying, the Sueves were again all reunited under Remiſmund, who immediately diſpatched embaſſadors to Theodoric, acquainting him with the death of Frumarius, and ſoliciting him to conclude a peace with the Sueves, which he did accordingly, ſending embaſſadors to Remiſmund with rich preſents, and likewiſe arms, in token of his ſincere friendſhip and the confidence he repoſed in him. At the ſame time he ſent him a young woman of extraordinary beauty, whom he married [q]; but who ſhe was, our hiſtorian does not inform us. Jornandes writes, that Remiſmund ſent the biſhops of Galicia to Theodoric, hoping, by their mediation, to obtain a peace; that Theodoric received them with all the reſpect that was due to their rank and dignity; that he ſoon after recalled the general and troops he had in Spain; and that Remiſmund, by a ſecond embaſſy, returned him thanks for the peace he had granted him. This peace, however, did not hinder Remiſmund from ſurpriſing, this very year, the city of Coimbra, which was held by the natives, and carrying with him from thence ſeveral captives. He did not, it ſeems, keep this city; for, three years after, that is, in 467, he ſurpriſed it anew [r]. The following year 465, Remiſmund was prevailed upon by Theodoric to ſet at liberty the priſoners he had taken at Coimbra, and make peace with the natives [s]. But this peace, ſays Idatius, was attended with a greater and far more dangerous evil than the war itſelf. Rechiarius, king of the Sueves from the year 447, to 456, renouncing paganiſm, had embraced the catholic faith, and his example had been followed by the whole nation of the Sueves; but at this time they ſuffered themſelves to be infected with the hereſy of Arius by one Ajax, a native of Galatia, who, abandoning the catholic faith, had been ordained by the Arians. Coming into Gaul, he had ſtaid ſome time at the court of Theodoric, and had been treated by that prince, who held the tenets of Arius, with great reſpect. From Gaul he paſſed into Spain, where he was well received by the Sueves, upon the recommendation of Theodoric. The kind reception he met with encouraged him to propagate his errors among the Sueves, and impugn the doctrine of the trinity [t]. Iſidore writes, that he infected the whole nation with the peſtiferous tenets of Arius, and that they continued in their errors during the reigns of ſeveral princes, till the time of king Theodomir, who, about an hundred years after, brought them back to the true faith [u].

IN the mean time, Theodoric being murdered by his brother Euric, Remiſmund, thinking himſelf no longer bound by the treaty of peace, which he had concluded by his mediation with the natives, broke into Luſitania, and, having ſurpriſed the city of Coimbra, gave it up to be plundered by his ſoldiers. He likewiſe ravaged and laid waſte the territory of Aunona belonging to the Galicians; who thereupon ſent deputies to Euric king of the

Viſigoths,

Viſigoths, begging his mediation and good offices with the king of the Sueves. Accordingly Euric prevailed upon Remiſmund to grant a peace or truce to the people of Aunona; but in the mean time, he himſelf committed dreadful ravages in Luſitania, made himſelf maſter of Pampelona and Saragoſa, and, having overcome and put to flight the nobility of the province of Tarraco, who continued faithful to the Romans, made himſelf maſter of all Upper Spain [w]. Thus were the inhabitants of Spain, who could not prevail upon themſelves to withdraw their obedience to the Romans, and ſubmit to the barbarians, in a moſt cruel manner plundered and harraſſed on one ſide by the Goths, and on the other by the Sueves, while the Romans were no-ways in a condition to relieve them. Of the calamities they ſuffered, the reader will find a full and pathetic account in Idatius, who tells us, that the Sueves, when they ſurpriſed Coimbra, plundered the houſes, laid moſt part of the city in aſhes, and carried with them into captivity ſuch of the inhabitants as had not the good luck to make their eſcape [x]. The following year 688, they made themſelves maſters of Liſbon, which was betrayed to them by one Luſides, who was a native of the place, and commanded in the town. As Liſbon was at that time held by the Goths, the troops of that nation, entering Luſitania, committed dreadful ravages on the territories belonging to the Sueves, as did the Sueves on thoſe of the Goths. However, Euric, being wholly bent upon driving the Romans quite out of Spain, with a deſign to fall afterwards upon the Sueves, concluded, for the preſent, a peace with Remiſmund, and then, turning his arms againſt the Romans, made himſelf maſter of all the places, that had been hitherto held by them, as we have related above, in the hiſtory of the Viſigoths; but he died before he could put in execution the deſign he had formed againſt the Sueves. Remiſmund, finding he could no longer cope with the Viſigoths, who were now maſters of almoſt all Spain, retired into Galicia, and there, giving over all thoughts of new conqueſts, ended his days. His ſucceſſors followed his example, contenting themſelves with the kingdom of Galicia, and obſerving a ſtrict neutrality in the diſputes, that aroſe between the Viſigoths and the Romans. By this means they maintained themſelves in the quiet poſſeſſion of Galicia till the year 585, when they were ſubdued by Leunigild or Leovigild king of the Viſigoths, and their kingdom reduced to a province of the Gothic monarchy, after it had laſted an hundred and ſeventy-four, or, as ſome will have it, an hundred and

AS the antients, by whom mention is first made of the Franks, have given us no account of their origin, and Valesius, a most diligent and curious inquirer into the antiquities of his nation, has prudently waved this subject, it cannot be expected we should say any thing relating thereto, that may be depended upon. Of the various opinions, or rather conjectures, that have been offered on this head by the modern writers, and which it would be too tedious to relate, that of Bucherius seems to us the most probable, viz. that the Franks were originally a motly multitude of several antient nations dwelling beyond the Rhine, who, uniting against the Romans in defence of their common liberty, styled themselves Franks, that word signifying, in their language, as it still does in ours, free [y]. It is certain, that under the name of Franks are comprised in history several nations, whose names were known long before theirs, viz. the Attuarii, Chamavi, Bructeri, Salii, Frisii, Chauci, Ansivarii, and Catti. The Franks are sometimes called Sicambrians, because they inhabited the country formerly possessed by that nation, of which the far greater part was cut off by Augustus, and the rest transplanted into Gaul, as we have related above. As for the opinion of those writers, who derive the name and origin of the Franks from one Francio, the son of Hector, it is too fabulous to be seriously confuted. No less ridiculous, if we may be allowed to use that term, is the opinion of the abbot Urspurgensis and several others, who suppose the name of Franks to have been first given them by the emperor Valentinian. The original of the Franks, says Urspurgensis, is to be fetched from the antient stock of the Trojans; for at the time that Æneas, after the destruction of Troy, came into Italy, other Trojan exiles arrived in the neighbourhood of the Palus Mæotis, and, settling there, inlarged their bounds as far as Pannonia, and built the city of Sicambria, from which they took the name of Sicambrians. This account, of all others the moſt akin to the idle romances of our Geoffrey of Monmouth, is ſo far from being vouched by any antient hiſtorian, that, on the contrary, it evidently contradicts all antient hiſtory, in ſuppoſing the Franks to have been ſo called from Valentinian; whereas it is certain, that their name occurs in hiſtory at leaſt an hundred years before that emperor's time. Goropius Becanus explodes the opinion of thoſe, who derive the origin of the Franks from the Trojans; but at the ſame time ſuppoſes them to have come from the Palus Mæotis into Germany, without being able to alledge any thing to ſupport his opinion, but a few groundleſs, not to ſay childiſh, conjectures. Bodin will have the Franks to have been deſcended from the Gauls, who, being increaſed to ſuch a degree, that the country was too narrow for them, ſent colonies beyond the Rhine into Germany. Upon the whole, we think the opinion of Buchanan, which we have mentioned above, to be by far the moſt probable; for, as we have hinted before, we find ſeveral German nations, whoſe names occur in hiſtory many ages before that of the Franks was known, compriſed under the general name of Franks; a ſtrong proof, that the Franks were not a new nation come from the Palus Mæotis, or any other country, to ſettle in Germany, but conſiſted of ſeveral German nations united, as Bucherius conjectures, againſt the Romans, in defence of their common liberty.

Their ſeats As for the ſeats of the Franks, it appears from their conſtant incurſions into Gaul, that they dwelt on the banks of the Rhine, in the neighbourhood of Mentz. All hiſtorians ſpeak of them as placed there, till their ſettling in Gaul [z]. The orator Eumenes, who flouriſhed at Autun, in the end of the third century, diſtinguiſhes the country, which the Franks held originally, and he places on the coaſt of the ocean, from the country which was conquered by the Romans beyond the Rhine, and afterwards ſeized by the Franks [a]. Their country, according to the beſt modern geographers and hiſtorians, was bounded on the north by the ocean; on the weſt by the ocean and the Rhine; on the ſouth by the Rhone or the Mein; and on the eaſt by the Weſer [b]: according to which deſcription, they poſſeſſed the preſent countries of Weſtphalia, Heſſe, and ſome adjacent ſtates. St. Jerom calls them a nation not ſo great as powerful, and places them between the Saxons and Alemanns [c], viz. the Saxons to the eaſt, and the Alemanns to the ſouth; for thoſe were properly called Alemanns, who dwelt between the Rhine, the Mein, and the Danube. The ſame writer tells us, that the Saxons received a great overthrow at Deuſon, in the country of the Franks [d]; which place Pontanus, and moſt other writers, ſuppoſe to be the ſame, that, by later hiſtorians, is called Duitſium, and now Dutys, over-againſt Cologne. Pontanus adds, that, in his time, a ſtone was diſcovered in a monaſtery there, with an inſcription, importing that fortreſs to have been placed there in the country of the Franks by the emperor Conſtantine. Beatus Rhenanus aſſures us, that he ſaw at Augſburg, in the cuſtody of Peutinger, a map drawn in the time of the later emperors, wherein the country, from the mouth of the Rhine to Cologne, is marked in capital letters with the word Francia. Aimoinius likewiſe writes, that Clodio, who ſucceeded Pharamond, reſided at Dyſpargum, now Duiſburg, at a ſmall diſtance from the Rhine. Upon the whole, we may conclude, that the Franks poſſeſſed the countries we have mentioned above, and that, in proceſs of time, they extended their borders along the Rhine, as far as the mouths of that river and the ocean. The Franks were antiently divided into ſeveral tribes, whereof the Anſuarii and Salii, mentioned by Ammianus, were by far the moſt conſiderable. Pontanus ſuppoſes the Anſuarii to be the ſame people with the Anſinarii, of whom mention is made by Tacitus. Theſe, being driven out of their own habitations by the Chauci, ſeized on the country from which the Friſians had been driven by the command of Nero. Tacitus calls them a more powerful nation than that of the Friſians. Pontanus is of opinion, that they were a nation that wandered from place to place, without any fixed habitation, ready to join any other, as they found their advantage therein; that, agreeable to this principle, they joined the German nations lying towards the ocean, when, uniting againſt the Romans, in defence of their common liberty, they took the name of Franks; that they too were blended under the common appellation, but at the ſame time retained their antient name, being called Anſuarii, or Anſinarii Franci. This name ſome derive from the Teutonic word Hance, ſignifying excellent, free; whence the free towns of Germany are ſtill called the hance towns. Others, and among the reſt Goropius Becanus, will have them called Anſuari or Anſinarii, from the German word Anſiæ, ſignifying ſociety, becauſe they were ready to join any other nation in league and ſociety; and hence, according to theſe writers, the free towns of Germany are ſtyled hance towns, they being united in one ſociety, though far ſeparated from one another. As for the Salian Franks, who broke into Taxandria, now Brabant, but were driven out by Julian, as we read in Ammianus [c], Beatus Rhenanus derives their name from the Sala, which falls into the Mein; Paulus Æmilius from another river of the ſame name, that empties itſelf into the Elbe; Sidonius Apollinaris from the Latin word Salic, as if they had been ſo called from their leaping and dancing; and laſtly, Pontanus from the river Sala, now the Iſſel, on the banks of which they dwelt. The latter opinion ſeems to us by far the moſt probable, ſince the other two rivers, bearing the ſame name, flowed at ſome diſtance from the territories of the Franks. As for the derivation of Sidonius, it appears to us quite childiſh, though perhaps not ill adapted to the preſent Franks, a leaping and dancing people. As for their manners, Vopiſcus paints them as a moſt treacherous and faithleſs nation, accuſtomed to ſport with the moſt ſolemn oaths and ties, and not deeming it at all diſhonourable to break their word [f]. Sal- vianus, mixing together their good and bad qualities, says, that they were greatly addicted to lying, but civil and kind to strangers [g]. Procopius describes them as of all nations the most faithless, and regarding the least their word and oaths [h]. But Agathias, who flourished soon after Procopius, extols them on account of the fidelity, justice, and concord, with which they lived among themselves [i]; and St. Bernard, in one of his epistles, tells us, that they observed their oaths with the greatest strictness and religion; insomuch that they thought themselves bound by a public oath, even when it was sinful to take it [k]. This change the French writers ascribe to the christian religion; but whether they may not still be taxed with their original want of faith in the observance of the most solemn oaths and treaties, let the world judge. They seem to have been always troublesome neighbours; whence Egenhardus, chancellor to Charles the Great, used to say, I should chuse a Frank for a friend, but not for a neighbour: and truly, from the earliest accounts we have of that restless and ambitious nation, it appears, that they have ever incroached upon their neighbours, till they attained the power they now enjoy, which, however great, is not capable of satisfying their boundless ambition, and preventing their aspiring at a far greater power, and grasping at universal monarchy.

As to their form of government, it was, without all doubt, monarchical, though authors have given us no account of their first kings. The Franks are first mentioned in history about the year 241, and yet Tyro Prosper tells us, that the most antient king of that nation, whose name occurred to him in searching the records of time, was Priam, who reigned about the year 382 [l]. After him reigned his two sons Marcomir and Sunno, and at the same time Genobald. Next to them came Theodomir or Theudemir, the son of Ricimer, who was consul in 384. Theodomir was succeeded by Pharamond the son of Marcomir, and grandson of Priam. It is however to be observed here, that as Fredigarius supposes Theodomir to have been the son and immediate successor of Clodio, and ascribes to the former whatever else is by other writers ascribed to the latter, the learned Usher concludes from thence, that Theodomir and Pharamond were one and the same person, and accordingly places the defeat and death of Pharamond in the year 428, when Clodio began his reign, and the Franks were by Aetius driven out of that part of Gaul, that bordered on the Rhine, as we read in Prosper. In the reign of Pharamond, or not long before, the Franks, passing the Rhine, which had been the boundary between them and the Romans for the space of near two hundred years, settled in Thongria, that is, in the territory of Tongres, where they were governed by as many kings as they had cities or cantons. These kings were chosen out of the most illustrious families among them, and distinguished from their subjects by the length of their hair [m]. But whether Pharamond had any authority over the other princes, or was only a prince more powerful than the rest, is what we cannot gather from history. Bucherius is of opinion, that, in Pharamond's time, Honorius concluded a treaty with them, in virtue of which they were allowed to settle in the country bordering on the Rhine on the side of Cologne [n]. But what he writes is not vouched by any of the antients. Aetius obliged them, as we have hinted above, to repass the Rhine, having overcome them in battle, and slain their king Theodomir or Pharamond. However Clodio, the successor of Pharamond, settled anew in Gaul; for we are told by Gregory of Tours, that he resided in the castle of Disparg, supposed by Bucherius, and most geographers, to have stood in Brabant, on the borders of Thongria [o]. Clodio was succeeded by Merovæus, Merovæus by Childeric, and he by Clodavæus or Clovis, the first christian king of the Franks, who drove the Goths out of Gaul, and fixed the royal seat at Paris, where it has continued ever since his time.

Tyro Prosper tells us, as we have observed above, that Priam, the father of Marcomir and Sunno, is the first king of the Franks, whose name he found recorded in history; but it is certain, that, by the antients, other kings are mentioned long before his time, that is, before the year 382, when Tyro Prosper supposes him to have reigned. These are Atec, Genobald, Ascaric, Gaisus or Regaisus, Malloric, Mallobaudus or Mellobaudus. Atec and Genobald seem to have reigned at the same time, but over different nations or tribes of the Franks; for they are both named by Mamertin, in his panegyric on Diocletian, pronounced about the year 288, as reigning at that time. Atec, with his Franks, had plundered the coasts of Gaul; but was obliged by Diocletian to sue for peace, and make great submissions to that prince, in order to appease him, and be confirmed by him in his kingdom. Genobald likewise was forced to submit, says our panegyrist, which was the only means of his being restored to the quiet possession of his dominions [p]. In the same panegyric Mamertin speaks of a great victory gained by the generals of Diocleſian over a fickle and deceitful nation of barbarians; which deſcription ſuits no nation ſo well as that of the Franks. It was perhaps upon this victory that the two above-mentioned kings were obliged to ſubmit to the emperor, who, in all likelihood, took, on that occaſion, the ſurname of Francicus, which, in antient inſcriptions, is given both to him and his collegue Maximian [q]. Aſcaric and Gaiſus or Regaiſus reigned over the Franks in the time of Conſtantius the ſon of Conſtantine the Great, and were, by the latter, in the firſt year of his reign, that is, in 306, taken priſoners, and expoſed to the wild beaſts in the public ſports [r]. Malaric, who lived in the reigns of Conſtantius the ſon of Conſtantine, of Julian and Jovian, is called, by Marcellinus, only the governor, or chief of his countrymen, in the emperor's palace [s]; but is, by Procopius, reckoned among their kings. Jovian, in the year 364, the firſt of his reign, appointed him general of the Roman troops in Gaul [t]; but he declined that employment [u]. Mallobaudus, or Mellobaudus, ſtyled by Marcellinus king of the Franks [w], commanded under Gratian in 377, and the following year 378, gained a ſignal victory over the Alemanns, of whom thirty thouſand were killed upon the ſpot, and, among the reſt, Triarius their king [x]. Mallobaudus, though king of the Franks, ſerved in the Roman army, and thought himſelf honoured with the employment of comes domeſticorum to the emperor Gratian. Ricomer, Ricimer, or Richimer, who was comes domeſticorum to the ſame emperor, general of the Roman horſe, and conſul in 384, is, by ſome reckoned among the kings of the Franks. His ſon Theodomir reigned over the Franks in the time of Honorius, and was killed by the Romans, with his mother Aſcila, according to an antient chronicle quoted by Gregory of Tours [y]. Fredigarius ſuppoſes him to have been killed by count Caſtinus, who was ſent againſt the Franks, by the emperor Honorius, about the year 421 [z], at which time all other writers ſuppoſe Pharamond to have reigned. Uſher, as we have hinted above, will have Theodomir and Pharamond to have been one and the ſame perſon. But why might not Theodomir and Pharamond, have reigned at the ſame time? it being certain, that the Franks, in the time of Pharamond, had ſeveral other kings, nay, as many kings as they had cities or cantons, as we have obſerved above. 'Tis true, that Fredegarius makes Theodomir the father and immediate predeceſſor of Clodio, and ſays of him what is ſaid by other writers of Pharamond. But Fredegarius, whom Valeſius ſtyles an impertinent writer [a], might have been, and probably was, therein miſtaken; ſeeing all other writers ſuppoſe Pharamond the ſon of Marcomir, or of Sunno, as we read in Vitalis [b], to have ſucceeded Theodomir. Tyro Proſper is the only author that mentions Priam, according to him, the father of Marcomir and Sunno. His name perhaps gave riſe to the romances of thoſe writers, who derive the origin of the Franks from the Trojans, whoſe laſt king bore that name. Such romances were, in ſome degree, countenanced, not only by the name of Priam, but by an opinion, which obtained among moſt writers, as Gregory of Tours informs us [c], viz. that the Franks had dwelt in Pannonia before they ſettled on the banks of the Rhine. Having thus given the reader the beſt account we have been able to gather from the moſt authentic writers of the firſt kings of the Franks, without taking upon us to aſcertain the order of their ſucceſſion, or their deſcents, we ſhall now paſs to their wars and exploits, from the time they are firſt mentioned in hiſtory to their ſettling in Gaul.

The break into Gaul, but are repreſſed by Aurelian.

THE firſt hiſtorian, by whom mention is made of the Franks, is Vopiſcus, in the life of the emperor Aurelian; where that writer tells us, that the Franks made an irruption into Gaul, and, though few in number, committed there dreadful ravages. But Aurelian, then only tribune of the ſixth legion, quartered at that time in Mentz, marching againſt them, killed ſeven hundred of them, took three hundred priſoners, whom he ſold for ſlaves, and obliged the reſt to quit their booty and retire [d]. This event is placed, by Valeſius, in the year 254, the ſecond of the emperor Valerian's reign [e]; by Bucherius and Cointius [f], in 234, in which year it is certain the Germans made an irruption into Gaul; and Aurelian, ſay they, born in 200, and then only thirty-four years old, might have attained to no higher poſt in the army than that of tribune. But as it appears from Vopiſcus, that at the time Aurelian overcame the Franks, the emperor was preparing to march againſt the Perſians, and Gordian marched againſt them in 242. Forburgus concludes from thence, that the Franks were defeated by Aurelian relian the preceding year 241 [g]. But at what time ſoever this happened, it is agreed on all hands, that the Franks, who afterwards proved ſo troubleſome neighbours to the Romans, and greatly contributed to the downfal of the weſtern empire, are firſt mentioned in hiſtory on this occaſion. In the year 256, the fourth of Valerian's reign, they broke anew into Gaul, with ſeveral other German nations, but were intirely defeated by Gallienus, whom Valerian had taken for his partner in the empire [h]. For this victory Gallienus took the ſurname of Germanicus, as appears from a medal ſtruck in the latter end of the preſent year [i]. However, the Franks and other German nations returning ſoon after in far greater numbers, Gallienus, no longer able to repreſs them by force, offered advantageous terms to one of their chiefs, who, readily accepting them, took upon him to guard the frontiers of the empire, which he did accordingly, often engaging the Franks, and other barbarians, attempting to break into the empire. Thus Zoſimus [k]; but who this prince was, he has not thought fit to tell us: Victoriſcus indeed informs us, that Gallienus lived in friendſhip with Attalus king of the Marcomanns, to whom he yielded part of Upper Pannonia, taking his daughter, by name Pipa, or Pipara, as he pretended, for his wife; but by hiſtorians ſhe is looked upon only as his concubine, he being already married to Soloninа [l], ſtyled in the antient inſcriptions, Cornelia Solonina Auguſta [m]. The following year 257, ſome Franks ſeem to have ſerved in the Roman army againſt the Goths; for among the auxiliaries that marched with Aurelian into Thrace, which province the Goths were then pillaging, mention is made of Hartoman, Haldegaſtus, Hildemon, and Carioviſcus [n], which names bear a great reſemblance to others that frequently occur in hiſtory among the Franks; whence Vorburgus concludes them to be the names of ſome chief men of that nation, who came with a body of their countrymen to aſſiſt the Romans in this expedition [o]. Three years after, that is, in 260, the Franks, and other German nations, taking advantage of the confuſion which the captivity of Valerian, taken priſoner by the Perſians, had cauſed throughout the empire, broke into Gaul, and, having ravaged the moſt wealthy provinces there, made an irruption into Italy [p]. St. Jerom [q] and Oroſius [r] add, that the Franks, croſſing the

Alps, and passing through Rhætia and Lombardy, advanced to the neighbourhood of Ravenna, laying waste the country, and committing every-where dreadful ravages. Zosimus writes, that this sudden irruption obliged Gallienus to take the field, in order to drive back the barbarians; but whether they were forced by him to retire, or withdrew of their own accord, he does not tell us. Five years after, they committed unheard-of ravages in Spain. Victor writes, that, after they had ravaged Gaul, they passed from thence into Spain [s]; but Valesius endeavours to prove, from the panegyric of Nazarius on Constantine, that they conveyed themselves thither by sea [t]; for that author writes, that they suffered themselves to be transported, by their warlike ardour, beyond the bounds of the ocean, and struck terror into the coasts of Spain itself [u]. They passed the bounds of the ocean, according to Valesius, by entering the Mediterranean, and landing in one of the Spanish provinces bordering on that sea. Be that as it will, they penetrated into a country, to use the expression of Eutropius, so far distant from their own, and made themselves masters of it, as we are told by St. Jerom [w]. Orosius writes, that they held, or rather pillaged, Spain for the space of twelve years [x]; and that they took by storm, plundered, and almost utterly destroyed, the city of Tarraco, which was then one of the chief cities of Spain, and the metropolis of several provinces; but for the space of an hundred and fifty years it bore the marks, adds the same author, of what it suffered on that occasion [y]. Some of the Franks, having provided themselves with vessels, crossed over into Africa, with a design to enrich themselves with the spoils of that wealthy nation [z]; but what was the issue of that undertaking, we are not told. The same year 265, Posthumius, who had revolted in Gaul, and taken upon him the title of emperor, gained great advantages over the Franks, attempting to break into those provinces, drove them all beyond the Rhine, and even built some forts in their country; whence, on his medals he is styled the restorer of Gaul, the defender of the empire [a]. On the same medals frequent mention is made of his victories over the Franks, chiefly in the fifth year of his reign, that is, in 265; and on some he is styled Germanicus Maximus, the Franks being distinguished in those times, as Valesius well observes, by the name of Germans, from the Alemanns, and other nations inhabiting Germany. That writer is of opinion, that the medals of Posthumius, on which Deuso, now Duitz, over-against Cologne, and Macusa, now Inchuse, in north Holland, are mentioned, allude to the victories he gained over the Franks [b]. However, they afterwards served under him against Gallienus, and supported him, to the utmost of their power, in the authority he had usurped [c]. In the year 273, the fourth of the emperor Aurelian's reign, they made an irruption into Gaul; but were driven back with great slaughter by that prince, who, having taken several of them prisoners, led them, with the captives of several other nations, in triumph, when he made his public entry into Rome, which we have described at length in our Roman history [d]. Aurelian dying two years after, the Franks, together with the Lyges, the Burgundians, and the Vandals, crossing the Rhine, entered Gaul, and, having reduced above seventy of the chief cities of that country in the space of two years, looked upon themselves as masters of all Gaul. But in the mean time Tacitus, who had succeeded Aurelian, dying, Probus, who was chosen in his room, marching in person against the Burgundians and Vandals, dispatched some of his best generals against the Franks, who gave them a total overthrow, and obliged them to abandon their booty, and return home [e]. Probus himself was attended with the like success against the Burgundians and Vandals; so that all Gaul was, by his valour, delivered, to use the expression of St. Jerom, from the yoke of the barbarians. The emperor, not satisfied with driving them out of Gaul, pursued them cross the Rhine, laid waste their territories far and near, and even built some forts in their country; which struck the barbarians with such terror, that nine of their kings came in person to sue for peace, which Probus granted them, upon their promising to supply the Romans yearly with a certain quantity of corn, and other provisions, and to send sixteen thousand men to serve in the Roman armies [f]. These Probus divided into several companies of fifty or sixty men, distributing them among the Roman troops in different places [g]. Some of the Franks, who had either submitted to Probus, or had been taken prisoners in this war, were sent by the emperor to the coast of the Euxine sea, where lands were allotted them to cultivate. There they continued for some time; but growing weary in the end of living after the Roman manner in a country so far distant from their own, having seized on some ships, they put to sea, and, roaming about, pillaged first the coasts of Asia and Greece, and then, passing over into Africa, landed in several places there; but, being constantly repulsed by the Roman troops quartered in that province, they quitted Africa, and, steering their course to Sicily, landed in that island, took and plundered the city of Syracuse, and, having put most of the inhabitants to the sword, reimbarqued with an immense booty. From Sicily they sailed for the straights of Gibraltar, and, entering the ocean, plundered the coasts of Gaul and Spain, and returned, in the end, loaded with booty, to their native country, at the mouth of the Rhine [h]. This happened while Probus was making war on several tyrants [i], that is, about the year 280. The same year, Proculus having revolted, and assumed the title of emperor at Cologne, the Franks at first espoused his cause, and promised to assist him to the utmost of their power; but as they scrupled no more, in those days, than they have done in later times, to break their word, they not only abandoned, but betrayed the usurper into the emperor's hands [k]. From this time they continued quiet till the year 287, the fourth of Diocletian's reign, when, in conjunction with the Saxon pirates, they plundered the coasts of Gaul, carrying off an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives. But Carausius having, by the emperor's order, fitted out a fleet at Boulogne, and gained some advantages over them, they retired for a while to their respective countries [l]. It was, no doubt, on account of these advantages, that Mamertinus, in his panegyric on Maximian, by whom Carausius had been sent against these pirates, calls him the conqueror of the Franks; and adds, that he put an end to the piratic war [p]. But as Carausius kept, and applied to his own use, the booty he had taken from the barbarians, instead of returning it to the proprietors, Maximian, suspecting that with this view he connived at their piracies, resolved to put him to death; but he, having timely notice of his design, passed over into Britain, with the fleet under his command, and there caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, as we have related elsewhere [q]. The following year, Maximian, crossing the Rhine, entered Germany, and, having laid waste the enemy's country far and near, returned to Gaul with an immense booty and a great number of captives. The fame of his name struck such terror into the Franks, that two of their kings, Ate and Genobald, the first we find named in history, submitted to him, desiring him to confirm them in their respective kingdoms [r].

Ate and Genobald, two kings of the Franks, submit to Maximian.

From an antient inſcription it appears, that Dioclesian, as well as his collegue Maximian, took, probably on this occaſion, the ſurnames of Francicus, Alemannicus, and Germanicus [s].

THE following year, Maximian allowed lands, in the neighbourhood of Treves and Cambray, to great numbers of Franks and Letes, who had ſubmitted to him, thoſe territories being almoſt quite deſtitute of inhabitants [t]. The Letes were originally a Gauliſh nation; but having afterwards left Gaul, and ſettled in Germany, they were reckoned among the German nations [u]. Their name often occurs in hiſtory, as appears from Valeſius, who is of opinion, that the names of the river Lis in Flanders, and of the Abbey of Leiſſis in Hainault, owe their origin to them [w]. Ammianus ſpeaks of this nation as dwelling in Germany, on the banks of the Rhine, about the year 356 [x].

Several Franks tranſplanted into Gaul by Conſtantius Chlorus Year after Chriſt 293.

A few years after, the Franks made themſelves maſters of Batavia, and that part of Flanders which is watered by the river Eſcaut; but Conſtantius, the father of Conſtantine the Great, marching againſt them ſoon after he was raiſed to the dignity of Cæſar, overcame them in battle, and, having obliged them to ſurrender at diſcretion, tranſplanted them, with their wives and children, into Gaul, where they were forced to cultivate the lands, which they themſelves had waſted, to pay the uſual tributes and taxes, as ſubjects of the empire, and to ſerve, when wanted, in the Roman armies. Upon their ſubmitting, their arms were taken from them, nor were they allowed any in their new ſettlements, that they might, by degrees, forget their native fierceneſs and barbarity, and accuſtom themſelves to live after the Roman manner [y]. The emperor Julian, ſpeaking of Maximian and Conſtantius, tells us, that they not only drove the barbarians out of the Roman territories, which they had long held, and cultivated as their own, but built ſeveral caſtles on the frontiers; by which means the country, no longer infeſted by the barbarians, enjoyed a profound tranquillity [z]. It was perhaps on account of the victory, which Conſtantius gained over the Franks, that the ſurname of Germanicus was given him on a monument erected to him by the city of Nicomedia, while he was conſul, that is, in 294 [a]. From this time they continued quiet till the year 306, the firſt of Conſtantine's reign, when, that prince being employed in Britain, they laid hold of the opportunity to break into Gaul. But the emperor, returning ſoon after, fell upon them unexpectedly, while they were buſied in plundering the country, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and, having taken two of their kings priſoners, Aſcaric and Gaiſus, he expoſed them to be devoured by the wild beaſts, in the magnificent ſhows which he afterwards exhibited [b]. He thought himſelf obliged, ſays the panegyriſt, to renew the rigor of the antient Romans towards their captive kings, in order to reſtrain, by the fear of puniſhment, a perfidious nation, that made no account of the moſt ſacred ties [c]. After this victory he croſſed the Rhine, and, entering the country of the Bructerians, who were one of the ſeveral nations then known by the name of Franks, he made a dreadful havock of that people, and took a great many priſoners, whom he likewiſe expoſed to the wild beaſts [d]. He repaired all the forts on the Rhine, placed numerous gariſons in them, kept on that river a great number of veſſels well armed and manned, and by that means put a ſtop, for ſome time, to the incurſions of the Franks. In memory of the advantages he had gained over them, he inſtituted ſolemn ſports, called, from them, ludi Francici, which were annually celebrated from the fourteenth of July to the twentieth [e]. However, two years after, that is, in 308, they began anew to aſſemble in conſiderable bodies, with a deſign, as was ſuppoſed, to make an irruption into Gaul; but Conſtantine marching againſt them upon the firſt news of their motions, they diſperſed [f]. In 310, all the nations known by the name of Franks, taking arms, approached the banks of the Rhine, and there dividing their army, which was very numerous, into ſeveral bodies, attempted to break into Gaul at different places. Conſtantine marched in perſon againſt them, and, not depending upon the relations of others, ventured, in diſguiſe, into the midſt of their army, pretending to be a deputy ſent to them from the emperor. As he found that, not caring to put the whole to the iſſue of a general engagement, they deſigned to carry on the war in ſeparate bodies, which would have rendered it more tedious, he aſſured them, that the emperor was not then with the army; which they no ſooner underſtood, than they diſmiſſed the pretended deputy, and, uniting all their forces, marched againſt the enemy. Conſtantine received them at the head of his army, put them to flight at the firſt onſet, and made a dreadful havock of them in the purſuit [g]. Euſebius writes, that he not only drove the barbarians out of Gaul, but utterly ſubdued thoſe, who dwelt on the banks of the Rhine, and near the ocean [h], that is, the Franks. However, three years after, taking advantage of the emperor's abſence, who was gone to Rome, they began to aſſemble anew on the banks of the Rhine; which Conſtantine no ſooner underſtood, than leaving Italy, he haſtened into Gaul. The Franks, who had not yet paſſed the Rhine, withdrew at his approach; but Conſtantine, giving out, that the Alemanns too were ready to break into Gaul, left ſome troops concealed among the woods at a ſmall diſtance from the river, and retired with the reſt. The Franks no ſooner heard of his departure, than they paſſed the Rhine; but the Romans, riſing unexpectedly out of their ambuſcade, fell upon them before they could draw up their forces, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to repaſs that river in the utmoſt confuſion. Conſtantine followed them in perſon with his whole army, and, entering their country, laid waſte their lands, and burnt their habitations, and, having taken a great number of priſoners, expoſed them all to be devoured by the wild beaſts. This ſeverity towards a perfidious and faithleſs enemy is commended by his panegyriſt; but it does not anſwer the character of a mild, generous, and good-natured prince, which is given to Conſtantine by moſt writers of thoſe times. For this victory over the Franks, he took the title of Francicus [i]. Notwithſtanding his ſeverity, the Franks were no ſooner informed, that Conſtantine had left Gaul, with a deſign to viſit Italy and Illyricum, than they croſſed the Rhine in great numbers, and, entering Gaul, laid waſte ſeveral provinces. But Criſpus, the ſon of Conſtantine, marching againſt them, obliged them to quit their booty, and retire. Optatianus ſeems to inſinuate, that he gained a great victory over them [k]; but Nazarius only ſays, that he drove them out of Gaul, and obliged them to ſue for peace; which he readily granted them [l]. From ſome medals it appears, that the young prince gained a victory over the Alemanns, who, in all likelihood, had invaded Gaul at the ſame time [m]; but the Franks, it ſeems, quitting their booty, retired at his approach [n]. This happened in 320, and no farther mention of the Franks is made in hiſtory till the year 341, the fourth of Conſtantius's reign, when they made an irruption into Gaul, committing every-where great ravages. Conſtans marched againſt them, and gave them battle; but as the loſs was equal on both ſides, the war was not ended till the enſuing year [o], when Conſtans either conquered or appeased them, as Idatius expresses it, that is, prevailed upon them, with presents and money, to retire, as, may be gathered from Libanius, who tells us, though speaking as a panegyrist, that the Franks were not conquered by dint of arms [p]. Be that as it will, it is certain they concluded a peace with Constans, and submitted to the princes he was pleased to appoint over them [q]. As they were the most powerful nation in those parts, the peace, they concluded with the emperor, prevented the others from attempting any thing against the empire; so that Constans, having nothing to fear on that side, passed over into Britain, to oppose the Scots, who made frequent inroads into the Roman dominions [r]. Some years after, that is, in 355, the eighteenth of the reign of Constantius, Malaric, king of the Franks, held a chief employment in the emperor's court [s]. But the following year, those of his nation, no longer able to live in peace, entering into an alliance with the Alemanns and Saxons, crossed the Rhine, took and pillaged above forty cities on the banks of that river, laid waste the neighbouring provinces, and carried off an incredible number of captives. The city of Cologne was on this occasion taken by them, and almost intirely ruined [t]. From thence they advanced as far as Autun, which city they besieged; but being vigorously repulsed by the veterans, who were quartered there, they abandoned the enterprise, and contented themselves with plundering the open places, roaming about without controul, and destroying with fire and sword what they could not carry off. Constantius, who was then in Italy, not thinking it adviseable to quit that country, raised his cousin Julian to the dignity of Cæsar, and at the same time appointed him governor of Gaul. Julian, without loss of time, set out for his government, and, arriving at Vienne, was received there with extraordinary marks of joy. As he arrived in that city in the depth of winter, he continued there the remaining part of that season, deliberating about the operations of the ensuing campaign; and, taking the field early in the spring, he marched, at the head of a small body, from Vienne to Autun, and from thence to Auxerre. On his march, he found himself surrounded on all sides by the enemy, who moved about in great bodies; but he put them to flight with a handful of men, and opened himself a way through the midst of the barbarians to Troies, and from thence to Rheims, where the main body of the army waited his arrival. Being joined there by all the Roman troops quartered in Gaul, he haſtened from thence to Decempagi, now Dieuze on the Seille in Lorain, with a deſign to fall upon the Franks, who were buſied in ravaging the country. But the enemy, receiving timely notice of his approach, took advantage of a dark and wet night to attack his rear unexpectedly, and would have cut off two legions, had not the reſt of the army, alarmed at the ſudden noiſe, turned back to their aſſiſtance. The Franks, encouraged with this ſucceſs, attacked him anew a few days after; but were put to flight, though not with great loſs. However, this ſmall victory opened him a way to Cologne, which the enemy abandoned at his approach, after it had been ten months in their hands. During his ſtay at Cologne, one of the kings of the Franks, dreading his arms, ſent deputies to him to ſue for a peace; but Julian only granted him a ſhort truce [u]. The following year, Julian gained a complete victory over the Franks, and other German nations, that had invaded Gaul, as we have related at length elſewhere [w], and took by ſtorm two caſtles on the Meuſe, in which ſome Franks had ſhut themſelves up, after having ravaged the country about Rheims. They defended themſelves with great bravery for the ſpace of fifty-four days; but being in the end obliged to ſurrender, they were all ſent to the emperor, who incorporated them among his troops [x]. After this, Julian put his troops into winter-quarters, and took up his own in Paris. But, in the mean time the Salii, a nation of the Franks, breaking unexpectedly into Taxandria, now Brabant, ſettled there; but Julian, marching againſt them early in the ſpring, obliged them to abandon the country they had ſeized, though they offered themſelves ready to guard the frontiers of the empire on that ſide, to ſupply the Romans with troops when required, and to pay the uſual taxes and tributes. Zoſimus tells us, that they had been driven out of their own country by the Saxons and Quadians, who were by Julian forced to reſtore it to the antient proprietors; which ſo gained the Salian Franks, that, ſubmitting to Julian, great numbers of them ſerved in his army [y].

The Franks continued quiet the whole time Julian reigned; but they no ſooner heard of his death, than, entering into an alliance with their neighbours the Saxons, they began to infeſt Gaul both by ſea and land. But count Theodoſius, father to the emperor of that name, being ſent againſt them by Valentinian, obliged them to retire with great loſs [z]. That commander is said to have overcome the Saxons, to have gained a victory over them off the Orcades, and to have defeated the enemies of the empire in Batavia, near the Rhine and the Vahal; which country was then held by the Franks [a]. From an inscription of 369, or 370, it appears, that Valentinian styled himself the conquerer of the Franks [b], no doubt on account of the advantages gained over that nation by count Theodosius. As it appears from a law dated the thirtieth of September [c] 368, that Valentinian was then at Cologne, some writers conclude from thence, that he marched in person against the Franks; but of this expedition no mention is made by any of the antients. At this time Mallobaudes was king of the Franks, and engaged in a war with the Alemanns, who, having concluded a peace with the Romans, had entered, upon what provocation we know not, the territories of the Franks, destroying all with fire and sword. Mallobaudes met them at the head of a considerable army, and, pretending to avoid an engagement, drew them into an ambuscade, by which means he cut great numbers of them in pieces, and among the rest their king Macrianus, a warlike prince, who had long infested, with continual inroads, the Roman dominions [d]. Three years after, that is, in 377, Mallobaudes was raised by the emperor Gratian to the consulate, having the emperor himself for his collegue in that dignity [e]. The following year he was honoured by the same emperor with the post of comes domesticorum, and distinguished himself in a most eminent manner in the battle of Argentaria, in which above thirty thousand of the Lentinenses, who had broken into the empire, were cut in pieces, with their king Triarius. This victory was chiefly owing to Mallobaudes, who, on this occasion, commanded the Roman troops, in conjunction with count Nennianus, as we have related in our Roman history [f]. He was consul the second time in 383, the eighth and last of Gratian's reign, and commanded the army, under that prince, against the usurper Maximus; but was not attended on that occasion with his usual success, for Gratian was put to flight, soon after taken prisoner, and put to death at Lyons. All authors agree, that the unhappy prince was betrayed by his own people; and Prosper, in his chronicle, names Mallobaudes among those, who kept a private correspondence with the usurper [g]. But Baronius maintains, that Prosper was therein mistaken, and that Mallobaudes, continued ever faithful to Gratian [h].

And truly Pacatus upbraids Maximus for hating Mallobaudes, and reducing him to the fatal neceſſity of laying violent hands on himſelf, for no other crime than that of an inviolable fidelity to Gratian, whoſe cauſe he had maintained to the laſt [k]. Three years after the death of Gratian, that is, in the year 388, we find the Franks ravaging Gaul with more fury than ever, perhaps to revenge on the uſurper Maximus the death of Gratian, who had ſhewn a particular kindneſs to their nation. However that be, Gregory of Tours tells us, that they over-ran all Belgic Gaul, committing every-where unheard-of ravages, made the city of Cologne tremble, burnt ſeveral villages, and then returned home with their booty, leaving ſeveral parties in Gaul to purſue the ravages they had begun. Theſe were defeated by Nannius and Quintinus, the two generals of Maximus, who cut great numbers of them in pieces in the province of Hainault. Quintinus, not ſatisfied with this advantage, paſſed the Rhine at Nuys, contrary to the opinion of Nannius, who refuſed to follow him, and, entering the enemy's country with the troops under his command, burnt ſeveral villages, which he found abandoned by the inhabitants. Encouraged with this ſucceſs, he advanced far into the country; but being, on his return, cunningly drawn into marſhes, woods, and unpaſſable places, by the enemy pretending to fly before him, he found himſelf on a ſudden ſurrounded on all ſides by great multitudes, who, falling upon his men while they were entangled in the woods and marſhes, cut moſt of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to ſhelter themſelves in the woods, where they periſhed with famine, only Quintinus, and a few more, having, with the utmoſt difficulty, found means to make their eſcape, and return to Gaul, after ſuffering inexpreſſible hardſhips in the enemy's country. The loſs ſuſtained by the Romans on this occaſion was very great, and is, by ſome, compared to the diſaſter of Varus and his legions, in the time of Auguſtus [l]. This happened while the Franks were governed by Genobald, Marcomir, and Sunno, who being elated with this victory, broke anew into Gaul the following year; which obliged Theodoſius to ſend Valentinian to make head againſt them. Upon that prince's arrival in Gaul, Arbogaſtes, general of the troops in thoſe provinces, adviſed him to march into the enemy's country, and force them to reſtore the booty they had carried off the year before, and deliver up the authors of the war [m]. Whether or no Valentinian followed his advice, we are not told. All we know is, that he had a conference with Marco- mir and Sunno, who delivered up hoſtages; and that he afterwards retired to Treves, and there paſſed the winter [n].

THREE years after, that is, in 392, Arbogaſtes, having put Valentinian II. to death, perſuaded Eugenius, whom he had raiſed to the empire in his room, to make war upon the Franks. Arbogaſtes, of whom we have ſpoken at length in our Roman hiſtory [o]. was himſelf by nation a Frank; but, as he bore an old grudge to Marcomir and Sunno, he not only induced Eugenius to make war upon them, but, taking upon himſelf the whole management of it, he paſſed the Rhine near Cologne, in the depth of winter, and laid waſte the countries of the Bructerians and Chamavians, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition, Marcomir only ſhewing himſelf at a diſtance on the hills with ſome parties of the Anſivarii and Chatti. But, as to the iſſue of this war, hiſtorians only tell us, that Arbogaſtes, after having put many of his countrymen to the ſword, concluded in the end a peace with them; and that Eugenius himſelf approached the Rhine to renew the antient treaty with the kings of the Franks and Alemanns [p]. From this account it appears, that the Franks had ſeveral kings at the ſame time, and that under the name of Franks were compriſed ſeveral antient German nations. Great numbers of the Franks liſted themſelves among the troops of Eugenius; for Oroſius tells us, that he led againſt Theodoſius an infinite number of Franks and other barbarians [q]. Two years after, Theodoſius died, and, by his laſt will, divided the empire between his two children, bequeathing the eaſt to his eldeſt ſon Arcadius, and the weſt to Honorius. Stilicho, who was prime miniſter to the latter, adviſed him, in the firſt place, to renew the antient alliances with the Franks and other German nations, which they had broken, by aſſiſting the uſurper Eugenius againſt Theodoſius. This province Stilicho took upon himſelf, and, repairing to the banks of the Rhine, accompliſhed it in a very ſhort time [r]. However, Marcomir and Sunno attempting to raiſe new diſturbances ſoon after the concluſion of the peace, one of them, ſays Claudian, was taken, and, after having been kept ſome time in priſon, confined to Tuſcany. The other was for revenging on the Romans the affront they had offered his brother; but his own people, unwilling to engage in a war with the empire, put him to death. Claudian adds, that Honorius appointed other kings over the Franks in their room [s]. An antient hiſtorian ſuppoſes Marcomir to have outlived Sunno, and conſequently that it was he

In the year 406, the Franks falling upon the Vandals, as they were attempting to break into Gaul with the Sueves and Alans, cut near twenty thouſand of them in pieces, with their king Godigiſcles; and would have put them all to the ſword, had not the Alans come ſeaſonably to their aſſiſtance. Theſe two nations, together with the Sueves, opened themſelves a way, in ſpite of the Franks, and, paſſing the Rhine, entered Gaul [w]. Great numbers of Franks followed them, to have ſome ſhare in the ſpoils of thoſe wealthy provinces; but far greater numbers of the ſame nation entered Gaul four years after, being invited thither by the uſurper Conſtantine, of whoſe forces the commander in chief was one Edobic, a Frank by nation [x]. In the year 413, they made an irruption into Gaul, and not only pillaged, but burnt, the city of Treves the ſecond time, ſays Frigerid, an antient author quoted by Gregory of Tours [y]. When this firſt irruption happened, we are no-where told; but that unhappy city was the third time plundered, and ſet on fire, by the Franks, about the year 420, as Salvian informs us, who was an eye-witneſs of the deplorable condition, to which it was reduced on that occaſion [z]. Our author greatly complains of the inſenſibility and hardneſs of heart, which he diſcovered in the inhabitants, who having loſt all their effects, and with much-ado eſcaped with their lives, inſtead of applying themſelves to works of piety, preſſed the emperor to cauſe the ſports of the circus to be exhibited among the aſhes and ruins of their demoliſhed city [a].

ABOUT this time Pharamond muſt have reigned over the Franks. He is ſaid by Vitalis to have been the ſon of Sunno; but all other writers ſuppoſe him to have been the ſon of Marcomir, the brother of Sunno. Gregory of Tours, a very accurate writer, never once mentions this prince; which is very ſurpriſing. But both Aimonius and Tyro Proſper ſpeak of him, and place his reign at this time. In the chronicle of the latter, as publiſhed by Scaliger, at the twenty-fifth year of Honorius's reign, we read the following words; Pharamond reigns in France: then follows the year 26, with theſe words; This year there was an eclipſe of the ſun. If therefore Pharamond reigned in the year preceding the eclipſe, he reigned in the year

417, for all authors agree, that there was an eclipſe on Friday the 19th of July 418. Philoſtorgius writes, that the ſtars were then ſeen at two in the afternoon [b]. The Alexandrian chronicle, and likewiſe the chronicles of count Marcellinus and Idatius, mention this eclipſe; but the latter, by miſtake, ſuppoſes it to have happened on a Thurſday; whereas, in 418, the 19th of July fell on a Friday. Tyro Proſper likewiſe was miſtaken, in ſuppoſing the year 418 to have been the twenty-ſixth of Honorius, that year being, according to the beſt chronologers, only the twenty-third or twenty-fourth of his reign. Father Le Cointe will have Pharamond to have begun his reign the ſame year in which the eclipſe happened; others, and among the reſt father Labbé in his chronology, maintain, that he began to reign in 420, and not before [c]. But it is impoſſible to fix, with any certainty, the preciſe time, in which this prince began his reign, ſince Proſper's chronicle, on which we muſt chiefly depend, is full of miſtakes, and differently read in this very place. It is even uncertain, whether it was in his reign, or ſome time before, that the Franks, paſſing the Rhine, firſt ſettled in Gaul. Bucherius is of opinion, that, about this time, Honorius, entering into a treaty with their chiefs, yielded to them the country bordering on the Rhine towards Cologne, and on the ſame ſide of that river, which country was afterwards called Ripuaria; but he alledges only a few conjectures to ſupport his opinion [d]. Gregory of Tours ſuppoſes them to have ſettled about this time in Thongria, that is, in the territory of Tongres, where they were governed, as we have hinted above, by as many kings as they had cities or cantons [e]. Pharamond, who reigned at this time, was one of the moſt powerful princes among them; but we are not told whether he had any authority over the reſt. He is ſuppoſed to have reigned from the year 417 or 418, to the year 428, in which Clodio, his ſon and ſucceſſor, is ſaid by Tyro Proſper to have reigned in France, that is, in the country of the Franks [f]. In the year in which he is ſuppoſed to have died, the famous Aetius made war upon the Franks in Gaul, and drove them from the country in which they had ſettled [g]. Of this war Jornandes ſpeaks without all doubt, where he tells us, that Aetius, with great ſlaughter, tamed the barbarity of the Franks, and forced them to ſubmit to the empire [h]. The learned Uſher is of opinion, that, in this war, Pharamond was killed [i]. Chifletius, a learned antiquary, will have Pharamond to have made himſelf maſter of all Belgica Secunda, and to have died at Rheims, the metropolis of that province. He founds his opinion on the authority of an old manuſcript genealogy lodged in the palace at Bruſſels, in which Pharamond is ſaid to have been buried at Rheims, according to the cuſtom of the barbarians, without the city, towards Laudunum, on a little hill [k]. But we can hardly believe, that all the antients would have paſſed over in ſilence the conqueſt of ſuch an extenſive country; for Belgica Secunda compriſed Champagne and all the countries lying between that province and the ocean. Some writers are of opinion, that the Salic laws were compiled by Pharamond, after his ſettling in Gaul, with the aſſiſtance of four ſages, named Wiſegaſt, Leſegaſt, Widegaſt, and Solegaſt; but Valeſius thinks, that the Franks had no written laws till the time of Clovis, who, according to him, was their firſt legiſlator [l].

Clodio. Year after Chriſt 428.

Pharamond was ſucceeded by his ſon Clodio in the year 428, the fourth of the reign of Valentinian III. Gregory of Tours calls him a moſt illuſtrious prince, and one to whom his people, whoſe intereſt he had at heart, were highly indebted [m]. An hiſtorian, who flouriſhed in the time of Charles Martel, and after him moſt other writers, ſuppoſe both Clodio and his ſucceſſor Merovæus to have been the children of Pharamond [n]. Fredegarius, in his abridgment of Gregory of Tours, which he compiled in the time of Pepin, will have him to have been the ſon of Theodemir, who was killed by the Romans, as we have related above. The authority of Fredegarius is of no great weight; but as Gregory of Tours too mentions the death of Theodomir, ſome are of opinion, that Theodomir and Pharamond were one and the ſame perſon, as we have hinted above. As Gregory of Tours begins the hiſtory of the Franks with the reign of Clodio (for he makes no mention of Pharamond), and derives from him the pedigree of the ſucceeding kings [o], ſeveral hiſtorians reckon him the firſt king of that nation [p]. And truly he ought to be deemed the founder of the French monarchy in the country we now call France, ſince he eſtabliſhed his dominion ſo firmly there, that the Romans were never after able to drive him out, as they had done his predeceſſor Pharamond about the year 428. He is commonly ſurnamed the long-haired, as if he had been the firſt among the princes of his nation, who was distinguished from his subjects by the length of his hair; whereas this mark of distinction is taken notice of by several historians, as common to the kings of the Franks before his time [q]. On this subject Bucherius makes a long descant [r], and to him we refer the reader. Sidonius, speaking of the Franks, describes their hair, their beard, their arms, and their whole attire [s]; and from him it appears, that their hair was long before, and quite short behind. We know but very little from the antients of what happened in this prince's reign. Idatius tells us, that, in the year 431, Aetius was employed in an expedition in Gaul [t]. This expedition was, without all doubt, undertaken against the Franks; for the same writer, who was then with Aetius, adds, that, in 432, he overcame the Franks in a combat. Majorianus, afterwards emperor, served, in all likelihood, under Aetius in this expedition; for Sidonius extols his exploits on the Rhine, the Vahal, and the Meuse; and adds, that nothing was performed by Aetius without him [u]. Aetius, after having overcome the Franks, concluded a peace with them the same year [w]; but upon what terms we know not. Bucherius is of opinion, that Aetius, being obliged to march against the Visigoths, and other barbarians settled in Gaul, in order to keep the Franks quiet, restored to them the country from which he had driven them in 428, that is, the territory of Tongres [x]. This, he thinks, may be gathered from the notitia; but the whole is founded upon a mere conjecture. Gregory of Tours, speaking of Clodio before the conquest of Cambray, supposes him to have resided in the castle of Disparg, commonly thought to be the present Doesburg, between Brussels and Louvain, in the antient diocese of Tongres, or on the confines of that country [y]; which is agreeable to what that writer adds, viz. that the country, which the Romans still held, lay south of the territories possessed by Clodio residing at Disparg. In the year 435, the Franks made, it seems, an attempt upon Tours; for Sidonius tells us, that Majorianus defended that city against them. Not long after, the Franks made an irruption into the country of the Attrebates, now Artois. But Aetius, marching against them with all possible expedition, fell upon them unexpectedly, while, without the least apprehension of danger, they were celebrating the nuptials of one of their chiefs, and cut great numbers of them in pieces [z]. This action happened at a place called Vicus Helenæ, which some take to be the village

But that writer is certainly mistaken; for Majorianus, afterwards emperor, who performed wonders in the battle of Lens or Hesdin, if Sidonius is to be credited, was still a young man in 458, since Sidonius, in the panegyric which he pronounced that year, styles him juvenis, a young man; and how could he be a young man then, if he had signalized himself in a battle fought at least thirty years before? Thus father Sirmond (6), who rightly observes, that, in 428, Aetius waged war with the Franks on the banks of the Rhine; whereas the battle mentioned by Sidonius was fought in Artois, near the village of Helena; which some take to be Lens, and others place on the Canche, where the ruins of it are still to be seen, and known by the name of Wieil Hesdin. That writer was well apprised, that he could not allow the above-mentioned events to have happened after the year 428, without allowing at the same time the countries, which Clodio seized in that irruption, to have been kept by him, since no mention is made in history of the Franks being driven out of Gaul after the year 428. But against father's Daniel's system lie the above-mentioned, in our opinion, unanswerable objections, to which we shall add another, viz. that we find Clovis possessed of Tournay, without being told by any historian, that either he or his predecessors, Merovæus and Childeric, reduced it; whence we conclude it to have been held by him, and the two princes who reigned before him, as the successors of Clodio, by whom the whole country between Cambray and the Rhine was reduced, in the manner we have related.

Some add, that he took Tournay, Amiens, and ſeveral other cities [d]. But we ſhall content ourſelves with what we find in the beſt and moſt credible writers, among whom we do not reckon De Guiſe, the author of the annals of Hainault, tho' Bucherius has copied many things from him. Aetius is ſuppoſed to have afterwards concluded a peace with the Franks, and to have left them in poſſeſſion, at leaſt, of ſome part of the country they had conquered, ſince he granted the like favour to other nations, whom he dreaded leſs [e]. Priſcus, who flouriſhed in thoſe days, tells us, that he ſaw at Rome the ſecond ſon of the king of the Franks, who had been ſent thither on an embaſſy, though a youth yet quite beardleſs. He takes notice of his long, yellow hair; and adds, that Aetius adopted him for his ſon, by preſenting him with his armour, and treated him with the greateſt marks imaginable of eſteem, friendſhip, and affection [f]. Upon his leaving Rome, he was loaded with rich and valuable preſents, ſent him both by Aetius and Valentinian III. then emperor [g]. This young prince was, in all likelihood, Merovæus, the ſucceſſor of Clodio; for he lived in great friendſhip with Aetius, and joined him againſt Attila. He went, in all likelihood, to Rome in 439, for in that year Valentinian was there.

He deſtroys Treves.

Salvianus, who wrote about the year 440, tells us, that the city of Treves had been the fourth time pillaged by the Franks and utterly deſtroyed [h]. This muſt have happened about the year 477, during the war between him and the Romans, of which we have ſpoken above. The ſame writer adds, that the Franks made themſelves maſters of another city not yielding to Treves in grandeur, and ſtanding at a ſmall diſtance from it [i]. This city can be no other but Cologne, which was held by the Franks, as appears from that writer, in the year 440. The enemy entered the city while the chief inhabitants were feaſting and revelling, without the leaſt apprehenſion of danger [k]. Several of Salvianus's relations were, on that occaſion, taken by the Franks and by them kept in ſlavery, and, among the reſt, a holy widow, who, having ranſomed herſelf, was reduced to ſuch poverty, that ſhe was obliged to earn her bread by working for the wives of the barbarians [l]. The taking of Cologne happened, according to the beſt chronologers, in the reign of Clodio, about the year 438, or 439 [m]. 'Tis to be obſerved, that this town, in the time of Clovis, had a king of its own, but a Frank by nation [n]. Father Le Cointe obſerves, that, till his time, Cologne is conſtantly called Agrippina, and ſeldom Colonia; whereas the latter name univerſally prevailed and the former was quite laid aſide, after the Franks became maſters of the place, which induced Hincmar and ſome others to imagine, that the name of Colonia had been given it by them [o]. As the Franks were ſtill pagans, the church ſuffered much in the countries ſubject to them; and hence it is, that we find no biſhops of Cologne, named in the eccleſiaſtic hiſtory, from the time of Evergilius, who is ſuppoſed to have died about the year 430, till the time of Aquilinus, who governed that church in the reign of Clovis [p]. The churches of Tournay and Cambray fared no better; for they ſeem to have had no biſhops from the year 407, when the Vandals broke into thoſe countries, till the end of that century [q]. Clodio II. reigned about twenty years, that is, from the year 428, to 448, when Tyro Proſper tells us, that Merovæus reigned in France [r], that is, in the countries ſubject to the Franks on either ſide of the Rhine. From the words of Proſper ſome conclude, that the Franks held yet nothing in Gaul; for, by the word Francia, ſay they, is to be underſtood the country inhabited by the Franks on the German ſide of the Rhine. But they are therein certainly miſtaken; ſince it is manifeſt from all the antients, that both Clodio and Merovæus were maſters of ſeveral places in Gaul. There is a great diſagreement among authors about Merovæus: according to the opinion which to us ſeems the moſt probable, he was the ſecond ſon of Clodio, and him Priſcus ſaw at Rome in 439, as we have hinted above, he being then about eighteen years old. Both he and his elder brother outlived their father Clodio; but Merovæus, by the aſſiſtance of Aetius and the Romans, carried the crown; for that there were great conteſts between them, is certain, the elder brother having called in Attila to his aſſiſtance; for this Attila himſelf alledged, among the other motives that had prompted him in 451 to enter Gaul. He had a conſiderable number of Franks in his army, thoſe, without doubt, who had eſpouſed the cauſe of his elder brother. But Merovæus, king of the Franks, fought for the Romans, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the famous battle of Chalons, which to him ſecured the crown, and made his elder brother give over all hopes of ever wearing it; nay, Attila himſelf adviſed him, after the battle, to return home [s]. The elder brother's name is commonly thought to have been Clandebald, who, in an antient manuscript copy of the Salic law, is said to have been the son of Clude, or Clodio, the son of Pharamond, and the brother of Cleno, of whom no farther mention is made [t]. Valesius takes Claudebald to be the same person with Clodomir, who, in the life of St. Genulphus, is said to have reigned between Clodio and Merovæus [u]. But that life was written long after those times, and is therefore of no great authority. Gregory of Tours only says of Merovæus, that he was the father of Childeric [w]. However, he must have been a prince of no small renown, since the authors of the seventh and eighth century, and after them many others, have given the name of Merovingian to the kings who reigned after him, till the time of Pepin, the first king of the second race, as they style it [x], the first being called Merovingian from Merovæus. Rorico extols him greatly, but by elogiums couched in general terms [y]; and besides, no great stress is to be laid on what that author writes. Of his exploits, Buchcrius speaks at length; but all he says is founded upon conjecture [z]. Valesius, from what we read of Childeric, concludes Merovæus to have extended his conquests from the Somme to the Seine, probably after the death of Aetius. All we know for certain is, that upon the news of the death of Valentinian III. the Franks, under the conduct of Merovæus, ravaged Germania Prima and Belgica Secunda, that is, the provinces of Mentz and Rheims [a]. Bucherius thinks, that Merovæus died the year after Valentinian III. that is, in 456 [b]; but Valesius will have him to have lived till the year 458 [c]. Rorico writes, that he was loved, honoured, and revered, by his people, as a common father, and that from him the Franks in general were called Merovingians [d]. In a genealogical table of the French kings, prefixed to a manuscript life of Charles the Great, lodged in the royal library at Brussels, he is made the stock or head of the first race (E).

(E) It is greatly disputed among authors, whether Merovæus was brother to his predecessor Clodio, only his kinsman, or even of a different family. Gregory of Tours only says, that by some it was held for certain, he was of the same race or family (1). It is past all doubt, that the king of the Franks, who died some time before the year 451, and could be no other but Clodio, had two sons, who, after his death, contended for the kingdom (2). If Merovæus was of these princes, he was certainly the son of Clodio. But perhaps both Clodio's children lost what each of them strove to get, and a kinsman of theirs, or one who was no-ways related to the family, possessed himself of the kingdom. Du Chesne seems to have been of this opinion (3). It is not unlikely, that Merovæus was the first of a new branch, since his successors was from him called Merovingians (4). But on the other hand, if we admit the authority of Sigo Prosper, we can hardly deny Merovæus to have reigned in 451, when Attila broke into Gaul, and consequently to have been one of the two sons of Clodio. For Priscus does not say that a contest arose among three princes; but only, that the two brothers contended for the kingdom; and it is certain, that this contest was not ended in 451, for Attila came to make war on the Franks in favour of the elder brother (5). It appears from Priscus, that the king of the Franks, who sided with Actius against Attila in 451, fought at the same time against his brother and the king of the Huns (6). the very expression used by Priscus, viz. that Attila came to make war on the Franks, in favour of the elder brother, shews, that the bulk of the nation acknowledged the younger; and, since Attila was obliged to retire, it is not at all likely, that the elder brother, supported by him, got the better of the younger, supported by the Romans, by whom Attila was overcome and forced to abandon Gaul. The king of the Franks had, according to Gregory of Tours, (7), a share in the victory; and in history we find no mention made of any but Merovæus, who, in 451, could be styled king of the Franks. Gregory of Tours knew of no other king between him and Clodio, who died before the irruption of the Huns. We must therefore either suppose Merovæus not to have begun his reign in 448, but only in 451, and consequently bring in another king between him and Clodio, for which there is not the least foundation in history, or allow Merovæus to have been the son of Clodio. Father Le Cointe allows Merovæus to have been the son of Clodio; but will have him to have been the elder brother, and adds, that he was acknowledged king; that the younger brother had recourse to the Romans and to Attila; and that the Romans, hearing Attila was coming with a formidable army, abandoned the younger brother, and declared for the elder, who thereupon sided with the Romans against Attila (8). But is it at all probable, that Merovæus would have dared to abandon, nay, to betray Attila, at a time when all nations, the Romans not excepted, trembled at his name? Besides, it is certain, that Attila was assisted by the Franks, and that mother and other persons of distinction; but delivered from captivity by the fidelity, courage, and address of a Frank, named Wiomald, as we read in Fredegarius [c]. This happened in the year 453, when Attila, attempting to pass the Rhine, in order to enter Gaul, was opposed by Merovæus, at the head of the Franks who had espoused his cause against his competitor.

several of that nation served in his army (9). The above mentioned writer could not persuade himself that the younger son of Clodio, who was a beardless youth when he came to Rome, was the father of Childeric, who, as early as the year 456, had abandoned himself to all manner of lewdness and debauchery; and this is what induced him to embrace the aforesaid opinion. Some chronologers suppose the son of Clodio to have gone to Rome in 459, and others place his journey to that metropolis still later. If, in 459, he was eighteen, he might have had Childeric in 440. Le Cointe places the beginning of the reign of Childeric in 456, and Valesius in 458, when that prince, then eighteen years old, might well have been guilty of all the debaucheries, which, by historians, are laid to his charge. Besides, we are not told, that he abandoned himself to a debauched life as soon as he ascended the throne: so that the chief argument with which Le Cointe strives to support his opinion is of no weight. The only proof of any strength, that can be alledged in favour of the opinion denying Merovæus to have been the son of Clodio, is the name of Merovingian, which was given to his successors; for if they were descended from Clodio, as well as from him, why did they take their name rather from him than from Clodio? But that name is not given by Gregory of Tours, to the kings of his time, nor is it to be found in any writer till near two hundred years after Merovæus's time; and some authors will have it to have been common to the Franks in general. Those, who maintain Merovæus not to have been the son of Clodio, must at the same time suppose, with Du Chesne, that both the sons of Clodio were by him excluded from the throne; that this happened after the defeat of Attila, that is, after the year 451, and that the Romans suffered it, though they had espoused the cause of Merovæus, finding they could reap no advantage from a war with the usurper (10). As for the fables related by Fredegarius on the birth of Merovæus, it would be degrading our history to allow them a place in it (11); and with them are much of a piece those we read in the annals of Hainault, by du Haisi, though Buchérius thinks them agreeable to what we find in Priscus. It is surprising, that a man of his learning and penetration should reason on that subject in the manner he does (12): he surely must never have perused the original Greek copy of Priscus.

Childeric

Childeric no sooner ascended the throne, than he began to think of inlarging his dominions, the more, as Aetius, who had kept the barbarians in awe, was now dead. He is said to have extended his conquests as far as the Loire, and to have reduced the city of Paris, after a siege, according to some, of five, according to others, of ten years [f]. In the year 470, he made himself master of Angers, after having killed count Paul, the Roman governor of the place [g]. Thus Gregory of Tours, without acquainting us how count Paul and Childeric came to fall out; for he had told us, a few lines before, that the Roman general, with the assistance of the Franks, had made war on the Goths and gained some advantages over them. Bucherius thinks, that the Romans and Franks were overcome by the Goths; and founds his opinion upon the authority of Sidonius, who writes, without marking any time, that the Franks were defeated and put to flight by Euric king of the Goths [h]. The same author adds, that Euric, after having overcome the Franks, entered into an alliance with them [i]; and elsewhere, that he gave his daughter in marriage to one Sigismer, a barbarian prince [k], whom Valesius takes to have been a Frank [l]. This alliance between the Goths and the Franks induced, in all likelihood, Childeric to turn his arms against the Romans, and seize on the city of Angers, at that time belonging to them. He likewise made himself master of Orleans, after having defeated one Odoacer, who came with a body of Saxons to the relief of the place [m]. Gregory of Tours tells us, that Childeric, entering into an alliance with Odoacer king of Italy, marched against the Alemanns, who had entered that country, and gave them a total overthrow. Soon after his return to Gaul, he died at Ternacum, now Tournay, where his remains were discovered in 1653, with many gold coins of the Roman emperors, and other things of great curiosity and value; among which was the king's signet, with the inscription Childerici regis, and his image engraved on it, with his long hair covering both his shoulders, and a dart in his right-hand. But of this discovery the curious reader will find a minute and learned account in the Anastasis Childerici, which Chiffletius wrote in 1655, by order of the archduke Leopold, at that time governor of the Low-countries for Philip IV. king of Spain [n]. Childeric, in the beginning of his reign, abandoned himself to all manner of lewdness, loading at the same time his subjects with exorbitant taxes and impoſitions, to ſupply his extravagant expences. Hereupon ſome of thoſe, whoſe wives and daughters he had debauched, revolting, drove him from the throne. Gregory of Tours writes, that, foreſeeing the ſtorm, he prudently withdrew of his own accord, and retired into the territory of Tongres, where he continued, till, his ſubjects returning to their duty, which was chiefly owing to his truſty friend Wiomald, he was recalled and reſtored to the throne. During his abſence, the Franks ſubmitted to Ægidius, by nation a Gaul, but commander of the Roman troops in that country °, whom, upon the return of Childeric, they eaſily drove out, and received their lawful ſovereign with the greateſt marks of joy imaginable (F). Fredegarius,

(F) This event is thus related by Gregory of Tours: Childeric, by ſeducing the daughters of his ſubjects, provoked them to ſuch a degree, that, fearing he ſhould be aſſaſſinated by them, he thought it adviſeable to abandon his kingdom and retire. Het herefore withdrew into the country of the Thuringians; but left behind him a truſty friend to mollify the exulcerated minds of his people, and diſpoſe them to receive again their lawful ſovereign. Upon his departure he cut in two a piece of gold, whereof he took one part with him, and left the other with his friend, to be ſent to him, as a token, that he might return without the leaſt apprehenſion of danger. After this he withdrew and took refuge in Thuringia, living as a private perſon in the court of king Baſinus and queen Baſina his wife. Childeric being thus withdrawn, the Franks with one conſent chole Ægidius for their governor, who had been raiſed by the emperor to the poſt of magiſter militiæ, or commander in chief of the Roman forces in Gaul. While Ægidius was in the eighth year of his reign, Childeric's faithful friend, having privately and by degrees reconciled the minds of the Franks to his maſter, diſpatched a meſſenger to him with the piece of gold, which he had kept. Childeric, underſtanding, from that token, that his ſubjects were ready to receive him, left Thuringia, and, returning home, was reſtored to the throne (13). Thus Gregory of Tours, who was born about ſixty-three years after the death of Childeric, and conſequently muſt have been acquainted with ſeveral perſons who had converſed, at leaſt, with his contemporaries, and probably, knew ſome who had ſeen Childeric himſelf: ſo that it can hardly be ſuppoſed, that he was not well informed of ſuch remarkable events as the depoſition and reſtoration of the king of the Franks, and the chuſing of Ægidius to reign in his room. And yet father Daniel looks upon this account as altogether incredible and fabulous: he thinks, that the conduct of the Franks, had they choſen Ægidius for their king, would have been no leſs unaccountable than

that of the Turks in 1687, if after deposing Mahomet IV. they had raised to the throne prince Charles of Lorrain, who then commanded the emperor's army in Hungary, and owed all his glory to the advantages he had gained over them. Is it at all likely, says he, that the Franks, who were barbarians and pagans, should chuse for their king a Roman, and one who professed the christian religion; and supposing they had to such a Roman offered the crown, would not he, thro' fear of incurring the emperor's indignation, have rejected their offer? But in those days we find several instances of pagans acknowledging and obeying christian princes, and of pagan princes ruling over those who professed the christian religion. As to the jealousy, which his accepting that dignity might have given to the emperor, Majorianus reposed an entire confidence in Ægidius; and besides, the crown, which the Franks placed upon his head, was but a small addition to the power and honours he enjoyed before, as magister militiæ, which employment raised him above all the kings of the barbarians, whom he commanded accordingly in the field. The title of king was no great thing in those times, since it was given not only to all the chiefs of the barbarians, but to the different leaders of many tribes, into which each nation was divided. Ennodius, bishop of Pavia, who flourished in the fifth century, speaking of the army which Theodoric king of the Ostrogoths in Italy led against the barbarians, says, that the country, in which that prince encamped, could hardly supply with provisions so many soldiers as he had kings in his army (13). The title of king, therefore, which the Franks bestowed on Ægidius, could give no jealousy to the emperor: it was far inferior to that of magister militiæ, which he bore already, and with which the greatest kings among the barbarians thought themselves greatly honoured. Nay, Majorianus, who reposed an intire confidence in Ægidius, must have been highly pleased to hear, that the Franks had submitted to him, which, in effect, was submitting to the empire. The Franks did not then wage war with the Romans, but were their confederates, and had often served in their armies under the conduct of Ægidius, whose probity and moderation could not, by that means, be unknown to them; so that every one must be well apprised of the wide difference between their chusing him and the Turks chusing Charles of Lorrain, for their king. But the circumstances, adds father Daniel, attending the deposition of Childeric and election of Ægidius, are evidently fabulous. This we allow to be true, speaking of the circumstances that have been added to those events by later writers; but, in the account Gregory of Tours gives us of them, nothing occurs that to us seems childish, to use father Daniel's expression, or incredible. Gregory of Tours ſtantinople, to implore the protection of the emperor Mauritius, and returned from thence by ſea into Gaul. A ſtrange anachroniſm! Mauritius having been raiſed to the imperial throne near an hundred years after the flight of Childeric. Wilthomius, in his chronicle written in the year 810, reads is not accountable, and much leſs are we, for the fables which later writers have been pleaſed to add to his relation. Is an event related, we may ſay, by a contemporary writer, to be deemed fabulous, becauſe others, who wrote after, have added to it ſeveral fabulous circumſtances? How many unconteſted events have been thus diſfigured, and turned into fables? As for the ſilence of the contemporary writers, on which father Daniel lays great ſtreſs, there flouriſhed at that time but two, viz. Idatius and Apollinaris Sidonius, of whom the former, who wrote in Spain, at that time overrun by the barbarians, was not perhaps informed of what paſſed among the Franks in Gaul, or, if he was, he did not think proper to inſert in his chronicle an event that no-ways concerned his countrymen; for, in the affairs of Gaul, he is ſo conciſe, as to give, in one line, an account of the moſt memorable battles and ſieges that happened there. As for Sidonius, he did not write the hiſtory of thoſe times, but only ſpeaks of ſome events occaſionally; and his ſubject did not lead him to mention the depoſing of Childeric by the Franks, and their chuſing Ægidius in his room. The only objection of any weight that can be brought againſt the account of Gregory of Tours, is in point of chronology. It is certain, that Ægidius was magiſter militiæ when he was choſen by the Franks for their king; that Majorianus was then acknowledged emperor in Gaul; and that he was not acknowledged there before the latter end of the year 458. On the other hand it is no leſs certain, that Childeric was reſtored before the death of Ægidius; and that Ægidius died in 464, the fifth year after the depoſition of Childeric. Gregory of Tours therefore was certainly miſtaken, in ſuppoſing Ægidius to have reigned eight years over the Franks. This miſtake in point of chronology has induced father Daniel to queſtion the whole account Gregory of Tours gives us of the depoſition of Childeric and election of Ægidius. But might not this miſtake have crept into the text of our hiſtorian through the ignorance or careleſneſs of the tranſcribers? It is owned by all the critics, that in ſeveral other paſſages the numbers have been altered by the tranſcribers; and this they cannot help owning, without ſuppoſing Gregory of Tours to have contradicted himſelf. Why then may not the miſtake as to the years of Childeric's exile be likewiſe charged upon the tranſcribers? the more, as in all the antient manuſcript copies the numbers are written in arithmetical figures, which are very liable to be altered. But allowing Gregory of Tours to have been miſtaken as to the years Ægidius reigned, can we infer from thence, that he did not reign at all? Are not the beſt hiſtorians ſometimes groſly miſtaken in point of chronology?

Martianus

Martianus instead of Mauritius; but, according to the best chronologers, Martian died in 457, whereas Childeric either fled, or was driven out, in the year 461, and restored eight years after. Besides, Gregory of Tours, who lived in the next age, takes no notice of his journey to Constantinople; and Aimonius expressly tells us, that he kept at a small distance from his own dominions, not doubting but Wiomald would, by some means or other, appease his subjects, and procure his return [P]. He was received in his own territories by the inhabitants of Barrum, who went out to meet him, and were, on that account, exempted from all tribute, which immunity they enjoyed for many years. This Barrum Franchet will have to be Barrum ducis, or Bar le duc; Belleforest to be Bar on the Seine; while Uredius and Chiffletius take it to be a place in Brabant or Holland; for they are of opinion, that Childeric took shelter, not in Tungria, but in Thuringia, as we read it in Gregory of Tours; but that writer, or his transcriber, often confounds these two countries (G). Whatever place he came from, he was soon followed by Basina, the wife of king Basinus, by whom he had been entertained during his exile. Some French historians would make us believe, that she abandoned her husband to follow Childeric, being taken with his good qualities. But the answer she gave to Childeric, when asked by him for what reason she had left her husband to follow him, seems to insinuate, though related by Gregory of Tours in the most modest terms, that she was not so much taken with his good qualities, as with the abilities of

[P] AIMON l. i. c. 7.

(G) A modern critic (14) is of opinion, that the words Tungria and Thuringia were used by those who transcribed the history of Gregory of Tours, as synonymous terms to express one and the same country, viz. that of Tongres. Miræl, who in 1561, published the second edition of the history of Gregory of Tours, writes, that in an antient manuscript of that historian he found the following words: Dispargum, which stands on the borders of the Tungrians or Thuringians; and father Ruinart, a most accurate writer, quotes two manuscript copies of the history of Gregory of Tours, viz. that which was made use of by the first editor of that history, and another lodged in the abbey of Royaumont, in both which the Franks are said to have settled in Thuringia after they had passed the Rhine, which evidently proves, that by Thuringia was meant Tungria, or the country of Tongres, lying on the Roman side of the Rhine; for there they settled after having crossed that river.

another kind, which she had discovered in him (H). Be that as it will, Childeric married her, and had by her Clodovæus, who succeeded him in the kingdom [q].

Clodovæus. Year after Christ 482.

Clodovæus, called also Hludovicus, Ludovicus, Ludicin, and Clovis, was no sooner raised to the throne, than he began to think of inlarging his dominions, which, according to the best writers, extended only from the Wahal to the city of Tournay. That Childeric was, at his death, master of Tournay, cannot be questioned, since he was interred there; and, on the other hand, we know for certain, that Clovis resided at Tournay during the first years of his reign [r]. The kingdom, therefore, to which he succeeded, was bounded on the north by the Wahal; on the east by the city of Tongres, which belonged to another tribe of Franks, and was not reduced by Clovis till the tenth year of his reign, as Gregory of Tours tells us in express terms; on the south by the kingdom of Ragnacharius, who held Cambray; on the west by the kingdom of Chararic, commonly placed between the Escault and the ocean. Ragnacharius and Chararic were likewise kings of the Franks, but ruled over different tribes, and were quite independent of Clovis, as well as of each other. The other provinces of Gaul were held by the Romans, by the Visigoths, and by the Burgundians, who all lorded it over the unhappy natives. Clovis, resolved to inlarge his dominions, and perhaps, as his ambition knew no bounds, he being then but in the twentieth year of

(H) The words of Gregory of Tours are: His ergo regnantibus Francis, Basina illa, quam supra memoravimus, relicto viro suo, ad Childericum venit. Qui cum solicite interrogaret, qua de causa ad eum de tantis regionibus venisset, respondisse fertur: Novi, inquit, utilitatem tuam, quod bis valde firmus; ideoque veni, ut habitem tecum. Nam nosses, si in his interioribus partibus aliquem cognovissem utiliorem te, adjutisse utique habitationem ejus. At ille gaudens eam sibi conjugio copulavit. Is not the meaning of these words, novi utilitatem tuam, &c. as plain as a modest writer could well make it, and very different from that which Dubos, in his critical history of the French monarchy, would obtrude upon us? viz. Because I know you are a man of honour, of courage, and worthy of my affections: had there been a more deserving man in the world, I should have crossed the seas in quest of him, &c. his age, aſpired at nothing leſs than the monarchy of all Gaul, thought it adviſeable to begin with the Romans, who, by the downfal of the weſtern empire, were reduced to the loweſt ebb of power. Syagrius, the ſon of Ægidius, of whom we have ſpoken above, held the city of Soiſſons. He had ſucceeded his father in the government of that city, and perhaps had made himſelf abſolute maſter of it during the anarchy which had prevailed in Gaul, upon the downfal of the weſtern empire, ſince he is, by Gregory of Tours, diſtinguiſhed with the title of king [s]. However that be, Clovis, being reſolved to reduce that city, invited Chararic and Ragnacharius to aſſiſt him in the enterpriſe, which the latter readily did; but Chararic declined being any-ways concerned in that war, with a deſign, ſays Gregory of Tours, to join the prince who ſhould prevail over the other [t]. Clovis was no ſooner joined by Ragnacharius, whom our hiſtorian calls his kinſman, than he ſet out on his march for Soiſſons, and, arriving with his army in the neighbourhood of that city, he ſent a meſſenger to Syagrius, offering him battle. Syagrius, accepting the challenge, marched into a neighbouring plain, where the two armies engaged. The combat laſted ſome time; but the Romans being in the end put to flight, Syagrius, from the field of battle, fled to Toloufe, and there took refuge at the court of Alaric king of the Viſigoths; which Clovis no ſooner underſtood, than he diſpatched embaſſadors to Alaric, threatening to make war upon him, if he did not forthwith deliver the fugitive Roman into his hands. Alaric, unwilling to provoke the king of the Franks, ordered Syagrius to be immediately delivered up to the embaſſadors; upon whoſe return he was, by Clovis's order, kept under cloſe confinement, till that prince had reduced Soiſſons, and then privately beheaded [u]. Clovis, now maſter of Soiſſons, tranſferred his royal ſeat from Tournay to that city [w]. He afterwards waged ſeveral wars, ſays Gregory of Tours; and in the tenth year of his reign ſubdued the Thuringians, meaning, without all doubt, the Tongrians; for Thuringia lay on the other ſide of the Rhine, at a great diſtance from his dominions, and ſeparated from them by the countries which the Alemanns held on the one ſide of that river, and the Franks, called Ripuarians, on the other, who had a king of their own. It is therefore paſt all doubt, that the country, ſaid by our hiſtorian to have been ſubdued by Clovis, in the tenth year of his reign, was the city of Tongres and its territory, which bordered on the territory of Tournay, and opened a free communication between his dominions and thoſe of Sigebert, king of the Ripuarians and his kinſman; for the Ripuarians held Cologne, and were maſters of the country between the Lower Rhine and the Lower Meuſe. Tongria, when reduced by Clovis, was held, according to the moſt probable opinion, by another tribe of Franks, who had ſettled there ſome time before. The ſame year Clovis married Clothildis, or Crothechildis, as ſhe is called by Gregory of Tours, the daughter of Childeric, king of the Burgundians, who had been murdered ſome years before by his brother Gundebald, as we ſhall relate in the hiſtory of that nation. Of this marriage, Gregory of Tours gives us the following account: The embaſſadors, whom Clovis had often occaſion to ſend to the court of the king of the Burgundians, during their abode there, took particular notice of a young woman named Chrothechildis, and, being charmed with her beauty, her wiſdom, and her engaging behaviour, and at the ſame time informed, that ſhe was of the blood royal, upon their return home, they gave the king an high idea of her good qualities, which made ſo deep an impreſſion on his mind, that, ſoon after, he ſent embaſſadors to king Gundebald, aſking her in marriage. Gundebald, afraid to diſoblige the king of the Franks, granted him his requeſt, delivering the young princeſs to his embaſſadors, who immediately conveyed her to their maſter. The king was ſo taken with her beauty and amiable qualities, that he immediately married her, though he had already, by a concubine, a ſon named Theodoric [x]. Thus Gregory of Tours: but the epitomiſer of the hiſtory of the Franks, and the author of the Geſts of the Franks, add ſeveral circumſtances which ſeem to have been unknown to our hiſtorian. The account they give us is as follows: Clovis, deſiring to marry Clothildis, often ſent embaſſadors to the court of the king of the Burgundians; but theſe finding no opportunity to ſpeak to her, he charged a Roman, by name Aurelian, to wait upon her, and, by converſing with her, to diſcover her real ſentiments, delivering to him one of his rings by way of credentials. Aurelian, the better to execute his commiſſion, went in the diſguiſe of a beggar to Geneva, where Clothildis then reſided with her ſiſter. The two young princeſſes, who ſpent moſt of their time in acts of charity and hoſpitality, entertaining all the poor who came to the place, received Aurelian among the reſt, and conducted him to the place where they uſed to waſh the feet of the poor pilgrims and beggars, according to a cuſtom which then prevailed, as it ſtill does in ſome places of Italy. This gave Aurelian an opportunity of ſpeaking to Clothildis, and letting her know, that he had been sent by the king of the Franks, who, being informed of her good qualities by his embassadors, begged she would give him leave to ask her in marriage. At the same time, he delivered to her the ring as a certain token of his embassy. The young princess received the ring with great joy, and, returning thanks to the king for the good opinion he entertained of her, and the honour he designed her, readily consented to the proposal; but at the same time desired Aurelian to acquaint his master, that unless the whole was concluded before the return of Aridius, who had been sent to Constantinople by her uncle Gundebald, he would leave no stone unturned to put a stop to their intended marriage. In taking her leave of the embassador, she pulled off her ring, and, delivering it to him, desired him to present it, in her name, to the king, as a token of the affection and esteem she had for so great a prince. Aurelian, returning without delay to Soissons, delivered the ring to Clovis, acquainting him at the same time with the answer Clothildis had given him. Hereupon the king immediately dispatched embassadors to Gundebald, demanding his niece in marriage. The king of the Burgundians was not inclined to the match, but nevertheless, through fear of disobliging so powerful a prince, granted him his request; so that Clothildis was immediately betrothed to Clovis, and, after that ceremony was over, delivered to the embassadors, to be conveyed by them to their master. The embassadors set out without loss of time; but were scarce gone, when news was brought, that Aridius was landed at Marseilles. Hereupon Clothildis, quitting her chariot, mounted on horseback, and, pursuing her journey with all possible expedition, arrived at the place where Clovis waited for her. In the mean time Aridius, who, on his landing, had been informed of the marriage, flew to court, and, by remonstrating to the king the dangerous consequences of such a match, viz. that Clothildis, mindful of the murder of her father and brothers, would, one day or other, prevail upon her husband to revenge their death, persuaded Gundebald, by whose orders they had been assassinated, to dispatch immediately a body of troops, with orders to bring back Clothildis. But she had already reached Villers, a place in the territory of Troyes, and in that city Clovis waited for his royal bride. However, the soldiers sent by Gundebald seized on her chariot and equipage. Thus the epitomizer of the history of the Franks [y], with whom the author of the Gests of the Franks agrees in the main [z]; but as Gregory of Tours, whom we may call a contemporary writer, takes no notice of the particulars related by them, we cannot help looking upon them as doubtful, if not fabulous.

A few years after, the Alemanns, one of the moſt powerful nations in Germany, having paſſed the Rhine, broke unexpectedly into Germania Secunda, held at that time by the Franks called Ripuarians, who had Sigebert for their king. That prince drew together what forces he could; but not finding himſelf in a condition to make head againſt ſo numerous an army with his own troops, he had recourſe to Clovis, who readily joined him, being glad to lay hold of every opportunity that offered to ſignalize himſelf, and inure his men to the fatigues and dangers of war. The two kings, after their conjunction, marched againſt the Alemanns, and engaged them at a village called Tolbiacum, thought to be the preſent Zulpick, about twelve miles from Cologne. The battle proved very bloody, both parties exerting their utmoſt efforts; but in the end, king Sigebert receiving a wound in his leg, of which he ever after continued lame, the Franks began to give ground; which Clovis no ſooner perceived, than, lifting up his eyes to heaven, ſays Gregory of Tours, he implored the aſſiſtance of Jeſus Chriſt, who, Clothildis had often told him, was the ſon of God, and never failed to aſſiſt thoſe in diſtreſs who put their confidence in him, promiſing at the ſame time to believe in him, and be baptized, if, by granting him a victory, he convinced him of his divine power. He had ſcarce made this promiſe, when the Alemanns, notwithſtanding the advantage they had gained, betook themſelves to a precipitous flight. In this battle their king was killed, and with him moſt of their chief men, which ſo diſheartened them, that they ſubmitted to Clovis, and acknowledged him for their king. Thus Gregory of Tours [p]; whoſe words have induced ſome to believe, that the whole nation of the Alemanns ſubmitted to the king of the Franks. But that writer muſt be underſtood only of ſuch of that nation as had been formerly allowed to continue in the places of Gaul which they had ſeized. For, it is certain, that numbers of them had recourſe to Theoderic king of Italy, who took them under his protection, and permitted them to ſettle in Rhætia and Noricum, then ſubject to him. Nay, that prince wrote to the inhabitants of Noricum, injoining them to ſupply ſuch of the Alemanns, as were not willing to continue there, with freſh oxen to draw their waggons, taking, in exchange, their oxen fatigued with ſo long a march [q]. This letter has been tranſmitted to us by Caſſiodore, with another which Theodoric wrote to Clovis, exhorting him to give over purſuing the flying Alemanns,

He overthrows the Alemanns.

[p] Greg. Tur. l. ii. c. 30. [q] Cassiodor. var. l. ii. ep. 5[illegible] especially especially those who had taken refuge in his dominions [r]. In this letter, after congratulating the king of the Franks on the victory he had gained over so numerous and warlike a nation, and intreating him to spare the remains of that unhappy people, he tells him, that he had sent embassadors to impart to him, by word of mouth, several affairs of the greatest importance, and disclosed to him some secrets, which it greatly concerned him to know. These secrets perhaps related to the conditions of the treaty, which about this time the king of the Burgundians concluded with the emperor Anastasius; and it is not improbable, that Theodoric, who was at variance with the emperor, should propose now that offensive alliance against the Burgundians, which they concluded three years after, as we shall relate anon. Clovis, it seems, at the request of Theodoric, who had married his sister Audefleda, gave over pursuing the Alemanns; of whom part settled in the provinces of Rhætia and Noricum, and part was, by Theodoric, transplanted into Italy, as appears from the panegyric of Ennodius on that prince, where he tells us, that, under Theodoric, Italy was guarded by the Alemanns, who had formerly plundered it; and that unhappy nation, after having lost their king, and been driven from their native country, were become the subjects of a generous and good-natured prince, who had given them a far better country than that which they had been forced to abandon [s]. Such of the Alemanns as settled in Rhætia and Noricum, continued subject to the kings of Italy, till the Ostrogoths yielded to the children of Clovis whatever they held out of that country. From what we have said, it appears, that the Alemanns received a total overthrow at Tolbiac, since, after the battle, they were quite driven out of their country by the two confederate kings of the Franks. The Alemanns in Gaul, masters of a considerable part of the present Switzerland, submitted to Clovis, as we have hinted above, and acknowledged him for their king. Some of that nation had likewise settled in Alsace, and of that country too Clovis made himself master on this occasion, and likewise of the city of Basle; for, among the bishops who subscribed to the first council of Orleans held by order of Clovis in 511, we find the name of Adelphius bishop of Basle; and it is well known, that bishops were not allowed, in those days, to assist in councils that met in places not subject to their prince.

Clovis no sooner returned from pursuing the fugitives, than he acquainted the queen with the vow or promise he had made, acknowledging at the same time, that the victory he had acquired was owing to it. Hereupon Clothildis, without loss of time, dispatched a messenger to Remigius bishop of Rheims, acquainting him with what had happened, and intreating him to hasten to court, in order to instruct the king in the mysteries of the christian religion. Clovis received the holy prelate with the greatest marks of respect and esteem; but being informed, in the several private conferences he had with him, that he must, in the first place, renounce the worship of the gods he had till then adored, he told the bishop, that he was ready to comply with his instructions, but being afraid, lest the Franks, attached to the religion of their forefathers, might thence be prompted to revolt, he begged leave to acquaint them first with his design, and to try, whether the arguments, that had convinced him, might not be of equal weight with them. Having therefore, with this view, assembled the Franks, he no sooner began to speak, than they all cried out, with one voice, We renounce the worship of the false gods, and are ready to acknowledge the God whom the bishop of Rheims preaches. Hereupon the holy prelate, transported with joy, ordered every thing to be got ready for the baptizing of the king, and the ceremony was performed with the greatest pomp and solemnity. When the bishop was upon the point of administring the sacrament, he addressed the king thus: Bow your head with humility, O Sicambrian; adore what you formerly burnt, and burn what you formerly adored. Remigius, adds Gregory of Tours, from whom we have copied this whole account, was, by all his contemporaries, held in great veneration for the holiness of his life; nay, he was even said to have raised one from the dead [t]. With Clovis were baptized, according to the same writer, three thousand of his subjects able to bear arms, and one of his sisters, named Albofleda. At the same time, another sister, by name Lantildis, renounced the errors of Arius, and was received into the church. Albofleda died a few days after she had been baptized; and upon her death Remigius wrote a consolatory letter to the king, whereof the beginning has been transmitted to us by Gregory of Tours [u], and some fragments of it gathered from other writers by Du Chesne [w], to whom we refer the reader. Clovis was not baptized during the solemnity of Easter, as Hincmar [x] and Flodoard have written [y]; but in that of Christmas, as is evident from the letter which Alcimus Avitus, bishop of Vienna, wrote to Clovis, congratulating him upon his conversion. The epitomizer of the history of the Franks tells us, that Remigius having preached to Clovis and those who had been baptized with him, a sermon on the passion of our Saviour, the king, in hearing him, could not forbear crying out, If I had been there with my Franks, that should not have happened [z]. Before his conversion, he had two sons by Clothildis, of whom the eldest, named Ingomer, was baptized, by the care of his pious mother, but died a few days after; which greatly provoked the king, who ascribed his death to his being offered to the God of Clothildis, and not to those of his forefathers. However, the zealous queen caused the other likewise, by name Clodomire, to be baptized, who soon after was seized with a dangerous distemper, which incensed the king anew against his consort; but the child recovered, and the queen never ceased to preach to her husband the true God, whom she adored, till, with the miraculous assistance of Heaven, she brought about his conversion [a]. From the whole account of the conversion and baptism of Clovis, which we have copied from Gregory of Tours, the reader must conclude him to have been, in religious matters, a very credulous writer; but, credulous as he is, he makes no mention of the holy phial, said to have been sent from heaven, wherein is kept the oil with which the French kings are still anointed at their coronation. Of this phial Hincmar gives us the following account: Clovis and St. Remigius were no sooner entered into the baptistery, than all the avenues to it were so filled with the croud, that the ecclesiastic, who carried the holy oil, and was not gone in with them, could by no means find a way through the multitude. Hereupon the holy prelate, not finding the oil when he was to use it, had recourse to heaven, begging with a short, but fervent, prayer, that the want of what was necessary to accomplish the ceremony might be supplied by some means or other. He had scarce done, when a dove, exceeding the very snow in whiteness, was seen carrying a phial filled with oil; which the bishop had no sooner received, than the dove disappeared and was never afterwards seen. With this oil Remigius anointed the king, and the odour it spread was sweet beyond imagination or expression [b]. Of all this, not a word in Gregory of Tours, though a great believer of miracles; which plainly shews, that in his time this fable was not yet invented. It is to be observed, that Clovis was at this time the only catholic prince in the Roman world. Anastasius, emperor of the east, was greatly inclined to the doctrine of Arius. Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths in Italy, Alaric, king of the Visigoths, master of almost all Spain, and of the third part of Gaul, the king of the Burgundians, and the king of the Vandals in Africa, were avowed and zealous followers of that hereſiarch: as for the other kings of the Franks ſettled in Gaul, they were ſtill pagans. No wonder therefore, that not only Anaſtaſius II. then biſhop of Rome, but ſeveral other biſhops, though ſubject to different princes, wrote to the king of the Franks, congratulating him on his converſion, and teſtifying their joy for ſo happy an event [c].

The Armorici ſubmit to Clovis.

BUT to return to the military atchievements of Clovis: the year after his converſion, the Armorici, that is, the people dwelling on the coaſt of the ocean between the Loire and the Seine, who had ſhaken off the Roman yoke, and formed themſelves into a republic, ſubmitted of their own accord to Clovis, and became one nation with the Franks [d]. Hereupon the Roman troops, that were ſtill in Gaul, finding themſelves ſurrounded on all ſides by the enemies of the empire, and not caring to ſerve under the Arians, ſays Procopius, that is, the Burgundians and Viſigoths, capitulated with the Franks and Armorici, and, ſurrendering to them the places they held, entered into their ſervice. Theſe, adds Procopius, ſtill obſerve, both in their attire and manner of marching and fighting, the antient cuſtoms and diſcipline of the Romans [e]. Thus ended the dominion of the Romans in Gaul, after they had been maſters of that country for the ſpace of five hundred years and upwards, which was now held by three different nations, viz. the Franks, the Viſigoths, and the Burgundians. To the above-mentioned union of the Armorici with the Franks, Procopius, who flouriſhed ſoon after, aſcribes the great power which the Franks had already attained in his time (H). (H) The union of the Armorici with the Franks is founded chiefly on the authority of Procopius; but, in the text of that writer, the people, who ſubmitted to the Franks, are called Arborici. However, all thoſe, who have had occaſion to ſpeak of this event, read, as we have done, Armorici inſtead of Arborici (1); except father Daniel, who, contrary to the opinion of all thoſe who wrote before him, maintains, that in the reign of Clovis there was a people in Gaul called Arborici. But, in the firſt place, that nation was utterly unknown to Cluverius, who, ſpeaking of them, expreſſes himſelf thus: Who theſe Arborici were, no writer has been yet able of the Armorici with the Franks, Theodoric, king of Italy, be- in resolved to make war on the Burgundians, in order to recover that part of Gaul which was held by them, and had been formerly subject to Rome, entered into an offensive alliance with Clovis, at that time the most powerful prince in Gaul. In virtue of this treaty, they were to fall upon the king of the Burgundians at the same time, and, if attended with success, divide his dominions between them: if either of them should fail to take the field at the time appointed, and the other, by that means, be obliged to fight alone against the king of the Burgundians, he, who had not fulfilled his engagement, should pay to the other a certain sum, and not receive any share of the conquered king's dominions, till he had paid it [f]. Of this war Gregory of Tours gives us the following account: At this time Gundebald and his brother Godegiselus reigned over the Burgundians who were masters of the countries lying on the Rhone and the Saone, and of the province of Marseilles. Both prinees to discover (z). Father Daniel, in the map which he has prefixed to his history, places them between the Meuse, the ocean, and the Escault. But he is therein certainly mistaken; for in none of the notitias, or descriptions of Gaul, which have reached our times, and were composed under the last emperors, mention is made of the Arborici, who must have been a very numerous people, though all the other nations inhabiting Gaul and Belgica Secunda, are there minutely described. Apollinaris Sidonius, Salvianus, and Avitus, frequently enumerate the various nations that, in the fifth century, were settled in Gaul, but no mention is made of the Arborici by any of them. Besides, if the Arborici had dwelt in the country allotted them, by father Daniel, on the most distant borders of Belgica Secunda, how could their joining the Franks oblige, as we read in Procopius, the Roman troops, who guarded the Loire, to capitulate with Clovis? For these reasons, all those who have had occasion to speak of the Armorici, even after father Daniel published the first volume of his history have read Armorici instead of Arborici; nay, Hertius (3), Eccard (4), and father Lobineau (5), cannot help expressing great surprise, that such an able writer as father Daniel should be guilty of so gross a mistake. Had he read Procopius, says Eccard, with more attention, he would himself have been convinced of his error. In the same passage we find, in the text of Procopius, Eridanus instead of Rhodanus, which mistake, as well as that of Arborici instead of Armorici, ought to be charged upon the transcribers, and not to the author, who had lived too long in Italy not to know, that the Po was a river of that coutry, and not of Gaul.

were Arians, as well as their ſubjects. However, as the two brothers were at variance, Godegiſelus privately concluded an alliance with Clovis, whoſe troops were in great repute. The articles of this treaty were: That Godegiſelus ſhould, by ſome means or other, get the whole power into his hands, and thereupon pay an annual tribute to the king of the Franks. Purſuant to this agreement, Clovis took the field, and in an hoſtile manner entered the dominions of Gundebald, who immediately diſpatched a meſſenger to his brother, of whom he did not entertain the leaſt jealouſy or ſuſpicion, intreating him to march without delay to his aſſiſtance, which Godigiſelus promiſed to do; but, when the two armies joined battle, inſtead of affording him the promiſed aſſiſtance, he fell unexpectedly upon his brother's troops, who, finding themſelves attacked at the ſame time in the front and the rear, betook themſelves, after a faint oppoſition, to a precipitous flight. This battle was fought at Divio, now Dijon, on the Ouſche; and from thence Gundebald, upon the defeat of his army, fled to Avenio, now Avignon, and ſhut himſelf up in that city. Upon his flight Godegiſelus ſeized on his dominions, and cauſed himſelf to be acknowledged at Vienne, the capital of his brother's kingdom [g]. Clovis purſued the fugitive king to Avignon, and laid cloſe ſiege to that city, with a deſign to take him priſoner, and afterwards diſpoſe of him as he and Godegiſelus ſhould think proper. But in the mean time, Aredius, or Aridius, one of Gundebald's miniſters, a perſon of extraordinary parts, and greatly attached to his maſter's intereſt, pretending to have abandoned him upon ſome diſguſt, went over to Clovis, and, being received by him with the greateſt marks of eſteem, he prevailed upon him by degrees, with arguments drawn from the uncertainty of fortune, to raiſe the ſiege of a place which he ſaid was impregnable, and content himſelf with a yearly tribute, which Gundebald readily agreed to pay him. Clovis was no ſooner returned to his dominions, than Gundebald, having aſſembled what forces he could, marched with all poſſible expedition to Vienne, where Godegiſelus then reſided, and, having got into the town, with a choſen body of men, through an equeduct, at his firſt appearing, ſtruck the king and the garriſon with ſuch terror, that, believing the enemy maſter of the city, they only thought of ſaving themſelves in the churches. But Godegiſelus was, by his brother's orders, killed in his aſylum, with a biſhop who had there taken refuge with him. A ſmall body of Franks, who had remained with Godegiſelus, withdrew into a tower, with a deſign to defend themſelves there; but being in the end forced to ſubmit,

Gundebald

Gundebald only disarmed them, and sent them thus disarmed to Alaric king of the Visigoths. But as for the senators and chief men, who had declared for Godegiselus, he ordered them all to be put to death. Gundebald, continues our historian being, by the death of his brother, become master of the whole country now known by the name of Burgundy, published a new code, containing several laws in favour of his Roman subjects, that they might be no longer oppressed by the Burgundians [h].

Gregory of Tours, in his account of this war, has omitted, as the reader must have observed, such events as belonged to the history of the Ostrogoths; and, on the other hand, Procopius takes very little notice of those that belonged to the history of the Franks. The former writer thought, perhaps, an account of what the Ostrogoths performed in, or acquired by, this war, foreign to his purpose; and the latter contented himself with a detail of those events in which the Ostrogoths were chiefly concerned; since, in this war, they made themselves masters of several cities in Gaul, which they still held, when Justinian, whose wars with them he describes, undertook to subdue them. The account he gives, after the conclusion of the above-mentioned treaty between the Franks and the Ostrogoths, is as follows: Pursuant to this treaty, the king of the Franks took the field with a numerous army, and entered the territories of the Burgundians in an hostile manner. Theodoric, on the contrary, pretending to hasten his warlike preparations, ordered them privately to be carried on slowly, with a design to wait the issue of the first engagement between his ally and the king of the Burgundians. When the troops were, in the end, ready to take the field, he gave private orders to his generals to advance with slow marches, till such time as they had received certain intelligence of the success that had attended the Franks. If the Franks had defeated the Burgundians, the Ostrogoths were to advance with all possible expedition; but to halt, and wait for further orders, if the Burgundians had gained the advantage. While the Ostrogoths, therefore, were yet on their march, the Franks alone engaged and put to flight the common enemy, pursuing them to the farthest borders of their country, where they had several strong-holds, in which they shut themselves up, abandoning the rest of their territories to the conquerors. Upon the first news of this victory, Theodoric's army marched, with all possible expedition, to join the Franks, and, alledging the badness of the roads, as an excuse for their coming so late, offered to the king of the Franks the sum, which, agreeable to the treaty, they had forfeited by their delay. Clovis accepted

the offer, and, upon his receiving the money, divided with the Ostrogoths, pursuant to the same treaty, the country he had conquered. The conduct of Theodoric, on this occasion, continues our historian, was a strong proof of his wisdom and prudence, since, without exposing the lives of his subjects, and only by paying a small sum, he acquired one half of his enemy's country [i], viz. the city of Marseilles and its territory, with all the countries lying between the Durance, the Alps, the Mediterranean, and the Lower Rhone.

Some writers are of opinion, that Gregory of Tours and Procopius speak of different wars. Clovis, according to them, waged war with the Burgundians at two different times. In the first of these wars, he had Godegiselus, the brother of Gundebald, for his ally, and, in the second, Theodoric king of the Ostrogoths. But this does not at all agree with what we read in Marius Aventicensis, a contemporary writer, who, speaking of the war in the year 500, in which Gundebald was defeated in the neighbourhood of Dijon, that is, of the war described by Gregory of Tours, concludes thus: Gundebald, therefore, having recovered, upon the death of his brother, his own dominions, and likewise made himself master of those that had belonged to Godegiselus, governed them with great prosperity to the day of his death [k]. This we cannot persuade ourselves the bishop of Avanches would have written, had Gundebald, after his restoration in 500, been engaged in such an unsuccessful war as that of which Procopius speaks. However, we cannot help thinking it very strange, that Procopius should not mention the alliance of the Franks with Godegiselus, nor Gregory of Tours that of the Ostrogoths with the Franks. 'Tis true, both historians agree in some particulars, viz. that in the very beginning of this war a decisive battle was fought, in which the Burgundians were utterly defeated by the Franks; and that, after their defeat, they took refuge in their fortified towns, situated on the most distant borders of their country. Besides, it appears, from the acts of a conference held at Lyons on religious matters, in the year 499, that Clovis, who was then preparing to make war on the Burgundians, had already entered into an alliance with a prince who was then at war with them. This ally could neither be Godegiselus nor Alaric king of the Visigoths; for the alliance of the former with the king of the Franks was kept secret till the battle of Dijon, fought, according to the bishop of Avanches [l] and the best chronologers, the following year 500. As for Alaric, he was not at war with the Burgundians; since their king ſent, as we have related above, the Franks, whom he had taken at Vienne, to be kept by him. As it appears, therefore, from hence, that Clovis had Theodoric for his ally in the war which he waged with the Burgundians in 500, we may well ſuppoſe Procopius to have ſpoken of this war without recurring to a ſecond. To conclude; if Gregory of Tours and Procopius ſpeak of different wars, they are both highly to blame, the former for taking no notice of the ſecond war, and the latter for being quite ſilent as to the firſt. Clovis was ſo far from revenging the death of Godegiſelus his friend and ally, that, on the contrary, he reſtored to Gundebald, no doubt in virtue of ſome treaty unknown to us, that part of his dominions which had fallen to his ſhare. As for Theodoric, he kept the city of Marſeilles and ſome adjacent places, which Gundebald perhaps yielded to him, in virtue of a treaty of marriage concluded this year between Segiſmund the ſon of Gundebald, and Oſtrogotha one of Theodoric's daughters.

Clovis had ſcarce concluded a peace with the Burgundians, when, ſome differences ariſing between him and Alaric king of the Viſigoths, both princes began to prepare for war; which Theodoric, king of the Oſtrogoths, no ſooner underſtood, than he interpoſed his good offices, and offered his mediation, ſending both to them, and to the kings of the Burgundians, the Heruli, the Varni, and the Thuringians, letters on that ſubject, which are ſtill to be ſeen in Caſſiodore[m]. He adviſes Alaric not to be too confident on the reputation of his Viſigoths, for the great things formerly atchieved by them; but bids him conſider what an alteration long peace and idleneſs may have wrought in them: he tells him, that paſſion is a bad counſellor, and not only prompts men to take pernicious reſolutions, but to make choice of the worſt means to put them in execution; that war ought to be looked upon as the laſt reſource, and never ought to be entered into by princes, till all other methods of obtaining what is due to them in juſtice have proved unſucceſsful: he therefore exhorts him to forbear all hoſtilities againſt the king of the Franks till the return of the embaſſadors, whom he deſigned to ſend to that prince with an offer of his mediation, in order to prevent either of the two princes, ſo nearly allied to him, from aggrandizing himſelf at the expence of the other. He cloſes his letter thus: It is not to revenge the blood of your fathers, or to recover part of your dominions unjuſtly ſeized and detained by either of you, that you take arms againſt each other, but only on account of ſome unguarded words; ſo that your differences may be eaſily compoſed, if not heightened by un-

the offer, and, upon his receiving the money, divided with the Ostrogoths, pursuant to the same treaty, the country he had conquered. This we cannot persuade ourselves the bishop of Avanches would have written, had Gundebald, after his restoration in 500, been engaged in such an unsuccessful war as that of which Procopius speaks. However, we cannot help thinking it very strange, that Procopius should not mention the alliance of the Franks with Godegiselus, nor Gregory of Tours that of the Ostrogoths with the Franks. 'Tis true, both historians agree in some particulars, viz. that in the very beginning of this war a decisive battle was fought, in which the Burgundians were utterly defeated by the Franks; and that, after their defeat, they took refuge in their fortified towns, situated on the most distant borders of their country. Besides, it appears, from the acts of a conference held at Lyons on religious matters, in the year 499, that Clovis, who was then preparing to make war on the Burgundians, had already entered into an alliance with a prince who was then at war with them. This ally could neither be Godegiselus nor Alaric king of the Visigoths; for the alliance of the former with the king of the Franks was kept secret till the battle of Dijon, fought, according to the bishop of Avanches [l] and the best chronologers, the following year 500. As for Alaric, he was not at war with the Burgundians; since their king ſent, as we have related above, the Franks, whom he had taken at Vienne, to be kept by him. As it appears, therefore, from hence, that Clovis had Theodoric for his ally in the war which he waged with the Burgundians in 500, we may well ſuppoſe Procopius to have ſpoken of this war without recurring to a ſecond. To conclude; if Gregory of Tours and Procopius ſpeak of different wars, they are both highly to blame, the former for taking no notice of the ſecond war, and the latter for being quite ſilent as to the firſt. Clovis was ſo far from revenging the death of Godegiſelus his friend and ally, that, on the contrary, he reſtored to Gundebald, no doubt in virtue of ſome treaty unknown to us, that part of his dominions which had fallen to his ſhare. As for Theodoric, he kept the city of Marſeilles and ſome adjacent places, which Gundebald perhaps yielded to him, in virtue of a treaty of marriage concluded this year between Segiſmund the ſon of Gundebald, and Oſtrogotha one of Theodoric's daughters.

Clovis had ſcarce concluded a peace with the Burgundians, when, ſome differences ariſing between him and Alaric king of the Viſigoths, both princes began to prepare for war; which Theodoric, king of the Oſtrogoths, no ſooner underſtood, than he interpoſed his good offices, and offered his mediation, ſending both to them, and to the kings of the Burgundians, the Heruli, the Varni, and the Thuringians, letters on that ſubject, which are ſtill to be ſeen in Caſſiodore [m]. He adviſes Alaric not to be too confident on the reputation of his Viſigoths, for the great things formerly atchieved by them; but bids him conſider what an alteration long peace and idleneſs may have wrought in them: he tells him, that paſſion is a bad counſellor, and not only prompts men to take pernicious reſolutions, but to make choice of the worſt means to put them in execution; that war ought to be looked upon as the laſt reſource, and never ought to be entered into by princes, till all other methods of obtaining what is due to them in juſtice have proved unſucceſsful: he therefore exhorts him to forbear all hoſtilities againſt the king of the Franks till the return of the embaſſadors, whom he deſigned to ſend to that prince with an offer of his mediation, in order to prevent either of the two princes, ſo nearly allied to him, from aggrandizing himſelf at the expence of the other. He cloſes his letter thus: It is not to revenge the blood of your fathers, or to recover part of your dominions unjuſtly ſeized and detained by either of you, that you take arms againſt each other, but only on account of ſome unguarded words; ſo that your differences may be eaſily compoſed, if not heightened by the seasonable hostilities. Give me leave, therefore, to acquaint Clovis, before you come to an open rupture, that he shall have me too for his enemy, if he makes war upon you. When justice speaks to princes with a sword in her hand, they readily hearken to her. We have therefore dispatched embassadors to you, who will farther acquaint you, by word of mouth, with our intention. We have ordered them to repair afterwards to the courts of the king of the Burgundians, and of such other princes as you shall think proper, and to act there pursuant to the instructions they shall receive from you. Above all things, take care you be not the first in committing hostilities; lest you should incur the hatred which all men bear to the violaters of treaties. Persuade yourself, that we are so far from sowing the seeds of discord among our neighbours, in order to take advantage of their misfortunes, that we shall look upon those, who fall upon you, as a common enemy, and act accordingly [n]. In his letter to Luduin, for so he calls Clovis, he tells that prince, that he cannot but wonder he should be so easily provoked, and, upon so slight an occasion, make war upon Alaric, being uncle to his wife Theodogotha; that their common enemies wished for nothing so much as to see the Franks and Visigoths weakening and destroying each other: he bids him consider, that they are both kings of powerful nations, and in the flower of their age; and therefore that they ought the more to be upon their guard against evil counsellors, lest they should, by rashly entering into a war, bring their kingdoms to the brink of ruin. He proposes the mediation of the neighbouring princes, and advises him to sheath his sword, which he could not in honour see drawn by either of them: he concludes by threatening to make war upon the first, whether Luduin or Alaric, who should commit hostilities against the other, and by assuring both, that the advice he gave them proceeded from the most sincere friendship, since none but a true friend, who was far from envying their prosperity, would advise them as he had done. In his letter to Gundebald, he tells that prince, that he thinks himself bound in duty to moderate the ardour of two young princes, whose conduct is condemned by all men of experience and prudence; that they ought to hearken to those, who, by their age and experience, are entitled to advise them; that he cannot suffer two princes, who are both nearly allied to him, to destroy each other, and therefore is resolved to declare against him, who shall first commit hostilities: he adds, that he has dispatched embassadors to him, with orders to repair afterwards to the court of the king of the Franks, with the deputies of the other princes his friends and allies, to negotiate an accommodation between the contending parties. He closes his letter with advising the king of the Burgundians to act in concert with him, and do all that lies in his power to prevent a war, which, should they be remiss in their good offices, the world will believe to have been under-hand kindled by them. In these letters Theodoric pretends to stand quite neuter, and to have taken no other resolution, but that of declaring against the aggressor, whether Clovis or Alaric; but in the letter he wrote to the three brothers, Hermanafred, Baderic, and Berthier, who at that time reigned jointly over the Heruli, the Varni, and the Thuringians, he betrays great partiality for Alaric, and no small prejudice against Clovis. It was couched in the following terms: The proud are detested by Heaven, and it is incumbent on every man to curb their arrogance. He who seeks to oppress a people, whom every nation would be glad to have for neighbours, shews but too plainly, that he only wants an opportunity of treating all other princes in the like manner. A prince, who pays no regard to the laws of equity, thinks every thing lawful when he has been once attended with success in an unjust attempt: such a prince ought to be abhorred by all mankind. It behoves therefore you, whose valour is capable of stemming the most unbounded ambition, to prevent the execution of such iniquitous projects. Begin with joining your embassadors to those whom king Gundebald and we have dispatched to the king of the Franks, in order to divert him from falling upon the Visigoths, and persuade him to pay due regard to the laws of equity, and right of nations. If he refuses to submit to the arbitration of so many powerful princes, let him be deemed the common enemy of mankind. And truly what else can a prince, who is actuated by good principles, wish for, than to have such mediators, who readily take upon them to see justice done him, if he has been wronged? To speak my sentiments openly; a prince, who pays no regard to the law of nations, must necessarily be hatching dangerous projects, which may end in the ruin of other states. Let us therefore stem the torrent at its source, and cover the countries that are exposed to his ravages, lest they should feel, before they are aware, the direful effects of his fury. You remember, without all doubt, the many favours you have received at the hands of Euric, the father of Alaric, the magnificent presents he often sent you, the efforts he made, and the vast charge he was at, to prevent the neighbouring nations from making incursions into your territories. It is now time to repay to the son the good offices of the father. If the king of the Franks is inclined to aggrandize himself at the expence of his neighbours, the most distant nations will be no longer safe. These are the motives that have induced us to dispatch embassadors to you, who will farther inform you of our sentiments by word of mouth, and to whom, after seeing their credentials, you may give intire credit. We exhort you therefore to enter into the measures we have taken to secure the public tranquillity, and to concern yourselves in what passes in the neighbouring countries, that you may not have a war in your own [o]. From these letters it appears, that Theodoric entertained no small jealousy of Clovis, and was greatly prejudiced against him. But the king of the Franks, not thinking it advisable to break with the Visigoths at this juncture, forbore all hostilities till five years after, that is, till the year 507, and in the mean time, probably, consented to that interview with Alaric which Gregory of Tours speaks of: for, according to that historian, Alaric, alarmed at the conquests Clovis was daily making, dispatched embassadors to him, inviting him to an interview. With this invitation Clovis readily complied; so that the two princes met in an island formed by the Loire, over-against Amboise, a place in the territory of Tours. There they conferred, and, having dined together, they parted, promising to live in friendship and amity with each other [p]. This is all we find in Gregory of Tours concerning this interview. But to his account historians, who came after him, have added several particulars, which we look upon as fabulous, since they have not been mentioned by him; namely, that Alaric laid snares for Clovis, which he happily escaped; a circumstance that seems to have been invented to justify the war which Clovis made a few years after on Alaric, that is, in 507.

Interview between Clovis and Alaric.

Clovis makes war on the Visigoths.

OF this war Gregory of Tours gives us the following account: In those days most people in Gaul were desirous of living under the dominion of the Franks, and, among the rest, Quintianus, bishop of Rhodes; which the Visigoths being well apprised of, they resolved to dispatch him, lest he should betray that city to them. But the holy prelate, receiving timely notice of their design, made his escape in the night, and retired into Auvergne. When Clovis heard of the treatment Quintianus had met with from the Visigoths, It grieves me, said he, turning to his people, that these Arians should hold any thing in Gaul: let us march against them, and, with the assistance of Heaven, make ourselves masters of the fine country they possess. His speech being received by all with loud acclamations, he began his march without loss of time, bending his route to Poictiers,

where Alaric then was. On his arrival at the Vienne, he found the enemy encamped on the oppoſite bank, and that river ſo ſwelled with the heavy rains that had fallen for ſeveral days together, that it was not then fordable, nor could he attempt to lay bridges over it, or convey his men in boats to the oppoſite bank, without expoſing them to the greateſt and almoſt inevitable dangers, the other ſide of the river being all along lined with the enemy's troops. This gave Clovis great uneaſineſs, who thereupon continued all night in prayer; and the next morning a hind of an extraordinary ſize was ſeen by the whole army to enter the river, and ford it, as if ſent by Heaven on purpoſe to point out to the Franks the place where the Vienne, notwithſtanding the depth of its waters, was fordable. The whole army followed their guide, and, having croſſed the river without the loſs of a man, encamped in ſight of Poictiers. While he lay there, he obſerved, one night, a globe of fire over the church of St. Hilarius, in the city of Poictiers, darting rays towards his camp, and, as it were, inviting him to engage, without loſs of time, the king of the Viſigoths, who had his head-quarters in that city. Accordingly Clovis immediately ſet out anew on his march, and, coming up with the enemy in the plain of Vouglé, about ten miles from Poictiers, he gave them a total overthrow. In this battle moſt part of the enemy's troops were cut off, and the reſt obliged to take refuge in their ſtrong-holds and fortified towns. Clovis diſtinguiſhed himſelf on this occaſion in a moſt eminent manner, and killed, as all writers agree, the king of the Viſigoths with his own hand; but was himſelf in the utmoſt danger, two of Alaric's guards having attacked him while he was engaged with their king; but his breaſt-plate being proof againſt their lances, he happily eſcaped[q]. Gregory of Tours does not mention the number of the dead; but only tells us, that moſt of the inhabitants of Auvergne, who, under the conduct of Apollinaris, came to the aſſiſtance of Alaric, were cut off, and that among the dead there were many ſenators and perſons of diſtinction (I). Of this battle Procopius gives us a very ſuccinct account. That writer, after relating what we have inſerted above of the war which Clovis and Theodoric made jointly on the Burgundians in the year 500,

Whom he defeats, and kills their king. Year after Chriſt 507.

(I) Apollinaris, who commanded the troops of Auvergne, was the ſon of the celebrated Apollinaris Sidonius by Papianilla, daughter to the emperor Avitus. Moſt of his men were killed in the battle of Vouglé; but he had the good luck to eſcape the general ſlaughter. continues thus: The power of the Franks being considerably increased, they no longer paid any regard to Theodoric, but, free from all fear, made war upon Alaric, king of the Visigoths. That prince was no sooner acquainted with their design, than he had recourse to Theodoric, who immediately put himself at the head of his army, and marched to the assistance of his son-in-law. In the mean time the Visigoths, upon intelligence, that the enemy began to appear upon the frontiers of Poictou, posted themselves under the walls of Poictiers, and kept some days within their trenches, waiting the arrival of the Ostrogoths. This highly affronted the Visigoths, who, thinking themselves a match for the Franks without the assistance of any other nation, forced Alaric in the end to engage the enemy before he was joined by Theodoric. But the Visigoths were defeated, and great numbers of them killed on the spot, and, among the rest, their king [r]. We are told by several writers, who lived in those times, or soon after, that Clovis had for his ally in this war Gundebald king of the Burgundians [s]; and from Gregory of Tours it appears, that a body of Ripuarian Franks joined him before the battle under the conduct of Chloderic, the eldest son of Sigebert king of that tribe [t]. The battle of Vouglé was fought in the year 507, the emperor Anastasius being consul the third time in the east, and Venantius Decius in the west. As Clovis was chiefly prompted by his zeal for the catholic faith, to make war upon Alaric, an Arian prince, no wonder that Gregory of Tours, an ecclesiastic and credulous writer, should believe and gravely relate the miracles that were said to have been wrought by Heaven in his favour, but were utterly unknown to Procopius.

The Franks make themselves masters of several places.

Clovis, taking advantage of the consternation the Visigoths were in on the defeat of their army and the death of the king, dispatched his son Theodoric, with part of his forces, to reduce the Albigeois, Rovergne, and Auvergne; which he did accordingly, making himself master of all the places in that tract between the confines of the Visigoths and those of the Burgundians [u]. Clovis, with the rest of the army, advanced to Carcassone, and laid close siege to that place; but being informed, that Theodoric was drawing near at the head of his Ostrogoths, he thought it advisable to retire. However, he made himself master of that part of Gaul which lies between the Rhône and the ocean, that is, of the two Aquitains [w]. After this he took up his winter-quarters in Bourdeaux, whither he caused great part of the treaſures of Alaric to be conveyed from Toloſe. Early in the ſpring he took the field, and laid ſiege to Engouleme, which he ſoon reduced. Our credulous hiſtorian tells us, that the walls of that city fell as ſoon as Clovis appeared before them, and that thereupon the Viſigoths evacuated that place, and the inhabitants, with great joy, took the oath of allegiance to the king of the Franks [x]. From Engouleme the Franks and the Burgundians, their allies in this war, advanced to the city of Arles, which it was of the utmoſt importance for them to reduce; ſince, by the reduction of it, all communication would be cut off between the province, which the Oſtrogoths poſſeſſed in Gaul, and that part of the province of Narbonne, which was ſtill held by the Viſigoths. The Franks, upon their arrival before the place, attempted to make themſelves maſters of a bridge on the Rhône, and, by that means, of an iſland named Camargue, which is formed by the Rhône, on which Arles ſtands, dividing itſelf there into two arms. The Viſigoths made a vigorous reſiſtance, and in the end obliged the Franks to retire, who thereupon croſſed the river in boats, and joined the Burgundians encamped on the oppoſite bank. The ſiege, of which we know but very few particulars, muſt have laſted ſome time; for, from ſeveral antient records and letters, it appears, that the inhabitants ſuffered greatly by famine, and that the city was reduced to the utmoſt extremity [y]. But in the end the Franks were obliged, by the troops which Theodoric ſent to the relief of the place, to abandon the enterpriſe, and retire. Of this event Caſſiodore ſpeaks thus: In the conſulſhip of Venantius the younger and Celer, our ſovereign Theodoric ſent an army into Gaul, where the depredations of the Franks had occaſioned great confuſion. By this army the enemy was defeated, and put to flight, and great part of the country reduced [z]. From the life of Cæſarius, at that time biſhop of Arles, which was written ſoon after the ſiege, it appears, that the Franks and Burgundians were cloſely purſued in their retreat by the Oſtrogoths, who cut many of them in pieces, and took an incredible number of captives [a]. In this war Theodoric made himſelf maſter of Avignon, and ſome other places belonging to the Burgundians [b]. But no mention is made by any of the antients of his making himſelf maſter of any town or country ſubject to the Franks.

They lay ſiege to Arles.

Which they are obliged to raiſe with great loſs.

THE following year 509, Hilba, one of Theodoric's generals, gained a memorable victory over the Franks, of whom thirty thouſand, if Jornandes is to be credited [c], were killed upon the spot. Soon after, a peace was concluded between Theodoric and Clovis, whereof one of the articles was, that the Franks should keep the countries, which they had taken from the Visigoths [d]; which inclines us to question the truth of what Jornandes writes concerning the memorable victory of the Ostrogoths over the Franks, the more as no mention is made of it by Procopius; nay, that writer tells us in express terms, that Theodoric yielded to the Franks the countries they had seized, after he had attempted in vain to drive them out of them. Amalaric, the grandson of Theodoric, was, at this time, king of the Visigoths; but, as he was yet under age, Theodoric, who was his guardian, exercised the same authority in the young prince's dominions, as he did in his own. By this peace, the power of the Visigoths was greatly impaired; for nothing now remained to them in Gaul, but the city of Narbonne, and five or six other cities within the district of that metropolis. As for the Ostrogoths, they continued masters of the province they held before, lying between the Alps, the Mediterranean, the Rhone, and the Durance, and appropriated to themselves the city of Arles, for the charges they had been at in this war. A peace being thus concluded, Clovis repaired to Tours, and there received the embassadors who had been sent to him by the emperor Anastasius, with the ensigns and ornaments of the consulship; for that prince, hearing of his great exploits, thought it advisable, by such a kind of empty respect, to gain his favour, the rather as Theodoric and the emperor were, at this time, at variance, for the Ostrogoths had seized on Pannonia, and the Romans, under the conduct of Romanus, were ravaging the coasts of Italy.

Clovis honoured with the consulship, conferred on him by the emperor Anastasius

Clovis, having received the presents sent him by the emperor, and the rescript of his election, appeared first in the great church of St. Martin, with the tunica trabeata, the chlamys, and the other ensigns of his new dignity, and from thence rode, with a diadem on his head, to the cathedral, throwing gold and silver to the populace, who, in great crouds, attended him. From that time forwards he was acknowledged, concludes Gregory of Tours, as consul and emperor [e]. From which words as consul, and from his name not being found in the fasti, some authors conclude, not the real and ordinary, but only the titular and honorary consulship to have been conferred upon him. In all the fasti, that have been transmitted to us, Boetius alone is marked as consul of the year 510. Boetius was one of Theodoric's ministers, and is no less known by his writings, than by his misfortunes. To this objection some answer, that, in Gaul, all the public registers were kept at Arles, at that

that time subject to Theodoric, who, envying the king of the Franks his new dignity, would not suffer his name to be registered in the fasti. But this answer is of no weight, since the name of Boetius alone is to be found, not only in the fasti written in Gaul, but in all others. Baronius is of opinion, that only the titular or honorary consulship was offered him by Anastasius; and that he, thinking it below him to accept of such a dignity, refused the emperor's offer. But this opinion evidently contradicts Gregory of Tours, who lived soon after Clovis, and must have been acquainted with several persons who had seen that prince. Besides, even the honorary consulship was often conferred on the kings of the barbarians, and other very deserving and eminent persons, as is manifest from innumerable instances in history. From Tours, where Clovis had taken the ensigns of consul, he repaired to Paris, which city he chose for the usual place of his residence, and fixed the royal seat there[t]. This metropolis was deemed of such importance, that the grand-children of Clovis, in dividing his dominion among them, agreed, that it should not be comprised in any lot, but remain common to all; and that none of them should enter it without the express consent of the rest, on pain of forfeiting his whole share. Paris has been the seat of the French monarchy ever since the time of Clovis, who first resided there. The kingdoms, over which his grand-children reigned, after the division of his dominions, had each its particular metropolis; but Paris still continued to be the metropolis of the whole monarchy.

He fixes his royal seat at Paris. Year after Christ 510

Clovis had hitherto greatly inlarged his dominions at the expence of the Visigoths, as we have related above; but now he formed a design of causing himself to be acknowledged king by the other tribes of the Franks, who were governed by their own princes, and, by adding their dominions and forces to his own, establish his kingdom so firmly in Gaul, that it should be out of the power of any other prince to overturn it. This he accomplished, and in the following manner, which no-ways redounds to his glory, though related by Gregory of Tours, his panegyrist rather than historian. While he resided at Paris, says that writer, by his emissaries he represented to Chloderic, the son of Sigebert, that his father was now stricken in years, and moreover lame of the wound he had received at the battle of Tolbiac, assuring him at the same time, that he was resolved to espouse his cause, and maintain him on the throne after the death of his father. Chloderic, depending upon the promises of Clovis, suffered himself to be so blinded by his ambition, as to commit a parricide; for one day, while Sigebert, who had paſſed the Rhine to take the air in the foreſt of Buchovia, was ſleeping after dinner, he was diſpatched by two aſſaſſins hired for that purpoſe by his ſon. A few days after, Chloderic was overtaken by the like fate; for having acquainted Clovis with the death of his father, and deſired him at the ſame time to ſend proper perſons to take poſſeſſion of the deceaſed prince's treaſures, which were at his diſpoſal, one of thoſe, who were ſent to view the treaſures (for Clovis declared he did not want them), bid Chloderic thruſt down his hand, and ſearch one of the deepeſt cheſts to the bottom; but the prince had no ſooner inclined his body, in compliance with his requeſt, than, with his battle-ax, he gave him a blow on the head, which daſhed out his brains. Clovis, upon the news of his death, flew to the place, where the murder had been committed; and having aſſembled the ſubjects of Sigebert, he aſſured them, that he was no-ways privy to the death either of the father or the ſon; but that the father had been barbarouſly aſſaſſinated by the ſon, and the inhuman parricide, by a juſt puniſhment from Heaven, put to death by perſons to him utterly unknown. He concluded his harangue by adviſing them, ſince they were deſtitute of a prince and leader, to chuſe him for their king, aſſuring them, that he was ready to defend them againſt all their enemies at the expence of his own life. His ſpeech was received with loud ſhouts of joy; and he had ſcarce done, when he was, with one voice, proclaimed by the multitude king of their tribe [g]. Thus Clovis made himſelf maſter of the dominions and ſubjects of Sigebert, adding the ſubjects of that unfortunate prince to his own.

He is proclaimed king of the Ripuarian Franks.

Gregory of Tours cloſes his account of the murder of Sigebert, and his ſon Chloderic, with the following words: Thus were the enemies of Clovis delivered up daily into his hands by Providence, becauſe his intention was upright, and his conduct pleaſing to Heaven [h]. Some writers, to excuſe Clovis, and indeed Gregory of Tours for ſpeaking thus of a prince guilty of ſuch enormities, ſuppoſe Sigebert, and his ſon Chloderic, to have been the aggreſſors, and to have made ſome attempt upon the life of Clovis; but of this not a word in Gregory of Tours, who would not, as we conceive, have paſſed over in ſilence ſuch an attempt, ſince it might, in ſome degree, have extenuated, in the eyes of the world, the guilt of Clovis, in whoſe favour that writer was greatly prejudiced. Beſides, let the provocation be ever ſo great, the ſtirring up a ſon to imbrue his hands in the blood of his father, muſt be highly criminal. We cannot therefore conceive what could induce our hiſtorian, after relating the murder of the father by the ſon at the inſtigation of Clovis, and of the ſon by the emiſſaries of that prince, to add what we have inſerted above, viz. that Providence delivered his enemies into his hands, becauſe his intention was upright, and his conduct pleaſing to Heaven. By his upright intention the biſhop meant perhaps his intention of gaining the Ripuarian Franks over to the chriſtian religion; for both they, and the two princes, were ſtill pagans, whereas Clovis was a zealous profeſſor of the catholic faith. This alone, as we apprehend, could excuſe, and, in the opinion of our hiſtorian, even ſanctify, the moſt inhuman and unnatural murders. Be that as it will, Clovis, by the death of thoſe two princes, became maſter of the whole country held by the Ripuarian Franks, which, according to the moſt probable opinion, extended weſt of the Rhine as far as the river Fuld, and on the eaſt to the city of Chalons on the Marne, having Cologne for its metropolis. The country, lying weſt of the Rhine, was part of antient France, which the Ripuarians had defended againſt the efforts of the Thuringians, attempting to drive them from thence. Some time before the invaſion of Attila, they croſſed the Rhine, and, being allowed to ſettle in the parts of Gaul bordering on that river, they extended, by degrees, their territories to Chalons. In the life of St. Meſmin, the ſecond abbot of Mici, in the dioceſe of Orleans, and the cotemporary with Clovis, which was written ſoon after his death, and likewiſe in a chronicle of the twelfth century, by one Hugo, we find a long account of the ſiege and reduction of Verdun by Clovis, which, according to the beſt chronologers, happened at this time, the inhabitants of that city, who were highly provoked at the treacherous murder of their princes, refuſing to acknowledge him for their king, as we read in the abovementioned chronicle. However, they were in the end obliged to ſubmit, as were ſeveral other cities, which had belonged to Sigebert, and were unwilling to receive Clovis for their king [i]. The Ripuarian Franks ſeem to have been, next to the Salians, the moſt powerful of all the tribes of that nation ſettled in Gaul; for, even after they had acknowledged Clovis for their king, they continued a diſtinct tribe, ſeparated from that of the Salians, had their own code of laws, and lived according to them, even under the kings of the ſecond race. But all the other tribes, after they had ſubmitted to Clovis, were incorporated, and became one people, with the tribe of the Salians, of which Clovis was king, no further mention being made in hiſtory of the Chatti, Chamavi, Ampſivarii, &c. whoſe names ſo often occur in the hiſtorians, who wrote before that time.

Clovis seizes on the dominions of Chararic, king of another tribe of the Franks.

But to resume the thread of our history: Gregory of Tours, after relating in what manner Clovis united the dominions of Sigebert to his own, gives us an account of the tragical end of Chararic king of those Franks, who, according to the most probable opinion, had settled in the country comprising the present dioceses of Bologne, St. Omer, Bruges, and Ghent. Clovis, says our historian, marched afterwards against Chararic, who, refusing to join him against Syagrius, had waited the issue of the battle, in order to side with the conqueror. Chararic and his son fell into the snare, which Clovis had laid for them, who, having got them in his power, after ordering their hair to be cut, caused the father to be ordained priest, and the son deacon. As Chararic was one day bewailing his hard fate, the son, to alleviate the grief of his disconsolate father; In stripping us of our dignity, says he, and bereaving us of the ensigns of majesty, they have only stripped a green tree of its leaves, which will soon bud anew. May our enemy perish as soon as our hair will grow! Clovis, being informed of this discourse, and not doubting but they intended to let their hair grow, which was a mark of royalty, and, by hiring assassins to murder him, attempt the recovery of their kingdom, resolved to be beforehand with them, and accordingly ordered them to be put to death. The two princes being thus dispatched, he seized on their treasures, made himself master of their country, and obliged their subjects, both Romans and Franks, to acknowledge him for their king [k].

He and his son are put to death by Clovis.

Ragnacharius, king of Cambray, was now the only prince among the Franks, of whom Clovis entertained the least jealousy. He therefore resolved, in the next place, to fall upon him, being well apprised, that, if he were once removed, the kings of the other tribes would be no-ways in a condition to make head against him, even with their united forces. Ragnacharius, as Gregory of Tours takes care to tell us, was a most wicked prince, abandoned to all manner of lewdness, not sparing his own relations, and intirely governed by a favourite minister named Faro, whom he treated rather as his equal than his servant. His debauched life, and the exorbitant power he allowed to his wicked favourite, who was the object of the public hatred, raised an universal discontent among his subjects. This Clovis resolved to improve to his advantage, and, in order to gain over the discontented party, he sent to the leading men among them bracelets of gilt brass, pretending they were of pure gold. When he found he could depend upon those, who had received his presents, he entered unexpectedly the dominions of Regnacharius at the head of a powerful army; which Ragnacharius no sooner understood, than he took the field with what troops he could assemble, in order to oppose the attempts of his rival. When Clovis drew near the place where he was encamped, he sent out some parties to reconnoitre the enemy; but these, being gained over by Clovis, assured him on their return, that the troops he discovered at a distance were his own subjects, coming, pursuant to his orders, to join him. In the mean time, Clovis advanced, and, falling upon Ragnacharius before he could draw up the troops he had with him, put them to flight. The unhappy prince attempted to make his escape; but was taken, together with his brother Richarius, by the traitors he had about him, and both delivered up, with their hands tied behind their backs, to Clovis, who thus addressed Ragnacharius: It was base and scandalous in you to suffer one of our illustrious race to be thus bound, like a publit malefactor. You ought to have avoided, at the expence of a thousand lives, such an ignominious treatment. He had scarce uttered these words, when, with a blow of his battle-ax, he cleaved his head, and laid him dead at his feet. In the same manner he treated Richarius, after upbraiding him with cowardice, for not defending his brother with that courage and resolution, which became one of his blood. In the mean time, those, who had betrayed Ragnacharius, discovering that their bracelets were not of gold, complained thereof to Clovis, who is said to have returned them the following answer: You well know what you have done, and therefore ought not to complain, but deem it a great favour, that I suffer you to live. Clovis, continues our historian, was nearly related to Ragnacharius and Richarius, who had another brother named Regnomer, king of the Franks settled at Mans; and him too Clovis caused to be murdered, making himself master of the dominions and treasures of the three brothers. By the murder of these, and several other princes, of whom, as they were his kinsmen, he entertained some jealousy, he extended his dominion all over Gaul. Having thus dispatched all the princes, who were any-ways related to him, he one day, in the presence of his nobles, bemoaned his condition, saying, That he was, in a manner, a stranger among his own people, having no kinsman to stand by him, in case he wanted his assistance. But this he said, not because he was concerned for their death, but to try whether any one would own himself for his relation, that he might dispatch him, as he had done the others [l]. This is the account Gregory of Tours gives us of the manner, in which Clovis caused himself to be acknowledged king of all the tribes of the Franks settled in Gaul. Whether his intention could be upright, as that writer is pleased to express himself, and his conduct pleasing to Heaven, we leave our readers to judge.

He dies. Year after Christ 511.

Clovis did not long enjoy his new conquests; for he died soon after the reduction of the several tribes of Franks settled in Gaul. Clovis, says Gregory of Tours, having transacted these things, that is, having forced all the tribes of the Franks in Gaul to acknowledge him for their king, died soon after at Paris, and was buried there in the church of the holy apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, which had been built by him and queen Clothildis, or, as our historian styles her, Crothildis. He died in the forty-fifth year of his age, five years after the battle of Vouglé, having reigned thirty years. After his death, Clothildis retired into Touraine, and there passed the remaining part of her life at St. Martin's tomb [m]. This is all we find in Gregory of Tours concerning the death of Clovis. He left four sons behind him, viz. Theodoric, Clodomir, Childebert, and Clotharius. The three last he had by Clothildis, and the eldest by a concubine before his marriage with that princess. Theodoric, at his father's death, had already a son named Theodobert, a youth of great expectation [n]. As to the age of the other three, all we know is, that Clodomir the eldest was born before the battle of Tolbiac in 496, so that, at the time of his father's death, he must have been about seventeen. The four brothers divided their father's dominions equally amongst them. Theodoric reigned at Metz; Clodomir at Orleans; Clotharius at Soissons; and Childebert at Paris. Though these four kingdoms were rather members of one and the same monarchy, than four different monarchies, yet the princes were quite independent of each other, in the same manner as the kings of the different tribes had been of Clovis.

SECT. VI.

The origin of the Burgundians.

THE Burgundians, who, upon the decline of the empire, seized on a considerable portion of Gaul, and founded a new kingdom there, were, according to Ammianus Marcellinus [o], originally descended from the Romans. Orosius, who

wrote about the year 420, was of the same opinion: We are told, says that writer, that Drusus Nero and his brother Tiberius, the adopted sons of Cæsar Augustus, having subdued the inner parts of Germany, left several camps in the country, and part of their army, to keep the neighbouring people in subjection. From the Roman soldiers, who were on this occasion left to guard the camps, are descended the Burgundians. The castles and the strong-holds, built for the defence of a country, are by the Germans called burgts; and hence the Romans who guarded them, and their descendants, were styled Burgundians. Their conquests in Gaul, continues our historian, speak them both a numerous and warlike nation. As they have embraced the catholic faith, our ecclesiastics, whose spiritual jurisdiction they acknowledge, have rendered them mild and tractable; for, in the countries where they have settled, they treat the natives, not as strangers whom they have subdued, but as brothers in Christ [p]. Thus Orosius, who, had he lived thirty years longer, would not have commended the Burgundians on account of their gentle treatment of the natives; for, upon their embracing the tenets of Arius, which happened about the year 450, the natives, who professed the catholic faith, were treated by them more like slaves than brethren. But to return to their origin: Pliny the elder supposes them to be a German nation, descended from the Vindili, whom most writers take to be the same people with the Vandals [q]. Valesius distinguishes the Burgundians of Germany from those of the same name, who dwelt more to the east, on the banks of the Danube [r]. The Burgundians of Germany were sometimes in alliance, and sometimes at war with the empire; but never had the reputation of a warlike nation: for the writers, who flourished in those times, speak of them as far inferior in courage and bravery to the other Germans, and observe, that the Burgundians dwelt in castles and fortified places, whereas the other German nations scorned any other fence but their arms [s]: and truly most of them were mechanics, and, before they settled in Gaul, they used in great numbers to flock into that country, to earn a livelihood by their respective professions. As to their government, they were divided into several tribes, each governed by their own chief or king, whose authority was so far from being hereditary, that it was not even during life. The kings of this nation, whom we find mentioned in history, are Gundicar, Gundiac, Bilimer, Gundebald, Sigismund, and Godemar. These princes reigned after the Burgundians had entered Gaul, that is, after the year 407, but they had, without all doubt, kings or chiefs long before that time, though not named by the historians, whose works have reached us. The kings of the Burgundians, as well as those of the other barbarians, did not think it below them to serve in the Roman armies, to discharge some of the chief offices of the empire, and to receive at the hands of the emperors, such dignities as they used to confer on their subjects. Thus Gundiac was, in the reign of Anthemius, magister militiæ, or general of the Roman armies; and Gundebald his eldest son patrician. Chilperic, the brother of Gundebald, had been likewise magister militiæ, and was afterwards created patrician[t]. His son Sigismund, who succeeded him in the kingdom, received from Anastasius the same dignity of patrician, on which occasion he wrote to the emperor the following letter: My predecessors and I have ever been so attached to the Roman empire, as to think ourselves more honoured by the dignities the emperors have conferred on us, than by the titles which have been transmitted to us by our ancestors. We command at home, but think it a greater honour to serve abroad in your armies [u]. The use of legal duels, or duels ordered by the magistrates or judges, to discover, from the event, the truth of contested facts, was first introduced into Gaul, where it long obtained, by the Burgundians. Gundebald was the first, who established by law this maxim, that the best champion is the best man, and ought to be believed; a maxim which has so often proved fatal to innocence! This unjust and sanguinary law was couched in the following words: Being fully convinced, that many of our subjects suffer themselves to be corrupted by their avarice, or hurried on by their obstinacy, so as to attest by oath what they know not, nay, and what they know to be false; to put a stop to such scandalous practices, when two Burgundians are at law, if the defendant shall swear, that he owes not what is demanded of him, or that he is not guilty of the crime that is laid to his charge; and the plaintiff, on the other hand, not satisfied therewith, shall declare, that he is ready to maintain, sword in hand, the truth of what he advances; if the defendant does not acquiesce, it shall be lawful for them to decide the controversy by dint of sword. This is to be likewise understood of the witnesses of either party, it being just, that every man should be ready to defend with his sword the truth which he attests, and to submit himself to the judgment of Heaven. If one of the plaintiffs witnesses shall be killed, all the others shall be condemned to pay immediately three hundred solidi. If the defendant is overcome, the plaintiff shall receive three times the sum which he demanded demanded. It is our will and pleasure, that this law be strictly observed and executed, that our subjects may conceive an utter aversion to the detestable sin of perjury. Given at Lyons the twenty-seventh of June, Abienus being consul, that is, in 501 [u]. This law was no sooner published, than Avitus, bishop of Vienne, wrote a letter to the king, remonstrating, with equal zeal and learning, the injustice of it; but could, by no means, prevail upon that prince to repeal it; nay, however unjust and sanguinary, it prevailed, by degrees, among the Franks, and all the other nations dwelling in Gaul.

The Burgundians break into Gaul; but are driven out by Probus. Year after Christ 275.

As to the history of the Burgundians, we find nothing worthy of notice concerning them till the year 275, the first of the emperor Tacitus's reign, when, in conjunction with the Lugians, the Franks, and the Vandals, they crossed the Rhine, over-ran all Gaul, and made themselves masters of seventy cities and upwards in that country, which they held for the space of almost two years [w]. But in the mean time Tacitus being murdered, Probus, who was chosen in his room, marched against them, and, having gained a complete victory over the Burgundians and Vandals on the banks of the Rhine, obliged them to sue for peace; which was granted them, upon their promising to restore the booty, and set at liberty the prisoners, they had taken. But, as they did not faithfully comply with this condition, Probus fell upon them in their retreat, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and took many prisoners, whom he afterwards sent into Britain, where they proved very serviceble to the Romans in all seditions and insurrections [x]. In the year 287, the fourth of the emperor Diocletian, they broke into Gaul anew with the Heruli, the Alemanns, and the Chaibons or Cavions, a people on no other occasion mentioned in history, and of whom all we know is, that their country, as well as that of the Heruli, lay at a great distance from Gaul [y]. We are told, that the Alemanns and Burgundians were destroyed by their own numbers, which occasioned a famine, that was followed by a plague; so that they were easily overcome by Maximian, whom Diocletian had taken for his partner in the empire, and dispatched against them. We are told, that, of such vast multitudes of barbarians, a very small number returned home, the rest being swept off by the plague, or cut in pieces by the Romans [z]. For the advantages gained over the barbarians on this occasion, the two emperors were decreed a triumph, as appears from a medal of this year [a]. Some years after, that is, in the year 291, a war broke out between the Burgundians and Alemanns, in which the former seem to have gained considerable advantages over the latter; for we are told, that they reduced great part of their country, and that the Alemanns were striving to recover what they had lost [b]; and this is all we know of that war. In the year 370, the seventh of Valentinian I. the Burgundians appeared on the banks of the Rhine, to the number of eighty thousand fighting men, being invited thither by Valentinian, who maintained a private intelligence with their chiefs, and had promised to pass the Rhine, and, in conjunction with them, fall upon Macrian, king of the Alemanns, with whom they were then at variance. But the emperor, who was then busied in building forts on the Rhine, not caring to interrupt the work and join them, as he had promised to do, they returned home, highly incensed against Valentinian, by whom they had been thus disappointed and deluded [c]; but we do not find they committed any hostilities against the empire. In the year 407, they followed the Vandals, Sueves, and Alans, who had entered Gaul the last day of the preceding year, in order to share with them the spoils of those wealthy provinces; but they did not settle, it seems, in that country till the year 413, for in that year, Prosper tells us, they obtained that part of Gaul, which borders on the Rhine, that is, according to Bucherius, the present Alsace and the remaining part of Germania Prima, which, in the opinion of that writer, were yielded to them by Honorius, not able, by any other means, to put a stop to their ravages [d]. Such was the beginning of the kingdom of the Burgundians in Gaul. They continued quiet in the seats allotted them till the year 435, when, in conjunction with the Heruli, the Hunns, and the Franks, they entered Belgic Gaul, committing every-where dreadful ravages, though they had, upon their first settling in Gaul, promised to assist the Romans, and serve in their armies, as subjects of the empire. Hereupon Aetius marched against them, and, having overcome them with great slaughter in a pitched battle, reduced them to such straights, that Gundicarius their king was obliged to sue for peace; which, in the end, he obtained, but did not long enjoy, being, in the beginning of the following year 436, attacked by the Hunns, perhaps at the instigation of Aetius, and cut off, with twenty thousand of his subjects [e]. Socrates tells us, that the Hunns made frequent irruptions into their territories, putting all to fire and ſword; that the Burgundians, no longer able to withſtand them, had recourſe to Heaven, and, repairing to a city in Gaul, embraced there the chriſtian religion, and received the ſacrament of baptiſm; which ceremony was no ſooner over, than, full of courage and confidence, they marched againſt the enemy, and, finding them without a leader (for we are told, that Uptar their king died ſuddenly the night before), cut ten thouſand of them in pieces, and obliged the reſt to ſave themſelves by a precipitous flight, though the Burgundians were in all but three thouſand men. Thus Socrates [f]. But Oroſius, who wrote in 417, aſſures us, that they had, at that time, already embraced the chriſtian religion [g]. They continued on the banks of the Rhine till the year 438, or, as others will have it, 443, when they were removed from thence by Aetius to the preſent dutchy of Savoy. During their abode there, Gundiac, who ſucceeded Gundicar, and is thought to have been his ſon, joining Theodoric king of the Viſigoths about the year 456, againſt the Sueves, marched with him into Spain, and ſignalized himſelf in the battle, that was fought that very year on the banks of the Orbegua, in which the Sueves were utterly defeated, and their king Rechiarius wounded, and afterwards taken priſoner [h]. Gundiac, upon his return from Spain, ſeized on part of Gaul, dividing, according to an antient chronologiſt, the lands with the Roman ſenators [i]. Valeſius is of opinion, that he made himſelf then maſter of the city of Lyons [k]. In 463, Gundiac wrote to Hilarius biſhop of Rome concerning an affair of Dié in Dauphiny [l]; whence we may conclude, that he was then in poſſeſſion of that city. Some are of opinion, that both Dié and Vienne were yielded to him by the emperor Avitus, whoſe cauſe he had eſpouſed [m]. Others think, that Gundiac, taking advantage of the diſturbances, that were occaſioned by the depoſition of Avitus, inlarged his dominions, and ſeized on the above-mentioned cities [n]. It is certain, that, in the war between the Romans and Viſigoths about the year 470, the Burgundians, under the conduct of their king Gundiac and his ſon Chilperic, fought for the Romans; for we are told, that they defended the province of Auvergne againſt Euric king of the Viſigoths, being jealous of the growing power of that prince [o]. Beſides, both Gundiac and Chilperic were at that time magiſtri militiæ, and commanded the Roman troops [p]; whence it is probable, that the Romans either yielded to them the above-mentioned countries, or ſuffered them to ſeize them, not caring to quarrel at the ſame time with the Viſigoths and Burgundians. Before the year 490, the Burgundians were maſters of all Lugdunenſis Prima, which Sidonius ſtyles Germanica Lugdunenſis, ſaying, it was then ſubject to Chilperic the ſon of Gundiac [q]. The ſame writer tells us elſewhere, that, when he left Lyons, and retired to Auvergne, a Burgundian king reſided in that city with his queen [r]. Sidonius withdrew from Lyons about the year 470, finding himſelf obnoxious to the Burgundians, who ſuſpected him of privately favouring the Franks. Chilperic was likewiſe maſter of the country in which ſtood the abby of St. Claudius [s], that is, of the country of the Sequani. When Sidonius died, Aprunculus, biſhop of Langres, finding the Burgundians ſuſpected him as if he maintained a private correſpondence with the Franks, made his eſcape from the caſtle of Dijon, and withdrew to Auvergne [t]. In 494, Epiphanius, biſhop of Pavia, went to the court of Gundebald at Dions, and to that of Godigiſcles at Geneva [u]; ſo that the Burgundians were then maſters of all theſe places. On the other hand, we do not find they made war upon the Romans; nay, on the contrary, they aſſiſted them againſt the Viſigoths, and are ſtyled, by the writers of thoſe times, the friends and allies of the empire. We may therefore conclude, that they thus inlarged their dominions with the conſent, or at leaſt with the connivance, of the emperors, willing to yield to them, or to wink at their ſeizing, part of the country, which they could not maintain without them. Chilperic, who is often mentioned by Sidonius, and ſtyled by him a victorious prince [w], was not, as ſome have imagined, the brother, but the ſon, of Gundiac, and grandſon of Gundicar; for Gundiac married the ſiſter of the famous Ricimer, whom we have had frequent occaſion to mention in our Roman hiſtory, and had by her Gundebald, Godegiſcles, Chilperic, called alſo Hilperic, and Godemar [x]. They divided, in all likelihood, among them the countries then ſubject to the Burgundians; for Chilperic is ſtyled by Sidonius tetrarch [y], and by Jornandes king [z]. Sidonius, ſpeaking elſewhere of theſe four princes, calls them tirannopotæ, intimating thereby, that they acted more like tyrants than kings. Father Sirmond tells us, that Chilperic and Godemar, joining againſt Gundebald, drove him out, and ſeized on his dominions; but that Gundebald, having in the end recovered his dominions, found means to diſpatch his two brothers, with their iſſue male [a]. But this is vouched only by the chronicle of Burgundy written by Vigner, to which we do not give intire credit. Gundebald was in Italy in 472, and there raiſed by the emperor Olybrius to the rank of patrician. However, he might have returned from thence to Gaul, and there cauſed his brother Chilperic to be put to death, and his wife to be drowned, as we read in Gregory of Tours [b]. Sidonius ſtyles her a Tanaquil, either on account of her prudence, or becauſe ſhe had a great aſcendant over her huſband [c]; for ſhe is ſaid to have tempered, with her addreſs and engaging behaviour, the ſeverity to which her huſband was naturally inclined, and to have ſaved the lives of ſeveral perſons unjuſtly accuſed [d]. Chilperic left two daughters behind him, who were both baniſhed by Gundebald, or rather kept under confinement in a caſtle at ſome diſtance from the court [e]. Mucuruna, the eldeſt, embraced the ſtate of virginity; the other was Clothilda, who was married to Clovis king of the Franks, as we have related in the foregoing ſection. In the year 473, Gundebald was at Ravenna; for he is ſaid to have induced Glycerius to take upon him the title of emperor in that city [f]. After the depoſition of Glycerius, Gundebald eſpouſed the cauſe of Nepos, who was raiſed to the empire in his room, joining the Romans in Gaul againſt the Viſigoths, who, under the conduct of Euric their king, attempted to make themſelves maſters of Auvergne [g]. In the year 480, Odoacer, king of Italy, having yielded Provence to the Viſigoths, Gundebald, jealous of the growing power of that nation, claimed part of the country that had been granted them. This gave riſe to a war between the two nations, in which the Burgundians were ſubdued, ſays Jornandes [h], by the Viſigoths, who made themſelves maſters of all Gaul. But that writer was certainly miſtaken, ſince the Burgundians were, in the year 517 and 528, ſtill maſters of above twenty-eight cities, and, among the reſt, of Lyons, Vienne, Beſançon, and Embrun, as appears from the acts of the councils of Agde and Epaune, held in thoſe times [i]. In the year 490, the Burgundians, under the conduct of Gundebald, entering Italy, with a design, as they pretended, to assist Odoacer against Theodoric the Ostrogoth, committed unheard-of ravages in Liguria, putting all to fire and sword, and carrying off with them, upon their return home, such numbers of captives, that, in most places, there were not left sufficient hands to till the ground. They met with no opposition, the Romans, who had always looked upon them as their friends and protectors, being no-ways upon their guard against them [k]. Gundebald afterwards declared, that he had acted as an open enemy, to be revenged on the king of Italy, who had deceived him by a false alliance [l]; but whether he meant Theodoric or Odoacer, is uncertain. Authors observe, that, on this occasion, bishops began first to fortify their mansions, that, on any sudden irruption of barbarians, they might serve as places of refuge for those who dwelt in the country [m]. About this time, Gundebald sent one Laurentius, a person of great distinction among the Burgundians, with the character of embassador to the emperor Anastasius at Constantinople [n]; but with what commission he was charged, we are no-where told. Two letters have reached us, both written in 497, the one by the emperor Anastasius to Clovis, intreating him to prevail upon Gundebald to allow one of Laurentius's sons to repair to his father at Constantinople; the other by Clovis to Gundebald, who readily complied with the emperor's request and his [o]. In the history of the Franks, we have spoken of the war which Gundebald waged with Clovis and his brother Godegiscles, whom in the end he overcame and put to death. Being restored to his dominions, he reigned, without disturbing his neighbours, or being disturbed by them, till his death, which happened in the year 516 [p]. Some years before his death, he was for renouncing privately the errors of Arius; but could, by no means, be prevailed upon, says Gregory of Tours, to acknowledge publicly the mystery of the Holy Trinity [q].

Sigismund.

Gundebald was succeeded by his son Sigismund, who had no sooner taken possession of his father's dominions, than he dispatched embassadors to the emperor Anastasius at Constantinople, acquainting him with his accession to the crown. In the letter he wrote on this occasion to the emperor, he styles his father one of Anastasius's most faithful subjects; and adds, that the nation, which he governed, had ever acknowledged Anastasius for their liege lord; that he himself deemed it a greater

honour to obey his commands, than to be obeyed by a whole nation; that these sentiments were hereditary in his family; that his ancestors had ever had a heart truly Roman, thinking themselves more honoured by the titles, which the emperors had been pleased to confer upon them, than by those, however specious, which they had received by birth; that the country, which it was now his lot to govern, though lying at a great distance from the capital of the empire, was not, on that account, less subject to the imperial crown, than those that lay near it, &c. He closes the letter thus: The east is governed by your presence, the west under your auspices. By this letter therefore I offer my duty to the greatest of princes, and wait, with submission, your august commands [r]. From this letter it is manifest, that the princes of the barbarians, who reigned in Gaul, acknowledged themselves subjects of the empire. Theodoric, king of Italy, refused a passage through his dominions to the embassadors, who were dispatched with these letters. However, Anastasius wrote to Sigismund, without waiting till he received letters from him, confirming to him the dignities, which he had conferred upon him in his father's life-time, and adding to them the patriciate [s]. Sigismund wrote a second letter to Anastasius, returning him thanks for the honours to which he had raised him, and acquainting him, that, upon his father's death, he had immediately written to him; but that his embassadors had been stopped on their way to Constantinople [t]. In this letter, as well as in the former, and in a third, which he wrote to the emperor Justin, he owns himself a subject of the empire, and uses all along the language of a subject to his sovereign. There was, without all doubt, at this time a misunderstanding between Theodoric and Sigismund, which, however, did not come to an open rupture. Sigismund, in the sixth year of his reign, caused his son Sigeric to be inhumanly murdered. Of this murder Gregory of Tours gives us the following account: Sigismund, says our historian, had to his first wife the daughter of Theodoric king of Italy, and by her a son named Sigeric. Upon the death of that princess, he married one of her household, who, looking upon Sigeric with the eyes of a step-mother, did all that lay in her power to incense his father against him. The young prince indeed, with his haughty and contemptuous behaviour, heightened the aversion, which the new queen bore him as a step-mother; for the queen having one day appeared in the robes of his mother, he publicly upbraided her for presuming to shew herself in the apparel of one,

whoſe menial ſervant ſhe had been. This bitter reproach galled her to ſuch a degree, that, tranſported with rage, ſhe reſolved at all events to make Sigeric pay dearly for it. Accordingly, as ſhe had a great aſcendant over her huſband, ſhe perſuaded him, that the young prince had formed a deſign of aſſaſſinating him, and joining his dominions to thoſe of his grandfather Theodoric. Sigiſmund gave intire credit to theſe falſe and malicious inſinuations, and, without further inquiry, to be before-hand with his ſon, cauſed him to be ſtrangled, while he was repoſing after dinner. He was ſcarce dead, when Sigiſmund, ſtung with the remorſe of ſo heinous a crime, threw himſelf upon the dead body, and, bathing it in tears, called himſelf of all men the moſt unhappy; which one of his ſervants hearing, You have but too much reaſon, ſaid he, to bewail your own fate; but as for your ſon, he died free from all guilt, and is now happy. Thus Gregory of Tours [u]. A few days after, Sigiſmund retired to the monaſtery of St. Mauritius in Valais, to do penance for the crime he had committed, and there founded what is called by our hiſtorian laus perennis, that is, a ſervice to be celebrated night and day without intermiſſion, by ſeveral eccleſiaſtics relieving one another. After a ſhort ſtay in the above-mentioned monaſtery, he returned to Lyons, and there married a daughter, which he had by his firſt wife Oſtrogotha, to king Theodoric or Thierri, the eldeſt ſon of Clovis. As the Oſtrogoths and their king Theodoric were highly provoked againſt Sigiſmund, for the murder of his ſon, whom they looked upon as a prince of their own blood, Clothildis thought this a favourable conjuncture to be revenged on the poſterity of Gundebald, ſince he was no more, for the death of her father Chilperic, of her mother, and her brothers, all maſſacred by that prince's order. Having firſt put the three kings, her children, Clodomir, Childebert, and Clotharius, in mind of the cruel and inhuman treatment, which her father and mother had met with at the hands of Gundebald, ſhe exhorted them not to let ſlip ſo favourable an opportunity of revenging it on his poſterity. As this advice was intirely agreeable to the ambitious views of the young princes, they readily hearkened to it, and began to make the neceſſary preparations. They preſſed Theodoric, whom their father Clovis had by a concubine, as we have related above, to join them in the enterpriſe; but, as he had married the daughter of Sigiſmund, and had not been any-ways injured either by him or his anceſtors, he declared that he would take no part in a war between his brothers and father-in-law, but obſerve a ſtrict neutrality. The three princes therefore, finding

they could not prevail upon him to join them, took the field without him, and entering the dominions of Sigiſmund, began to lay them waſte. Hereupon Sigiſmund, having drawn together what troops he could, marched out againſt them; but in the battle that enſued, he was utterly defeated, and obliged to take refuge in a monaſtery, where he lay ſome time concealed in the habit of a monk; but his own ſubjects, by whom he was abhorred, on account of the murder of his ſon, diſcovered him to the Franks, who immediately ſeized him, and delivered him to Clodomir, who had already in his power his wife and children. Clodomir ſent both the prince and his unfortunate family to the city of Orleans, where they were kept under cloſe confinement. Upon the news of his captivity, the far greater part of the country, which he held, ſubmitted to the Franks [w]. This happened, according to the biſhop of Avanches, in the year 523. In the conſulſhip of Maximus, ſays that writer in his chronicle [x], Sigiſmund was by the Burgundians delivered up to the Franks, who carried him away in the habit of a monk, in which they had found him, and afterwards threw him, with his wife and children, into a deep well, where they were all drowned. Maximus was conſul, as appears from all the antient chronologers, in the above-mentioned year. What our chronologer relates of the unhappy end of Sigiſmund and his family, did not happen till the following year, when the Franks retiring to their own country, the Burgundians, who had ſubmitted to them, revolting, proclaimed Godemar, the brother of Sigiſmund; and, in order to induce the Oſtrogoths to aſſiſt them, at leaſt under-hand, yielded to them four cities, viz. Carpentras, Cavaillon, Tricaſtinum, now St. Paul trois-chateaux, and Apt [y]. No mention indeed is made of any ſuccours ſent them by the Oſtrogoths. It is not, however, to be doubted, but that Theodoric, then king of that nation, and greatly alarmed at the growing power of the Franks, aſſiſted them ſo far as he could, without openly declaring in their favour. News was no ſooner brought to the three princes of the Franks, that Godemar had been proclaimed king of the Burgundians, and acknowledged even in thoſe countries, which had ſubmitted to them, than they reſolved to take the field anew. But Clodomir, before he ſet out on his march, ordered Sigiſmund, with his wife and children, to be put to death in the city of Orleans, in the manner we have related above, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances and threats of Avitus, abbot of Mici, a perſon highly eſteemed and revered all over Gaul for the ſanctity of his life. Gundebald had cauſed the father, mother, and brother, of Clothildis to be thrown into a well, as we have related above, and in the ſame manner, by way of retaliation, Clodomir ordered Sigiſmund to be diſpatched, with his wife and children. Soon after, Clodomir led his troops againſt Godemar; and the two armies meeting at Veſeronce in the territory of Vienne, not far from the city of Belley, a bloody battle enſued, in which the Burgundians, after a long and obſtinate reſiſtance, were in the end put to flight. But Clodomir, purſuing the enemy with more ardour than caution, was ſurrounded by them, and cut in pieces [z]. The Burgundians, ſays Agathias, concluding from Clodomir's long hair, which covered his ſhoulders, that he was one of the kings of the Franks, ſtruck off his head, and carrying it upon the point of a ſpear, returned to the charge; but were repulſed by the Franks, and a ſecond time put to the rout [a].

Peace between the Burgundians and Franks.

However, the Franks being deſtitute of a leader, (for the children of Clodomir were yet very young) they readily concluded a peace with the Burgundians, whereof one of the articles was, that they ſhould reſtore to Godemar all the countries they had ſeized during the war [b]; which they did accordingly. Gregory of Tours writes, that Godemar, having raiſed a new army, purſued the war with great vigour, and in the end recovered the kingdom of his anceſtors [c]. According to the chronicle of the biſhop of Avanches, the battle of Veſeronce was fought the ſame year, in which Godemar had been proclaimed king, that is, in 524.

A new war between theſe two nations.

The peace concluded between the Franks and Burgundians laſted for the ſpace of eight years, that is, till the year 532, when the two ſurviving brothers Childebert and Clotharius broke anew into the dominions of Godemar. What gave riſe to this new war, we are not told; but, ſo far as we can conjecture from Procopius, they were prompted merely by their ambition, and that luſt of conqueſts, which ſeems hereditary to the princes of that reſtleſs nation, to invade a kingdom, which, they were well appriſed, they could eaſily reduce; for a few years after the conqueſt of Burgundy by the Franks, an embaſſador from the emperor Juſtinian to the Oſtrogoths, with whom the Franks were at that time negotiating an alliance, addreſſed them thus, as we read in Procopius: The Franks pique themſelves upon ſtanding faithfully to their engagements; but, to ſay nothing at preſent of the manner, in which they have obſerved the treaties concluded with the Thuringians and Burgundians, you cannot have forgot the little account they have ever made of the moſt ſolemn engagements they have, from time to time, entered into even with you [d]. Of this war, which ended in the ruin of the kingdom of the Burgundians, Gregory of Tours gives us the following account: Childebert and Clotharius, having made the neceſſary preparations to invade the kingdom of Burgundy, ſolicited their brother Theodoric to join them in the enterpriſe; but he openly declared that he would take no part in that war. This gave great offence to the Franks, who were ſubject to him: nay, they were diſpleaſed with his conduct to ſuch a degree, that they openly threatened to revolt from him, and acknowledge the other two princes, if he did not aſſiſt them with all his forces, and look upon their cauſe as the common cauſe of the Franks. Theodoric, to quiet his mutinous ſubjects, told them, that, without him, his brothers were well able to cope with the king of the Burgundians; that, however, he would not fail to join them, if they ſhould ſtand in need of his aſſiſtance; but that, in the mean time, he deſigned to lead them againſt the inhabitants of Auvergne, who, during the war he had lately made on the Thuringians, had given ſtrong proofs of their diſaffection to his perſon and government; that he deſigned to lay waſte their country, and that thoſe, who followed him thither, ſhould have free quarters, and be at full liberty to plunder, and carry off what ſlaves, cattle, money, furniture, &c. they thought fit. The ſubjects of Theodoric, allured by theſe promiſes, gave over all thoughts of joining the other two princes in their expedition againſt the Burgundians. Childebert therefore and Clotharius, hoping to compaſs their deſign without the aſſiſtance of Theodoric, took the field, and, entering the territories of the Burgundians, laid ſiege to Auguſtodunum, now Autun, obliged Godemar to ſave himſelf by flight, and made themſelves maſters, of his kingdom [e]. Thus, in a few words, Gregory of Tours gives us an account of the reduction of the kingdom of the Burgundians, one of the moſt remarkable events in the hiſtory of the Franks. And Marius Avenſis is no leſs conciſe in relating the ſame events: In the conſulſhip of Paulinus the younger, ſays that writer, Childebert, Clotharius, and Theodobert, kings of the Franks, reduced Burgundy, and having put Godemar to flight, divided his kingdom among them [f]. From this writer it appears, that the war laſted two years, that is, from 532, to 534, and that Theodoric dying in the mean time, his ſon Theodobert joined the other two princes. From other writers we learn, that in this war, the Burgundians were aſſiſted both by the Oſtrogoths and Viſigoths [g], that, in ſeveral encounters, the Franks were defeated by by thoſe two nations[h]; but that, upon the death of Athalaric, the Oſtrogoths having withdrawn their troops, the Burgundians were in the end obliged to ſubmit to the conquerors[i]. Procopius telis us, that Godemar was taken priſoner by the Franks, who kept him under cloſe confinement in one of their caſtles; that, upon his captivity, the Burgundians agreed to ſerve the Franks in their wars, and to pay them a yearly tribute, with ſuch taxes and cuſtoms, as they had paid to Godemar and his predeceſſors[k]. One of the conditions, on which they ſubmitted to the Franks, was, though not mentioned by Procopius, that they ſhould live according to their own laws; which they actually did to the reign of Lewis ſurnamed the Debonnair, as we ſhall relate in a more proper place. Thus the Franks, prompted by their boundleſs ambition, extended their dominions, at the expence of their neighbours, till they became maſters of all Gaul.

The Alemanns.

The Alemans.

THE Alemanns, a nation, which, in proceſs of time, became ſo famous in hiſtory, made their firſt appearance about the year 214, the fourth of the emperor Caracalla's reign[l]. Agathias, upon the authority of Aſinius Quadratus, a Roman hiſtorian, who wrote in the reign of the emperor Philip, about the year 247, tells us, that the Alemanns were originally a motley multitude, conſiſting of ſeveral nations, as appears, added that writer, from their very name[m]; ſo that, according to Aſinius Quadratus, the Alemanns were ſo called, becauſe they conſiſted of all men, that is, of men of all nations. Some German writers, diſpleaſed with this etymology, derive the name of Alemanns from the word Atelman, ſignifying a man of diſtinction[n]. But the other derivation is both more natural, and better grounded. The Alemanns, according to the moſt common opinion, conſiſted chiefly of Sueves, who, in proceſs of time, were joined by ſeveral other German nations and ſome Gauls; for we are told by Tacitus, that a conſiderable number of Gauls, abandoning their own country, went to ſettle beyond the Rhine, in the country which had formerly belonged to the Sueves[o]. The Alemanns are placed by Aurelius Victor, St. Jerom[p], and other writers, between the Danube, the Upper

Rhine,

Rhine, and the Mein, that is, in the present dutchy of Wirtemberg. They were a numerous and warlike nation, and are chiefly commended for fighting with great skill and dexterity on horseback [q]. They had such an aversion to slavery, that even their women, some of whom were taken prisoners by Caracalla, chose rather to die than to be sold for slaves. Caracalla, however, ordered them to be sold; but, preferring death to slavery, they laid violent hands on themselves, some of them having first dispatched their children [r]. Their government was monarchical; for we find several of their kings mentioned in history, of whom we shall have occasion to speak anon. As to their religion, they worshipped the same deities as the other German nations. We shall now acquaint the reader with what we have been able to gather from the antients concerning this nation. In the year 214, Caracalla is said to have made war upon the Cenni, or, as some read it, the Chatti, the Alemanns, and other German nations. The Alemanns, it seems, had joined the Chatti or Catti; and Caracalla, under pretence of succouring another nation, with whom they were at variance, made war upon them, and is said to have defeated the Alemanns on the banks of the Mein [s]. He afterwards concluded a peace with them, distributed large sums among them, listed great numbers of them in his army, and even among his guards, chusing rather to trust his life to them, than to the Romans [t]. Aurelius Victor adds, that he often appeared in the dress peculiar to those barbarians, wearing false hair of the same colour with theirs [u]. For the victory he gained over the Alemanns, he took the surname of Alemannicus [w]. In the year 234, the thirteenth of the emperor Severus Alexander, the Alemanns, and other German nations, having passed the Rhine, made themselves masters of the forts built on the banks of that river, and, entering Gaul, committed dreadful ravages there. Alexander, who was just then returned from Persia, where he had gained great advantages over Artaxerxes the Persian king, upon the news of this irruption, hastened into Gaul, and advanced, without loss of time, to the banks of the Rhine. But the enemy having repassed that river upon the news of his approach, he ordered a bridge to be laid over it, with a design to attack them in their own country, as soon as the season would allow him to take the field. But he being in the mean time assassinated by the mutinous soldiery, Maximinus, who had fir-red them up and was chosen in his room, entered Germany early in the spring, at the head of a mighty army, ravaged the country far and wide, burnt the enemy's habitations, carried off their corn and cattle, and took an incredible number of prisoners. We are told, that several battles were fought in the woods and marshes, in each of which the emperor killed many of the enemy with his own hand [x]. For the signal advantages he gained in this expedition over the Alemanns and other *Germ*an nations, the senate decreed both to him and his son the title of Germanicus, which is still to be seen on several of his medals [y].

They break into Gaul and Italy.

The Alemanns continued quiet from this time to the year 256, the fourth of Valerian's reign, when, breaking unexpectedly into Gaul, they laid waste that country, while the Juthongians, that is, the Alemanns who dwelt on the banks of the Danube, made an irruption into Italy. In Gaul they were defeated, and obliged to repass the Rhine, by Posthumius, governor of those provinces. In Italy they advanced as far as Milan, destroying all with fire and sword; but their numerous army, consisting of three hundred thousand men, was defeated in the neighbourhood of that city, if Zonaras is to be credited, by Gallienus, with a body only of ten thousand men [z]. But of this victory no mention is made either by Pollio or Vopiscus; and Zosimus writes, that the Alemanns and other barbarous nations, having ravaged Illyricum and great part of Italy, returned home, without meeting with the least opposition [a]. Eutropius [b], St. Jerom [c], and Orosius [d], suppose the Alemanns to have first ravaged Gaul, and from thence passing through Rhætia, to have entered Italy. We find no further mention made of them till the year 268, the first of the emperor Claudius, when the Juthongians, breaking into Italy, advanced without opposition as far as the lake Benacus, now Lago di Garda near Verona. Claudius had no sooner suppressed the rebellion of Aureolus, who had assumed the purple, than he marched against them, defeated them in a pitched battle, and, having cut great numbers of them in pieces, obliged the rest to quit their booty, and save themselves by a precipitous flight into their own country [e]. This victory was not known, it seems, to Pollio, since he does not mention it; but it is confirmed by several medals, on which the title of Germanicus is given to Claudius, before that of Gothicus, which he took the year after, that is, in 269 [f]. Notwithstanding this overthrow, they no sooner heard of the death of Claudius, Gallienus is said to have gained a great victory over them.

They are routed by Claudius.

than, joining the Marcomanns, they resolved to invade Italy anew. But Aurelian, who succeeded Claudius, having timely notice of their march, left Pannonia, where he then was, and meeting them with the flower of his army in Vindelicia, which comprehended all the present Bavaria, and a great part of Swabia, gave them a total overthrow, and, pursuing them close, cut off great numbers of them, as they attempted to pass the Danube. Hereupon they sent embassadors to the emperor, offering to renew their antient alliance with the empire, provided they were allowed to return unmolested to their own country; for Aurelian had cut off their retreat, and detached part of his army to guard the banks of the Danube. But the emperor refusing to hearken to any terms, the Alemanns, by this means reduced to despair, after various debates and consultations, resolved at length to enter Italy, since they could not return to their own country; and accordingly, finding the passes unguarded (for the emperor thought only of cutting off their retreat), they advanced as far as Placentia before Aurelian could come up with them, committing every-where unheard-of ravages. As the emperor drew near, they concealed themselves in the neighbouring woods, whence sallying out upon him in the night, they gained a complete victory; which threw all Italy, and Rome itself, into the utmost consternation. The books of the Sibyls were consulted on this occasion by the emperor's orders, and several ceremonies performed to avert the impending storm, which, they apprehended, might be attended with the total ruin of the empire. But in the mean time Aurelian, having received strong reinforcements from Illyricum, came unexpectedly upon the enemy, in the neighbourhood of Fanum Fortunæ, now Fano, and gave them a dreadful overthrow. Such of them as escaped from this first battle were slain in two others, one of which was fought in the neighbourhood of Placentia, and the other in the plains of Ticinum or Pavia. Thus was the whole multitude cut off to a man [g]. About four years after, the Alemanns, who dwelt near the Rhine, made an irruption into Gaul; but were forced by Probus, who was afterwards emperor, and then commanded in those parts, to repass that river, and return home [h]. They continued afterwards quiet, without molesting either their neighbours or the Romans, for the space of eleven years, that is, till the year 285, the third of Diocletian's reign, when they attempted, it seems, to break into the empire; for Diocletian is said to have made war upon them, and to have gained some advantages over them [i]. In 287, they broke into Gaul anew, with the Burgundians, Heruli, Cavians, and several other barbarous nations; but were most of them cut off by Maximian, or destroyed by famine [k]. For the great advantages gained over them by Maximian, a triumph was decreed by the senate both to him and Diocletian, as appears from a medal of this very year 287 [l]. The following year, Maximian passed the Rhine at the head of a numerous army, and, entering the country of the Alemanns, laid it waste far and near, destroying all with fire and sword. He took in this expedition an incredible number of captives, and reduced, if Mamertin his panegyrist is to be credited, great part of Germany [m]. At the same time, Diocletian entered Germany through Rhætia, and is said to have extended the confines of the empire to the source of the Danube [n]. In the year 291, the Burgundians seized on part of the country belonging to the Alemanns, which gave rise to a war between those two nations [o]; but as to the issue of this war, we are quite in the dark. In the year 301, Constantius Chlorus, the father of Constantine the Great, gained a signal victory over the Alemanns, who, breaking into Gaul with a numerous army, came upon him unexpectedly, while he had but a small body of troops with him; which obliged him at first to retire and shelter himself within the walls of Langres. But his army arriving a few hours after he had entered that city, he marched out at the head of the detachment he had with him, joined his other forces, and, engaging the enemy, gained a complete victory [p]. In this battle the Alemanns lost sixty thousand men, as appears from Eutropius [q], St. Jerom [r], Orosius [s], and even from Zonaras [t], and not six thousand only, as we read it in the Greek text of Eusebius. The Alemanns, disheartened with so great a loss, did not offer to disturb the peace of the empire during the remaining part of the reign of Constantius. But, in the first of his son Constantine, that is, in 306, they began anew to make inroads into Gaul, which provoked that prince to such a degree, that, having taken some of their kings prisoners, he exposed them to be devoured by the wild beasts in the magnificent shows which he exhibited [u]. However, a few years after, that is, in 310, the Alemanns, in conjunction with the Bructerians, Cheruscans, and Chamavians, having crossed the Rhine, laid waste the neighbouring provinces; but Constantine, marching against them, overcame them in a pitched battle, and obliged them to quit their booty and repass the Rhine [w]. For this victory he is supposed to have taken the title of Maximus, which we find on his coins of this year [x]. From this time no mention is made of the Alemanns till the year 355, the eighteenth of Constantius's reign, when they attempted to break into Italy; which obliged the emperor to march against them: but as he drew near the enemy, who were advanced as far as the lake of Constance, he detached Arbetio with the flower of the army against them. Arbetio, falling into an ambuscade, was defeated with great loss. But some of the officers, who commanded under him, engaging the enemy a few days after, without his orders, put the Alemanns to flight; and Constantius, satisfied with this small advantage, returned to Milan [y]. The same year, another body of Alemanns, breaking into Gaul, with the Franks and Saxons, took and plundered above forty towns on the banks of the Rhine, and, among the rest, the city of Cologne, which they almost intirely ruined [z]. Hereupon Constantius, unwilling to leave Italy and march against the barbarians in person, raised Julian to the dignity of Cæsar, and sent him to head the Roman forces in Gaul. Julian, soon after his arrival, led what forces he had against the Alemanns, who had advanced as far as Lyons, with a design to surprise that city; but the enemy retiring upon his approach, he waited for them in the passes, through which they were to return to their own country, and there cut most of them in pieces. Only a small number, who took their route through the present Switzerland, had the good luck to make their escape, being suffered to pass unmolested by Barbatio, another Roman general, who was encamped at Basle, and is supposed to have had private orders from Constantius to thwart all the designs of Julian [a]. Be that as it will, Julian, having thus driven the Alemanns out of Gaul, undertook the rebuilding of the Tres Tabernæ, a fort near Argentoratum, now Strasburg, known at present by the name of Saverne, which the enemy had demolished. As it was so situated as to curb the nations beyond the Rhine, and prevent their irruptions into Gaul, Julian not only repaired the antient fortifications, but added new works to them, stored them with provisions for a whole year, and left a numerous garison in the place, to keep the neighbouring country in awe [b]. In the mean time, a large body of Alemanns, falling upon Barbatio while he was busied in laying a bridge of boats over the Rhine, cut great numbers of his men in pieces, took moſt of his baggage, laid waſte the neighbouring country, and returned home loaded with booty. Elated with this victory, they aſſembled in great numbers under the banners of Chnodomarius and ſix other kings, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Straſburg. Being informed there by a deſerter, that Julian's army was only thirteen thouſand ſtrong, Chnodomarius had the arrogance to ſend a meſſenger to him, commanding him to quit a country, which the Alemanns had acquired by their courage and valour [c]. Libanius adds, that the meſſenger produced letters from Conſtantius, in which he yielded to them that country [d]. Julian, however, paying no regard to them, detained the meſſenger as a ſpy, and purſued the works he had begun at Saverne, till he received intelligence, that the enemy, having paſſed the Rhine, were advanced within twenty miles of his camp. Hereupon, interrupting the work, he marched directly againſt them, and engaging the ſame day, though his men were tired with their long march, gained a complete victory over them. They were thirty-five thouſand ſtrong, headed by ſeven kings, ten princes, and ſeveral other perſons of great diſtinction. The victory continued long doubtful; the Roman cavalry even gave way, nor could Julian, with all his oratory, prevail upon them to return to the charge; but the vigorous reſiſtance made by the foot ſo diſheartened the barbarians, that, deſpairing to be able to break them, they began to abate much of their impetuoſity; which the Romans perceiving, made a laſt effort, and charging the barbarians, already quite ſpent, put them in the end to flight, and purſued them with great ſlaughter. Vaſt numbers of them were drowned in the Rhine, in attempting to croſs that river. Chnodomarius himſelf was taken priſoner, and preſented to Julian, who ſent him to Conſtantius, by whoſe orders he was conveyed to Rome, where he died ſoon after a natural death. In this battle Julian loſt only four tribunes, and two hundred and forty-three private men. Of the Alemanns ſix, or, as ſome write, eight, thouſand men were killed in the field; but a great many dead bodies were ſeen floating on the river [e]. Zoſimus writes, that ſixty thouſand of the enemy were killed upon the ſpot, and an equal number drowned; but he muſt certainly have been miſtaken. Julian himſelf ſtyles the battle of Straſburg a ſucceſsful action, which reſtored Gaul to its antient liberty [f]. Mamertinus ſays, that, by this ſingle battle, the war was ended, and Germany ruined [g]. It is at leaſt certain, that the barbarians were intirely driven out of Gaul. Julian, from the field of battle, returned to Saverne, and, having finiſhed the works there, advanced with his whole army to Mayence, where he built a bridge over the river, and, entering Germany, continued ravaging the countries of the Alemanns and their allies till after the equinox, when the ſnow preventing him from advancing farther, he returned to Gaul, after having repaired the caſtle of Trajan, which ſtood at a ſmall diſtance from the preſent city of Francfort, and granted to the Alemanns and their allies a truce for ten months, upon their promiſing to ſtore with proviſions the fort that was building in their country [h]. The truce no ſooner expired, than Julian, croſſing the Rhine on a bridge of boats, entered anew the country of the Alemanns, and obliged two of their kings, Suomarius and Hortarius, to ſue for peace; which he granted them, upon their ſending back all the Roman captives, and furniſhing timber, iron, and other materials, to repair the cities which they had ruined [i]. We are told by Zoſimus, that, in this expedition, Julian got two thouſand Romans ſet at liberty [k].

THE following year 359, Julian, paſſing unexpectedly the Rhine, advanced to the moſt diſtant borders of the Alemanns and Burgundians, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. Here- upon two of the kings of the Alemanns, Macrianus and Hariobaldus, diſpatched embaſſadors to him, ſuing for peace. At the ſame time, Vadomarius king of the Alemanns, whoſe country lay towards Baſle, came in perſon to wait on Julian, who, at his earneſt requeſt, reſtored to him his ſon, whom he had given as an hoſtage; but at the ſame time he declared, that he would treat him as an enemy, if he did not ſet at liberty the Romans, whom, to the number of three thouſand, he kept in captivity. As Vadomarius put off from time to time the ſending back the captives, Julian, leaving Spire, where he then was, marched directly to Baſle, and, arriving unexpectedly in the neighbourhood of that city, ſtruck Vadomarius and his people with ſuch terror, that the captives were immediately ſet at liberty. Hereupon Julian received the king of the Alemanns as his friend and ally, ordering his men to forbear all hoſtilities [l]. We are told, that the emperor himſelf wrote to Julian in favour of Vadomarius, being induced thereunto by ſome Alemanns, who were in great employments at court, viz. by Latinus, at that time comes domeſticorum; by Agilo the tribunus stabuli, or master of the horse; and by Agilo, who had a chief command in the army [m]. Soon after, three other kings of the Alemanns, viz. Urias, Ursicinus, and Vestralphus, sent deputies suing for peace; which Julian granted them, upon their setting at liberty the Roman captives [n]. Julian, having thus concluded a peace with the princes of the Alemanns, left Germany, and, putting his troops into winter-quarters, as the season was already far advanced, retired himself to Paris [o]. Two years after, that is, in 361, the Alemanns, those chiefly who were subject to Vadomarius, broke anew into Gaul on the side of Rhætia, and committed dreadful ravages there. Vadomarius pretended to be much concerned for the hostilities committed by his countrymen, and to have the greatest respect imaginable for Julian. But in the mean time, he wrote a letter to the emperor Constantius, filled with bitter invectives against him. Julian, having intercepted the letter, found means to have him arrested at a banquet, and banished him into Spain [p]. He had already sent Libano, one of his generals, with a strong detachment against the Alemanns; but he being killed, and his men put to the route near Sanctio, thought to be the present Seckingen, in the neighbourhood of Basle, Julian advanced in person against them, passed the Rhine, and, coming upon them unexpectedly, cut great numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to restore the booty they had taken, and sue for peace; which he granted them upon his own terms [q].

They break anew into Gaul; but are defeated by Julian, who takes one of their kings prisoner. Year after Christ 361.

Upon the death of Julian they ravage Gaul.

The Alemanns continued quiet the remaining part of Julian's reign; but they no sooner heard of his death, than they renewed their ravages in Rhætia and Gaul. Hereupon Valentinian I. then emperor, dispatched Dagalaiphus, one of his best generals, against them, and, leaving Italy, hastened in person into Gaul, in order to make head against the numerous forces, which the Alemanns and other barbarous nations were said to be raising with a design to invade Gaul. The emperor advanced as far as Rheims; but the Alemanns retiring at his approach, he turned back, and took up his winter-quarters at Paris [r]. In the mean time, the Alemanns having, in the depth of winter, passed the Rhine on the ice, defeated in a pitched battle the Romans, who attempted to oppose them, took the standards of the Batavians and Heruli, killed count Charietto, who commanded in both Germanies, and wounded count Severianus, who had the command of a body of troops [s]. Zosimus supposes Valentinian himself to have been present at this battle. But it is plain from Ammianus, that he was then at Paris; whence, upon the first news of the defeat of his troops, he dispatched Dagalaiphus, to prevent the evil consequences, that were likely to attend the late overthrow. Dagalaiphus, pretending he had not sufficient strength to engage the enemy, who were roving about the country in several great bodies, did not so much as offer to restrain them. Hereupon he was recalled, and Jovinus, general of the horse, sent in his room, who defeated the Alemanns in three battles, whereof the first was fought at a place called Scarponna, now Charpeigne, between Toul and Metz; the second in the neighbourhood of the Moselle; and the third near Chalons on the Marne. In the last of these three engagements, the enemy fought with great resolution and intrepidity, and the Romans were once in great danger of being utterly defeated, the sudden flight of a tribune having disanimated the troops under his command. However, Jovinus, inspiring them with fresh courage, led them on to the charge, while they were ready to turn their backs; and, pressing with great resolution and intrepidity upon the enemy, obliged them to give ground, and in the end to betake themselves to a precipitous flight. On the enemy's side, six thousand were killed on the spot, and four thousand wounded; and of the Romans only two hundred killed and as many wounded [t]. The enemy withdrew in the night-time; but were intercepted in their retreat by several parties sent out by Jovinus for that purpose; insomuch, that few of them had the good luck to make their escape. One of their kings was taken prisoner, and immediately hanged by those who took him; which base action provoked Jovinus to such a degree, that he would have punished with death the tribune who commanded the party, had he not found, upon a strict inquiry, that he had done all that lay in his power to restrain the fury of the incensed soldiery [u]. Of this victory Idatius must, without all doubt, be understood, where he writes, that the Alemanns were utterly defeated by Valentinian [w]. In the close of the following year 367, the Alemanns, notwithstanding the loss they had sustained the year before, passed unexpectedly the Rhine, and, having taken and plundered the city of Mentz, while the emperor was employed, says Ammianus, in some other expedition, committed dreadful ravages in the neighbouring provinces, under the conduct of Rhando, one of their princes. The Romans, to be revenged on the Alemanns, had recourse to treachery, and caused Vithicabius, a prince of the same nation, to be assassinated by one of his own people, whom they had gained over by their emissaries. Vithicabius was the son of Vadomarius, and a prince of great address, intrepidity, and resolution [x]. Valentinian, having spent the following winter at Treves in making vast preparations, with a design to attack the Alemanns in their own country, took the field on the seventeenth of June, and, having assembled all his troops, crossed the Rhine, entered the enemy's country, and advanced, without the least opposition, to a place called Solicinium, which the modern geographers take to be the city of Sultz on the Neckar.

Valentinian gains a signal victory over them. Year after Christ 368.

The Alemanns had posted themselves there on a high and steep mountain; but the Romans, notwithstanding their advantageous situation, attacked them with great intrepidity, and, though several times repulsed, dislodged them in the end, and pursued them with great slaughter. Some of the enemy made their escape by favour of the night; but the far greater part were put to the sword, their retreat being cut off by count Sebastian, at the head of a strong detachment. After this battle, which was fought at a small distance from the head of the Neckar, in the present dutchy of Wirtemberg, the emperor returned to Treves, as the season was already far advanced, and there gave audience to the embassadors of the Alemanns suing for peace; which, it seems, he granted them [y], but, upon what terms, we are not told. This peace, however, was not long-lived; for two years after, that is, in 370, there appeared on the banks of the Rhine eighty thousand Burgundians, whom Valentinian had invited to join him against Macrianus king of the Alemanns. But the emperor being then busied in fortifying the banks of the Rhine, and unwilling to interrupt that work, the Burgundians returned home, without offering to molest the Alemanns. However, Theodosius, father to the emperor of that name, taking advantage of the consternation the Alemanns were in, made an irruption into their country, and returned with a considerable number of prisoners, to whom the emperor allowed lands and settlements on the banks of the Po [z]. The following year Valentinian broke unexpectedly into the country of the Alemanns, hoping to surprise Macrianus their king, whom he chiefly dreaded; but Macrianus, having received timely notice of his approach, saved himself by flight; and the emperor returned to Treves, after having laid waste the country round Mentz belonging to the Alemanns called Bucinobantes, to whom he gave one of his own nation, named Fraomarius, for king. But the country being intirely ruined, Fraomarius was glad to quit his new dignity for the command of a body of his countrymen then quartered in Britain [a]. The following year, Valentinian, paſſing the Rhine in the beginning of the ſummer, committed ſome ravages in the country of the Alemanns, and undertook the building of a fort in the neighbourhood of Baſle, to ſerve as a curb upon the Alemanns on that ſide. But in the mean time the Sarmatians and Quadians having broken into Pannonia, and cut in pieces two Roman legions there, the emperor reſolved to march againſt them in perſon. As he could not leave Gaul, without concluding a peace with the Alemanns, who, he was well appriſed, would not fail to break into thoſe provinces upon his departure, he invited Macrianus to an interview in the neighbourhood of Mentz. The king of the Alemanns readily complied with the invitation; and though at firſt he betrayed a great deal of haughtineſs in ſeeing his friendſhip thus courted by the Roman emperor, yet, in the end, he accepted the advantageous conditions that were offered him, and ever after continued a faithful friend to the Romans [b]. Some years after, a war being kindled between the Alemanns and Franks, Macrianus, having invaded the enemy's country, was killed in an ambuſcade by Mellobaudes, a warlike prince of that nation [c].

He concludes a peace with Macrianus their king. Year after Chriſt 374.

IN the year 378, the Goths, who had been admitted by Valens into the empire, having revolted, and defeated ſeveral Roman armies ſent againſt them, Gratian, alarmed at the danger that threatened the eaſtern provinces, reſolved to march in perſon to the aſſiſtance of his uncle, as ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit; and in the mean time ordered part of his forces to ſet out on their march from Gaul, where he then was, to Illyricum. Of this notice being immediately given to the Alemanns, called Lentienſes, by a countryman of theirs, who was in ſome employment at the court of Gratian, without the leaſt regard to the treaty they had concluded with Valentinian, they paſſed the Rhine, and began to lay waſte the neighbouring provinces. They were repulſed at firſt by the Roman troops quartered in thoſe parts; but returning ſoon after, to the number of forty thouſand fighting men, Gratian was obliged to recal the troops that were already on their march into Illyricum, and to ſend them, reinforced with thoſe that were left in Gaul, under the conduct of Nannianus and Mellobaudes king of the Franks, to oppoſe the attempts of the enemy, and to oblige them to repaſs the Rhine. The two generals gave them battle at a place called Argentaria, now, as is commonly believed, Colmar, and, tho' greatly inferior in number, gained a complete victory, thirty thousand of the enemy being killed on the spot, and the rest either slain in the pursuit or taken prisoners. Their king Triarius and several other persons of great distinction were in the number of the dead [d]. After this victory, Gratian passed the Rhine at the head of his army, and, entering the enemy's country, obliged them to take refuge among their barren mountains, where he kept them shut up, till they were forced by famine to submit to such terms as the conqueror thought fit to impose upon them, one of which was, that they should deliver up their youth to serve in the Roman army; which they did accordingly [e]. Of the Alemanns no further mention is made in history till the year 388, when we are told by Orosius [f], that, dreading the arms of Maximus, who had usurped the empire in Gaul, they submitted to him of their own accord, paying him a yearly tribute, and supplying his army with such quantities of corn and other provisions as he thought fit to demand. In the reign of Honorius, which began in 395, a colony of the Alemanns was allowed to settle in that part of the present Switzerland, which is separated by mount Jura from the Franche Comté, and by the lake of Geneva and the Rhône from the present Savoy and province of Vienne [g]. Servius, who wrote his comment upon Virgil about the year 411, tells us, that, in his time, the country bordering on the lake Lemanus, or lake of Geneva, was inhabited by the Alemanns [h]. We find no fruther mention made of the Alemanns till the year 477, when Audoacrius king of the Saxons, and Childeric king of the Franks, marching against those of that nation who had settled among the Alps, and made frequent inroads both into Gaul and Italy, put great numbers of them to the sword, and stripped them of the booty, which they had a little before brought with them from Italy [i]. Upon the downfal of the western empire, the Alemanns made themselves masters of that part of Gaul, which is now known by the name of Alsace, and settled there [k]. These Alemanns, being joined by their countrymen in Germany, and those who dwelt between mount Jura and the lake of Geneva, in the year 496, entered Germania Secunda, which then belonged to the Ripuarian Franks, putting all to fire and sword. Hereupon Sigebert, king of the country, not able to make head against them with his own forces alone, had recourse to Clovis, king of the Salian Franks; who immediately joined him. The two kings, after their junction, engaged the Alemanns, and gained a complete victory over them at Tolbiac, thought to be the present Zulpick, about four leagues from Cologne. After this defeat, such of the Alemanns as had settled in Alsace, and in the neighbourhood of the lake of Geneva, acknowledged Clovis for their king. Others took refuge in Rhætia and Noricum, being allowed to settle there by Theodoric king of Italy, as we have related above [l]. The same prince transplanted great numbers of them into Italy, and suffered the rest to settle in the countries between the Alps and the Danube, which were subject to him. From this time the Alemanns had no king of their own (for their last king was killed in the above-mentioned battle); but continued, as they were dispersed in several counties, subject partly to the Ostrogoths, who were masters of Italy, and partly to the Franks, who were lords of Gaul. When the Ostrogoths yielded to the children of Clovis whatever they held out of Italy, all the Alemanns, except those whom Theodoric had transplanted into that country, submitted to the Franks, as we shall relate in our history of the modern nations.

The Gepidæ.

THE Gepidæ were, without all doubt, a Gothic nation. Jornandes, speaking of them, gives us the following account of their name and origin: The Goths, says that writer, leaving Scandinavia under the conduct of king Berith, put to sea with three ships only. One of these, sailing slower than the other two, was thence called Gepanta, signifying in the Gothic tongue slow; and hence the name of Gepantæ and Gepidæ, which was first given to that people by way of reproach [m]. Procopius likewise tells us in express terms, that the Goths, the Vandals, the Visigoths, and the Gepidæ, were originally one and the same nation; that they had the same customs, manners, religion, and language, and that they only differed in names, borrowed perhaps, says he, from their different leaders [n]: and Paulus Diaconus; the Goths, the Gepidæ, the Vandals, says he, agree in language, manners, and religion, and differ only in name [o]. They entered Scythia, according to Jornandes, with the other Goths, and settled in the neighbourhood of the Tanais and Palus Mæotis [p]. There they continued till the reign of Arcadius and Honorius, when their numbers being greatly increased, they approached the Danube, and, having

ſome time after croſſed that river, they ſettled in the neighbourhood of Singidunum and Sirmium, about the year 400, where they ſtill were when Procopius wrote his hiſtory [q]. They had kings of their own, and formed a ſeparate and diſtinct nation both from the Oſtrogoths and Viſigoths; but perhaps not from the Lombards, who were afterwards maſters of Italy [r]. As for what we find of them in the antient writers, Jornandes tells us, that, under the conduct of their king Faſtida, they gained a complete victory over the Burgundians about the year 245 [s]. The Burgundians whom they overcame, and almoſt extirpated, were, according to Valeſius, as we have related above, a different nation from the Burgundians who afterwards ſettled in Gaul. Be that as it will, Faſtida, elated with his ſucceſs againſt the Burgundians, diſpatched a meſſenger to Oſtrogotha, king of the Goths, acquainting him, that as the Gepidæ were greatly ſtraightened for want of room, he muſt either grant them lands, or prepare for war. Oſtrogotha anſwered, That he ſhould be very unwilling to make war upon his kinſmen; but was determined to part with no land. Hereupon Faſtida, entering the territories of the Goths, began to lay them waſte; which Oſtrogotha no ſooner underſtood, than, leaving Mæſia, which he was then ravaging, he haſtened back to the defence of his own country, and, meeting Faſtida, gave him a total overthrow; but, contenting himſelf with the victory, did not ſo much as purſue the flying Gepidæ, looking upon them rather as his kinſmen, than an enemy [u]. The Gepidæ joined the Goths, and other northern nations, in the famous irruption which they made with their united forces into the empire in 269, the ſecond of the reign of Claudius; but they were defeated by that prince with great ſlaughter, as we have related at length elſewhere [v]. In the year 279, the emperor Probus granted to them, and likewiſe to the Juthungians, Vandals, and Franks, lands in Thrace, upon their promiſing to live as the other ſubjects of the empire. But while the emperor was engaged in war with Saturninus, who had revolted in the eaſt, they laid hold of that opportunity to ravage the neighbouring provinces. Hereupon Probus, having ſucceſsfully ended his other wars, marched againſt them in perſon, and, in ſeveral encounters, cut ſuch numbers of them in pieces, that only a ſmall body of Franks had the good luck to eſcape the general ſlaughter and return home [w]. out between them and the Goths, in which the Gepidæ were assisted by the Vandals, and the Goths by the Taifalæ, another Gothic nation. But all we know of this war is, that both parties were greatly weakened, and put out of a condition of disturbing, for some time, the peace of the empire [x]. The Gepidæ are mentioned by St. Jerom among the other nations of barbarians, that in 407 broke into Gaul, and over-ran those provinces [y]. They were afterwards subdued, with the other northern nations, by Attila, and in 451 served under him in his famous expedition into Gaul; on which occasion the Franks and they meeting in the dark, both parties engaged with such fury, that above fifteen thousand were left dead on the spot [z]. Upon the death of Attila, the Gepidæ shook off the yoke under the conduct of their king Ardaric; which occasioned a bloody war between them and the Hunns. But at length Ardaric having gained a complete victory over the Hunns, of whom thirty thousand were killed on the spot, with their king Ellac, the Gepidæ not only recovered their antient liberty, but the country whence they had been driven by Attila, that is, all antient Dacia, lying north of the Danube [a]. This memorable battle, which, in a manner, put an end to the empire of the Hunns, was fought on the banks of the Netad in Pannonia, about the year 480 [b]. The Gepidæ, thus settled in Dacia, entered into an alliance with the Romans, who agreed to pay them an annual pension. Dacia beyond the Danube was thenceforth called, from its new inhabitants, Gepidia, as we read in Jornandes [c]. Some years after, part of Illyricum was likewise granted them, with the city of Sirmium; whence their kings are by Theophanes styled kings of Sirmium [d]. There they continued quiet till the year 537, when, joining the Heruli, they began to plunder the neighbouring provinces. Hereupon Justinian, then emperor, having ended the war in Italy with the Goths, dispatched his best generals against them, who, having overcome them in several encounters, obliged them to abandon what they held in Illyricum, and content themselves with North Dacia, or Dacia beyond the Danube [e]. In the year 550, a contest arose between the Gepidæ and the Lombards descended from them, says Paulus Diaconus [f], about their confines; for the Lombards held part of Dacia beyond the Danube, having been allowed to settle there by the Roman emperors, who indeed had abandoned that province, but claimed a right of disposing of it to whom they pleased. Both the Gepidæ and Lombards, before they came to an open rupture, dispatched embassadors to Justinian, soliciting succours, in virtue of their alliance with the empire. The emperor, after hearing the embassadors of both nations, declared, that, in case of a war, he was determined not to suffer the Lombards to be oppressed by their encroaching neighbours, ordering at the same time ten thousand horse and fifteen hundred foot to march to their assistance, under the command of Constantianus, Buzes, Aratius, and other generals; which the Gepidæ no sooner understood, than they concluded a peace with the Lombards [g]. But the Roman troops were scarce returned home, when the Gepidæ, refusing to stand to the articles of the treaty, took the field anew under the conduct of their king Thorisinus. Auduinus, then king of the Lombards, having drawn together what troops he could, went out to meet the enemy; but both armies, seized with a panic while they were ready to engage, betook themselves at the same time to a precipitous flight; which both kings looking upon as a prodigy, they concluded a two years truce [h]; which was no sooner expired, than the Gepidæ, calling in the Heruli to their assistance, broke unexpectedly into the territories of the Lombards, destroying all with fire and sword. But the Lombards, receiving a timely reinforcement from Justinian, fell upon the Gepidæ, and gave them a total overthrow [i]. We are told, that Justinian had promised to observe a strict neutrality in this war; and that his promise was confirmed by the oath of twelve senators: but nevertheless, as the Gepidæ had not kept their word with him, he did not think himself bound, either by his own promise, or the oaths of the senators who had sworn in his name [k]. This defeat was followed by a peace between the two nations, which was concluded by the mediation of Justinian, unwilling that either should aggrandize themselves at the expence of the other. Thorisinus was at this time king of the Gepidæ, and Auduinus of the Lombards; but neither had any right to the crown he wore. The lawful heir to Elemund the late king of the Gepidæ was Ustrigothus, that prince's only son; but Elemund dying while he was yet under age, Thorisinus had caused himself to be acknowledged in his room. In the same manner Auduinus, king of the Lombards, had excluded Ildigesal the lawful heir from the crown, and placed it upon his own head. The above-mentioned peace between the two nations was scarce concluded, when Ildigesal took refuge among the Gepidæ, and Ustrigothus among the Lombards.

Both

Both princes were demanded with great earneſtneſs and threats by their reſpective nations; but neither caring to comply with the requeſt of the other, they both began to prepare for war. However, the two kings, or rather uſurpers, before hoſtilities were committed on either ſide, agreed to diſpatch each other's rival; which they did accordingly, deeming it leſs diſhonourable to aſſaſſinate than betray thoſe, who had put themſelves under their protection [l]. Not long after, the two kings dying, Thoriſinus was ſucceeded by Cunimundus, and Auduinus by Alboinus. Cunimundus had ſcarce aſcended the throne, when, reviving ſome antient claims upon the Lombards, which they refuſed to comply with, he took the field at the head of a very numerous army, and, entering the country of the Lombards, committed there unheard-of ravages. On the other hand, Alboinus, having drawn together a no leſs numerous army, reſolved to put the whole to the iſſue of a battle; which Cunimundus not declining, the two armies engaged with a fury hardly to be expreſſed. The victory continued long doubtful; but, in the end, the Gepidæ were put to flight, and purſued by the victorious Lombards with ſuch ſlaughter, that ſcarce one was left alive of ſo numerous a multitude. Alboinus killed Cunimundus with his own hand, and, cutting off his head, turned his ſkull into a cup, called by the Lombards, ſays Paulus Diaconus, ſchala, and by the Latins patera. This ſchala or cup he ever afterwards uſed at all public banquets or entertainments. After this victory, the Lombards ſeized on all Dacia, obliging the Gepidæ either to ſubmit to them, or retire elſewhere. Thenceforth they had no king of their own, but lived in ſubjection either to the Lombards, who were maſters of their country, or to the princes of the neighbouring nations, eſpecially of the Hunns ſettled in Pannonia [m]. Thus Paulus Diaconus in his hiſtory of the Lombards. Lazius adds, that, among the preſent Hungarians, the deſcendants of the Gepidæ are eaſily diſtinguiſhed from thoſe who are ſprung from the Hunns [n]. The ruin of the kingdom of the Gepidæ is placed by Pagi in 553, while Juſtinian was ſtill living; but others more rightly in the year 572, Juſtin, the ſucceſſor of Juſtinian, being then emperor: for we are told, that the treaſures of the deceaſed king were conveyed to Juſtin at Conſtantinople by Traſſaicus, an Arian biſhop, and by Reptilanes, the late king's grandſon [o]. Alboinus afterwards married Roſimund, the daughter of Cunimundus; which made the Gepidæ bear the yoke more patiently [p]. Theodebert, one of the kings of the Franks, reproaches the emperor Justinian for assuming the title of Gepidicus, to which he had no claim, since that nation was never overcome or conquered by him [q]. Some writers think, that the king of the Franks was therein mistaken, since the surname of Gepidicus is not to be found on any of the almost innumerable monuments and coins of Justinian, which have reached our times. Others are of opinion, that Justinian took the surname of Gepidicus, not on account of his conquering that nation, but because the Gepidæ, by putting themselves, as they did, under his protection, were deemed his subjects, which, say they, intitled him to the surname of Gepidicus. It is certain, that he took, and, according to the most probable opinion, on this account, the title of Francicus, before he had gained any advantages over that nation, nay several years before he made war upon them.

The Heruli.

The Heruli.

Their origin.

Their different seats.

THE Heruli, by Zosimus called Eruli [r], by Syncellus Aairuli [s], but commonly Heruli, were originally, according to Jornandes and Procopius, a Gothic nation. The former writer tells us, that they first dwelt in Scandinavia, and that, being driven from thence by the Dani, they wandered eastward as far as the Palus Mœotis, and settled in that neighbourhood [t]. Procopius speaks of them as inhabiting, in antient times, the countries lying beyond the Danube [u], agreeing therein with Jornandes. There they continued, making frequent irruptions into the empire, till the reign of the emperor Anastasius, who succeeded Zeno in 491, when great numbers of them were cut off by the Lombards, and the rest driven from their antient habitations. Some of them, after having long roved about from one country to another, settled in that of the Rugians, the present Pomerania, which they found uninhabited, the antient proprietors being gone with the Goths into Italy. Some time after, they removed from thence into North Dacia, or Dacia beyond the Danube, being allowed by the Gepidæ, then masters of that country, to settle among them. But being oppressed and ill used by the Gepidæ, they had recourse to the emperor Anastasius, who in 511 allowed them to pass the Danube, and settle in Thrace, upon their promising to serve with fidelity in the Roman armies, when required [w]. Great numbers of them, upon their being driven out of their own country by the Lombards, as we have mentioned above, under the conduct of several princes of the blood royal, took their route westward, and, passing without opposition through several barbarous nations, came to the ocean, and, embarquing there, set sail for Thule, where they settled [x]. By Thule Procopius meant, without all doubt, the peninsula of Scandinavia, which he calls ten times as big as Britain; and adds, that great part of it was destitute of inhabitants, but in that, which was inhabited, were seated thirteen populous nations, each of them being governed by their own kings and laws [y]. The Heruli had kings of their own; but their kings, says Procopius, were such only by name; for they scarce had any authority, and were almost upon a level with every private man [z]. Hence some think they were called Heruli, from the antient Gothic word herrn, signifying free. But others, and, among the rest, Ablavius, as quoted by Jornandes, will have them to have been called Heruli, from the Greek word hele, signifying marshy grounds, such as those were in the neighbourhood of the Palus Mœotis, where they dwelt [a]. The Heruli had some laws peculiar to themselves, and differing from those of all other nations; for, among them, when men were grown old or infirm, they were not to live, but intreat their relations to dispatch them; which they did accordingly, by placing them on a pile of wood, where they were put to death by one, who was a stranger to them in blood, and their bodies reduced to ashes, it being the duty of the nearest relation to set fire to the pile. When the husband died, the wife was to strangle herself on her husband's tomb, on pain of being deemed infamous, and looked upon as one, who had no value for her husband. They were given to all manner of lewdness and debauchery, and not ashamed of the most unnatural practices. They adored the same gods as the other Gothic nations, and used, on some extraordinary occasions, to appease them with human sacrifices [b]. They were a warlike people, and are chiefly commended by the antients for their swiftness and agility, all other nations chusing their light-armed soldiers out of them. The Heruli began first to invade the empire about the year 526, the fourth of the emperor Valerian's reign; but were soon driven back by Gallienus, the son of Valerian, and his collegue in the empire [c]. Eleven years after, the Heruli, passing from the Palus Maotis into the Euxine sea with five hundred veſſels, under the conduct of one of their chiefs named Naulobat, landed at Byzantium and Chryopolis, now Scutari. At the latter place they were met and defeated by Venerianus, who was himſelf killed in the engagement. The Heruli, ſomewhat diſcouraged with the loſs they had ſuſtained, reimbarqued, and began to retire to the mouth of the Euxine ſea; but the very next day, the wind proving favourable, they returned anew before Byzantium, and, having croſſed the Boſporus, ſurpriſed and plundered the city of Cyzicus, with great part of Aſia, and the iſlands of Lemnos and Scyros in the Archipelago. Thence they ſteered their courſe towards Greece, and, landing there, beſieged and burnt Athens, Corinth, Sparta, and Argos, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition, till the Athenians, under the conduct of Dexippus the hiſtorian, waiting for them in the ſtraights, and, falling upon them unexpectedly, cut great numbers of them in pieces. However, in their retreat they committed great devaſtations in Bæotia, Acarnania, Epirus, and Thrace. In the mean time, Gallienus, returning from Gaul, haſtened into Illyricum, hoping to meet the Heruli there on their return home. He met them accordingly, and coming upon them unexpectedly, gave them a total overthrow, purſued them with great ſlaughter as far as the Neſſus in Mœſia, and there cut three thouſand of them in pieces, as they were attempting to croſs that river. Naulobat himſelf was taken priſoner, but treated with great humanity by Gallienus, who, to gain the affections of the barbarians, honoured him either with the conſulate or the conſular ornaments [d]. The Heruli, however, two years after, that is, in 269, joined the Goths and other northern nations, againſt the emperor Claudius; but were defeated by that prince with great ſlaughter, as we have related at length elſewhere [e]. In the year 287, the fourth of Dioclefian's reign, the Heruli, joining the Chaibons and Cavions, entered Gaul, and laid waſte the provinces bordering on the Rhine. But Maximian, marching againſt them, gave them a total overthrow, and purſued them with ſuch ſlaughter, that, if his panegyriſt may be credited, out of ſo great a multitude not one was left alive to carry home the news of their defeat [f]. All we know of the Chaibons and Cavions is, that their country lay at a great diſtance from Gaul, as well as that of the Heruli [g]. In the year 366, the third of Valentinian's reign, we find a body of Heruli ſerving in the Roman army on the Rhine; for Am-

mianus Marcellinus [h] and Zosimus [i] tell us, that the Alemanns, croſſing that river on the ice, defeated the Romans and took the ſtandards of the Batavians and Heruli. About the year 370, Ermenric, whom Jornandes calls Ermanaric, king of the Oſtrogoths, after having ſubdued the neighbouring nations, fell upon the Heruli, and obliged them to ſubmit, to pay him a yearly tribute, and to ſupply his army with their youth, when required [k]. They were afterwards ſubdued, with the other northern nations, by Attila, and ſerved in his army, when in 451, he invaded Gaul. Upon the death of Attila, they recovered their antient liberty, and, entering into an alliance with the Romans, ſerved in their armies, under commanders of their own nation, but named by the emperors [l]. In the year 456, they made a deſcent on the coaſt of Galicia; but finding the inhabitants on their guard, they reimbarqued, and, landing in Biſcay, committed great ravages there [m]. Idatius, who ſpeaks of this deſcent, does not tell us whence thoſe Heruli came, who, according to him, were but four hundred in number. When Odoacer made himſelf maſter of Italy in 476, ſuch of the Heruli, as ſerved at that time in the Roman armies, obtained of him lands in Italy, the third of that country being by him divided among the barbarians, who were in the Roman ſervice, under the name of fœderati, or allies, and had joined him againſt Oreſtes and his ſon Auguſtulus, as we have related elſewhere [n]. In the reign of the emperor Anaſtaſius, which began in 491, they made war on ſeveral barbarous nations, ſays Procopius [o], and ſubdued them; but having obliged their king Rodulphus to make war upon the Lombards, without the leaſt provocation, they were overthrown by them with great ſlaughter, and obliged either to live in ſubjection to the conquerors or abandon their country. Moſt of them choſe the latter, ſome ſettling in the country of the Rugians, as we have hinted above, others returning into Scandinavia, and ſome, with the permiſſion of the emperor Anaſtaſius, taking up their abode in Thrace and Illyricum [p], where they had not been long, ere they began to oppreſs and abuſe, in a moſt barbarous manner, the Romans, among whom they lived. Hereupon Anaſtaſius ordered the troops quartered in the neighbouring provinces to march to the aſſiſtance of the oppreſſed Romans, who, taking arms upon their arrival, fell, in conjunction with them, on the Heruli, and cut moſt of them in pieces. Such of them, as eſcaped the general ſlaughter, had recourſe to the clemency of the emperor, who, upon their promiſing to ſerve the empire like faithful ſubjects, not only ordered them to be ſpared, but ſuffered them to continue in the countries, which he had formerly granted them [q]. In the reign of the emperor Juſtinian, which began in 526, the Heruli, having murdered their king, and no other remaining among them of the blood royal, they diſpatched embaſſadors into Thule or Scandinavia, with orders to bring a prince from thence of the family, if it was not extinct likewiſe there. The embaſſadors, purſuant to their directions, pitched upon one (for there were many of the royal race there); but he dying on the way, they went back, and choſe another named Todaſius, who immediately ſet out on his journey to Thrace, attended by the embaſſadors, by his brother Aordas, and by a guard of two hundred men. But in the mean time the Heruli, having long waited the return of their embaſſadors, and ſuſpecting they had met with ſome misfortune, had recourſe to Juſtinian, begging he would give them a king. The emperor readily complied with their requeſt, and appointed one Suartuas to reign over them, who was of the ſame nation, but had lived long at Conſtantinople. The Heruli received their new king with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy; but, a few days after his arrival, news being brought, that the embaſſadors, on their return from Thule, had already reached the confines, with a prince of the blood royal, they immediately revolted from Suartuas, who was thereupon obliged to ſave himſelf by flight and return to Conſtantinople. Juſtinian, highly provoked at their conduct, reſolved to force them to acknowledge the prince he had given them; but the Gepidæ eſpouſing the cauſe of the new king, the emperor, whoſe troops were then employed againſt the Oſtrogoths in Italy, did not think it adviſeable to engage in a new war. But the war in Italy was no ſooner ended, than, turning his arms againſt the Heruli and their allies the Gepidæ, he drove both nations quite out of the empire [r]. He was afterwards reconciled to the Heruli, who aſſiſted him in his other wars, ſupplying his armies with numerous bodies of troops, of which one ſerved with great reputation in Italy, and the other in Colchis [s]. In the reign of Juſtinian, great numbers of them embraced the chriſtian religion; but the change of religion wrought no change in their manners, being of all nations, ſays Procopius, the moſt wicked, the moſt treacherous, avaricious, and the moſt addicted to drunkenneſs, and all manner of lewdneſs and debauchery. They were, ſoon after the death of Juſtinian, ſubdued by the Lombards, and lived partly ſubject to them, partly to the neighbouring nations.

The Marcomanns.

THE Marcomanns are, by all the antient writers, reckoned among the German nations. They dwelt originally near the ſprings of the Danube; but removed from thence under the conduct of their king Maroboduus, into the country which was then held by the Boians, and is ſtill called from them Bohemia, as it was by the antients Boiohemia and Boioheimia, that is, the country of the Boians. The Boians were, according to Cæſar, a Gauliſh nation, but from Gaul paſſed into Germany, and, ſettling in the preſent Bohemia, continued there till they were driven out by the Marcomanns [u]. The migration of the Marcomanns, from their original country into that of the Boians, is mentioned by Velleius Paterculus [w]. Ptolemy, in deſcribing the country of the Marcomanns, mentions a city there called Marobudum, which name it took, without all doubt, from its founder Maroboduus. This our modern geographers take to be the preſent city of Prague. Strabo calls the city, where Maroboduus uſually reſided, Boviaſmum [f]; but Cluverius thinks we ought to read Boiæum. The Marcomanns agreed in cuſtoms, manners, religion, &c. with the other German nations, were a very numerous and warlike people, and ever ready to prefer death to ſlavery. Of all the German nations they alone made uſe of the Runic letters in their charms and incantations; whence Lazius and Rhabanus Maurus conclude them to have come originally from Scandinavia [g]; but, in every thing elſe, they agreed with the German nations, and are reckoned among them, as we have hinted above, by the antient writers. As for their hiſtory, in the reign of Auguſtus, Tiberius, having croſſed the Rhine at the head of a very numerous and powerful army, gained great advantages over them and the other German nations; which obliged them to ſend deputies to Auguſtus and ſue for peace. The emperor received the embaſſadors of the Marcomanns with particular marks of diſtinction, and granted them their requeſt; but obliged the other German nations to retire beyond the Elbe, and the Sicambrians, with ſuch of the Sueves as were not ſubject to Merobodnus, to abandon their native country, and people some places in Gaul, that were destitute of inhabitants [h]. In the year 17, the fourth of Tiberius, a war broke out between the Marcomanns and the Cheruscans dwelling between the Elbe and the Weser. The former were commanded by Maroboduus, and the latter by the celebrated Arminius, who, a few years before, had cut off the legions of Varus. But all we know of this war is, that the Cheruscans gained considerable advantages over the Marcomanns [i]. Two years after, Tiberius having, by his emissaries, stirred up the subjects of Maroboduus against him, he was driven from the throne, and obliged to pass the last eighteen years of his life at Ravenna. Maroboduus was succeeded by Catualdus, who was likewise driven out soon after, and obliged to take refuge in Gaul [k]. In the year 86, the emperor Domitian, provoked against the Marcomanns and Quadians, because they did not assist him in the war, which he was then waging with the Dacians, entered their country in an hostile manner. Both nations earnestly sued for peace; which Domitian was so far from granting, that he caused their embassadors to be put to death. Hereupon the Marcomanns flew to arms, and, having drawn together a considerable body of troops, they engaged the emperor, and put his army to the rout [l]. However the emperor, upon his return to Rome, triumphed both over them and the Dacians, of whom, after his defeat by the Marcomanns, he had purchased a peace with large sums, which he had refused before upon most advantageous terms [m]. But the triumphs of this emperor were looked upon as certain tokens of his having been defeated [n]. In the year 93, Domitian marched in person against the Sarmatians, who, according to some, had cut in pieces one, according to others, several Roman legions [o], and at the same time made war upon the Marcomanns [p]. But all we know of this war is, that Domitian pretended to have gained great advantages over both nations, and, on that account, took the title of imperator [q]. We have spoken elsewhere at length of the memorable war, which, in conjunction with several other German nations, the Marcomanns made on the empire [r]; and therefore shall only observe here, that, in one of the battles that were fought in this war, the Romans were defeated with the loss of twenty thousand men; and that, on another occasion, the emperor Aurelius was in great danger of being cut off with his whole army. Tho' the whole ſtrength of the empire was employed againſt them, yet they held out for the ſpace of fifteen years, and in the end obtained a peace upon very reaſonable terms, one of which was, that they ſhould not, for the future, ſettle within ſix miles of the Danube [s]. Some of the Marcomanns, who ſubmitted to the emperor, were tranſplanted into Italy; but theſe, having attempted to make themſelves maſters of Ravenna, were by him ſent back to their own country. This war laſted from the year 165, to the year 180. In the year 214, a war was kindled between them and the Vandals, by means of the emperor Caracalla, who uſed to brag, that he had ſet at variance thoſe two nations, which, till this time, had lived in friendſhip and amity [t]; but what was the iſſue of that war, we are nowhere told. In the year 256, the emperor Gallienus entered into an alliance with Attalus king of the Marcomanns; and, upon the captivity of his father Valerian, taken priſoner by the Perſians, he yielded to him part of Upper Pannonia for his daughter Pipa or Pipara, whom he pretended to marry; but as he was already married to Salonina, ſtyled in the antient inſcriptions Cornelia Salonina Auguſta [u], Pipa is called by the writers of thoſe times his concubine [w]. The Marcomanns joined the Alemanns and the Juthongians in the war, which thoſe nations made on the emperor Aurelian about the year 270, but were in the end cut off almoſt to a man [x]. Both Idatius and Victor [y] mention a victory gained over the Marcomanns in the year 299, the ſixteenth of Dioclefian's reign. About the year 396, Fritigil, queen of the Marcomanns, having embraced the chriſtian religion, wrote to St. Ambroſe, intreating him to ſend her ſome inſtructions relating to the conduct of her life. The holy prelate readily complied with her requeſt, and beſides exhorted her to perſuade her huſband to live in peace and amity with the Romans. This ſhe not only did, but prevailed upon the king to ſubject himſelf, and his kingdom to the empire [z]. And hence it is, that, among the many barbarous nations that broke into Gaul a few years after, that is, in 406, and 407, no mention is made of the Marcomanns. They ſeem to have continued faithful to the Romans till the time of Attila, when, being ſubdued by that prince, they were obliged to ſerve in his army againſt their old friends and allies; for they are mentioned among the many different nations, of which

The Quadians.

The Quadians.

NEXT to the Marcomanns dwelt the Quadians, a German nation often mentioned by the antients, eſpecially by Eutropius and Capitolinus. Their country is at preſent known by the name of Moravia; for it extended from the mountains of Bohemia to the river Marus, now the March, and conſequently compriſed that province. Ptolemy mentions the following cities in the country of the Quadians, viz. Eburodunum, or, as others read it, Robodunum, Eburum, Medoſlanium, and Celemantia, now, according to Cluverius, Brin, Olmutz, Znaim, and Kalminz. The Quadians were a warlike people, had kings of their own, and agreed in cuſtoms, manners, and religion, with the other German nations. The Quadians joined, without all doubt, their countrymen againſt Lollius, Germanicus, Caius, and Galba, attempting to reduce Germany, and bring under ſubjection the ſeveral nations inhabiting that extenſive country. The emperor Domitian, while engaged in a war with the Dacians, turned unexpectedly his arms againſt them; but, before the Quadians could draw their troops together, the emperor was defeated and put to flight by the Marcomanns, as we have related above. They ſubmitted, it ſeems, to the emperor Titus Antoninus; for they received and acknowledged a king named by that prince, as appears from ſome of Antoninus's coins, ſuppoſed to have been ſtruck about the year 139 [c]. They joined the Marcomanns in the memorable war, which that nation made upon the empire in the reign of M. Aurelius, as we have hinted above, and related at length in our Roman hiſtory [d]. The Quadians being, by that war, which had laſted fifteen years, reduced to great ſtraights, ſent in the end embaſſadors to ſue for peace, and with them all the Roman deſerters, and thirteen thouſand priſoners, whom they had taken during the war. By that means they obtained a peace, upon condition that they ſhould not traffic for the future within the Roman dominions, nor ſettle within ſix miles of the Danube. But, diſliking theſe conditions, they renewed the war, in conjunction with the Marcomanns; and, having driven out Furtius, whom the emperor had appointed to reign over them, they appointed one Ariogeſes in his room; which M. Aurelius reſented to ſuch a degree, that though the Quadians promiſed to ſet at liberty fifty thouſand Roman captives, upon condition that he confirmed to Ariogeſes the title of king, the emperor would not hearken to the propoſal; but, on the contrary, proſcribed the new prince, and ſet a price upon his head. Hereupon the Quadians, being joined by the Marcomanns and ſeveral other nations, attacked the Romans; but, after a long and bloody diſpute, were put to the rout and utterly defeated. Ariogeſes himſelf was taken priſoner; but the emperor generouſly ſpared his life, and contented himſelf with confining him to the city of Alexandria, the metropolis of Egypt. After this victory, the other nations ſubmitted and obtained a peace; but the Quadians ſeem to have continued in arms till the reign of Commodus, who granted them a peace upon the following terms: They obtain a peace of Commodus.

1. That they ſhould keep at the diſtance of five miles from the Danube. 2. That they ſhould deliver up their arms, and ſupply the Romans with a certain number of troops, when required. 3. That they ſhould aſſemble but once a month in one place only, and in the preſence of a Roman centurion. And laſtly, That they ſhould not make war upon the neighbouring nations, without the conſent of the people of Rome *. This peace was concluded in the year 180, the firſt of the emperor Commodus's reign. In the year 214, the Quadians had one Gaiobomar for their king, who was murdered by the orders of Caracalla; but upon what provocation, we are not told. Of this aſſaſſination the emperor uſed to brag, as of a glorious action °. In 257, the fourth of the emperor Valerian's reign, the Quadians, joining the Sarmatians, broke into Illyricum, and ravaged part of that province; but they were defeated by Probus, afterwards emperor, but at that time only tribune of a legion. On this occaſion Probus reſcued out of the hands of the Quadians Valerius Flaccus, a youth deſcended from an illuſtrious family, and nearly related to the emperor Valerian, who publicly commended Probus for ſo glorious an action, and preſented him with a civic crown, which, in the times of the republic, was beſtowed on thoſe, who had ſaved the life of a citizen [f]. In 260, the ſeventh of the emperor Gallienus, they made a ſudden ir- Defeated by Probus.

ruption into Pannonia; but were obliged by Regillianus, who commanded there, to quit their booty and return home. That commander is ſaid to have gained ſeveral victories over them in one day [g]. Some years after, that is, about the year 283, Probus, who had kept the barbarians in awe, being dead, the Quadians, in conjunction with the Sarmatians, broke into Illyricum and Thrace, and, after having ravaged thoſe provinces, were advancing towards Italy; but Carus, who had ſucceeded Probus, meeting them on the borders of Illyricum, gave them a total overthrow, killed ſixteen thouſand of them on the ſpot, and took twenty thouſand priſoners [h]. In the year 355, the nineteenth of the emperor Conſtantius, the Quadians broke into Pannonia and Mæſia, and, having pillaged thoſe provinces, without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition, they returned home unmoleſted, carrying with them an immenſe booty [i]. Of this irruption, no mention is made by Ammianus. Two years after, they returned anew, and laid waſte Valeria, while the Sueves committed dreadful ravages in Rhætia, and the Sarmatians over-ran Lower Pannonia and Upper Mœſia. Hereupon Conſtantius, leaving Milan, where he then was, advanced to the confines of the Quadians, and there conferred with the chiefs, who excuſed, in the beſt manner they could, the paſt ravages, and promiſed, for the future, to live in peace and amity with the empire [k]. But, notwithſtanding the promiſes they had made, the following year 358, in conjunction with the Sarmatians, they laid waſte great part of Pannonia and Mœſia; but, at the approach of Conſtantius, who marched againſt them in perſon, they repaſſed the Danube and returned home. But the emperor reſolved to puniſh them for their treachery, and, having paſſed the Danube on a bridge of boats, began to lay waſte their country. The Quadians, not finding themſelves in a condition to make head againſt the numerous forces Conſtantius had with him, ſent deputies to ſue for peace; which the emperor readily granted them, upon their delivering up hoſtages, and ſetting at liberty all the priſoners they had taken [l]. In the year 374, their king Gabinius being treacherouſly murdered by Marcellianus duke of Valeria, in the manner we have related in our Roman hiſtory [m], they paſſed the Danube in the utmoſt rage, and falling upon the reapers, it being then harveſt-time, cut moſt of them in pieces, laid waſte the country to a great diſtance, and took an incredible number of captives. Equitius, general of the troops in Illyricum, not finding himself in a condition to stem this furious torrent, retired into Valeria; but the Quadians, looking upon him as the chief author of the murder of their king, followed him thither, committing dreadful ravages in the countries through which they passed. In their way they met two legions, the Pannonian and the Mœsian, who had been sent to oppose them; but the legions falling into an unseasonable contention about precedency, the barbarians, taking advantage of their disagreement, cut them both in pieces. Thus all the open country was abandoned to them, the Romans remaining masters only of the fortified places [n]. The Sarmatians, who had joined the Quadians in this irruption, having entered Upper Mœsia, were defeated there with great slaughter by Theodosius, afterwards emperor, but then very young, and only duke of Mœsia. Against the Quadians Valentinian I. then emperor, marched in person, and, arriving at Carnutum in Illyricum, which most geographers take to be the present city of Hainburg on the Danube in Austria, about thirty miles east of Vienna, continued there three months, making vast preparations for his intended expedition into the country of the Quadians. At length he took the field, and, having passed the Danube at Acincum, now Gran, or, as others will have it, Buda in Lower Hungary, he entered the enemy's country and laid it waste, destroying all with fire and sword. Having thus passed the summer and great part of the autumn, he took up his winter-quarters at Bregetio, which some take to be a village on the Danube, now called Bregnitz, and others the present city of Komare in the isle of Schut. There he gave audience to the embassadors of the Quadians, come to sue for peace; but, while he was speaking to them with great warmth, and threatening to extirpate their whole nation, he fell all on a sudden to the ground, as if his life and voice had failed him at once. Being immediately conveyed into his chamber, he was there seized with convulsion-fits, and violent contorsions of all his limbs, in the agonies of which he soon expired [o]. Socrates writes, that being offended at the mean and beggarly appearance of the embassadors of the Quadians, he asked them, If their country afforded men of no better quality to appear before him? They answered, That the first men in the nation were in his presence. Hereupon he fell into a violent passion, upbraiding their whole nation with arrogance, for daring to insult the majesty of the Roman people. He delivered himself with so much heat and violence, that, his veins burſting, he was inſtantly ſuffocated in his own blood [p]. Upon his death, the officers of the army proclaimed Valentinian, his ſecond ſon, emperor, though he was then a child but four or five years old. At the ſame time, they concluded a truce with the Quadians, and recalled the troops, which, under the conduct of Merobaudes and count Sebaſtian, were laying waſte their country. In the year 379, they broke anew into Illyricum; but were driven out with ſome loſs by the emperor Gratian. In the year 407, the Quadians entered Gaul with the other barbarians, and over-ran thoſe provinces, committing every-where dreadful ravages, of which we have ſpoken at length elſewhere [q]. From this time no further mention is made in hiſtory of the Quadians; whence Lazius concludes them to have been either ſubdued, or utterly extirpated, by the Goths, who had ſettled in Pannonia and Illyricum.

The Sarmatians.

The Sarmatians.

THE Sarmatians were a very numerous and warlike nation, divided into many tribes, each of them having their own king, and maſters of a large and extenſive country. Sarmatia Europæa, or Sarmatia in Europe, of which alone we deſign to ſpeak here, extended from the Viſtula, now the Weiſſel, parting it from Germany, to the Euxine ſea, the Boſporus Cimmerius, the Palus Mæotis, and the Tanais dividing it from Aſia and the Aſiatic Sarmatia. In this vaſt tract of land, comprehending the preſent Poland, Ruſſia, and great part of Tartary, dwelt the following nations, viz. the Burgiones, Cariones, Sudeni, Geloni, Hamaxobii, Agathyrſi, Boruſci, Melanchlænæ, Alauni or Alani, Iazyges, Roxolani, Baſtarnæ, Carpi or Carpates, Sidones, Borani, and Venedi, by Jornandes called Vinidæ and Vinidi. The five laſt-named nations are thought to have come originally from Germany, eſpecially the Baſtarnæ; for even in the time of Tacitus, who is at a loſs whether he ought to place them among the German or the Sarmatian nations, they agreed with the former in dreſs and language [r]. The Geloni were, according to Herodotus [s], of Greek extraction; but had, even in his time, adopted, in a great meaſure, the cuſtoms and manners of the Budini, among whom they had ſettled, eſpecially the cuſtom of painting their bodies, as we read in Virgil [t] and Claudian [u]. The Budini dwelt near mount

Budinus,

Budinus, from which ſprings the Boryſthenes, called by more modern writers the Danapris, and thence the Dnieſer or Nieper. The other nations, which we have mentioned above, were all Gothic; and of the origin of the Gothic nations we have ſpoken at length in the hiſtory of the Goths. Theſe various nations were blended by the Romans under the common name of Sarmatæ; by the Greeks under that of Sauromatæ, and ſometimes by both, under the denomination of Scythæ or Scythians, and Getæ. Each of them had, it ſeems, their own king; for mention is made in hiſtory of the kings of the Roxolani, of the Baſtarnæ, of the Iazyges, &c. Ammianus Marcellinus, ſpeaking of the Sarmatians in general, tells us, that they were a ſavage people, and infamous for their lewdneſs [w]. The Melanchlænæ are ſaid, both by Ammianus [x] and Herodotus [y], to have fed on human fleſh, and are thence called by them, as well as by Mela and Pliny, Anthropophagi or Androphagi.

THE Sarmatians began firſt to threaten the empire in the reign of Nero, about the year of the chriſtian æra 63, that is, about ſeventeen years after Thrace had been by Claudius reduced to a Roman province; for, till its reduction, it had been governed by its own princes, and ſerved as a barrier on that ſide between the Sarmatians and Romans. A few years after the latter became poſſeſſed of it, the Sarmatians began to appear in great numbers on the confines, as if they intended to make themſelves maſters of that province, which was then guarded by a ſmall number of troops, under the command of Plautius Silvanus Ælianus, who had ſent the reſt to the aſſiſtance of Corbulo, then making war in Armenia. But the Roman general having gained over the kings of the Baſtarnians and Roxolanians, the reſt ſoon diſperſed [z]. However, ſix years after, that is in 69, Otho being then emperor, the Roxolanians, who dwelt on the weſt ſide of the Palus Mæotis entering Mæſia, defeated there two Roman cohorts, and, having pillaged that part of the province, which bordered on the Danube, they repaſſed the river and returned home unmoleſted. Animated with this ſucceſs, they appeared anew the ſame year with nine thouſand horſe. But Marcus Aponius Saturninus, governor of Mæſia, falling upon them with a legion and ſome auxiliaries, cut them off almoſt to a man [a]. The ſame year, Veſpaſian being proclaimed emperor by the legions quartered in the eaſt, the Iazygians, a Sarmatic nation dwelling next to the Roxolanians, declared for the new emperor againſt Vitellius. But Veſpaſian, returning them thanks for the troops they offered him, took with him only their chiefs, not with a deſign to employ them, but prevent them from making inroads into the Roman territories during the war [b]. Tacitus calls the Iazygians the allies of the Romans. But the very firſt year of the reign of Veſpaſian, whom they had offered to join a few months before, they broke into Mæſia, and having killed Fonteius Agrippa, governor of that province, who attempted to oppoſe them, they laid waſte the country far and near. Hereupon Rubrius Gallus, marching againſt them with the utmoſt expedition, purſuant to the orders he had received from the emperor, cut great numbers of them in pieces in ſeveral encounters, obliged the reſt to repaſs the Danube, and, with great care, fortified the banks of that river, to cover the province from their incurſions [c]. In the year 85, the fourth of Domitian's reign, the Iazygians, joining the Suevi, armed with a deſign, ſays Dion [d], to paſs the Danube, and lay waſte the Roman dominions; but whether or no they put their deſign in execution, that writer has not thought fit to tell us. Tacitus indeed writes in one place, that the Sarmatians and Suevians armed againſt the empire [e]; and elſewhere, that this very year, ſoon after the return of Agricola to Rome, the Roman armies were defeated in Pannonia [f], in all likelihood by the Iazygians and Suevians. In the year 93, the thirteenth of Domitian's reign, the Sarmatians having cut in pieces a Roman legion with their tribune, the emperor, who was then in Dacia, marched againſt them in perſon [g]; but with what ſucceſs, we are not told. Domitian indeed took the title of Imperator, as if he had gained ſome great advantage over the enemy; but that prince often claimed the victory when he had been driven out of the field, and ſhamefully put to flight, as we have hinted above. The Sarmatians are by Dion reckoned among the nations that ſubmitted to Adrian [h] while he was in Armenia, in the year 107, but that writer ſpeaks, without all doubt, of the Aſiatic Sarmatians. As for the Sarmatians in Europe, they broke into Illyricum with great fury in the year 119, the ſecond of Adrian's reign; which obliged that prince to quit Rome, and march againſt them in perſon. Upon his arrival in Mæſia, they repaſſed the Danube with great precipitation, and encamped on the oppoſite bank; but the Roman cavalry ſwimming [illegible]med as they were, croſs the river, in order to attack

them, the Sarmatians were ſtruck with ſuch terror, that they immediately ſubmitted [i]. The horſe, to whoſe intrepidity and boldneſs was owing the ſubmiſſion of the enemy, were the Batavians in the Roman ſervice, as appears from the epitaph of one of them named Soranus [k]. Suidas writes, that Adrian himſelf paſſed the Danube on horſeback [l]; but he ſeems to have miſunderſtood the paſſage in Dion. The princes of the Sarmatians quarrelled afterwards among themſelves, and choſe Adrian for their umpire, who compoſed their differences to the general ſatisfaction of the contending parties. On this occaſion, the king of the Roxolanians complaining to the emperor, that his penſion had been leſſened, Adrian ordered the ſum, which had been formerly allowed him, to be paid without the leaſt deduction [m]. In the year 135, the Iazyges ſent embaſſadors to Rome, to renew their alliance with Adrian, who received them in a very obliging manner, introduced them to the ſenate, and, having granted them their requeſt, ſent them back loaded with rich preſents [n]. All the nations inhabiting Sarmatia conſpired, with the Marcomanns againſt M. Aurelius; but were in the end moſt of them cut in pieces. Over the Iazygians in particular the emperor gained two complete victories, the one before they reached the Danube on their way home, and the other, deſcribed at length by Dion [o], as they were croſſing that river on the ice. But, notwithſtanding the great loſſes they ſuſtained in this war, they were ſo far from ſuing for peace, that they depoſed, and threw into priſon, their king named Bandaſpes, for no other reaſon, but becauſe he had ſent embaſſadors with propoſals for concluding a peace with the empire. However, being in the end abandoned by the Marcomanns and their other allies, and reduced to great ſtraights, their new king, named Zantichus, came in perſon, attended by all the chief men of the nation, to throw himſelf at the emperor's feet and ſue for peace; which was granted them upon the following terms, viz. That they ſhould not ſettle within ten miles of the Danube; that they ſhould ſet at liberty all the priſoners they had taken, and ſupply the emperor's army with a body of eight thouſand horſe. With theſe conditions they readily complied, and we are told, that the priſoners, whom they diſmiſſed on this occaſion, were in number, at leaſt, one hundred thouſand, though they had ſold to other nations many of thoſe they had taken during the war. The eight thouſand Iazygian horſe were, by the emperor, ſent into Britain. To the other Sarmatic nations lands were allotted in Pannonia, Mœsia, Germany, and even in Italy [p]. The Iazyges lived, it seems, some time in peace and amity with the Romans; for in 180, one of the articles of the peace concluded between the emperor Commodus and the Alemanns was, that they should not make war upon the Iazygians, Burians, or Vandals [q]. Besides, no mention is made by historians, either of them, or the other Sarmatic nations, till the year 215, when the emperor Caracalla is said to have gained some advantages over the Sarmatians, and to have taken, on that account, the surname of Sarmaticus [r]. In the year 228, the Carpi, a people of Sarmatia dwelling near the Carpatian mountains, which part Hungary and Transylvania from Poland, being informed, that the Roman emperors paid a yearly pension to the Goths, sent deputies to Menophilus, governor of Mœsia, demanding, that the same sum which the Goths received should be paid to them, since their friendship deserved to be no less courted than that of the Goths. The deputies found Menophilus exercising his troops, according to his daily custom; and, as he well knew on what errand they were come, to humble their pride, he made them wait several days before he gave them audience, allowing them in the mean time to assist at the military exercises performed by his troops. At length he received them seated on a high tribunal, and attended by all the officers of the army, to whom he pretended to give his orders while the embassadors were speaking, as if nothing they said deserved his attention. The embassadors, mortified and amazed at this conduct, only asked, Why money was given to the Goths, and not to them? Because the emperor, answered Menophilus, bestows his favours on whom he pleases. We hope then, replied the embassadors, that he will be pleased to shew himself as generous to us, as to the Goths; we are a more brave and deserving nation. The Roman general answered with a smile, That the emperor would do what he thought fit; and that if they met him in four months time, at a place which he appointed, he would acquaint them with the emperor's will and pleasure. The embassadors met him accordingly, and found him, as they had done before, wholly intent upon exercising his troops. Menophilus, having made them wait some days, as if he had affairs of greater importance on his hands than to give audience to them, received them in the same manner as he had done the first time, and ordered them to return in three months, appointing the place where they should find him. The answer he then gave them was, That the emperor would enter into no engagements with them; but, if they ſtood in need of preſent relief, the emperor would, in all likelihood, out of his good-nature, allow them ſome, provided they went and threw themſelves at his feet. They were highly provoked at this anſwer, and departed in a great rage; but nevertheleſs, awed by Menophilus, they continued quiet ſo long as he commanded in that province [s]. The emperor Maximinus made, it ſeems, war upon the Sarmatians, and gained conſiderable advantages over them; for it appears from ſeveral inſcriptions found in France and Spain, that both he and his ſon took the ſurname of Sarmaticus [t]. However, Capitolinus only writes, that Maximinus, having quelled the Germans, reſolved to make war upon the Sarmatians, and, with that deſign, paſſed the winter in 236, at Sirmium in Pannonia [u]. Maximinus, ſpeaking of himſelf in Herodian, only ſays, that he overcame, on ſeveral occaſions, the Germans; inſomuch, that they were afraid to ſtir, as were likewiſe the Sarmatians, who, by their deputies, were conſtantly ſuing for peace [w]. In the year 238, Menophilus, of whom we have ſpoken above, being recalled, the Carpi, who had been awed by his preſence, broke into Mœſia, and having ravaged that province, and utterly deſtroyed the city of Iſtria or Iſtropolis, on the moſt ſouthern mouth of the Danube in Lower Mœſia, or rather Little Scythia, they returned home unmoleſted, the Romans being then engaged in a civil war between Maximinus, Maximus, and Balbinus [x]. In 242, the fourth of the emperor Gordian's reign, that prince, in paſſing through Thrace on his march into the eaſt to make war there on the Perſians, overcame the Goths and Sarmatians, and obliged them to abandon that province, and retire beyond the Danube [y]. In the year 260, the Sarmatians and Quadians ſeized on great part of Dacia and Pannonia; but were driven out by Regillianus, who commanded in Illyricum, and is ſaid to have gained ſeveral victories over them in one day [z]. He ſoon after cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor; but he was ſcarce ſeated on the throne, when the Rovolanians, who ſerved under him, revolted; and their example being followed by the reſt of the army, he was murdered by ſome of his own men [a]. Aurelian, who was afterwards emperor, is ſaid to have gained a ſignal victory over the Sarmatians and Sueves in the reign of Claudius, about the year 268 [b]. But of this victory no mention is made by any other writer. In the year 27, the emperor Probus marched againſt them in person; but, at his approach, they retired from Thrace, where they had committed great ravages, abandoning the booty they had taken, and awed by the fame of his name, sent deputies to sue for peace; which the emperor granted them, upon their promising to keep beyond the Danube, and supply the Roman armies with a certain number of troops, when required [c]. They continued quiet during the remaining part of Probus's reign, but no sooner heard of his death, than they broke into Illyricum, destroying all with fire and sword. But Carus, then emperor, marched against them, cut sixteen thousand of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to repass the Danube and sue for peace [d]. About seven years after, they returned with a very numerous army, and committed great ravages in Thrace and Illyricum; but Diocletian, hastening to the relief of the oppressed provinces, defeated the barbarians with great slaughter. Eumenes writes, that, on this occasion, almost the whole nation was cut off [e]: but he speaks more like a panegyrist than an historian; for some years after the Sarmatians dwelling near the Palus Mæotis, under the conduct of Crisco king of Bosporus, broke into the country of the Lazians in Colchis, and, having pillaged great part of Pontus, advanced as far as the Halys, a river of Paphlagonia. Constantius, then only tribune, but soon after declared Cæsar, was sent by Diocletian to put a stop to their ravages; but his army being far inferior in number to that of the barbarians, he contented himself with encamping on the opposite bank of the Halys, and by that means preventing them from passing that river. But in the mean time, Chrestus, king of the Chersonesus, and vassal of the empire, having, at the instigation of Diocletian, broken into Sarmatia, and even taken by stratagem the city of Bosporus, Crisco immediately dispatched embassadors to Constantius, suing for peace; which was granted him, upon his restoring the booty, and setting at liberty all the prisoners he had taken. Chrestus at the same time restored to him the booty he had taken, and the prisoners, among whom were his wife and his concubines. For this eminent piece of service, Diocletian sent rich presents to the inhabitants of the Chersonesus, declared them free, and exempted them from all tribute, customs, and taxes. This account we have copied from a piece intituled, Of the government of the empire, published by Meursius in 1611, and ascribed to Constantine Porphyrogenitus, who reigned in the east in 950. The emperor Galerius made war, it seems, on the Sarmatians; for both Zonaras and Ammianus Marcellinus tell us, that seeking the deſtruction of Conſtantine, whoſe extraordinary qualities gave him great umbrage, he ordered him, in the Sarmatian war, to engage a barbarian, who ſurpaſſed all the others in ſtature and the fierceneſs of his looks; which Conſtantine did accordingly, and, having overcome him and thrown him on the ground, he dragged him by the hair to the emperor's preſence, and laid him at his feet. In the ſame war, having ordered him to croſs a marſh at the head of ſome troops, he entered it the firſt on horſeback, and, being followed by his men, put great numbers of the enemy to the ſword and gained a complete victory [f]. This is ſuppoſed to have happened about the year 305. About the ſame time, the whole nation of the Carpi ſubmitted to the Romans, being ſeveral times overcome, and reduced to great ſtraights, by Galerius. Dioclefian tranſplanted the whole nation into the Roman territories, eſpecially into Pannonia, where great numbers of them had been allowed to ſettle in the reign of Aurelian [g]. Conſtantine the Great, in the year 322, the ſeventeenth of his reign, gained a great victory over the other Sarmatic nations [h]. Optatianus writes, that they were overcome in ſeveral battles in the neighbourhood of Campana, Marga, and Bononia, all three cities of Illyricum on the Danube [i]. Rauſimodes, one of the Sarmatian kings, had, as we read in Zoſimus, beſieged a city, which that writer does not name; but Conſtantine, haſtening to the relief of the place, put the enemy to flight, and, having obliged thoſe, who had made their eſcape, to repaſs the Danube, he purſued them croſs that river, defeated them a ſecond time, killed their king Rauſimodes, laid waſte their country, and returned with an incredible number of captives [k]. The Sarmatian ſports, which were yearly celebrated about the latter end of November, as appears from an antient kalendar of the year 534, probably took their riſe from this victory.

IN the year 332, a war being kindled between the Goths and Sarmatians, the latter had recourſe to Conſtantine, who immediately ſent a conſiderable body of troops to their aſſiſtance. Theſe, engaging the Goths on the twentieth of April of this year, gained a complete victory over them. We are told, that, in this war, near an hundred thouſand Goths periſhed either by the ſword or by famine. At length they concluded a peace, both with the Romans and the Sarmatians, Ariaric or Araric their king delivering up his ſon as an hoſtage [l], and ſupplying the Roman armies with a body of forty thouſand Goths; which corps was, for ſome ages, kept intire and complete, and ſerved under the name of fœderati, or allies [m]. The Sarmatians, finding they had nothing now to fear from the Goths, with the utmoſt ingratitude, turned their arms againſt their friends and benefactors, making frequent inroads into the territories of the Romans, to whom they owed their deliverance. Conſtantine, highly provoked at their conduct, marched againſt them at the head of a powerful army, and, having put them to flight, entered their country, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. However, upon their ſubmitting, and promiſing to ſerve the empire with fidelity, the emperor put a ſtop to all hoſtilities, and, quitting their country, repaſſed the Danube [n]. Two years after, the Sarmatians were attacked anew by the Goths, under the conduct of their king Geberic, the ſucceſſor of Araric. The war laſted ſome years; but in the end the Sarmatians were utterly defeated on the banks of the Mariſius in Dacia. In this battle the Sarmatians loſt their king Wiſimar, and with him the flower of their nobility, and ſuch numbers of men, that they were obliged to arm their ſlaves, who defeated indeed the Goths; but then, turning their arms againſt their maſters, drove them quite out of their native country, and ſeized on their lands and poſſeſſions [o]. Theſe ſlaves are by Ammianus [p] and St. Jerom [q] ſtyled Limigantes: the former tells us, that the free-born among the Sarmatians were diſtinguiſhed by the name of Acaragantes [r]. The Sarmatians, thus driven out by their ſlaves, had recourſe to Conſtantine, who received three hundred thouſand of them within the empire, incorporated ſome among his troops, and to the others allowed lands in the provinces bordering on the Danube and in Italy itſelf [s]. Some of them took refuge amongſt other barbarians, by Ammianus called Victohales [t], and by moſt writers thought to be the ſame people with the Quadi Ultramontani, or the Quadians beyond the mountains Sudeti or Suditi parting the country of the Quadi from that of the Marcomanns, at preſent the mountains of Bohemia. The Sarmatians, who took refuge among the Quadians, in the year 355, made an irruption into Pannonia, in conjunction with the Quadians, and, having pillaged both that province and Upper Mœſia, returned home unmoleſted, with an immenſe booty [u]. Thus Zoſimus. But of this irruption no mention is made by Ammianus. Two years after, they returned anew, and laid waſte the ſame provinces, while the Sueves committed dreadful ravages in Rhætia, and the Quadians in Valeria, a province of Illyricum. Conſtantius, who was then at Rome, and, as Ammianus tells us [w], mightily taken with the curioſities and diverſions of that city, ſet out in great haſte to ſtop the progreſs of the barbarians, who threatened Italy itſelf; but they were no ſooner informed of his arrival at Milan, than they retired of their own accord [x]. However, the emperor advanced as far as Sirmium, and there had ſeveral conferences with the chiefs of the nations dwelling in the neighbourhood of the Danube, who all promiſed to live in peace and amity with the empire [y]. But the following winter, while the Danube was frozen, unmindful of their promiſes, they laid hold of that opportunity, and, entering Mœſia and Pannonia, pillaged thoſe provinces, while the Alemanns, notwithſtanding the peace they had lately concluded with the empire, laid waſte Rhætia. Againſt the Alemanns Conſtantius diſpatched Barbatio; but againſt the Sarmatians, who had been joined by the Quadians, he marched in perſon, leaving Sirmium, where he had paſſed the winter, after the ſpring equinox [z]. The barbarians retired at his approach; but the emperor, having paſſed the Danube on a bridge of boats, entered their country, and laid it waſte far and near. The Sarmatians came in great numbers to Conſtantius, pretending to ſue for peace; but their real deſign was to attack the Romans unawares. Of this the emperor had timely notice, and therefore ordered his troops to fall upon them as they drew near; which they did accordingly, and cut them in pieces to a man. The reſt, diſheartened with this loſs, ſubmitted to Conſtantius, who concluded a peace with them, upon their ſetting at liberty all the priſoners they had taken, and delivering up hoſtages as a ſurety for their future conduct [a]. The Sarmatians reaped in the end great advantages from this war. They had been driven out of their own country by their ſlaves in 334, as we have hinted above, and obliged to take refuge among the Quadians, who treated them as their ſubjects. From this ſubjection they were delivered by Conſtantius, who declared them free, appointed one Zizais, a prince of their own nation, to reign over them, and re-eſtabliſhed them in their antient country; for the ſlaves, by whom they had been driven out, having ravaged the neighbouring provinces, Conſtantius made war upon them, and reduced them to great ſtraights. Hereupon the Limigantes (for ſo thoſe ſlaves were called) came in great numbers to the emperor, ſuing for peace; but reſolved at the ſame time to fall unexpectedly upon the Romans, if they could not obtain it upon honourable terms. This Conſtantius ſuſpected, and therefore ordered his troops to ſurround them inſenſibly while they were yet ſpeaking. When they had done, Conſtantius told them upon what terms he was willing to grant them a peace; which they no-ways reliſhing, began to handle their arms. This the Romans, who watched them narrowly, no ſooner obſerved, than they fell upon them ſword in hand, and cut moſt of them in pieces, not one, out of ſo great a multitude, calling for quarter, or offering to ſubmit [b]. After this, the Romans entering their country on one ſide, and the Sarmatians, their antient maſters, on the other, a dreadful havock was made of the inhabitants, without diſtinction of ſex or age. Thus the Limigantes were obliged at length to ſubmit, and accept the terms, however hard, that were offered them. Theſe were, that they ſhould quit the country, which they had ſeized on, and held with the utmoſt injuſtice, and retire to another at a great diſtance from the empire. The country, which they abandoned, was, by Conſtantius, reſtored to the antient proprietors, who ſettled there anew twenty-four years after they had been driven out by their rebellious ſlaves [c]. For theſe atchievements Conſtantius took the ſurname of Sarmaticus [d]. The Sarmatians, notwithſtanding the great obligations they owed the Romans, a few years after, that is, in 364, broke into Pannonia, and laid waſte that province, while the Roman troops were employed againſt the Alemanns in Rhætia [e]. In 374, they joined the Quadians, and, in conjunction with them, committed dreadful ravages in Pannonia, and from thence advanced into Upper Mœſia; but were there defeated with great ſlaughter by Theodoſius, afterwards emperor, as we have related above. In the year 376, Athanaric, one of the chiefs of the Goths, being forced by the Hunns to abandon his own country, retired, with his people, to a place called Caucalanda, driving from thence the Sarmatians, to whom it belonged [f]. In 378, the Sarmatians, informed that the Goths, who had been admitted by Valens into the empire, had taken up arms againſt the Romans, reſolved to paſs the Danube and join them. But Theodoſius, afterwards emperor, meeting them in Thrace, gave them a total overthrow. Incredible numbers of the barbarians were cut in pieces, and the victory Theodoſius gained over them is ſaid to have been ſo complete, that Gratian, then emperor, could not believe the account, which Theodoſius himſelf gave him of it upon his return to court, till he was informed of the truth by persons sent on purpose to view the field of battle [g]. In the year 407, they entered Gaul, with the Vandals, Sueves, Franks, Burgundians, and other barbarians, and committed dreadful ravages there. Those who remained in Sarmatia, were afterwards subdued by Attila, and served, with their princes, in his army, when he invaded Gaul in 451 [h]. Upon that prince's death, they shook off the yoke, and, having recovered their antient liberty, submitted to Marcian, then emperor, who allowed them to settle in Pannonia, Mœsia, and the other provinces bordering on the Danube, where they continued quiet, till they were reduced by the Goths, the most powerful nation in those parts. Such of them as resided among the Goths, became, in process of time, one nation with them. From those, who remained in Sarmatia, the present Poles and Tartars are thought to have sprung.

The Dacians.

The Dacians.

THE Dacians were, according to Jornandes [i], a Gothic nation, came originally out of Scandinavia, and, settling in the neighbourhood of the Palus Mæotis, made themselves masters of Scythia, Mœsia, Thrace, and Dacia, driving out the antient inhabitants. This seems agreeable to what we read in Herodotus, viz. that the antient Scythians, who, coming out of Syria, had crossed the Araxes, and settled in the country which was afterwards called Scythia, were, in process of time, driven from their seats by the Cimmerians, that is, by the Goths, who, according to Jornandes, settled first in Cimmeria. Dion observes, that the same people were called Dacians by the Romans and Getes by the Greeks [k]; and Justin, the compiler of Trogus Pompeius, tells us in express terms, that the Dacians were the offspring of the Getes [l]. Now, that the Getes and Goths were one and the same people, we have sufficiently proved above, in our history of the Goths. Some writers derive the Dacians from the Daæ, a people dwelling, according to Strabo, near Hyrcania in Asiatic Scythia. But this opinion is intirely founded on the similitude of the names Daci and Daæ. The Dacians, in more antient times, were known by the name of Davi; for the termination dava was common to most of their towns and cities, as Comidava, Sergidava, Decidava, Marcidava, &c. and the names of Geta and Dacus were, among the Athenians, peculiar to ſlaves, who uſually bore the name of the nations to which they belonged. As to the antient country of the Dacians, it compriſed the preſent Moldavia, Valachia, and part of Tranſylvania. The whole nation was afterwards tranſplanted into Illyricum by the emperor Aurelian, and the country they held there is the Dacia, of which the authors ſpeak, who wrote in the fourth and fifth centuries, the Goths being then maſters of antient Dacia. The Dacians were deemed the moſt warlike and formidable of all the barbarous nations, not only on account of their natural courage and great ſtrength, which enabled them to endure the toils of war, but becauſe they looked upon death, not as the end of the preſent, but as the beginning of a more happy, life; whence they were as ready, ſays the emperor Julian, to expoſe themſelves to the greateſt dangers, as to undertake a journey [m]. This doctrine they learnt of one Xamolxis, a great philoſopher, whom Jornandes ſuppoſes to have been king of the Getes or Goths dwelling in Thrace, Dacia, and Mœſia; but other writers ſpeak of him only as a diſciple, and ſome as a ſlave, of the celebrated Pythagoras [n]. Suidas thinks he flouriſhed long before Pythagoras [o]. He was by birth a Gete or Goth, and is ſaid to have been held in great veneration among his countrymen during his life, and, after his death, to have been worſhipped by them with divine honours [p]. The Dacians were governed by their own kings, and agreed in cuſtoms, manners, laws, and religion, with the other Gothic nations, of whom we have ſpoken above. The firſt of their kings we find mentioned in hiſtory is Oroles, in whoſe reign they made war upon the Baſtarnæ; but not having behaved on a certain occaſion with their uſual courage, the king, by way of puniſhment, ordered them to lay their heads, when they ſlept, where their feet ſhould lie, and to perform the ſame offices about their wives, which it was cuſtomary for their wives to perform about them, till ſuch time as, by a more gallant behaviour, they had retrieved their loſt reputation [q]. In the reign of Auguſtus they broke firſt into the empire; but in what place, we are not told. All we know is, that, at the approach of Druſus, ſent againſt them by Auguſtus then in Gaul, they retired to their own country [r]. In the year of the chriſtian æra 69, the legions quartered in Mœſia being by Otho ordered into Italy, to make head againſt Vitellius there, the Dacians, who dwelt beyond the Danube, and never allowed the Romans, ſays Tacitus, any reſpite, but when they did not think it safe to attack them, laying hold of that opportunity, crossed the Danube, and, entering Mœsia, made themselves masters of part of that province. But Mucianus passing soon after through Mœsia on his march from the east into Italy, obliged them to abandon the country they had seized, leaving there Fonteius Agrippa, formerly proconsul of Asia, with a body of troops to awe the barbarians [s]. But the following year, Agrippa being killed by the Sarmatians, the Dacians broke into Pannonia, and, having plundered that province, advanced into Mœsia, where they joined the Sarmatians; but were soon after driven out with great slaughter by Rubrius Gallus, whom Vespasian, then emperor, had dispatched against them [t]. About the year 86, the Dacians having anew ravaged the neighbouring provinces, and committed every-where great cruelties, Domitian, then emperor, resolved to march against them in person. Duras was at that time king of the Dacians; but he, by an instance of moderation seldom to be met with in history, of his own accord yielded the sovereignty to Decebalus, because he thought him better qualified for it than himself: and truly Decebalus was, according to Dion [u], one of the best commanders of his time, knew what was proper to be done, and how it ought to be put in execution; was very dextrous both in attacking and retiring, in laying ambuscades, and engaging in the open field; was never at a loss how to improve a victory, or how to support himself when conquered [w]. Either Duras or Decebalus, but more likely the latter, is by Orosius [x] and Jornandes [y] called Diurpaneus. As for the issue of this war in general, Tacitus tells us, that, soon after the return of Agricola to Rome, several Roman armies were destroyed in Mœsia and Dacia, some through the cowardice, others by the rashness, of their leaders; that the legions and troops of the allies were taken prisoners even in the fortified towns; insomuch, that the Romans had reason to apprehend the loss, not only of the country bordering on the Danube, but of intire provinces. News was daily brought of some new misfortune, and every year distinguished by some remarkable defeat [z]. Our historian did not think it safe to give us a more particular account of these misfortunes, or to mention the number of the slain on the side of the Romans in so many engagements, imitating therein the reserve of Sallust, and some other historians, on like occasions [a]. Every true Roman, says Tacitus, wished then to see the command of the armies vested in Agricola. He was even proposed to the emperor by several of his freed-men, some of them hoping by that means to hasten his ruin, while others had nothing in view but the reputation of their master and the welfare of the state; but that jealous prince dreaded nothing so much as to trust a man of courage with the command of his armies [b]. As for the particulars of this war, we have related them in the history of Domitian's reign; and therefore shall only observe here, that the Dacians, in the first battle they fought, utterly defeated Appius or Oppius Sabinus, governor of Mœsia, who was killed in the engagement; that, upon his death and the defeat of his army, they laid waste, without controul, all Mœsia, and made themselves masters of several castles and strong-holds; that Domitian, to put a stop to their ravages, hastened into Illyricum, with almost all the forces of the empire; that thereupon Decebalus sent deputies to sue for peace; but the emperor, rejecting his proposals, dispatched Cornelius Fuscus, then præfectus prætorio, against him with the flower of his army, who, having passed the Danube, and engaged the Dacians, was by them cut off, with almost his whole army. This overthrow obliged Domitian, who was already returned to Rome, to hasten back into Illyricum, whence he detached one of his generals, named Julian, against the enemy, not caring to expose his own person. Julian gained a complete victory, and put such numbers of the Dacians to the sword, that Decebalus, no longer able to keep the field, dispatched embassadors anew to sue for peace; which Domitian upon no terms would grant him. But in the mean time, instead of improving his late victory, and pressing Decebalus, already reduced to great straights, he turned his arms against the Marcomanns and Quadians, and, being by the former defeated and put to flight, he was glad to come to an agreement with Decebalus; and accordingly dispatched embassadors to him with more advantageous proposals than he could have asked or expected. Decebalus, reflecting on the bad situation of his affairs, thought it advisable to accept the emperor's offers; but, instead of waiting upon him in person, as Domitian desired, he appointed his brother Diegis to supply his room. Diegis delivered up to the emperor some arms and a small number of prisoners, and received, at his hands, the diadem in his brother's name [c].

THE yearly ſum, which Domitian had agreed to pay to Decebalus, was punctually tranſmitted to him during the reign of that prince, and likewiſe the reign of his ſucceſſor Nerva; but Trajan, who ſucceeded Nerva, would by no means ſubmit to that ſhameful tribute, as he called it, alledging, that he had not been conquered by Decebalus. for he wanted only a pretence to make war on the Dacians, whose growing power gave him no small umbrage. Besides, he was informed, that Decebalus maintained a friendly correspondence with Pacorus king of the Parthians, whom he had presented with one Callidromus taken in Mœsia by one of his lieutenants during the war with Domitian. The good understanding between these two powers gave Trajan no small jealousy. He therefore no sooner heard, that Decebalus had crossed the Danube and committed some hostilities in the Roman territories, than, drawing together a mighty army, he marched, with incredible expedition, to the banks of the Danube, passed that river without opposition, Decebalus not being apprised of his arrival, and, entering Dacia, laid waste the country far and near. Decebalus, however, not in the least dismayed, having armed the youth of the country, marched boldly to meet Trajan; whereupon a bloody engagement ensued, in which great numbers fell on both sides; but the Romans in the end gained the victory. It was on this occasion, that, linen being wanted to bind the wounds of the Romans, Trajan tore his own robes to supply that want. The emperor, pursuing the advantages of this victory, followed the enemy close, and, not allowing them time to levy new forces, he harrassed them without intermission to such a degree, that Decebalus was in the end obliged to send deputies with proposals for an accommodation. Trajan appointed Licinius Sura and Claudius Libianus to treat with them; but the deputies not agreeing, Trajan pursued his ravages, advancing from hill to hill, not without great danger, till he arrived in the neighbourhood of Zermizegethusa, the metropolis of Dacia. On the other hand, Maximus, one of the emperor's generals, reduced several places, in one of which he took the sister of Decebalus prisoner, and recovered a Roman standard, which had been lost when Fuscus was defeated and killed in the reign of Domitian. Thus Decebalus was obliged at last to submit, and comply with the hard terms, which Trajan thought fit to prescribe, and we have related elsewhere[y]. However, three years after, he renewed the war; but, being overcome by Trajan in several encounters and stripped of his dominions, he chose rather to put an end to his life, than to live in subjection. His head was immediately brought to Trajan, and by him sent to Rome. Upon the death of Decebalus, Dacia was intirely subdued and reduced to a Roman province. The emperor caused several castles to be built in the country, and placed garisons in them, to keep the inhabitants in awe. He likewise planted a great number of colonies, distributing lands among the poor citizens of Rome and of the other cities of Italy, who were willing to settle in Dacia. The Hungarian writers mention several cities in their country and likewise in Transylvania, which on this occasion were, as they endeavour to prove, built or peopled by the Romans. But of Trajan's war with the Dacians, and the intire reduction of their country, we have spoken at length in our Roman history [z]; and therefore have only hinted here at some of the chief events. Dacia, thus reduced to a province, was governed by a Roman magistrate, with the title of proprætor, as appears from some antient inscriptions [a]. The emperor Adrian, who succeeded Trajan in 117, was for abandoning Dacia; but the regard he had for the Roman citizens, who had settled there in great numbers, made him alter the resolution he had taken. However, to prevent the barbarians dwelling on the other side of the Danube from invading the Roman territories, he caused the famous bridge to be broken down, which his predecessor had built over that river, and we have described in our Roman history [b]. In the year 138, the first of the reign of Antoninus Pius, the Dacians attempted to shake off the yoke; but the rebellion was soon quelled by the generals, whom the emperor dispatched against them [c]. In 168, they joined the Alemanns, Marcomanns, Quadians, and Sarmatians, against the empire; but the two emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus marching against them, they submitted anew. However, a battle, it seems, was fought, and the victory gained by the Romans; for in this very year the two emperors took the title of imperator the fifth time [d]; which they never did but on occasion of some victory. In 180, twelve thousand Dacians being driven out of their country by other barbarians, Sabinianus, governor of that province, prevailed upon them to settle in another part of Dacia, while they were in full march to join the Alemanns, then at war with the Romans [e]. In the reign of Caracalla, the Dacians seem to have revolted anew; for we are told, that some skirmishes were fought between them and that prince, and that they gave hostages, as a pledge of their future fidelity [f]. Upon the reduction of Dacia in 205, great numbers of the natives, abandoning their antient country, settled among the neighbouring barbarians. These made frequent inroads into the empire, with the Sarmatians, Quadians, Alemanns, &c. and their descendants, in the reign of Maximinus, joining the Sarmatians, committed dreadful ravages in the Roman provinces bordering on the Danube; but were, in all likelihood, repulſed with great loſs by the emperor, ſince the year after they broke into the empire Macrinus took the titles of Sarmaticus and Dacicus, as appears from ſeveral inſcriptions found in France and Spain [g]. In the year 265, the thirteenth of Gallienus's reign, the Goths and other barbarous nations made themſelves maſters of Dacia; for the loſs of that province is reckoned among the many misfortunes of that prince's unhappy reign [h]. About nine years after, it was in great part recovered by Aurelian; but he, finding he could not maintain it in the midſt of ſo many barbarous nations without an immenſe charge, withdrew the troops appointed to defend it, and with them the inhabitants and their families, allotting them lands in Mœſia and Dardania, which he made a new province, called likewiſe Dacia, and by Lactantius New Dacia. This province lay on the Roman ſide of the Danube, and is placed by Vopiſcus between the two Mœſias. It compriſed, according to Sanſon, part of the preſent Bulgaria and Servia, and had Sardica for its metropolis. The Goths ſeem to have ſeized on the antient Dacia abandoned by Aurelian. Thus were the antient Dacians either tranſplanted into the Roman territories, or diſperſed among the neighbouring barbarians beyond the Danube, with whom they became one nation.

The Lombards.

THE Longobards, Langobards, or Lombards, who, in proceſs of time, made themſelves maſters of Italy, and from whom part of that country, formerly known by the name of Ciſalpine Gaul, is ſtill called Lombardy, are firſt mentioned in hiſtory by Proſper Aquitanus, biſhop of Rhegium, in the year 379. That writer, beginning a chronicle of his own in the ſaid year, after having copied till then the chronicle of St. Jerom, tells us, that the Lombards, abandoning the moſt diſtant coaſts of the ocean and their native country Scandinavia, and ſeeking new ſettlements, as they were overſtocked with people at home, attacked firſt, and overcame, about this time, the Vandals, then in Germany. They were headed by two chiefs, named Iboreus and Aionus, upon whoſe death, which happened about ten years after, they created Agilmund, ſon to the latter, their firſt king, who reigned thirty-three years [i]. It is to be obſerved, that, long before Proſper's time, mention is made of a people named Longobards; for that name occurs in Ptolemy, Tacitus, and Strabo; nay, Maroboduus, who was contemporary with Auguſtus, is by Tacitus ſtyled king of the Sueves, Marcomanns, and Longobards [k]. In the time of Tiberius they entered into an alliance with the Cheruſcans, under the conduct of the celebrated Arminius, and made war upon Maroboduus, from whom they had revolted [l]. In the year 170, the ninth of M. Aurelius's reign, ſix thouſand of them, who had paſſed the Danube, and, in conjunction with the Marcomanns, invaded the Roman dominions, were defeated by Vindex and Candidus, and obliged to ſue for peace [m]. But theſe Longobards, by moſt geographers placed between the Elbe and the Oder, were, according to Grotius, a German nation, and a quite different people from the Longobards, who are mentioned by Proſper, and afterwards ſettled in Italy [n]. The latter were, according to Paul Warnefrid deacon of Aquileia, commonly known by the name of Paulus Diaconus, and the moſt credible writers, originally a Gothic nation, and the ſame with the Gepidæ, of whom we have ſpoken above. The Gepidæ, coming, with the other Goths, out of Scandinavia in three ſhips, as we have related above, ſtopped at the mouth of the Viſtula or the Wieſſer. From thence they advanced to the banks of the Danube, and, ſettling there, infeſted, as we read in Vopiſcus, the Roman territories with frequent incurſions. In proceſs of time, the Gepidæ fell out among themſelves; and from this diviſion ſprung the Longobards, who are therefore, as Salmaſius [o] and Conſtantine Porphyrogenitus [p] obſerve, called ſometimes Gepidæ and ſometimes Longobards. They wandered from place to place, often ſhifting their ſeats, and were thence called Winili, that is, wanderers; which denomination has induced ſome writers to think, that the Lombards and Vandals, named alſo Winili, were one and the ſame people. As theſe two nations were conſtantly changing their habitations, they were thence called Winili or wanderers; but, though agreeing in name, they continued to be two diſtinct nations. The learned Sherringham is of opinion, that the Longobards mentioned by Strabo, Tacitus, and Ptolemy, were of Gothic extraction; and that they were left in Germany by the celebrated Woden on his march through that country from Scythia into Scandinavia; but at the ſame time that writer allows the Lom-

bards, who afterwards made themselves masters of Italy, to have been a different nation, come several ages after out of Scandinavia, their common country [q]. As for the name of Longobards, some derive it from the word lack or lache, signifying in the German language water, because the Lombards, while in Scandinavia, lived in marshes, or near the sea [r]. Others think it comes from the two German words langen barden, or helle-harden, that is, from the long halberds, which they suppose to have been used by them. But Paulus Diaconus, who was himself a Lombard, though born in Italy, tells us, that they were called Longobards from the length of their beards; and with him agree Constantine Porphyrogenitus [s], Otho Frisingensis [t], Gunterus [u], and Grotius [w]. After they had wandered through several countries, shifting their seats, they settled at length in Pannonia, which they held for the space of forty-two years, and then marching into Italy, under the conduct of their king Alboinus, made themselves masters of the greater part of that country. We have observed above, that, upon the death of their leaders, Iboreus and Aion, they appointed Agilmund their first king. He was succeeded by the following princes, Lamiscus, Leta, Ildeock, Gudeoc, Claffus, Tatus, Wachus, Walterius, Audoinus, and Alboinus, the first of that nation who reigned in Italy. As for the manners of the Lombards, Paulus Diaconus tells us, that no violence or oppression, no treachery or compulsion, was practised among them; and that every man enjoyed his property undisturbed, and followed his profession, without the least apprehension of danger. But that writer was perhaps somewhat prejudiced in favour of his countrymen; for Procopius writes, that those Lombards, who had served under Narses against the Goths in Italy, were sent back to their own country, on account of the disorders they committed; and pope Gregory, surnamed the Great, who was but too well acquainted with the Lombards, calls them, in several parts of his works, a most wicked nation, perhaps they neither deserved the encomiums of Paulus nor the reproaches of Gregory; at least it does not appear from their conduct, while masters of Italy, that they did. Paulus Diaconus, speaking of their dress, tells us, that their cloaths were loose, and for the most part of linen, such as the Anglo-Saxons wore, being interwoven with various colours; that their shoes were open to the end of their foot, and that they used to button or lace them.

them [x]. From ſome antient paintings it appears, that they ſhaved the back part of their heads; but that their hair was long before, their locks being parted and laid on each ſide of their foreheads. As for their hiſtory, we ſhall here relate what we find in Paulus Diaconus, but will not take upon us to vouch the truth of what that author writes.

THE Goths in Scandinavia, overſtocked with people at home, ſent out frequent colonies in queſt of new ſettlements. One, among the reſt, leaving their native country, put to ſea in three ſhips: one of theſe ſailed ſlower than the other two, and ſtopped in the end at the Viſtula. The Goths on board this ſhip were called, as we have obſerved above, Gepidæ, from a word in their language ſignifying ſlow. Theſe Gepidæ, unwilling to proceed farther, ſettled in an iſland formed by the Viſtula, and continued there, till their numbers were ſo increaſed, that the iſland could no longer ſupport them. They then began to roam about the neighbouring countries in queſt of new ſeats; and thence were called Winili, or wanderers. They quarrelled at length among themſelves, and agreed to part. Paulus Diaconus writes, that the country, where they had ſettled, being no longer able to maintain them, they divided themſelves into three parts, one whereof, on whom the lot ſhould fall, was to go in queſt of new habitations. But moſt other writers ſuppoſe the Longobards to have ſprung from the diviſion of the Gepidæ quarrelling among themſelves. Be that as it will, thoſe who went out choſe for their leaders Iboreus and Aion, the ſons of one Gambara, a woman univerſally reſpected on account of her wiſdom. Under their conduct they firſt ſettled in a country, by Paulus Diaconus called Scoringa, bordering on that which was then held by the Vandals, who, ſoon after their arrival, gave them to underſtand, that they muſt either pay tribute or prepare for war. The two leaders, by advice of their mother, returned anſwer, That, though they were few in number, they preferred war to ſervitude and ſubjection. Hereupon a bloody engagement enſued, in which the Vandals were utterly defeated. But the Gepidæ, whom we ſhall henceforth call Lombards, though that name was perhaps given them afterwards, being ſorely diſtreſſed with famine, reſolved to abandon Scoringa, and ſettle in a more fruitful country. They ſet out accordingly for Mauringa; but the Aſſipitti denying them a paſſage thro' their territories, they reſolved to attempt it by force. In order to ſtrike terror into the enemy, who were far ſuperior to them in number, they gave out, that they had among them Cynocephali, or men with dogs heads; which report ſo terrified the

A Aſſipitti,

Assipitti, that, not caring to engage so dreadful an enemy, and having one among them of extraordinary strength and courage, they resolved to put the whole to the issue of a single combat; which they no sooner proposed to the Lombards, than the proposal was accepted, the two nations agreeing, that, if the champion of the Assipitti should overcome, the passage should be denied; but, if the Lombard proved victorious, the rest should be allowed to pass unmolested. The two champions engaged in the sight of both armies; and the Lombard having gained the victory, a passage was granted to the whole nation, pursuant to the agreement. Upon their arrival in Mauringa, to increase the number of their warriors, they set all their slaves at liberty, who, though of different countries, became one nation with them. From Mauringa, where they staid but a short time, they proceeded to Gothland, and there made themselves masters of Anthabet, Bathaib, and Urgundiab, which our historian conjectures to be names of towns. In Gothland died their two leaders, Iboreus and Aion, upon whose death the Lombards resolved to chuse a king, after the manner of other nations; and accordingly conferred that dignity on Agilmund the son of Aion, who is said to have been killed by the Bulgarians, after he had reigned thirty-three years. He was succeeded by Lamiscus or Lamissio, so called from the word lama, signifying in their language a fish-pond; for his mother, by profession a harlot, is said to have thrown him, with six other males, of whom she was delivered at the same time, into a fish-pond. Lamissio was luckily saved by Agilmund, who, passing that way, and observing the children, stopped his horse, and stretching out his spear to them, one of them took hold of it, and was by that means saved. The king, not doubting but he would one day prove a great man, ordered him to be brought up with great care, calling him Lamis-shon, that is, the son of a fish-pond. He is said to have gained a victory over the Amazons, and to have behaved, on several other occasions, with such resolution and intrepidity, that, upon the death of Agilmund, the Lombards, with one voice, proclaimed him king. He no sooner found himself invested with this dignity, than, bent upon revenging the death of his predecessor, he marched against the Bulgarians; and though his men gave way at first, yet in the end, being animated by the words and example of their new king, they gained a complete victory. Lamissio was succeeded by Leta or Lechu, and he, after a reign of near forty years, by Ildeock or Hildehoc, as was Ildeock by Gudeock. In the reign of the latter, Odoacer king of Italy having killed Feletheu, king of the Rugians dwelling beyond the Danube, and either put to the sword, or carried into captivity, the whole nation, the the Lombards came and ſettled in their country, then deſtitute of inhabitants. During their ſtay in Rugiland (for ſo the country of the Rugians is called by our hiſtorian) their king Gudeock died, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Claffus, after whom reigned Tatus, in whoſe time the Lombards, leaving Rugiland, ſettled in the champaign country bordering on the Danube, where a war breaking out between them and the Heruli, the latter were defeated with great ſlaughter, their king Rodulphus being ſlain, with the flower of their nation. The victorious Lombards divided the rich plunder; but their king took for his ſhare only the ſtandard of Rodulphus, called bandum, with the helmet he uſed to wear in battle. Not long after, Tatus was ſlain by Wacho, ſon to his brother Zuchilo. Ildichus, the ſon of Tatus, endeavoured to revenge his father's death, and make good the juſt claim he had to the crown; but was in ſeveral encounters defeated by Wacho, and in the end obliged to take refuge among the neighbouring Gepidæ. Wacho is ſaid to have ſubdued the Sueves. He had three wives, viz. Ranicunda, daughter to the king of the Thuringians; Auſtrigoſa, daughter of the king of the Gepidæ; and Salinga, daughter of the king of the Heruli. By the latter he had Walterius, who ſucceeded him in the kingdom, and reigned about ſeven years. After Walterius came Audoinus, in whoſe reign a war being kindled between the Lombards and the Gepidæ, a bloody battle was fought, in which the latter were utterly defeated. The ſignal victory gained on this occaſion by the Lombards, was chiefly owing to Alboinus, the king's ſon; for the young prince having engaged and killed with his own hand Thoriſmund, the ſon of Turiſind king of the Gepidæ, the enemy, who had fought till then with great reſolution and intrepidity, hearing the king's ſon was killed, betook themſelves to a precipitous flight. The victorious Lombards, upon their return home, begged their king to indulge his ſon, by way of reward for his gallant behaviour, the honour of dining with him, which was deemed no leſs honourable among the Lombards, than a triumph was among the Romans. The king anſwered, That, by an antient and immemorial cuſtom among the Lombards, that honour and mark of diſtinction was not to be granted, even to the princes of the blood royal, till they had publicly appeared in the armour of ſome foreign prince killed in battle with their own hand. Hereupon Alboinus, attended only by forty reſolute young men, repaired to the court of Turiſind, to demand the armour of that prince's ſon, whom he had killed in the above-mentioned battle, being reſolved, if any violence was offered him, to ſell his life dear. The king received him in a moſt obliging manner, entertained him at his table, and, admiring his courage and intrepidity, complied with his demand, and dismissed him not only unmolested, but loaded with rich presents. Upon his return home, after he had publicly appeared in the armour of Thorismund, he was, at a grand entertainment, allowed to sit at a table with the king his father. In the reign of Audoinus, the Lombards were, by the emperor Justinian, allowed to settle in Pannonia [y]. Thus far Paulus Diaconus of the various migrations, wars, and conquests, of the Lombards, from their first leaving Scandinavia, to their settling in Pannonia. His account is, as the reader must have observed, interwoven with some fables; but, in the main, he agrees with Prosper Aquitanus, who wrote before his time; with Erchempetus, who flourished after; and likewise with Procopius, who lived in the reign of the emperor Justinian, whose secretary he was, and consequently well acquainted with the Lombards. The latter writer, in speaking of the above-mentioned war between the Lombards and the Heruli, tells us, that the Lombards had been formerly obliged to pay tribute to the Heruli [z], of which no notice is taken by our historian. The names of the various countries, in which the Lombards are said by Paulus Diaconus to have settled, have occasioned great debates among the later historians and geographers, and several conjectures have been offered; but all we know with any foundation is, that the countries mentioned by that writer lay between the mouth of the Vistula, where the Lombards coming from Scandinavia are supposed to have stopped, and Pannonia, where they settled in Justinian's time.

The Lombards, under the conduct of Audoinus, settle in Pannonia. Year after Christ 526.

Audoinus dying, the brave Alboinus was by the Lombards proclaimed king. Upon his accession to the crown, he married Clodisvinta, daughter of Clotharius, king of the Franks, by whom he had but one daughter, named by some Alpisunda, and by others Albisvinela. About the same time, died Turisind king of the Gepidæ, and was succeeded by his son Cunimund, who, to revenge the death of his brother Thorismund, made war upon the Lombards. Hereupon Alboinus, entering into an alliance with the Hunns, then known by the name of Avares, took the field, and, in the first battle that was fought, killed the king of the Gepidæ with his own hand, put their army to the rout, and, pursuing his victory, cut such numbers of them in pieces, that they ceased to be a nation, as we have related above. Alboinus, having caused the deceased king's head to be struck off, made a cup of his skull, called, in the language of the Lombards, scbala, which he made use of in all public entertainments. However, having taken, among many other captives of great diſtinction, the late king's daughter, by name Roſimunda, he married her upon the death of his former wife Clodiſvinta [a]. By this victory Alboinus gained great fame and reputation, not only among the Gothic nations, whoſe bards celebrated his proweſs and valour in their poems, but likewiſe among the Romans; inſomuch, that Narſes, who had been ſent by Juſtinian to drive the Goths out of Italy, courted his friendſhip, and, entering into an alliance with him, ſolicited his aſſiſtance to put in execution the commiſſion he had received. Alboinus ſent him a choice body of men, who, croſſing the Adriatic gulf, landed in Italy, and, joining the Romans, diſtinguiſhed themſelves in that battle, in which Totila was killed. The war being ended, they were ſent home loaded with rich preſents, continuing faithful allies to the Romans, whom they aſſiſted on all occaſions, ſo long as they inhabited Pannonia [b]. Thus Paulus Diaconus. But Procopius writes, that the Lombards, who came to the aſſiſtance of Narſes, committed every-where unheard of diſorders, pillaging the open country, burning the villages, and not ſparing even the holy virgins, inſomuch, that the Roman general was obliged to ſend them home before the war was ended, charging the two generals Valerianus and Damianus to accompany them, with a body of troops, to the confines of the empire, in order to reſtrain them from plundering the countries through which they paſſed [c]. Be that as it will, it is certain, that Narſes, whom we may juſtly ſtyle the deliverer of Italy, maintained, ſo long as he governed that country, a ſtrict friendſhip and correſpondence with Alboinus king of the Lombards; ſo that it was no difficult matter for him to perſuade that warlike and ambitious prince to attempt the conqueſt of Italy. Of this memorable event Paulus Diaconus, the author who deſerves moſt credit in what concerns the Lombards, gives us the following account; Narſes having, with the aſſiſtance of the Lombards, delivered Italy from the yoke of the Goths, ſent back into Pannonia his victorious auxiliaries, loaded with rich preſents. There they continued faithful to their engagements with the Romans, whom they were ready to aſſiſt on all occaſions. In the mean time, Juſtinian dying, Narſes, who governed Italy with an abſolute ſway, and had acquired immenſe wealth, was by the Italians accuſed to the emperor Juſtin II. the ſucceſſor of Juſtinian, and to the empreſs Sophia, as if he aſpired at the ſovereignty of the country. Hereupon he was recalled, and Longinus was sent to succeed him; nay, as he was an eunuch, the empress is reported to have said, that his employment at Constantinople should be to distribute, in the apartment of her women, the portion of wool, which each of them was to spin. Narses, enraged at this severe and insolent reflection, I will begin, said he, such a web as she shall never be able to finish; and immediately dispatched messengers to the Lombards, inviting them into Italy. With the messengers he sent several presents to Alboinus, with whom he was well acquainted, and some of the best fruits Italy afforded, as baits to allure him and his subjects to attempt the conquest of so fertile a country [d]. Thus Paulus Diaconus. But Baronius [e] and some other writers reject this account as fabulous, alledging, that Narses had been recalled the year before by Justin, at whose inauguration he assisted, and continued in great credit at Constantinople. This they assert upon the authority of Chorippus, a poet and grammarian of Africa, who flourished at that time, and was then at Constantinople, where he saw Narses present at the emperor Justin's coronation, and attending him soon after, when he gave audience to the embassadors of the Avares. But this objection the learned Petavius has intirely removed, shewing, that Chorippus speaks of another Narses, much younger than the celebrated commander; and that there were three of that name living at the same time, viz. the renowned deliverer of Italy, who died at Rome some time after he had called in the Lombards; the brother of Aratius; and the Narses whom Chorippus mentions in his poem, commending him on account of his tall stature, comely countenance, graceful person, and beautiful hair (K). It is surprising Baronius should think, that such a description suited an old eunuch. The Narses, of whom Chorippus speaks, was burnt alive in the year 605, by the command of Phocas. Baronius adds, that, according to our

Eminet excelsus super omnia vertice Narses

It is surprising, that Baronius should think the celebrated Narses to be described by these verses, who was an eunuch, and at this time, that is, at the beginning of Justin's reign, stricken in years.

historian, Narses dying at Rome, his body was put into a leaden coffin, and conveyed from Rome to Constantinople, where it was honourably interred [f]. Now, it is not by any means probable, says Baronius, that the emperor would have suffered any honours to be paid him after his death, had he treacherously delivered up Italy to the Lombards. To this Petavius answers, that his treachery was not known either to the Greeks or Latins, till some time after his death, when it was discovered by the Lombards themselves, owning, that they had been invited into Italy by Narses. That brave commander was, according to Paulus Diaconus, a man of great piety, and had, as we are told by Evagrius [g] and Nicephorus [h], a particular veneration for the virgin Mary, imploring her assistance before he entered upon any enterprise, and ascribing the success, that attended his arms, to her protection; and this is what induced Baronius to write in his favour, and endeavour to clear him from the treachery, with which he is charged by our historian.

BUT to resume the thread of our history: Alboinus, highly pleased with the opportunity that offered of invading Italy, a country with which the Lombards were already well acquainted, began, without loss of time, to make the necessary preparations for his intended expedition. In the first place, he solicited the assistance of the Saxons, his old friends and allies, promising to share with them his future conquests. The Saxons readily closed with his proposals, and sent him twenty thousand men, with their wives and children [i]. He likewise received powerful succours from other nations, namely from the Gepidæ, then his subjects, from the Bulgarians, Sarmatians, Pannonians, Sueves, Noricans, &c [k]. Having thus drawn together a numerous and powerful army, before he set out, he entered into a strict alliance with the Hunns, the most powerful of his neighbours, leaving Pannonia to them, upon this condition, that, if the expedition he was going upon should not succeed, the Lombards should be allowed to re-enter upon their former possessions. Having concerted such other measures as he thought necessary for so great an undertaking, he set out with his whole nation, their wives and children, carrying with them all their moveables and whatever they had of value, and, leaving Pannonia after a stay of forty-two years there, took their route towards Italy. They began their march in the month of April, just after Easter, which fell that year on the first day of the month, in the first indiction, in the third year of Justin II.

the ninth of John III. bishop of Rome, and in the year of the christian æra 568. Alboinus, with his army, and the promiscuous multitude that followed it, arrived, by the way of Istria, on the borders of Italy, which he entered without the least opposition, and, advancing through the province of Venetia to the city of Aquileia, found the whole country abandoned, the inhabitants being fled to the neighbouring islands in the Adriatic. He no sooner appeared before Aquileia, than the gates were opened to him by the few inhabitants who had the courage to stay, the rest having, upon the news of his approach, fled with their most valuable effects, following therein the example of their patriarch Paulinus, who, carrying with him all the utensils of his church, had taken refuge in an island. From Aquileia Alboinus advanced to Forum Julii, now Friuli, which likewise surrendered. In this city he passed the winter, dispersing his troops among the neighbouring villages, where they were plentifully supplied by the natives with all sorts of provisions. During the winter, Alboinus reduced the city of Friuli and its territory to a dukedom, conferring the title of duke on his nephew Gisulphus, whom he appointed to guard and govern those territories, which were, in a manner, the gates of Italy, through which every invader must first force his passage. Thus Friuli was erected into a dutchy, and such it has continued ever since. The following year 569, Alboinus, as soon as the season allowed him to take the field, moved forward with his army, and, without the least opposition, made himself master of Trivigi and Oderzo. From thence he marched to Monte Celce, Vicenza, Verona, and Trent, which surrendered to him upon the first summons. In each of these cities he left a strong garison of Lombards, under the command of an officer, whom he distinguished with the title of duke; but these dukes were only officers and governors of cities, and bore that title no longer than the prince thought fit to continue them in their command or government. Such likewise were the first dukes in Gaul, as Paulus Æmilius well observes[1]. Alboinus left Padua, and several other cities, behind him, either because they lay too much out of his way, or because they were well garisoned, and it would take up too much of his time to besiege them. Thus ended the second campaign of the Lombards in Italy. The third proved no less successful; for entering Liguria upon the return of the spring, the inhabitants were so terrified at his approach, that, leaving their habitations, they fled, with such of their effects as they could carry off, to the most remote and inaccessible parts of the mountains; so that the cities of Brescia, Bergamo, Lodi, Como, and the other towns of Liguria, quite to the Alps, being almoſt deſtitute of inhabitants, received him, without attempting to make the leaſt reſiſtance. He then advanced to Milan, the capital of Liguria, which, after a ſhort ſiege, ſurrendered, moſt of the inhabitants, ſeeing there were not forces in the place ſufficient for its defence, being retired, with Honoratus their biſhop, to Genoa. Upon the reduction of Milan, the Lombards, with joyful acclamations, proclaimed and ſaluted Alboinus king of Italy, lifting him up upon a ſhield in the midſt of the army, according to the cuſtom of their nation, and preſenting him with a lance, which, among them, was the enſign of royalty. From this time hiſtorians date the beginning of the kingdom of the Lombards in Italy, which laſted for the ſpace of two hundred years and upwards.

Alboinus, now veſted with royal authority, marched from Milan to Pavia; but meeting there with a vigorous reſiſtance, as the place was well gariſoned, and furniſhed with great plenty of proviſions, he left part of his army to puſh on the ſiege, and with the reſt reduced Piacenza, Parma, Modena, and the other inland cities both in Æmilia and Tuſcany. He then marched into Umbria, and there made himſelf maſter of Spoleto, which he made the metropolis of Umbria; and, erecting the city and its territory into a dukedom, appointed Feroaldus, whom he dignified with the title of duke, governor of that diſtrict. The governors of the other cities of note were honoured with the ſame title, as were the cities with that of dutchies, which title moſt of them retain to this day [m]. From Umbria Alboinus returned to the ſiege of Pavia, which at length ſurrendered, after it had held out with great reſolution for three years and ſome months. The king, highly incenſed againſt the inhabitants, had vowed to put them all to the ſword; but we are told, that, as he was entering the city on horſeback, his horſe fell under him in the middle of the gate, and could not by any means be raiſed, till, at the perſuaſion of one of his followers, he revoked the cruel vow he had made; when his horſe ſtarting up of himſelf, he proceeded to the palace built by Theodoric king of the Oſtrogoths, whither the people, to whom he had promiſed indemnity, crouded to ſee him, and to ſwear allegiance to their new prince [n]. As Pavia was a city of great ſtrength and conveniently ſituated, Alboinus and his ſucceſſors choſe it for the place of their reſidence; whence it became the metropolis of the kingdom of the Lombards, and was raiſed above all the other cities ſubject to them. Alboinus, now maſter of great part of Italy, that is, of all Venetia, tia, Liguria, Æmilia, Hetruria, and Umbria, reſolved to eſtabliſh peace and good order throughout the countries he had already reduced, before he made any further conqueſts. But he was in the mean time ſlain by the treachery of his wife, in the fourth year of his reign. This princeſs, called Roſimund, was the daughter of Cunimund, king of the Gepidæ, whom Alboinus had killed with his own hand in battle, and made a cup of his ſkull, as we have related above. Our hiſtorian aſſures us, that he himſelf had ſeen this cup [o]. Though Alboinus thus inſulted the memory of his conquered enemy, yet, upon the death of his firſt wife, he married his daughter, and was, by her contrivance, murdered on the following occaſion: As the king was one day feaſting at Verona with his chief favourites and principal officers, in the height of his mirth he ſent for the queen, and, filling the deteſted cup, commanded her to drink merrily with her father. Roſimund, ſtruck with horror, hurried out of the room, and, highly incenſed againſt her huſband for thus barbarouſly triumphing over the misfortunes of her family, reſolved, at all events, to make him pay dear for ſuch an inhuman and affronting conduct. Accordingly ſhe immediately diſcovered her intention to Helmichild, the king's ſchilpor, as the Lombards called him, that is ſhield-bearer, a youth of great boldneſs and intrepidity. Helmichild peremptorily refuſed to imbrue his hands in the blood of his ſovereign, or to be anyways acceſſory to his death; and in this reſolution he perſiſted, till he was, by a ſhameful ſtratagem, forced by the queen to a compliance; for ſhe, knowing that he carried on an intrigue with one of her ladies, placed herſelf one night in her bed, and, receiving the youth, indulged him, as if ſhe had been his own miſtreſs, in his amorous deſires; which ſhe had no ſooner done, than, diſcovering herſelf to the deceived lover, ſhe told him, that he muſt now either put the king to death, or be put to death by him. Helmichild, well appriſed that, after what he had done, his ſafety depended upon the death of the king, engaged in the treaſon, which he otherwiſe abhorred. One day therefore, while Alboinus was repoſing in his chamber after dinner, Helmichild, with ſome others, whom he had made privy to his deſign, breaking in unexpectedly, fell upon the king with their daggers. Alboinus, ſtarting up at their firſt coming in, laid hold of his ſword, which he had always by him; but having attempted in vain to draw it, the queen having before-hand faſtened it in the ſcabbard, he defended himſelf for ſome time with a footſtool; but was in the end overpowered and diſpatched with many wounds. boinus, the firſt king of the Lombards in Italy, and one of the greateſt princes of the age in which he lived. He was both a warlike and prudent prince, being, according to the character the antients give him, no leſs ſkilled in the arts of government than in thoſe of war. His friendſhip was courted by all the princes of thoſe times, eſpecially by the emperor Juſtinian, who was glad to enter into an alliance with him while he was ſtill in Pannonia. The little oppoſition he met with in the reduction of Italy, was, in a great meaſure, owing to the new form of government, of which hereafter, introduced by the exarch Longinus, ſent by Juſtinian the younger to ſucceed Narſes, who had driven the Goths quite out of Italy, and had governed thoſe provinces with great reputation, as the emperor's lieutenant, for the ſpace of thirteen years. Baronius ſuppoſes Alboinus to have led the Lombards out of Scandinavia, to have brought them into Pannonia, and from thence, after they had continued forty-two years in that country, into Italy. tia, Liguria, Æmilia, Hetruria, and Umbria, resolved to establish peace and good order throughout the countries he had already reduced, before he made any further conquests. But he was in the mean time slain by the treachery of his wife, in the fourth year of his reign. This princess, called Rosimund, was the daughter of Cunimund, king of the Gepidæ, whom Alboinus had killed with his own hand in battle, and made a cup of his skull, as we have related above. Our historian assures us, that he himself had seen this cup [o]. Though Alboinus thus insulted the memory of his conquered enemy, yet, upon the death of his first wife, he married his daughter, and was, by her contrivance, murdered on the following occasion: As the king was one day feasting at Verona with his chief favourites and principal officers, in the height of his mirth he sent for the queen, and, filling the detested cup, commanded her to drink merrily with her father. Rosimund, struck with horror, hurried out of the room, and, highly incensed against her husband for thus barbarously triumphing over the misfortunes of her family, resolved, at all events, to make him pay dear for such an inhuman and affronting conduct. the greateſt marks of friendſhip and kindneſs, and aſſured her of his protection. She had not been long in Ravenna, when the exarch, judging a favourable opportunity now offered to make himſelf king of Italy, by means of Roſimund and her treaſure, imparted his deſign to her, and declared his intention to marry her, provided, by ſome means or other, ſhe diſpatched Helmichild. Roſimund, highly pleaſed with the propoſal, to ſatisfy her ambition, reſolved to get rid of the perſon, whom ſhe had married for the ſake of her revenge. Accordingly, having prepared a ſtrong poiſon, ſhe mixed it with wine, and gave it to her huſband, as he came thirſty out of the bath, and called for drink, according to his cuſtom. Helmichild had not half emptied the cup, when, by the ſudden and ſtrange operation he felt in his bowels, he concluded what it was, and, with his ſword pointed at the queen's breaſt, compelled her to drink the reſt. The poiſon had the ſame effect on her as on her huſband; for, in a few hours, they both died. Longinus, laying aſide, upon her death, all thoughts of making himſelf king of Italy, ſent the treaſure of the Lombards to Conſtantinople, together with Albiſvinda, the queen's daughter by Alboinus. In the mean time, the Lombards, having paid the laſt duties to their deceaſed king, aſſembled in Pavia, the metropolis of their kingdom, and there proceeded to the election of a new prince, which fell on Clephis, a man of great diſtinction among them. He rebuilt Imola, which had been ruined by Narſes, made himſelf maſter of Rimini, and extended his conqueſts to the very gates of Rome. But as he treated not only the Romans, but his own ſubjects, with great cruelty, he was murdered, with his wife Meſſana, by one of his people, after a ſhort reign of eighteen months. His cruelty gave the Lombards ſuch an averſion to royal power, that, upon his death, they reſolved to change their form of government, and accordingly, for the ſpace of ten years, they choſe no king, but lived ſubject to their dukes, that is, to the governors of the cities; for each city of note, as we have hinted above, was governed by ſome perſon of diſtinction, dignified with the title of duke. Theſe dukes had hitherto acknowledged the royal authority, and were by the kings appointed and removed at pleaſure; but, upon the aboliſhing of kingly power, each of them became ſovereign in his own city and its diſtrict. This diviſion of the countries they had conquered in Italy into ſo many petty kingdoms, as we may call them, put a ſtop for the preſent to their conqueſts, prevented them from ever making themſelves maſters of all Italy, and in the end occaſioned their total ruin; for tho' the royal authority was afterwards reſtored among them, yet, as they had been free free for ſome time, they proved leſs obedient, and more liable to quarrel among themſelves [a].

WE cannot diſmiſs this ſubject, without taking notice of a miſtake, which moſt modern writers have been led into by Sigonius. That writer ſuppoſes the Lombards, upon the death of Clephis, to have created thirty dukes, and to have divided their conqueſts in Italy among them. But from the words of Paulus Diaconus, where he ſpeaks of that change [b], it plainly appears, that the Lombards, dreading the authority, or rather tyranny, of a king, choſe to live under their dukes, who were not then firſt appointed, but had been choſen before by Alboinus and Clephis. The only innovation that happened among the Lombards, upon their aboliſhing the royal authority, was this, that the dukes, who had been hitherto ſubordinate to the kings, as their miniſters and officers, now governed each his dukedom with abſolute power, acknowledging no ſuperior authority. Beſides, the number of the dukes amounted not to thirty only, as is commonly believed, but to thirty-ſix; for Paulus Diaconus, after having told us, that Pavia, Milan, Bergamo, Breſcia, Trent, and Friuli, were governed by the following dukes Zaban, Alboinus, Walaris, Alachis, Evin, and Giſulphus, adds, that the other cities were governed by thirty dukes [c]. Tho' the Lombards, during the inter-regnum, were attended with ſucceſs in their wars with the Romans, for they made themſelves maſters of ſeveral cities, namely, of Sutri, Bomarzo, Orta, Todi, Amelia, Perugia, Luccoli, &c. yet they ſoon perceived, that their kingdom, thus divided, could not long ſubſiſt; and therefore aſſembling in Pavia, they reſolved to ſubmit anew to the authority of one man, and accordingly choſe Authari the ſon of Clephis for their king in the year 585. This prince, with his valour and prudence (for he is ſaid to have excelled in both Alboinus himſelf), ſo eſtabliſhed the kingdom of the Lombards, that, in ſpite of the utmoſt efforts of the Roman emperors, it laſted for the ſpace of near two hundred years. But of the exploits of the dukes during the inter-regnum, and the wars of Authari and his ſucceſſors, till the utter deſtruction of their kingdom by Charlemagne in 774, we ſhall ſpeak at length in a more proper place.

The Bulgarians.

THE name of the Bulgarians began to be firſt heard and the Bulgarians dreaded by the Romans in the reign of the emperor Zeno, Romans about the year 485. Ennodius, the moſt antient writer who mentions them, tells us in the panegyric, which he wrote on Theodoric king of the Ostrogoths, that they were a warlike and numerous nation, inured to the toils of war, ever ready to prefer death to slavery, and never known to have been put to flight, till they engaged this hero [d]. They dwelt, in antient times, near the Volga, on the north side of the Caspian sea; whence their country was called Volgaria, and they Volgari, which names, in process of time, were changed into Bulgaria and Bulgari [e]. Paulus Diaconus calls those countries Bulgaria Magna, which are known at present by the names of Astracan and Casan [f]. Some writers will have them to be of Gothic, and some of German, extraction; but as their language differs widely from the languages of both these nations, others, with far greater appearance of truth, conclude them descended from neither. They spoke antiently, says Diocleates in his history of the kingdom of the Slavi, the Slavonian language, as they still do, with some variation in the dialect [g]. As therefore the Goths, Alans, Vandals, Gepidæ, &c. are thought to have been originally one and the same people, because the same language was common to all, these nations must, on the contrary, be allowed to be different, whose languages differ. Now, no two languages, says Rudbeckius, can be conceived more unlike than the Sclavonian spoken by the Bulgarians, and the German and Gothic. The Bulgarians therefore were not sprung either from the Goths or the Germans, but ought to be reckoned among the nations inhabiting Asiatic Scythia; for they came first from thence; and to trace them farther back would be a vain and fruitless attempt. From Asiatic Scythia and the countries lying north of the Caspian sea, they advanced, in quest of a more fertile country, to the Tanais, and from thence, in the reign of the emperor Zeno, to the banks of the Danube, having at that time one Bladinus for their king. They were not stopped by that river, but passing it, broke into Thrace, with a design to settle there. But Theodoric the Ostrogth, afterwards king of Italy, and at this time general of the Roman troops quartered in that province, marching against them, put them to flight, and obliged them to repass the Danube [h]. Those who broke into Thrace had one Libertem for their leader, who was wounded in the engagement [i]. Ennodius, to enhance the glory of his hero, pretends, as we have hinted above, that the Bulgarians had never been overcome before [k]. after, that is, in 499, the eighth of the emperor Anastasius's reign, they broke anew into Thrace, committing every-where dreadful ravages. Against them the emperor dispatched Aristus, commander of the troops in Illyricum, at the head of fifteen thousand men, attended by five hundred and twenty waggons, loaded with arms and provisions. Aristus, confiding in his own strength, engaged the barbarians on the banks of the Zarta or Zurta; but was by them utterly defeated, with the loss of all his baggage, and four thousand men, among whom fell the counts Nicostratus, Innocentius, and Aquilinus, with some of the most experienced officers of the army [l]. Of this victory Zonaras, without all doubt, speaks, where he tells, that the Bulgarians, in the second irruption they made into the empire, gained, by magical incantations, a complete victory. He adds, that, about the time of this invasion, a comet appeared, and several prodigies happened [m]. We are not told what the barbarians did after this victory; but, in all likelihood, they returned home with the rich booty they had acquired. Three years after, they invaded Thrace anew, and, having plundered that province and great part of Illyricum, they carried off an immense booty, without meeting with the least opposition, the Roman troops being employed against the Saracens, who, under the conduct of one Badicarim, committed unheard-of cruelties in Palestine, Arabia, and Phœnice [n]. They seem to have continued quiet, perhaps by some agreement with the empire, from this time to the year 539, the twelfth of the emperor Justinian the Great, when, under the conduct of two kings, Vulger and Droggo, they passed the Danube and laid waste all Mœsia. The commanders of the Roman troops quartered in that and the neighbouring provinces, having drawn together their forces, marched against them; but were defeated with great slaughter, and put to flight. Hereupon the barbarians, roving about uncontrouled, took an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives, destroying with fire and sword what they could not carry off. But, in the mean time, one Acum, by nation a Hunn, an officer of great experience, whom Justinian had sent against them, having cut off their retreat, obliged them to venture a battle in a very disadvantageous situation. The Bulgarians fought with great resolution and intrepidity; but great numbers of their men being cut in pieces, and both their kings killed, they were in the end forced to quit their booty, and betake themselves to a precipitous flight.

Acum,

Acum, having thus delivered the Roman provinces from the barbarians, by whom they had been ſtrangely harraſſed, ſet out on his return to Conſtantinople with Conſtantine, who had commanded under him; but, in paſſing through Thrace, both generals were unexpectedly ſurrounded by a party of Bulgarians, and taken priſoners; ſo that Juſtinian was obliged to ranſom them with an immenſe ſum [o]. The following year 540, the Bulgarians, not in the leaſt diſcouraged by the loſſes they had ſuſtained, returned anew, and, entering Thrace, plundered and laid waſte the open country far and near. But Mundus, by nation a Gepid, whom Juſtinian had appointed governor of Illyricum, coming upon them unexpectedly, gave them a total overthrow, cut moſt of them in pieces, and, having taken a great number of priſoners, ſent them to the emperor at Conſtantinople, who incorporated ſome of them among his troops, and ordered the reſt to be tranſplanted into Armenia and Lazica [p]. For this and the above-mentioned victory, the emperor took the ſurname of Bulgaricus, which, among his other titles, is ſtill to be ſeen on his coins.

They defeat the Romans.

No further mention is made in hiſtory of the Bulgarians, till the reign of Conſtantine III. ſurnamed Pogonatus, which began in 668. In his time they paſſed the Danube, and, entering the Roman territories, committed great ravages in the provinces bordering on that river. Conſtantine, having raiſed a powerful army, diſpatched it againſt them; but as the Romans, confiding too much in their own ſtrength, and deſpiſing the barbarians as an undiſciplined multitude, were marching carelеſly, the Bulgarians fell upon them with ſuch vigour, that, after a faint reſiſtance, they betook themſelves to flight, and, retiring into the fortified places, left the enemy at full liberty to ravage at pleaſure the open country. Hereupon the emperor, preferring a ſhameful peace to an expenſive and doubtful war, agreed to pay them a yearly penſion, upon condition that they ſhould not, for the future infeſt the Roman territories, but join, when required, the emperor's forces againſt all other barbarians, who ſhould attempt to diſturb the peace of the empire [q]. About this time Alczecus, one of the princes or chiefs of the Bulgarians, abandoning his own country, for what reaſon we are not told, entered Italy with a body of his countrymen, and arriving at Pavia, without offering the leaſt violence to the people in the countries through which he paſſed, offered his ſervice to Grimoaldus king of the Lombards, declaring at the ſame time, that he was willing to live, with his people, in what part ſoever of his dominions he ſhould be pleaſed to allot him. Grimoaldus received him in a moſt obliging manner; and thinking he might prove very ſerviceable to his ſon Romualdus duke of Benevento, threatened at that time by the Greeks, who were maſters of Naples, he ſent Alczecus and his Bulgarians to him, requiring him to allow them ſettlements in the dukedom of Benevento. Romualdus, in compliance with his father's requeſt, allotted them ſeveral cities, and, among the reſt, Sepinum, Bajanum, and Iſernia; but at the ſame time obliged Alczecus to relinquiſh the title of duke, which, it ſeems, he had before, and content himſelf with that of gaſtaldus, either to ſhew, that he had not given him thoſe places in ſeignory and property, or becauſe he did not think it fit, that one of his ſubjects ſhould be diſtinguiſhed with the title of duke, ſince he had no other himſelf. The dukedom of Benevento being thus divided into ſeveral counties, all ſubject to the duke of Benevento, thoſe who were appointed to govern them, had no other title but that of gaſtaldi, which is the ſame with the title of comes or count [r]. Thus the Bulgarians came to ſettle in the dukedom of Benevento, where, for ſeveral ages, they inhabited the country now known by the name of Contado di Moliſe. Paulus Diaconus, who wrote above an hundred and fifty years after they had ſettled there, tells us, that though, in his time, they had learnt the Italian language, nevertheleſs they had not yet loſt the uſe of their own (L). By the Latin tongue our hiſtorian did not mean, as ſome have imagined (3), the language of the antient Romans, but another then current in Italy, and commonly called Italian; for the antient Latin, about the end of the ninth century, when Paulus Diaconus flouriſhed, was only made uſe of in writings, another, called Italian, being then commonly ſpoken, to which the mixture, variety, and confuſion of ſeveral languages with the Latin, had given riſe The Latin tongue, even in the time of the emperor Juſtinian, who died in 566, began to be ſtrangely corrupted, and to bear a great reſemblance to the Italian; for Fornerius tells us, that he had peruſed a public inſtrument, which had been drawn up in Ravenna in the the banks of the Danube: Constantine, as we have hinted above, had concluded a peace with them, and agreed to pay them an annual pension; nay, most authors are of opinion, that he allowed them to settle in Lower Mœsia, from them afterwards called Bulgaria, which name that country still retains. Other writers indeed suppose them to have settled there several years before Constantine's reign, tho' they will not take upon them to fix the precise time. However that be, Justinian II. not only refused to stand to the articles of the treaty, which his father had concluded with the Bulgarians, but, entering their country in an hostile manner, laid it waste far and near, made himself master of several forts, and obliged the inhabitants either to submit to him and pay unreasonable contributions, or to abandon their dwellings, and take refuge in the woods and marshes. The Bulgarians, finding themselves reduced to great straights, dispatched embassadors to the emperor, suing for

reign of Justinian, and was written in a kind of Latin, which bore a great affinity to the Italian (4). In the tenth century, the Italian alone was spoken in Italy; but that Italian came much nearer the Latin, than the language which is used now by the Italians, both in common speech, and in writing; but though the current language was then very different from the Latin, yet it was called Latin by the writers of that and the two following centuries, because it was spoken by the antient inhabitants, who were styled Latins or Romans, and by that name distinguished from the Greeks, the Lombards, and the other nations settled in Italy. Hence not only Paulus Diaconus, but authors who flourished long after his time, by the Latin meant the Italian, as the learned Camillo Pellegrino rightly observes (5). Thus, where Otho Frisingensis commends the Lombards of his time, who were then become Italians, for the elegancy with which they spoke the Latin tongue, that writer must be understood, not of the antient Latin, but the Italian; and in the same sense we must understand all the authors who flourished after the ninth century, and call the language used in their time Latin. There is in no country so great a variety of dialects as in Italy, which, as Camillo Pellegrino observes, is owing to the many different nations that settled there, viz. the Goths, the Lombards, the Bulgarians, the Greeks, the Saracens, the Normans, the Suevi, &c. for though these foreign nations forgot, in process of time, their native language, and spoke that of the country in which they dwelt, yet they kept many of their own words, and, with their words, a foreign accent; and hence the many different accents and dialects chiefly in the present kingdom of Naples, where all the above-mentioned nations continued some time.

the banks of the Danube: Constantine, as we have hinted above, had concluded a peace with them, and agreed to pay them an annual pension; nay, most authors are of opinion, that he allowed them to settle in Lower Mœsia, from them afterwards called Bulgaria, which name that country still retains. Other writers indeed suppose them to have settled there several years before Constantine's reign, tho' they will not take upon them to fix the precise time. However that be, Justinian II. not only refused to stand to the articles of the treaty, which his father had concluded with the Bulgarians, but, entering their country in an hostile manner, laid it waste far and near, made himself master of several forts, and obliged the inhabitants either to submit to him and pay unreasonable contributions, or to abandon their dwellings, and take refuge in the woods and marshes. The Bulgarians, finding themselves reduced to great straights, dispatched embassadors to the emperor, suing for

reign of Justinian, and was written in a kind of Latin, which bore a great affinity to the Italian (4). In the tenth century, the Italian alone was spoken in Italy; but that Italian came much nearer the Latin, than the language which is used now by the Italians, both in common speech, and in writing; but though the current language was then very different from the Latin, yet it was called Latin by the writers of that and the two following centuries, because it was spoken by the antient inhabitants, who were styled Latins or Romans, and by that name distinguished from the Greeks, the Lombards, and the other nations settled in Italy. Hence not only Paulus Diaconus, but authors who flourished long after his time, by the Latin meant the Italian, as the learned Camillo Pellegrino rightly observes (5). of Constantinople [w]. In the year 763, a new war was kindled between the same emperor and the Bulgarians, the occasion of which is variously related by authors; but the most probable opinion is, that Constantine, wanting a pretence to quarrel with them and to retrieve the reputation he had lost in his late war with them, pretended to be highly provoked against them for putting to death in a sedition all the princes of the blood royal among them, and raising to the throne one Telesis, a person of a mean descent. What gave rise to this rebellion, we are not told; but Constantine, pretending to revenge it, raised a powerful army, and, marching into the country of the Bulgarians, gave them battle on the borders of Thrace. The engagement lasted eight hours; but in the end the Romans gained a complete victory: after which the emperor, instead of improving it, returned to Constantinople, with the booty and prisoners he had taken, and entered the city in triumph. The Bulgarians, upon the retreat of the emperor, put their new king to death, either mistrusting him, as if he entertained a private correspondence with the Romans, or because his behaviour in the battle was such, as shewed him unworthy of the dignity to which he had been raised [x]. The Bulgarians, discouraged with the loss of the battle, in which the flower of their youth was cut off, sent embassadors to Constantinople to sue for peace, which was granted them; but upon such disadvantageous terms, that they resolved to observe them no longer than a favourable opportunity offered of renewing the war. Accordingly two years after, great part of the emperor's forces being employed in the east against the Saracens, they broke into the Roman dominions with a body of twelve thousand men; but Constantine marching in person against them, and, coming upon them when least expected, cut them all off to a man, and then returned in triumph to Constantinople. This the emperor styled his noble war, because not one christian was killed in it; but the victory was obtained, it seems, by treachery, the emperor being privately informed by some Bulgarians of the designs and all the motions of their countrymen. These Elerich, king of the country, discovered by the following device: He wrote to Constantine, pretending a desire to resign the crown and lead a private life at Constantinople; for which purpose he begged the emperor to send him a safe conduct, and at the same time to let him know what friends the Romans had among the Bulgarians, that he might repair with them to Constantinople, being unwilling to trust his person or design to others. Hereupon Constantine, not suspecting any deceit, sent him a list of the names of those, who maintained a private correſpondence with him; which Elerich no ſooner received, than he cauſed them all to be put to death. The emperor, finding himſelf thus deluded, tore his garment and his hair, in the height of his paſſion, and, vowing revenge at all events, ſpent the winter in warlike preparations, and early in the ſpring took the field, with a deſign to cut off the whole nation of the Bulgarians root and branch; but being ſeized on his march with a violent fever, he was obliged to return to Achadiopolis, whence he was conveyed to Strongylum, where he died [y]. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Leo III. who, upon his acceſſion to the throne, concluded a peace with the king of the Bulgarians, whoſe daughter Irene he had married. In the third year of his reign, Elerich being driven from the throne by his own ſubjects, fled to Conſtantinople, where he was received by the emperor with extraordinary marks of kindneſs and eſteem. During his ſtay in that metropolis, he was, at his own requeſt, inſtructed in the principles of the chriſtian religion; which he no ſooner embraced, than he was by Leo created a patrician, and married to a relation of the empreſs [z]. Conſtantine Porphyrogenitus, the ſon and ſucceſſor of Leo, in the year 791, the eleventh of his reign, made war upon the Bulgarians, who, according to their cuſtom, had broken into the Roman provinces; but with what ſucceſs the emperor was attended in this war, is uncertain; for Cedrenus writes, that he gained a ſignal victory; Zonaras, that it was a drawn battle; and ſome, that the Romans were worſted and loſt the flower of their army. Be that as it will, the following year 792, he marched anew againſt the Bulgarians, encouraged thereunto by ſome mathematicians, who promiſed him certain victory; but while, depending upon their promiſes, he omitted the proper means to obtain it, he was utterly defeated. In the battle, beſides a great number of common ſoldiers, fell ſome of the beſt officers of the army, and the moſt conſiderable men in the empire, with Pancratius the mathematician, who, by his lying predictions, had given occaſion to the overthrow [a]. Two years after, Cardanes king of the Bulgarians ſent embaſſadors to the emperor, demanding a tribute, and threatening, if it was refuſed him, to come as far as the Golden-gate of Conſtantinople, and tak it by force: to ſuch a low ebb was the empire then reduced! Conſtantine, however, exerting himſelf on this occaſion, returned anſwer, That, as the king of the Bulgarians was ſtricken in years, he would ſave him the trouble of ſo long a journey, by coming in perſon to wait upon him. Accordingly he marched againſt him at the head of a conſiderable army, at the ſight of which the barbabarians, ſtruck with a panic, fled in the utmoſt confuſion; but Conſtantine, inſtead of purſuing them, and taking advantage of the conſternation they were in, returned to Conſtantinople [b]. In the year 806, the ſeventh of the emperor Nicephorus, the Bulgarians, falling upon a party of Romans, put them all to the ſword, and ſeized eleven hundred pounds weight of gold, which they were eſcorting to Stragmon for the payment of the army. Soon after they made an irruption into the Roman provinces, under the conduct of Crumus their king, and, having ſurpriſed Sardica, put the whole gariſon, conſiſting of ſix thouſand men, to the ſword. Nicephorus marched againſt them in perſon; but the barbarians retiring at his approach, he returned to Conſtantinople. However, the following year, having drawn together all the forces of the eaſt and weſt, he marched at the head of them into Bulgaria, deſtroying all with fire and ſword. Crumus, alarmed at the approach of ſo formidable an army, ſent embaſſadors to ſue for peace, which he offered to conclude upon terms highly honourable to the empire. But Nicephorus, rejecting them with ſcorn and indignation, purſued his ravages, burning the towns and villages, and putting ſuch of the inhabitants to the ſword as fell into his hands, without diſtinction of ſex, age, or condition. He not only raged againſt the living, but likewiſe againſt the dead, not ſuffering thoſe who were ſlain to be buried, but ordering their bodies to be expoſed to the dogs and wild beaſts. But in the mean time Byzantius, his chief favourite, forſaking him, fled, with the imperial robe and an hundred pounds weight of gold, to the enemy; which was looked upon by the ſuperſtitious multitude as an unlucky omen. Crumus, ſenſibly affected with the calamities of his ſubjects, ſent anew embaſſadors to the emperor, offering to agree to any terms, on condition he would put an end to the ravages and quit the country. But Nicephorus, deaf to all propoſals, received the embaſſadors with great haughtineſs and diſmiſſed them with ſcorn. Hereupon Crumus, puſhed on by deſpair and the thirſt of revenge, in the firſt place, ſecured and fortified all the paſſes through which the emperor was to retire; and then, animating his men to revenge the blood of their wives and children, inhumanly maſſacred by the emperor's orders, he attacked unexpectedly the Roman camp, and, having forced it in ſpite of all oppoſition, cut off almoſt the whole army, with the emperor himſelf, a great number of patricians, and almoſt all the chief officers of the army. Saturatius, the emperor's ſon, was dan-gerouſly wounded; but eſcaped in a litter to Adrianople. All the arms and baggage fell into the enemy's hands; and the body of Nicephorus being found among the ſlain, Crumus ordered his head to be ſtruck off, and, after having kept it for ſome time expoſed to public view, incloſed the ſkull in ſilver, and uſed it ever after in all grand entertainments, inſtead of a cup [c]. In the beginning of the reign of Michael, who ſucceeded Nicephorus, a peace was concluded between the Romans and Bulgarians, nay, ſome of the latter were allowed to ſettle in the Roman provinces. But the good harmony that paſſed between the two nations was ſhort-lived; for, in the ſecond year of Michael's reign, they came to an open rupture on the following occaſion: Some Romans, who had been taken priſoners by the Bulgarians in the late war, having found means to make their eſcape, returned home. Theſe Crumus demanded, threatening the empire with war, if his juſt demand was not immediately complied with. The emperor, who was naturally averſe to war, and ſeveral perſons of diſtinction at court, were for granting the king of the Bulgarians his requeſt, the empire not being at that time in a condition to carry on a war with ſucceſs. But Nicephorus the patriarch, and Theoctiſtus, a perſon in great eſteem at court for his virtue and wiſdom, urging, that they ought to truſt to the aſſiſtance of heaven, and not gratify the pride and inſolence of the barbarians, the emperor, following their advice, received the Bulgarian embaſſadors in the moſt obliging manner; but at the ſame time told them, that he could not, by any means, comply with their requeſt, and deliver up into captivity ſuch of his ſubjects as, having once eſcaped that deplorable condition, had fled to him for protection. Hereupon Crumus, having drawn together a conſiderable army, entered the Roman territories, and not only ravaged the open country, but laid ſiege to, and made himſelf maſter of, ſeveral fortified places, being aſſiſted therein by an Arabian, well ſkilled in the art of framing military engines, who had been formerly employed by the emperor Nicephorus, but, being ill uſed by him, had fled to the Bulgarians, and taught them the uſe of all ſorts of battering engines. Beſides ſeveral other cities, he made himſelf maſter of Meſembria, a place of great importance in the neighbourhood of mount Hæmus, and put the gariſon to the ſword. In the mean time, the emperor, having aſſembled a very numerous army, leaving Conſtantinople, put himſelf at the head of it, and marching into Thrace, came up with the enemy in the neighbourhood of Conſtantinople. After ſeveral ſkirmiſhes, in which the Romans had the advantage, the emperor was, in a manner, forced by the ſoldiery to venture a battle. Both armies engaged with the utmoſt fury, and the victory continued long doubtful; but in the end the Romans were utterly defeated. Michael was ſo ſenſibly affected with this misfortune, that, reſigning the purple to Leo, he retired to the monaſtery of Pharus, and there took the monaſtic habit. Thus Theophanes [d], who lived at this time, and was an eye-witneſs of what he wrote. But Cedrenus writes, that the Romans had the advantage in the engagement; that great numbers of the Bulgarians were cut in pieces; and that Crumus with much-ado kept his men from betaking themſelves to a precipitous flight, till Leo, who aſpired at the empire, drew off the forces under his command; which ſo diſheartened the Romans, that they fled in the utmoſt confuſion [e]. Be that as it will, it is certain, that the Bulgarians gained a complete victory, and that the emperor, with great difficulty, eſcaped to Adrianople, and from thence, with a ſmall attendance, to Conſtantinople, where he abdicated ſoon after. The Bulgarians, elated with the great victory they had gained, purſued their ravages without controul, advancing almoſt to the gates of Conſtantinople, and deſtroying all with fire and ſword. Leo, who had ſucceeded Michael, endeavoured at firſt to reſtrain them by fair means, and for that purpoſe ſent embaſſadors to Crumus, with propoſals for an accommodation; but Crumus, deaf to all overtures, ſent them back without ſo much as granting them an audience. Leo, who was an active and warlike prince, highly provoked at the arrogance of the barbarian, drew together all the forces of the empire, and, marching into Thrace, offered the enemy battle; which Crumus not declining, a bloody engagement enſued. Great numbers fell on both ſides; but in the end the Romans, after a moſt obſtinate reſiſtance, were put to the rout. The Bulgarians, inſtead of purſuing the enemy, fell upon the baggage and began to plunder the camp in great diſorder; which being obſerved by Leo from a neighbouring eminence, where he had kept during the battle with a body of reſerve, he came down unexpectedly upon the enemy, renewed the fight, and, having rallied his other troops, obtained in the end an intire victory. Great numbers of the enemy were ſlain, and more taken priſoners. Among the former ſome reckon the king himſelf; and add, that the emperor ſlew him with his own hand; but others ſay, that he was only wounded, and that, falling from his horſe, he had been either killed or taken priſoner by the Romans, who had already ſurrounded him, had not his guards, with unparallelled valour, reſcued him out of their hands.

hands [f]. The Bulgarians were ſo diſheartened with this overthrow, that they made no inroads into the empire for ſome years after. Crumus was ſucceeded by Mortagon, in whoſe time Thomas, of whom we have ſpoken in our Roman hiſtory [g], revolting from Michael II. who had ſucceeded Leo, and keeping him cloſely blocked up in Conſtantinople, the king of the Bulgarians, pitying his condition, reſolved to march to his aſſiſtance, and, leſt he ſhould in the mean time come to any agreement with the rebels, he privately acquainted him with his deſign. The emperor, either to prevent the ravages and diſorders, which he was well appriſed the barbarians would commit, or ſuſpecting the ſincerity of the king, or, what the writers of thoſe times think moſt probable, apprehending that a reward, anſwerable to ſuch a friendly and ſeaſonable aſſiſtance, would too much exhauſt his treaſury, in the improving of which he at leaſt equalled the moſt covetous of his predeceſſors, returned the king of the Bulgarians thanks for his generous offer; but declined accepting it. Mortagon, however, accuſtomed to war and depredations, undertook the expedition, and entering Thrace, encamped at a place called Cedoctus, at a ſmall diſtance from Conſtantinople. Thomas, hearing of the approach of the Bulgarians, broke up the ſiege, and marched with all his forces to meet the enemy. Hereupon a battle enſued, in which the rebels were put to flight, with great ſlaughter. But Mortagon, inſtead of purſuing the fugitives, returned home, with the booty he found in the enemy's camp [h].

The Bulgarians aſſiſt the emperor Michael II.

THE Bulgarians continued quiet, no doubt in virtue of ſome treaty between them and the Romans, from this time to the year 893, the eighth of Leo V. when a war broke out between them and the Romans on the following occaſion: A great trade had been carried on for ſome time between the two nations, and the public mart was kept at Conſtantinople, whence, by the intereſt of Zantzas, father to Zoe the emperor's concubine, it was removed to Theſſalonica. This removal was procured by Zantzas, at the requeſt of the Conſtantinopolitan merchants, and thoſe very merchants were, by the great ſway he bore at court, appointed officers and receivers of the cuſtoms; which put it in their power to give great trouble to the Bulgarian merchants, whom they oppreſſed with new and unlawful impoſitions. Of this Simeon, king of the Bulgarians, complained by his embaſſadors to the emperor; but he, who was in all things governed by Zantzas, refuſing to redreſs the grievances complained of, Simeon, who wanted only a pretence for a rupture, without any further declaration of war, entered the Roman territories at the head of a powerful army, and advanced as far as Macedon, destroying all with fire and sword. On the borders of that province he was met by the army, which Leo had sent against him, under the conduct of Procopius Crenites and one Curticius an Armenian. The two armies no sooner came in sight of each other, than they engaged. The Romans stood their ground some time; but both their generals being slain, they were in the end utterly defeated. In the pursuit great numbers of them were taken prisoners, and treated in a most barbarous manner by the insolent conqueror, who first led them in triumph round his camp, and then, having caused their noses to be cut off, sent them, thus deformed, to Constantinople. Leo, highly provoked at this outrage, prevailed upon the Ungri or Hungarians to break into the country of the Bulgarians on one side, while he invaded it on the other. Simeon marched first against the Hungarians, who committed everywhere dreadful ravages; but, in the battle that ensued, the flower of his army was cut off, he himself having, with great difficulty, made his escape, and taken refuge in a strong-hold named Drista; so that the Hungarians pursued their ravages without controul, laid waste the country far and near, and took an incredible number of prisoners, whom they sold to the emperor. Leo, before the Hungarians began hostilities, or his own troops took the field, had sent to Simeon one Constantinacius with proposals for an accommodation; but the king of the Bulgarians, imagining that the emperor had therein no other view but to deceive and amuse him, had thrown the embassadors into prison; but finding his army cut off by the Hungarians, and being informed at the same time, that the Roman army, under the conduct of Nicephorus Phocas, was in full march to enter his country, he not only set Constantinacius at liberty, but dispatched embassadors to Leo suing for peace in a most submissive manner. The emperor, not thinking it adviseable to reduce so warlike a nation to despair, readily granted him his request, ordering Phocas, who was then upon the point of entering Bulgaria, to return home, with the forces under his command [t]. But Simeon no sooner found the danger removed, than he threw Leo's embassadors into prison, and, falling unexpectedly upon the Hungarians, gave them a total overthrow. He then entered their country, and committed there unheard-of cruelties, putting all to the sword who fell into his hands, without distinction of sex, age, or condition. Leo, not able to march to the assistance of his allies at so short a warning, dispatched embaſſadors to the king of the Bulgarians, complaining of the breach of the treaty juſt concluded, and requiring him to withdraw his troops forthwith out of the country of the Hungarians. Simeon, elated with his ſucceſs, returned anſwer, That he would hearken to no terms, till all the Bulgarians, who had been taken in the late war, were returned. To this the emperor conſented, unwilling to engage in a new war. But the priſoners were no ſooner returned him, than Simeon made new demands, ſtill more unreaſonable than the former; which provoked the emperor to ſuch a degree, that he reſolved to fall upon the Bulgarians with the whole ſtrength of the empire, and utterly extirpate, if poſſible, that perfidious nation. A powerful army was accordingly raiſed, and ſent into Bulgaria, under the command of Catacalon and Theodoſius a patrician. But Simeon, falling upon them unexpectedly, cut moſt of them in pieces, with Theodoſius, and a great number of officers of diſtinction. He puts to flight the Romans with great ſlaughter.

UPON that prince's death, they diſpatched embaſſadors to Alexander, his brother and ſucceſſor, to renew the treaty concluded in the late reign. But Alexander, inſtead of cultivating the friendſhip of that warlike nation, diſmiſſed the embaſſadors in an ignominious manner; at which Simeon, juſtly provoked, invaded the Roman dominions with a mighty army, and, meeting with no oppoſition, after having ravaged Thrace, advanced to the very gates of Conſtantinople, which he hoped to ſurpriſe; but the inhabitants making a vigorous reſiſtance, after ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts, Simeon was obliged to drop the enterpriſe and retire to Hebdomon, at a ſmall diſtance from the imperial city. From thence he ſent embaſſadors to Conſtantine, who had ſucceeded Alexander, with propoſals for an accommodation; which were received with great joy by the governors of the young prince, who was then under age. While the negotiations were carrying on, Simeon was admitted to dine with the emperor in the palace of Blachernæ, and, when the entertainment was over, diſmiſſed with rich preſents. Cedrenus ſuppoſes a peace to have been concluded; but Zonaras writes, that Simeon would not agree to the terms that were offered him. Be that as it will, the following year 914, the king of the Bulgarians broke anew into Thrace, and, advancing as far as Adrianople, laid ſiege to that city. In the mean time the empreſs Zoe, mother to the young prince, having got the whole power into her own hands, and, by the advice of the ſenate, concluded a peace with the Saracens, who had invaded the eaſtern provinces, reſolved to employ the whole ſtrength of the empire againſt the Bulgarians, and utterly extirpate, if poſſible, that nation. With this view ſhe aſſembled a mighty army, and, having firſt diſtributed large ſums among the ſoldiers, ſhe ordered them to march againſt the enemy, under the command of Leo Phocas, captain of the imperial guards. Under Leo commanded the following generals, Grapſon, Merula, Romanus, Melius, and Conſtantius Africanus, who had all diſtinguiſhed themſelves in former wars. The army was muſtered in a ſpacious plain called Diabeſis, where the chief chaplain of the palace, called the Protopapa, made them all kneel down, and ſwear they would fight to the laſt. After this, he gave them his bleſſing with the uſual ceremonies; which were no ſooner over, than Leo led them againſt the Bulgarians, who had made themſelves maſters of Adrianople, betrayed to them by one Pancratucus an Armenian. Simeon met the Romans at a caſtle called Archelous, whereupon a bloody battle enſued on the ſixth of Auguſt of the preſent year 917, in which the Bulgarians, after a moſt obſtinate diſpute, were in the end put to flight. The victory however was ſnatched out of the hands of the Romans by the following unlucky accident: Leo, the Roman general, alighting at a fountain to quench his drought during the purſuit, his horſe broke looſe while he ſtooped down to drink. The ſoldiers, who knew him, ſeeing him without a rider, concluded that their general was killed, and thereupon turned the purſuit into a flight. Simeon quickly perceived the diſorder the Romans were in, though not acquainted with the cauſe of it, and, rallying his men, returned to the charge, put ſuch of the enemy to flight as offered to oppoſe him, and purſued them, till the day was far ſpent, with great ſlaughter. Vaſt numbers of common ſoldiers were killed on this occaſion, and ſeveral officers of diſtinction, among whom were Conſtantius Africanus and Grapſon. As for Leo, who commanded in chief, having narrowly eſcaped falling into the enemy's hands, he got ſafe in the end to Meſembria[k]. To this miſtake ſome aſcribe the dreadful overthrow, which the Romans received on this occaſion; but others tell us, that, while Leo was buſy in the purſuit of the enemy, news was brought him, that Romanus Lacapenus, who commanded the fleet, was returned to Conſtantinople, with a deſign to uſurp the ſovereignty, while moſt of the nobility and officers were abſent; that, upon this intelligence, Leo, who had the ſame ambitious view, returned in great haſte to the camp, the better to be informed of the truth;

and that the ſoldiers, imagining he retired out of fear, betook themſelves to flight [l]. Be that as it will, the flower of the Roman army was cut off; and Simeon, elated with this unexpected ſucceſs, reſolved to return before Conſtantinople; but two ſtrong detachments from his army being met and defeated at a place called Cataſyrtes by the imperial troops, he thought it adviſeable to drop the enterpriſe and return home, with the immenſe booty, which he had already got. Even in this encounter or ſkirmiſh the Romans loſt a conſiderable number of men, and ſome officers of great reputation, among whom was Nicolas, the ſon of Conſtantine Ducas, who, on this occaſion, commanded in chief, and to whoſe valour the ſucceſs of the day was chiefly owing. Five years after, Simeon, taking advantage of the inteſtine broils and factions into which the empire was rent by the uſurpations of Romanus, began to make new inroads into the Roman territories. One of his parties advanced as far as Cataſyrtes, in the neighbourhood of Conſtantinople, where they were met by Leo, ſon-in-law to Romanus, and put to flight. In this encounter Michael, a Roman officer, who had ſignalized himſelf on ſeveral occaſions, received a wound, of which he died. A few months after, Simeon ſent into Thrace a very numerous army, commanded by Chaganus and Minicius, with orders to march ſtrait to Conſtantinople. Romanus, receiving timely notice of their deſign, diſpatched Leo, his brother Pothus Argyrus, and one John, againſt them, with all the troops he could aſſemble. The two armies met in the plains of Pegæ, at a ſmall diſtance from Conſtantinople, and thereupon a bloody battle enſued, in which the Romans, frightened with the ſudden flight of John, one of their generals, gave way and were purſued with great ſlaughter by the Bulgarians. Leo and Pothus took refuge in a neighbouring caſtle; John ſaved himſelf on board a ſmall veſſel; but moſt of the other officers and ſoldiers were either cut in pieces, taken priſoners, or drowned in ſtriving to get on board the fleet, which was riding at a ſmall diſtance from the field of battle. Among the latter was Alexius the admiral and ſeveral other officers of the navy. The Bulgarians, now maſters of the field, laid waſte the country without controul, burnt the imperial palace of Pegæ, and cloſely beſieged Adrianople. Leo, ſurnamed Moroleon, from his raſh and inconſiderate boldneſs, defended the place with great gallantry, and made ſeveral ſucceſsful ſallies; but the inhabitants being in the end obliged by famine to ſurrender, Simeon baſely cauſed Leo to be tortured to death [m].

THE king of the Bulgarians, encouraged with this ſucceſs, made vaſt preparations during the following winter, and early in the ſpring took the field, with a deſign to beſiege Conſtantinople itſelf. In his march he laid waſte Macedon and Thrace, and made himſelf maſter of moſt of the ſtrong-holds in thoſe provinces, leaving garriſons in ſome, and levelling others with the ground. At length he approached the imperial city and encamped at Blachernæ, whence he diſpatched a meſſenger to the emperor, requiring, that the patriarch and ſome other perſons of diſtinction might be ſent to treat with him of an accommodation, ſince he was willing, he ſaid, to put an end to ſuch a deſtructive and expenſive war. The emperor readily complied with his requeſt, and, upon the delivery of hoſtages, the conferences were opened. But ſome time after, Simeon deſired an interview with the emperor himſelf, that is, with Romanus, who had cauſed himſelf to be acknowledged the colleague of Conſtantine. Romanus, well pleaſed with this propoſal, went firſt to the place appointed, attended by his guards and the chief nobility. Simeon came ſoon after, and the two princes met on the ninth of December of the preſent year 923. Romanus, in a pathetic ſpeech, put the king of the Bulgarians in mind of the account he was one day to give to the Eternal Judge for the chriſtian blood he had already ſhed; expoſtulated with him, that, being a chriſtian, he ſhould delight in the ſlaughter of thoſe, who profeſſed the ſame religion; exhorted him to join thoſe, with whom he was already united by the ſame faith, and putting an end to ſuch unnatural wars, turn his arms againſt their common enemy the Saracens. He told him in the end, that, if he was prompted by the deſire of riches to commit every-where ſuch devaſtations, the treaſures of the empire ſhould be opened to him, and leave granted him to take from thence what wealth he pleaſed, provided he ſheathed his ſword, and put an end to the ſhedding of chriſtian blood. Simeon was ſo affected with this ſpeech, that he accepted the terms offered him by the emperor, ſigned the treaty, and, having received many rich preſents from Romanus, he returned home, not ſuffering his men to commit the leaſt diſorder in the provinces through which they paſſed [n]. Simeon, having thus concluded a peace with the Romans turned his arms againſt the Chrobati, a neighbouring nation; but he was by them overthrown, with the loſs of his whole army. He did not long outlive this misfortune, but died of grief a few days after. He left three ſons behind him, viz. Michael, whom he had by his firſt wife, Peter, and John, his children by his ſecond wife.

He

He had obliged his eldeſt ſon, whom he diſliked, to take the monaſtic habit ſome years before his death. He was therefore ſucceeded by Peter, to whom, as he was yet under age, George Suſurbulus, his mother's brother, was appointed guardian. The neighbouring nations no ſooner heard of the death of Simeon, than they reſolved to fall jointly upon the Bulgarians, by whom they had been inceſſantly harraſſed during the late king's reign. At the ſame time, a dreadful famine raged in Bulgaria, the corn having been conſumed by incredible multitudes of locuſts. Suſurbulus therefore, fearing the Romans, encouraged by their preſent calamities, might join the neighbouring nations againſt them, adviſed the young prince to invade their dominions firſt with the whole ſtrength of his kingdom, which, he ſaid, would make way for an advantageous treaty, and prevent them from joining their other enemies. Purſuant to this advice, Peter broke into Macedon at the head of a powerful army, deſtroying all with fire and ſword; but when he heard that Romanus was marching againſt him, he diſpatched a monk to the emperor, with propoſals for a peace, which he deſired might be ſtrengthened and confirmed by a more ſtrict alliance, if the emperor thought fit to give him his grand-daughter in marriage. This overture was very acceptable to Romanus; ſo that, after ſeveral negotiations and conferences between the miniſters of the two princes in the city of Meſembria, not only a peace, but a marriage, was concluded between the young king of the Bulgarians and Mary the daughter of Chriſtopher, the emperor's ſon. The articles being agreed on, Peter repaired to Conſtantinople where he was ſplendidly entertained by Romanus, and, with great ſolemnity, married to his grand-daughter by Stephen the patriarch. The king of the Bulgarians was ſcarce returned home, when a conſpiracy was diſcovered, carried on againſt him by John his brother and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction. All who were privy to it were put to death; but the king contented himſelf with confining his brother to a caſtle, whence, with the aſſiſtance of the emperor's embaſſadors, he made his eſcape to Conſtantinople. Soon after, Michael his brother, quitting the monaſtic habit, laid claim to the crown, and was joined by great numbers of Bulgarians; but, he dying, his followers abandoning their native country, broke into the Roman dominions, and, ravaging Macedon and Greece, advanced as far as Nicopolis; which city they took and ſettled there [o]. Upon the death of Romanus, the king of the Bulgarians ſent embaſſadors to Conſtantinople, to renew with his ſucceſſor Nicephorus Phocas his alliance with the emperor, delivering up his two ſons Boriſes and Romanus as hoſtages; but the king dying ſoon after, they were ſent home, where, with much difficulty, they got the better of a powerful faction, headed by the four ſons of one of the chief lords of that country. In the year 970, the Ruſſi or Roſſi, who inhabited the preſent Podolia, broke into Bulgaria, under the conduct of their king Spendoſthalbus, and, having ravaged the country and burnt ſeveral towns, they returned home loaded with booty. The enſuing year they purſued their ravages, and, having put the Bulgarians to flight who attempted to oppoſe them, and, in the purſuit, taken Boriſes and Romanus, the two ſons of Peter, priſoners, they reſolved to ſettle in Bulgaria, finding it a country far more pleaſant and fertile than their own. In this reſolution they were confirmed by one Calocyrus, a Roman fugitive, who engaged to reſign Bulgaria to them, to enter into a ſtrict alliance with their nation, and to pay them annually a conſiderable ſum, provided they raiſed him to the imperial throne. The Ruſſi, well acquainted with the late revolutions of the empire, and the low ebb to which the Roman power was reduced, thought it would be no difficult matter to effectuate what Calocyrus propoſed. Accordingly, having drawn to their aſſiſtance the Patzinacæ, a Sarmatic nation, with the Hunns or Hungarians, and armed ſuch of the conquered Bulgarians, as they thought they might ſafely truſt, they entered Thrace with an army of three hundred and eight thouſand men, and, having ravaged that province, ſat down before Adrianople, where they were ſoon after defeated, and moſt of them cut in pieces, by Bardas Sclerus with a body of twelve thouſand Romans, as we have related elſewhere [p]. Such of the Roſſi as eſcaped the general ſlaughter, returned into Bulgaria; whence they were afterwards driven back to their antient ſeats by John Zimiſces, then emperor. But of the war which that prince made on the Roſſi, till they conſented to abandon Bulgaria, we have ſpoken at length in our Roman hiſtory, to which we refer the reader [q].

THE Bulgarians, being thus delivered from the yoke under which they had groaned ſome years, readily ſubmitted to Zimiſces their deliverer. But their ſubmiſſion laſted no longer than his life; for no ſooner did they receive the news of the emperor's death, than, revolting from the Romans, they inveſted with ſupreme power four brothers, David, Moſes, Aaron, and Samuel, called Cometopoli, becauſe they were the children of an eminent count among them. Romanus had been taken prisoners by Zimisces in his war with the Rossi, and brought by him to Constantinople, whence they both made their escape upon that prince's death. But Borises, in passing through a wood in a Roman dress, was killed by a Bulgarian, who mistook him for a Roman. Romanus indeed was alive, but an eunuch, and consequently incapable of ascending the throne. Of the four brothers, whom we have just mentioned, David died soon after he was invested with the sovereign power; Moses was killed in the siege of a place called Serræ, and Aaron, being suspected of favouring the Romans, and keeping a private correspondence with them, was murdered by Samuel, with all his children, Blackhosthlabus excepted, who was saved by Kadomer the son of Samuel. Samuel, who was a warlike prince and a man of a restless temper, having thus got the whole power into his own hands, made frequent inroads into the Roman territories, returning home with an immense booty, and an incredible number of captives; nay, while Basilius, the successor of Zimisces, was engaged in a civil war with Bardas Sclerus, who had assumed the purple, Samuel, laying hold of that opportunity, over-ran not only Thrace and Macedon, but likewise Thessaly, Greece, and Peloponnesus, in which provinces he committed unheard-of ravages, burnt several cities, took others, and among the rest Larissa, the inhabitants whereof he transplanted, with their whole families, into Bulgaria, incorporated such of them as were able to bear arms among his troops, and employed them against the Romans. Basilius therefore, highly provoked against the Bulgarians, had no sooner put an end to the civil war, than he resolved to employ the whole strength of the empire against them. Pursuant to this resolution, having drawn together all his forces, he left Constantinople, without acquainting even his own generals with his design; and, putting himself at the head of his army, he entered Bulgaria through the country lying near Rhodoptes and the river Eurus, leaving Leo Melissenus behind him to secure the straights, while he, by a short cut through woods and marshes, advanced to Sardica by the Bulgarians called Triaditza, with a design to lay siege to that important place; but as he was making the necessary preparations for the the attack, Stephen, the commander of the western forces, and an irreconcileable enemy to Leo Melissenus, coming to him in the dead of the night, assured him that Leo intended to usurp the sovereign power, and with that design was marching with all the troops under his command, to the imperial city. The emperor, alarmed at this account, and at the same time apprehending the enemy might seize on the passes abandoned by Leo, and cut off his retreat, immediately ordered the army to march.

The emperor, though highly provoked, and indeed with a great deal of reason, against Stephen, the author of so much mischief, contented himself with reviling him only in words, till he began to defend what he had done; and then Basilius, no longer able to command his temper, leaped from his seat, and, taking hold of him by his locks and beard, pulled him down to the ground [r].

The two following years, the emperor was diverted, by intestine broils, from pursuing the war against the Bulgarians; and Samuel their king, taking advantage of these disturbances, harrassed, with daily incursions, the neighbouring provinces. But tranquility was no sooner restored to the empire, than Basilius began to make vast preparations both by sea and land, with a design intirely to subdue, or utterly extirpate, that restless and turbulent nation. In the first place he took a progress into Thrace and Macedon, and, having visited the frontiers on that side, and left a strong garison in Thessalonica, under the command of Gregorius Taronitas, to restrain the Bulgarians, he returned to Constantinople, to hasten the military preparations. In the mean time, Samuel approaching Thessalonica at the head of a numerous army, made himself master of the place, after having, by a stratagem, killed the governor, and taken his son prisoner. Elated with his success, he crossed the Peneus, and, having over-run all Thessaly, Bœotia, and Attica, he penetrated into the very heart of Peloponnesus, destroying all with fire and sword in the provinces through which he passed. Hereupon the emperor dispatched Nicephorus Uranius against him, with the flower of the army, who, leaving his heavy baggage at Larissa, passed with incredible expedition the Pharsalian plains and the river Apidanus, arrived at the Spercheius, and encamped on the banks of that river opposite to Samuel. The river was then so swelled, that Samuel, believing the Romans could not pass it, lay with great security on the other side. However, the emperor became master of the place not long after; but in what manner we are not told [t]. From Servia the emperor returned to Constantinople, carrying with him a great number of captives, and among the rest Nicolas, governor of that place, whom, for his gallant behaviour, he generously raised to the rank of a patrician. But Nicolas, preferring the service of his master to all the honours the emperor could confer upon him, made his escape soon after to Samuel, and with him laid siege to Servia; which the emperor no sooner understood, than he hastened thither in person, obliged the Bulgarians to retire, and, falling upon them in their retreat, took Nicolas a second time prisoner, and sent him to Constantinople, where he was, by the emperor's orders, kept under close confinement. From Servia Basilius led his army into Thessaly, and there repaired such castles, as had been dismantled by the Bulgarians, recovered those that were still held by them, and reunited that province, after it had been some time in their hands, to the empire. The year after, Basilius, early in the spring, entered Bulgaria anew, and laid siege to Bodyna, which held out for the space of eight months, but was in the end taken by storm. As the autumn was already far spent, the emperor, having left a strong garison in Bodyna, marched back with the rest of his troops to Constantinople. When he came, on his return home, to the river Axius, he found Samuel, with all the forces he had been able to assemble, encamped on the opposite bank. But Basilius, having discovered a ford, and passed the river in the dead of the night, fell early next morning on the enemy, before they could put themselves in a posture of defence, and gave them a total overthrow. Simeon's army being thus defeated and dispersed, Romanus, the son of the late king Peter and brother to Borises, delivered up to the emperor the city of Scopiæ, of which he was governor, and was on that account rewarded with the dignity of patrician. Samuel, no longer able to keep the field, placed strong guards in all the passes, to prevent the emperor from penetrating farther into Bulgaria. However, Basilius, bent upon the intire reduction of the country, forced, not without great loss of men, several passes; but, in the straights of Cimba Longus, he had been cut off with his whole army, had not Nicephorus Xiphias, governor of Philippopolis, marched with a strong detachment through by-ways and over a steep mountain, fallen unexpectedly upon the enemy's rear, and by that means obliged them to abandon their post. Hereupon Basilius, entering the straights without opposition, pursued them with great slaughter, though they retired in good order, and, often facing about, skirmished with the Romans. In one of these skirmishes the king narrowly escaped escaped falling into the hands of the Romans by the valour and conduct of his son, who rescued him when he was already surrounded on all sides, and conveyed him safe to the castle of Prilapus, though closely pursued by a body of Roman horse. On this occasion the emperor is said to have taken fifteen thousand prisoners, whom, contrary to his custom, he treated with great inhumanity; for he caused their eyes to be put out, and, to every hundred assigning a guide, who had one eye left, sent them in that condition to Samuel. The king of the Bulgarians, already broken with age and worn out with misfortunes, was so shocked at this dismal spectacle, that he fell into a swoon; and though he returned to himself again, yet, not able to bear up against so great a calamity, he died two days after. [u].

Samuel was succeeded by his son Gabriel, whom he had by a captive of Larissa. In the beginning of his reign, the emperor pursuing the conquest of Bulgaria, made himself master of a strong castle named Matzucius, and then sat down before Strumpitza, a place of great strength. During the siege, he detached Theophylact, one of his generals, with a body of chosen men, to reduce the strong-holds among the mountains, and open a way through the woods. Theophylact made himself master of several places; but being in the end surprised by the Bulgarians in a narrow pass, where he could not draw up his men, he was cut off, with the whole body under his command. The emperor, to whom Strumpitza had submitted after a vigorous resistance, hearing of this misfortune, thought it advisable to retreat; and accordingly marched back to Mosynopolis, and thence to Thessalonica. On his route, he took the castles of Prilapus, Stypeius, Melencius, and Budena, and burnt Buteliana, the royal palace of the Bulgarian kings. During the winter, Gabriel was killed, while he was hunting, by Bladisthlabus, the son of Aaron, whose life he had formerly preserved, as we have related above. Bladisthlabus, being acknowledged king by the Bulgarians, immediately acquainted the emperor with the death of Gabriel and his own promotion, acknowledging himself at the same time a subject and vassal of the empire. But Basilius, suspecting his sincerity, returned early in the spring into Bulgaria, and there made himself master of several strong castles and fortified towns, in one of which he took some of the principal men among the Bulgarians. In the mean time, Bladisthlabus sent a new deputation to the emperor, offering to submit upon what terms he should think proper to prescribe. At the same time, the emperor received letters from the Bulgarians, owning themselves his subjects and vassals. But Basilius, being informed, that neither the king nor his subjects were sincere in their declarations, and that they had made an attempt upon Dyrrhachium, hoping to surprise that important place, entered Bulgaria anew, and, having laid waste the countries of Ostrobus, Gosens, and Pelagonia, advanced to Achris, the place where the Bulgarian kings usually resided, which he reduced; and then, leaving part of his army in Pelagonia, to awe the Bulgarians, he marched out with the rest to reduce the neighbouring provinces. But he was scarce gone, when Ibatzes, a man of great distinction among the Bulgarians, and remarkable for his valour and experience in war, having drawn the Romans left by the emperor into an ambuscade, cut them off, with their commanders, all to a man. Hereupon Basilius, marching back in great rage, laid several cities in ashes, ravaged the open country with fire and sword, and, having taken a great number of prisoners, ordered their eyes to be put out, and, in that condition, sent them to Bladisthlabus. On the other hand, the Bulgarians, making frequent sallies from the woods, cut great numbers of his men in pieces; insomuch, that, his army being greatly diminished, he thought it adviseable to return earlier than usual to Constantinople. On his march, he laid siege to the castle of Pernicus; but the garison making a vigorous resistance, he lay before it eighty days, assaulting it almost every day with his whole army; but, being constantly repulsed with great loss of men, he was in the end obliged to drop the enterprise and retire. However, thinking he could not, without forfeiting his reputation, drop the war, till he had intirely subdued Bulgaria, after having so often invaded it in person, he allowed his army but a short respite; and then, taking the field again, he laid siege to Castoria, a fortified town in Pelagonia. But, in the mean time, the king of the Bulgarians, having drawn together all the forces he could muster, began to march towards the frontiers of the empire, in order to oblige the emperor to abandon Bulgaria, and hasten back to the defence of his own dominions. Basilius, accordingly, breaking up the siege of Castoria, marched against Bladisthlabus, who, not caring to put the whole to the issue of an engagement, retired at his approach. Basilius detached Constantine Diogenes in pursuit of the enemy, who put many of them to the sword, took the horses and baggage of the king, with one of his kinsmen, and returned loaded with booty. After this, the emperor took by storm the castle of Sateena, where he found a great quantity of corn, which he caused to be removed, and then set fire to the place. Having ended the campaign, he returned, according to his custom, to Constantinople. He was no sooner gone, than the king of the Bulga- rians laid siege to Dyrrhachium; but the garison making a vigorous resistance, he was slain in an assault. The Bulgarians, who had hitherto defended their country with an unparallelled valour, and maintained their liberties against the whole strength of the empire, in a war which had lasted twenty years and upwards, being now quite disheartened by the loss of their king, sent deputies to the emperor, with offers of a total and unfeigned submission. Basilius received them in the most obliging manner, and, hastening into Bulgaria, was met on the confines by the governors of thirty-six castles, which they delivered up to him. Their example was followed by most of the chief men of Bulgaria, and even by the wife of the deceased king, who, coming to the emperor, with three of her sons and her six daughters, renounced all claim to the kingdom of Bulgaria. She had three other sons by the king; but they had taken refuge on the tops of the Ceraunic mountains, whence they were soon after obliged by famine, the emperor having ordered all the passes to be carefully guarded, to come down and surrender themselves. Basilius received them in the most obliging manner imaginable, raised Prosranus, who seems to have been the eldest, to the dignity of magister, and the other five to that of patrician. To the mother and the daughters he allowed a maintenance suitable to their rank, and ever treated them with the utmost respect. At Achris, where the Bulgarian kings usually resided, he was received by his new subjects with loud acclamations. There he seized on the immense treasure of the Bulgarian princes, and found, among other things of great value, several crowns enriched with pearl, and a great quantity of gold, which he bestowed as a donative upon his soldiers [w]. There remained now but one man in the whole country capable of raising disturbances, who had not submitted to the emperor. This was Ibatzes, a person nearly allied to the royal family, and one who, during the course of the war, had given several instances of his courage and implacable hatred to the Romans. He, refusing to comply with the present posture of affairs, seized on a castle standing on the top of a mountain most difficult of access, and, having fortified himself there, declared, that he was determined to hold out to the last extremity. But in what manner he was seized in his castle and brought to the emperor, we have related at length in our Roman history [x], to which we refer the reader. And now Basilius, absolute master of all Bulgaria, took a progress through the country, receiving ceiving every-where the ſubmiſſions of his new ſubjects, and cauſing ſeveral caſtles to be demoliſhed, leſt the Bulgarians, ſeizing on them, ſhould attempt to ſhake off the yoke. Then, leaving Bulgaria, he repaired to Athens, and, aſcribing the ſucceſs that had attended his arms to the protection of the virgin Mary, he enriched her church in that city with many preſents of great value. From Athens he returned to Conſtantinople, which he entered in triumph through the golden-gate, amidſt the loud acclamations of the multitude, the widow of the late king of the Bulgarians, with all the princes and princeſſes of the blood royal, walking before him. This conqueſt and final reduction of Bulgaria, which had been often attempted in vain by other emperors, was effected by Raſilius in the forty-fourth year of his reign and of the chriſtian æra 1019.

The Bulgarians bore the yoke patiently for the ſpace of ſeventeen years, that is, till the year 1036, the ſecond of Michael IV. when they revolted on the following occaſion: One Deleanus, as we read in Cedrenus, or Dolianus, as Zonaras calls him, by birth a Bulgarian, but ſlave or ſervant to a citizen of Conſtantinople, eſcaping from his maſter, fled into Bulgaria, and there gave out, that he was the ſon of Gabriel and grandſon of Samuel, kings of that country. This he affirmed with ſuch confidence, that the Bulgarians, giving intire credit to all he ſaid, and being already weary of the yoke, to which they had lately ſubmitted, received him every-where with joyful acclamations, and proclaimed him king of Bulgaria, ſacrificing to this new idol all the Romans, who had the misfortune to fall into their hands. Baſilius Synademus, governor of Dyrrhachium, no ſooner heard of this inſurrection, than he marched out againſt the rebels, with all the troops under his command; but an unſeaſonable quarrel ariſing between him and a tribune in the army, named Michael Democaitas, the contention was carried to ſuch a height, that the tribune accuſed Synademus at court of high treaſon; who was thereupon, by the emperor's orders, ſeized, and ſent to Theſſalonica, to be confined there to cloſe priſon. The accuſer was preferred to the government of Dyrrhachium in his room; but in that command he behaved with ſuch inſolence, that the people, no longer able to bear his tyrannical temper and cruel exactions, roſe againſt him and drove him out of the town. This they were well appriſed the emperor would highly reſent, and therefore, deſpairing of pardon, they openly revolted, and choſe for their king one Teichomer, a ſoldier of great reputation among them. This unexpected election very much ſurpriſed Deleanus and his adherents; for there were now two powerful factions in Bulgaria, the city and territory of Dyrrhachium acknowledging Teichomer, and the reſt of the country Deleanus. This, Deleanus was well appriſed, would occaſion the ruin of both, and therefore reſolved, by ſome means or other, to get rid of his new rival; but, as that could not be well effected by force, he had recourſe to artifice; and, pretending to be highly pleaſed with the election of Teichomer, he wrote obliging letters to him, congratulating him upon his new dignity, expreſſed great joy in having him for his collegue, and earneſtly intreated him to come and ſhare the ſovereignty with him. Teichomer, believing him ſincere in his profeſſions, went and joined him with all his forces. Deleanus, having thus got him, as he thought, into his power, watched his opportunity; and, having called the ſoldiers together, he told them, that Bulgaria could not, in his opinion, admit of two kings; and that therefore they ought either to confirm his election, who was deſcended from Samuel, and remove Teichomer, or, if they thought fit, to depoſe him, and veſt Teichomer with the whole power. This ſpeech occaſioned, at firſt, a great conteſt in the army, which ended in the choice of Deleanus and the death of Teichomer, who was ſtoned by the ſoldiery. Deleanus, having thus got the whole power into his hands, led his army, without loſs of time, towards Theſſalonica, where Michael then was; but, upon the firſt news of his approach, the emperor fled to Conſtantinople, leaving all his baggage and treaſure behind him, under the care of Manuel Ibatza, who was ordered to convey it to the imperial city. But Ibatza, betraying his truſt, carried it over to Deleanus, whoſe party being ſtrengthened by ſome new acceſſion almoſt every day, he ſent a ſtrong body of troops, under the conduct of one Caucanus, againſt Dyrrhachium, which was ſoon reduced; and diſpatched another, commanded by one Anthemius, into Greece, at whoſe approach the province of Nicopolis, revolting from the emperor, cut in pieces his officers, by whom they had been moſt grievouſly oppreſſed, and ſubmitted to the rebels. In the mean time Aluſianus, the ſecond ſon of Aaron, and brother to Bladiſthlabus the laſt king of Bulgaria, who, ſubmitting with the reſt of his countrymen to Baſilius, had been raiſed by him to the rank of patrician, retiring privately from Conſtantinople, returned into his native country. He had been accuſed of ſome illegal proceedings by the inhabitants of Theodoſiopolis, of which city he had been appointed governor by Baſilius. Hereupon John, the emperor's brother, who ruled with an abſolute ſway, and bore an irreconcileable hatred to Aluſianus, not only prevailed upon Michael to forbid him the court, but obliged him, before his cauſe was heard, to pay a great ſum of gold, and, what provoked him moſt, forced a beautiful woman from him, for whom he had a great paſſion. Aluſianus, not knowing how far the emperor, at the inſtigation of his brother, might carry his reſentment, retired privately from Conſtantinople, and, in the diſguiſe of an Armenian, got ſafe to Oſtrobus, where Deleanus lay encamped with his army. Both the ſoldiery and people received him with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy; which did not a little alarm Deleanus. However, diſſembling his fears, and pretending to be no leſs pleaſed with his arrival than the reſt, he offered to ſhare with him the ſovereignty. Aluſianus readily accepted the offer, and, being by all acknowledged as his collegue, in order to gain the affections of the people and ſoldiery, he immediately marched, at the head of forty thouſand men, to beſiege Theſſalonica. But Conſtantine the patrician, a perſon nearly related to the emperor, making a very gallant and vigorous reſiſtance, Aluſianus, after having, for ſix days together, battered the walls with all ſorts of engines, and attempted, with repeated aſſaults, to make himſelf maſter of the place, was in the end obliged to turn the ſiege into a blockade, hoping the gariſon would be ſoon forced by famine to ſubmit. But the beſieged, making a general and unexpected ſally, cut fifteen thouſand of the Bulgarians in pieces, and obliged the reſt to break up the ſiege and ſave themſelves by a precipitous flight. This defeat increaſed the jealouſies which the two competitors had already conceived of each other, Deleanus aſcribing the overthrow to treachery, and Aluſianus, upon the ſenſe of his late misfortune, apprehending that his rival would lay hold of the firſt opportunity to ſtir up the people and ſoldiery againſt him: thus each in private began to meditate the ruin and deſtruction of the other. But Aluſianus was in the end before-hand with his collegue; for, having invited him to an entertainment, he encouraged him to drink till he was quite intoxicated, and then cauſed his eyes to be put out. After this, diſtruſtful of his own intereſt, and well acquainted with the fickle temper of the Bulgarians, he wrote to the emperor, offering to ſubmit and return to his duty, provided Michael would grant him his pardon, and ſuch a reward as his ſervice might be thought to deſerve. The emperor readily complied with his requeſt, conferred on him the dignity of magiſter, and ſent him to Conſtantinople. Michael had already reſolved to march in perſon into Bulgaria, and employ the whole ſtrength of the empire againſt the rebels, ſaying, it was a ſhame for him, who had added nothing to the empire, to ſuffer any part of it to be loſt. Upon the ſubmiſſion therefore of Aluſianus, he led his army, without loſs of time, into Bulgaria, though he was then ſo ſo ill of a dropſy, that all about him thought every day would prove his laſt. However, being reſolved not to let ſlip ſo favourable an opportunity of attacking the Bulgarians, while deſtitute of a leader, he could by no means be prevailed upon to drop the enterpriſe. Upon his firſt entering Bulgaria, Deleanus fell into his hands, whom he immediately ſent to Theſſalonica; then, penetrating farther into the country, he diſperſed ſome Bulgarians, who began to aſſemble, received the allegiance of the chief men of the country, and, having taken Manuel Ibatza, of whom we have ſpoken above, he returned with him and Deleanus in triumph to Conſtantinople[y]. From this time the Bulgarians continued ſubject to the emperors of Conſtantinople, whom they powerfully aſſiſted both againſt the Latins and the Turks, and were on that account allowed to chuſe a king of their own nation, who nevertheleſs owned himſelf a vaſſal of the empire. In 1206, John, king of Bulgaria, marching againſt Baldwin, the firſt emperor of the Latins in Conſtantinople, while he was beſieging Adrianople, defeated his army with great ſlaughter, relieved the city, and, having taken the emperor himſelf priſoner, carried him to Ternova, at that time the capital of Bulgaria. There he cauſed his hands and feet to be cut off, and then ordered him, thus maimed, to be thrown into a neighbouring valley, where he lay in the utmoſt agony for three days, and, then expiring, was devoured by the wild beaſts and birds of prey. In 1275, Stephen, the fourth king of Hungary, overcame in a great battle Cea prince of Bulgaria, and, having cut his whole army in pieces, obliged the Bulgarians to acknowledge him for their king. Hence Stephen and his ſucceſſors were ſtyled kings of Hungary and Bulgaria, which title paſſed, with the kingdom of Hungary, to the princes of the houſe of Auſtria, as we ſhall hereafter relate more at length. With the aſſiſtance of the Greek emperors they ſhook off the Hungarian yoke, and in 1369, under the conduct of Saſmenos their king, they attempted the recovery of Adrianople, taken by the Turks; but were utterly defeated by Amurath I. who had no ſooner ſettled his affairs in Aſia, than, provoked againſt the Bulgarians for their late attempt, he turned his arms againſt them, and, entering Bulgaria with a numerous army, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſtrong-holds, and obliged Saſmenos to purchaſe a peace, by yielding to him the far greater part of his kingdom, and promiſing to hold the reſt as his vaſſal and tributary. But Bajazet, who ſucceeded Amurath, invading Bulgaria without the leaſt provocation, made an abſolute con-
